JOHN ANTHON, ESQ.

DEAR BROTHER,

IF the present dedication be not in strict unison with the regulations of literary etiquette, my only apology is, that, in affixing to these pages the name of my best adviser and friend, I am giving utterance to feelings too sacred in their nature to be trammelled by the mere customs of the day. Nor indeed, apart even from every consideration of duty and attachment, do I see any good reason to abandon the course which I am pursuing, or to doubt for a moment of its propriety. I might, it is true, have selected some more titled individual, and have sent forth my humble labours under other and more imposing auspices; but where could I have found one more ardently attached to the splendid exertions of departed intellect? or, (if a brother be allowed to express the opinion,) one better qualified to appreciate the genius and the taste of antiquity?

Allow me to occupy your attention for a few moments, in relation to the work which is here presented, and the improvements, if they deserve to be so termed, that have been made in it. To the student who is desirous of an acquaintance with the general features of ancient times, the Classical Dictionary of Dr. Lempriere has always been recommended as a sure and accurate guide; and so high a reputation has the work obtained, as to have passed through more than twelve editions in England, and four in our own country. That it is in many respects worthy of great commendation, few will deny; since, from the direct bearing which it exercises upon the studies of the young scholar, it cannot but prove to him a pleasing and valuable auxiliary; while the man of general reading will be enabled to glean from its pages, information on almost any point of antiquity which he may wish to investigate. That it is worthy, however, of the blind admiration which many seem to entertain for it, or can be considered as accurate in many of its details, no one who has bestowed upon it the same patient examination which I have done, will be disposed to affirm. Having had frequent occasion to refer the young student to the pages of Lempriere, I was often startled by the strange answers which a perusal of the work led him to give to questions that had been proposed, and having my attention thus drawn to a closer examination of the volume, I soon became convinced that it was a strange medley of valuable materials and miserable trash, of correct information and careless conjecture; and, what was far worse, that the precept of the Roman Satyrist, which no instructor of youth should for a moment lose sight of, was violated on almost every page. There seemed, indeed, to be a strange pruriency on the part of the author, and one totally irreconcilable with his sacred profession, to bring forward on many occasions what should have remained covered with the mantle of oblivion. Often, in place of stating important particulars respecting an individual or a nation, some disgusting trait of moral deformity was alone mentioned, and it was thought fit information for the youthful student, to call his attention to what could have no other tendency than to initiate him in the mysteries of heathen iniquity. I trust that I shall not be thought to have used too unsparing a hand in removing what was thus offensive; my only regret indeed is, that I have allowed any portion of it to remain. Worse than idle are all the efforts of the scholar, if moral purity be a stranger to his breast, and vainly will he toil in the rich mine of antiquity, if every step exposes him to some fatal damp, which may prostrate for ever both his principles and his happiness.

It was with no small pleasure, therefore, that I received from a very respectable quarter, an application to edit the Classical Dictionary of Dr. Lempriere. Upon stating my opinion of the work, the proprietor, with great liberality, placed it entirely under my controul, and allowed me to make whatever alterations I might deem proper. The incessant labour which a work of this kind required, no one can well imagine, who has not had the evil fortune, I might almost call it, of being engaged in a similar undertaking. Every leisure moment which could be obtained from the fatiguing routine of Academic instruction, and from the two elementary works which I chanced to be editing when the offer was made for the present volume, has, I need not tell you how faithfully, been bestowed upon this almost Herculean task. Application such as this, however, could not but prove injurious to health, and long before the end of the volume was reached, I was compelled to relinquish the original plan, and make additions only where they could not in any way be omitted. The result of all this is, that Lempriere's Dictionary is here offered in a far less offensive garb than heretofore, and with such alterations as I trust cannot but prove useful. The plan pursued by me has been to enclose the added portions in brackets, an arrangement which, though to some it may occasionally wear an awkward appearance, was yet the best and least ostentatious that could be devised. The number of additions, many of which constitute entire articles, is above three thousand, exclusive of simple references from one part of the volume to another. Besides these, alterations have been silently made, on almost every page, in the language of the original. To some the additions may appear so numerous, as to give rise to the suspicion that many things have been altered or added in the mere spirit of correction. The answer to such is, that even now the work is highly susceptible of still farther improvement, and that my chief fear is, lest they who are well acquainted with these subjects may censure me for having allowed so much to pass uncorrected.

The most important head in Lempriere's Dictionary is that of ancient geography, and on this by far the largest portion of my time has been bestowed. My principal guide has been the excellent work of Mannert,* which is, I believe, little known in this country, and yet forms one of the most valuable treatises in this department of instruction. I have in almost every instance given him the preference to D'Anville, not from any wish to depreciate the merits of the latter, but from a firm conviction of the decided superiority of the German scholar. Much valuable matter has also been obtained from the geography of Malte-Brun. The additions made to the geographical articles in Lempriere will prove, I trust, the more useful, inasmuch as those parts of the original whose place they supply were written in a manner so utterly careless and inaccurate, as, in most instances, to bid defiance to any thing short of total alteration.

As far as relates to Classical criticism or controversy, the best writers have been uniformly consulted, and, where the limits of the volume would not admit of any extended detail, a reference has been made to such works as will furnish more ample sources of information. As often too as it was practicable, an account of the latest and best editions of ancient authors has been given, in addition to those already cited by Dr. Lempriere.

The Chronological table has been retained unaltered, except that the erroneous mode of computation, established by Dr. Lempriere, has been rectified in a note at the beginning of the table, for the substance of which I am indebted to the Classical Geography of Dr. Butler, the learned editor of Æschylus. The tables of Measures, &c. have also been allowed to remain.

In addition to all that has been said, it is deemed necessary to state, that, in order to make room for the new matter, much useless lumber has been thrown out of the work. Of what possible value can it be to the scholar to learn merely of one individual, that he was "a soldier," of another, that he was "a sailor," of a third, that he was "a man of Peloponnesus?" or what good end can it answer to crowd a book with the name of every petty village in Greece, unless that name be associated with some feature of her history? And yet all this was done in the original work, on almost every page, to the continual exclusion of valuable and interesting information.

In the remarks which I have made respecting the work of Dr. Lempriere, I have been actuated solely by a sense of duty, not by any wish to deprive his memory of the honours which have been conferred upon it. To borrow the idea of the great critic of antiquity, he deserves rather to be commended for what he has done, than to be censured for what he has left undone. Far be it from me, therefore, to rob him in any way of the praises which are his due.

Preface to the Sixth American Edition.

IN presenting a new edition of Lempriere's Dictionary to the notice of the public, the editor feels himself called upon to tender his sincere acknowledgments for the very flattering patronage which has been extended to his labours. The rapid sale of the previous impression has induced him to spare no efforts toward rendering the present volume still more deserving of public patronage, both as regards typographical appearance and the nature of the additions which have been made to the work itself. Not only have all the articles previously altered or added been carefully revised, and, whenever it appeared requisite, materially enlarged, but many of them have also been written anew; and, besides this, important and extensive additions been still farther made to the work. It was stated in the preface to the fifth edition that the whole number of additions which had been appended to the volume amounted to above three thousand; in the present edition they exceed four thousand. In making this statement, the editor is conscious of being actuated by any other than feelings of ostentation, or a wish to magnify his labours by an imposing display of their numerical strength. He owes it to himself, however, to be thus explicit respecting the nature and extent of those labours, lest any may imagine that he is desirous of elevating his own reputation upon the ruins of another's fame, or of acquiring for himself a character for scholarship by a few specious and paltry improvements.

The articles on which the most labour has been bestowed are the following: Aristoteles, Cannæ, Capua, Carneades, Carthago, Caucasus, Celtæ, Chaldæa, Cicero, Cimmerii, Cyclopes, Daricus, Decemviri, Delphi, Diogenes, Dithyrambus, Druides, Eleusis, Epicurus, Eridanus, Euphrates, Falernus, Ganges, Gigantes, Græcia, Hercules, Hetruria, Homerus, Horatius, Hyperborei, Ierne, Imaus, India, Indus, Iones, Josephus, Italia, Julianus, Jupiter, Lacedæmon, Lectonia, Mare Mediterraneum, Melita, Memnonium, Mercurius, Meroë, Musæ, Musæus, Moeris, Mycale, Mycenæ, Nepos, Niger, Nilus, Ilias, Odyssea, Orosus, Orpheus, Osiris, Padus, Pæstum, Palestina, Palmyra, Pandora, Pantheon, Pelasgi, Phaëton, Phœnicia, Phœtius, Pindarus, Piræus. Plato, Pomptinæ Paludes, Prometheus, Pyramides, Pythagoras, Quintilianus, Quintus Curtius, Roma, Rubicon, Sallustius, Samaria, Scylax, Seleucia, Senatus, Seres, Sibyllæ, Sidon, Silius Italicus, Sophocles, Sphinx, Stephanus, Ste-sichorus, Strongyle, Suidas, Sunium, Syene, Symmachus, Tacitus, Tanais, Tarpobane, Tarsus, Taurus, Tentyra, Terentius, Thales, Thebæ, Thermopylæ, Thucydides, Thule, Tigris, Troja, Valerius Maximus, Varro, Velleius Paterculus, Veneti, Vesuvius, Ulpianus, Xenophon, Zeno, Zenobia. Of these articles many occupy several columns.

Along with the additions that have been made to the present volume the editor has introduced whatever appeared new and interesting in the theories of the day. He has taken the liberty also of occasionally intruding theories of his own. Regarding these last with a partial eye, as every one is induced to regard the creations of his own imagination, he has been bold enough to place them by the side of other and more approved theories, not from the vain desire of instituting a comparison between his own and the labours of others, but that the presence of the latter might in some degree shield his own efforts from the animadversions of sober and cautious criticism. As regards the nature of some of the articles which have been just particularly enumerated, the reader will find under Aristoteles, an enlarged biography of that philosopher; under Carthago, an account of the ancient Punic literature; under Chaldæa, a theory respecting the Sclavonic origin of the Chaldæan race; under Cicero, an analysis of the works of that illustrious Roman; under Cyclopes, a theory respecting their location and the etymology of their name; under Daricus, remarks on the value of that coin; under Decemviri, a theory respecting the origin of the Roman laws; under Druïdes, some remarks on that singular priesthood; under Eleusis, an explanation of the probable object of the mysteries; under Eridanus and Phaëton, remarks respecting the existence, in former ages, of a milder temperature in the north of Europe; under Falernus, an account of the Roman wines, and the situation of the Falernian vineyards; under Gigantes, an argument against the possible existence, at any period, of a gigantic race; under Græcia and Iones, a theory respecting the movements and history of the earlier tribes of Greece; under Hercules, a theory identifying that hero with the sun; under Hetruria, a theory reconciling the conflicting opinions of the learned in relation to the origin of the Etrurians; under Homerus, remarks upon the several theories which have been started respecting the poet and his works, and an attempt to prove that alphabetic writing was known in the age of Homer; under Horatius, remarks upon the Epistle to the Pisos; under Hyperborei, a theory respecting the early settlements of the human race; under Ierne, remarks upon the early religious system of Ireland; under Imaus, a full account of that remarkable chain; under Josephus, remarks upon the works of that writer, and upon the passage in which mention is made of our Saviour; under Italia, a theory respecting the early population of that country; under Jupiter, an analysis of the religion of Greece; under Lacedæmon, remarks respecting the affinity between the Lacedæmonians and Hebrews; under Lectonia, a theory respecting that ancient land, now sunk beneath the waters of the Mediterranean; under Mediterraneum Mare, a theory respecting the overflowing of the Hellespont, and the inundation of the northern coast of Africa; under Melita, remarks upon the voyage of St. Paul; under Memnonium, a theory respecting the Egyptian Memnon; under Mycæ and Nepos, corrections of the historian; under Niger and Nilus, a full account of those streams; under Orpheus, remarks upon the several theories of the learned respecting the Orphic remains, and an attempt to prove that the ancient bard was of Indian origin; under Pandora, remarks upon that old tradition, and an attempt to establish an analogy between it and the Scriptural account of the origin of evil; under Pelasgi, remarks upon that singular race, and upon the introduction of Alphabetic writing into Greece; under Pindarus, remarks upon his lyric productions; under Plato, remarks upon the life and doctrines of that philosopher; under Pomptinæ Paludes, an historical account of the Pontine marshes; under Pyramides, an account of those structures, and a theory respecting their origin; under Pythagoras, remarks upon the life and doctrines of that philosopher; under Roma, a theory respecting the true origin of Rome; under Sphinx, an account of the excavation of that monument; under Syene, remarks upon the position of that place; under Tacitus, remarks upon the dialogue "De claris oratoribus;" under Taurus, a full description of that range of mountains; under Tentyra, remarks upon the famous zodiac; under Thebe, remarks upon the origin, history, and ruins of that famous city, and upon the state of the arts in ancient Egypt, together with an account of the mummies; under Thermopylæ, a description of that pass; under Thule, remarks upon the probable location of that island; under Troja, remarks upon the site of ancient Troy, and the true cause of the Trojan war ; under Varro, an account of the life and writings of that learned Roman ; under Veneti, a theory respecting their Slavonic origin ; under Zeno, remarks upon the life of that philosopher, and the doctrines of the Stoic sect. Of these theories, the one on which most labour has been bestowed, and to which the attention of the student is particularly invited, is that respecting the true origin of Rome. The editor regrets that he could not obtain access, while preparing it, to the history of Rome by the celebrated Niebuhr, as it would in that event have assumed, no doubt, a more conclusive and satisfactory shape.

In addition to the works mentioned in the preface to the fifth edition, from which valuable aid has been derived in the preparation of the preceding articles, the editor takes the present opportunity of enumerating ; Ukert's Geographie der Griechen und Römer ; Michaelis Spicilegium Geographiæ Hebræorum Exteræ ; Schoell, Histoire de la Littérature Grecque Profane ; Histoire Abrégée de la Littérature Romaine, by the same author ; Mohnike's Geschichte der Literatur der Griechen und Römer ; Tiraboschi, Storia della Letteratura Italiana ; Dunlop's History of Roman Literature ; Oxford Classical Journal ; Museum Criticum ; and Ritter's Vorhülle Europäischer Völkergeschichten vor Herodotus. Of the last of these, however, the editor has made but a sparing use, as he intends, at some future day, to lay before the public a work on the connection between the religious systems of the Eastern and Western nations, of which the profound investigations of Ritter will be made the basis.

The Editor concludes with the hope that the various theories which the young student may find in the course of this volume, will, if they produce no other result, teach him at least how wide a field for speculation still remains unexplored amid the apparently trite subjects of Classical antiquity ; while to the critic he would address himself in the language of an ancient writer, "sequimur probabilia, nec ultra id quam quod verisimile occurrit progredi possumus, et refellere sine pertinacia et refelli sine iracundia parati sumus."

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE,

From the Creation of the World to the Fall of the Roman Empire in the west and in the east.

[The rules laid down by Dr. Lempriere, in the note at the commencement of the Chronological Table, for finding the year of Rome and the Olympiads, may lead to errors of considerable magnitude. He ought to have observed that there should be added to the remainder in the former case, one for the current year, and in the latter, one for the current Olympiad, and one for the current year of that Olympiad. The following rules may therefore be given :

RULE I.

To find the year of Rome.

Subtract the given year before Christ from 753, (the date of the foundation of Rome,) and add to the remainder one for the current year, the result will give the year of Rome sought.

RULE II.

To find the Olympiad.

Subtract the given year from 776, (the era of the conquest of Corebus,) divide the remainder by 4, and to the quotient add one for the current Olympiad, and one for the current year of it.]

* In the following table, I have confined myself to the more easy and convenient eras of before, (B. C.) and after, (A. D.) Christ. For the sake of those, however, that do not wish the exclusion of the Julian period, it is necessary to observe, that, as the first year of the Christian era always falls on the 4714th of the Julian years, the number required either before or after Christ, will easily be discovered by the application of the rules of subtraction or addition. The era from the foundation of Rome (A. U. C.) will be found with the same facility, by recollecting that the city was built 753 years before Christ; and the Olympiads can likewise be recurred to by the consideration, that the conquest of Corebus (B. C. 776.) forms the first Olympiad, and that the Olympic games were celebrated after the revolution of four years.

AB

ABA or Abæ, [a city of Phocis in Greece, famous for an oracle of Apollo more ancient than that at Delphi, and also for a rich temple plundered and burnt by the Persians. The city is said to have been founded by the Abantes and named after their leader Abas. Paus. 10, c. 3.—Steph. de Urb.—Strab. 9.]

[ABACÆNUM, a town of Sicily near Messina; its ruins are supposed to be in the neighbourhood of the modern Tripi.]

ABĀLUS, [according to the ancients, an island in the German ocean, on whose shores amber was collected in great abundance, being driven thither by the waves in the spring. It is supposed by Mannert to have been the southern extremity of Sweden, mistaken by the ancients for an island on account of their ignorance of the country to the north. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. Vol. 4. p. 304.]

ABANTES, [a people of Thracian origin who settled in Phocis and founded Abæ. According to some ancient authors they afterwards emigrated to Eubœa. Herod. 1, c. 146.—Hom. Il. 2, 542.]

Their posterity was called Latini, from Latinus, one of their kings.—They assisted Æneas against Turnus. Rome was built in their country. The word signifies without origin, or whose origin is not known, and is generally applied to the original inhabitants of any country. Liv. 1. c. 1, &c.—

Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 10.—Justin. 43, c. 1.—Plin. 5, c. 5.—Strab. 5.

ABORRAS a river of Mesopotamia. Strab. 16. vid. Chaboras.

ABRADÄTES, a king of Susa, who when his wife Panthea had been taken prisoner by Cyrus, and humanely treated, surrendered himself and his troops to the conqueror. He was killed in the first battle which he undertook in the cause of Cyrus, and his wife stabbed herself on his corpse. Cyrus raised a monument on their tomb. Xenoph. Cyrop. 5, 6, &c.

ABRENTIUS, was made governor of Tarentum by Annibal. He betrayed his trust to the enemy to gain the favours of a beautiful woman, whose brother was in the Roman army. Polyæn. 8.

ABROCÖMAS, son of Darius, was in the army of Xerxes, when he invaded Greece. He was killed at Thermopylæ. Herodot. 7, c. 224.—Plaut. in Cleom.

ABRODIÆTUS, a name given to Parrhasius the painter, on account of the sumptuous manner of his living. vid. Parrhasius.

ABRON, an Athenian, who wrote some treatises on the religious festivals and sacrifices of the Greeks. Only the titles of his works are preserved. Suidas.—A grammarian of Rhodes, who taught rhetoric at Rome.—Another who wrote a treatise on Theocritus.—A Spartan, son of Lycurgus the orator. Plut. in 10. Orat.—A native of Argos, famous for his debauchery.

ABRONYCUS, an Athenian very serviceable to Themistocles in his embassy to Sparta. Thucyd. 1, c. 91.—Herodot. 8, c. 21.

ABRONIUS, Silo, a Latin poet in the Augustan age. He wrote some fables. Senec.

ABRÖTA, the wife of Nisus the youngest of the sons of Ægeus. As a monument to her chastity, Nisus, after her death, ordered the garments which she wore to become the models of fashion in Megara. Plut. Quest. Græc.

ABROTÖNUM, the mother of Themistocles. Plut. in Them.—A town of Africa, near the Syrtes. Plin. 5, c. 4.—A harlot of Thrace. Plut. in Arat.

ABRUS, a city of the Sapæi. Paus. 7, c. 10.

ABRYPOLIS, an ally of Rome, driven from his possessions by Perseus, the last king of Macedonia. Liv. 42, c. 13 and 41.

ABSÆUS, a giant, son of Tartarus and Terra. Hygin. Pref. fab.

ABSINTHII, a people on the coasts of Pontus, where there is also a mountain of the same name. Herodot. 6, c. 34.

[ABSXYRTIDES or Apsyrtides, islands in the Adriatic, on the coast of Illyricum, mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Mela, and Ptolemy. They were so called from Absyrtus, Medea's brother, who was said to have been killed there by his sister. They are separated by a channel, and are now called Cherso and Oseio. Strab. 7.]

ABSXYRTA, a son of Æetes king of Colchis and Hypseus. His sister Medea, as she fled away with Jason, tore his body to pieces, and strewed his limbs in her father's way, to stop his pursuit. Some say that she murdered her Colchis, [Others in one of the Absyrtides, while others again lay the scene at Tomos, on the western shores of the Euxine. It has been maintained on the contrary that he was not murdered, but that he arrived safe in Illyricum.] Lucan. 3, v. 190.—Strab. 7.—Hygm. fab. 23.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Flacc. 8, v. 261.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 9.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 19.—Plin. 3, c. 21 and 26.

ABULITES, governor of Susa, betrayed his trust to Alexander, and was rewarded with a province. Curt. 5, c. 2.—Diod. 17.

[ABUS, a river of Britain, now the Humber.]

ABYDOS, [an inland town of Thebais in Upper Egypt, famous for the palace of Memnon and the magnificent temple of Osiris. Now, a heap of ruins, as its modern name of Madfuné expresses.—Plut. de Isid. et Osir.—A city of Asia, founded by the Milesians, situate on the Hellespont, and lying opposite to Sestos. Some make the straight only half a mile, others, two miles wide. Strabo reckons 3750 paces from the port of Abydos to that of Sestos. It is famous for the bridge of boats which Xerxes made there across the Hellespont, and for the loves of Leander and Hero. Its situation was formerly very important, as it commanded the communication between the Euxine Sea and the Archipelago. It was attacked by Philip of Macedon, and the inhabitants devoted themselves to death with their families, rather than fall into the hands of the enemy. Liv. 31, c. 18.—Lucan. 2, v. 674.—Justin. 2, c. 13.—Museus. in Her. & Leand.—Flacc. 1, v. 285.]

ABÿ A. Vid. Abila.

ABYSSINIA, a large kingdom of Africa, in Upper Æthiopia, where the Nile takes its rise. The inhabitants were said to be of Arabian origin, and were little known to the ancients.

ACACALLIS, a nymph, mother of Philander and Phylacis by Apollo. These children were exposed to the wild beasts in Crete; but a goat gave them her milk, and preserved their life. Paus. 10, c. 16.—A daughter of Minos, mother of Cydon, by Mercury, and of Amphithemis by Apollo. Paus. 8, c. 53.—Apollon. 4, v. 1493.

ACACÆSIUM, a town of Arcadia, built by Acacus son of Lycaon. Mercury, surnamed Acacesius, because brought up by Acacus as his foster-father, was worshipped there. Paus. 8, c. 3, 36, &c.

ACACIUS, a rhetorician in the age of the emperor Julian.

ACADĒMIA, a place near Athens, surrounded with high trees, and adorned with spacious covered walks. [It derived its name from one Academus, a citizen of Athens, to whom it originally belonged, and who appropriated it according to some, to gymnastic sports and exercises.] Here Plato opened his school of Philosophy, and from this, every place sacred to learning has ever since been called Academia. To exclude from it profaneness and dissipation, it was even forbidden to laugh there. It was called Academia velus, to distinguish it from the second Academy founded by Arcesilaus, who made some few alterations in the Platonic philosophy, and from the third which was established by Carneades. Cic. de div. 1, c. 3.—Diog. 3.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 35.

ACADĒMUS, an Athenian, who discovered to Castor and Pollux where Theseus had concealed their sister Helen, for which they amply rewarded him. Plut. in Thes.

ACALANDRUS, or Acalydrus, a river falling into the Bay of Tarentum. [Now, the Salandrella.] Plin. 3, c. 11.

ACĀMAS, son of Theseus and Phædra, went with Diomedes to demand Helen from the Trojans after her elopement from Menelaus. In his embassy he had a son, called Munitus by Laodice, the daughter of Priam. He was concerned in the Trojan war, and afterwards built the town of Acamantum in Phrygia, and on his return to Greece called a tribe after his own name at Athens. Paus. 10, c. 26.—Q. Calab. 12.—Hygm. 103.

ACAMPISIS, a river of Colchis. [It separates Armenia from Colchis. The Greeks called it Acampsis from its impetuous course, which forbade all approaches to the shore. This name was applied to it at its mouth, its true name in the interior was Boas. Arrian, Perip.]

ACANTHA, a nymph loved by Apollo, and changed into the flower Acanthus.

ACANTHUS, [a town near mount Athos, founded by a colony of Andrians. Here Xerxes is said to have made his canal of seven stadia, in order to convey his ships into the Sinus Singiticus, without doubling the promontory of Athos. Thucyd. 4, 84.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Another in Egypt, near Memphis, now Bisalta, or according to D'Anville, Dashur. Plin. 5, c. 28.]

ACARIA, a fountain of Corinth, where Iolas cut off the head of Eurystheus. Strab. 8.

ACARNANIA, a country of Epirus, at the north of the Ionian sea, divided from Ætolia by the Achelous. The inhabitants reckoned only six months in the year; they were luxurious, and addicted to pleasure, so that χοτγιςτος Ακαρναιος, porcellus Acarnas became proverbial. Their horses were famous. It received its name from Acarnas. Plin. 2, c. 90.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 7 and 9.—Paus. 8, c. 24.—Lucian. in Dial. Meretr.

ACARNAS and Amphoterus, sons of Alcmaeon and Callirhoe. Alcmaeon being murdered by the brothers of Alpheisibœus, his former wife, Callirhoe obtained from Jupiter, that her children, who were still in the cradle, might, by a supernatural power, suddenly grow up to punish their father's murderers. This was granted. Vid. Alcmaeon.—Paus. 8, c. 24.—Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 10.

ACARNAS and Acarnan, a stony mountain of Attica. Senec. in Hippol. v. 20.

ACASTUS, son of Pelias king of Thessaly, by Anaxibia, married Astrydamia or Hyppolyte, who fell in love with Peleus, son of Æacus, when in banishment at her husband's court. Peleus, rejecting the addresses of Hyppolyte, was accused before Acastus of attempts upon her virtue, and soon after, at a chase, exposed to wild beasts. Vulcan, by order of Jupiter, delivered Peleus, who returned to Thesaly, and put to death Acastus and his wife. vid. Peleus and Astydamia.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 306. Her. Ep. 13, v. 25.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, &c.—The second archon at Athens.

ACATHANTUS, a bay in the Red Sea. Strab. 16.

ACCA Laurentia, the wife of Faustulus, shepherd of king Numitor's flocks, who brought up Romulus and Remus, who had been exposed on the banks of the Tiber.—From her wantonness, she was called Lupa, whence the fable that Romulus was suckled by a she-wolf. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 18.—Liv. 1, c. 4.—Aul. Gell. 6, c. 7.—The Romans yearly celebrated certain festivals, vid. Laurentalia, in honour of another of the same name, which arose from this circumstance: the keeper of the temple of Hercules, one day playing at dice, made the god one of the number, on condition that if Hercules was defeated, he should make him a present, but if he conquered, he should be entertained with an elegant feast, and share his bed with a beautiful female. Hercules was victorious, and accordingly Acca was conducted to the bed of Hercules, who in reality came to see her, and told her in the morning to go into the streets, and salute with a kiss the first man she met. This was Tarrutius, an old unmarried man, who, not displeased with Acca's liberty, loved her and made her the heirress of all his possessions. These, at her death, she gave to the Roman people, whence the honours paid to her memory. Plut. Quæst. Rom. & in Romul.—A companion of Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 320.

ACCIA or Atia, daughter of Julia and M. Atius Balbus, was the mother of Augustus, and died about 40 years B. C. Diod.—Suet. in Aug. 4.—Variola, an illustrious female, whose cause was elegantly pleaded by Pliny. Plin. 6, ep. 33.

L. ACCIUS, a Roman tragic poet, whose roughness of style Quinctilian has imputed to the unpolished age in which he lived. He translated some of the tragedies of Sophocles, but of his numerous pieces only some of the names are known; and among these, his Nuptia, Mercator, Neoptolemus, Phœnice, Medea, Atræus, &c. The great marks of honour which he received at Rome, may be collected from this circumstance, that a man was severely reprimanded by a magistrate for mentioning his name without reverence. Some few of his verses are preserved in Cicero and other writers. He died about 130 years B. C. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 56.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 15, v. 19.—Quinctil. 10, c. 1.—Cic. ad Att. & in Br. de Orat. 3, c. 16.—A famous orator of Pisaurum in Cicero's age.—Labeo, a foolish poet mentioned Pers. 1, v. 50.—Tullius, a prince of the Volsci, very inimical to the Romans. Coriolanus, when banished by his countrymen, fled to him, and led his armies against Rome. Liv. 2, c. 37.—Plut. in Coriol.

ACCO, a general of the Senones in Gaul. Cæs. bell. Gall. 6, c. 4. and 44.

ACE, [more properly Aco, a seaport town of Phœnicia, afterwards called Ptolemais, from the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt. It is now called by the Arabs, Akka, and by the Europeans, Acre.]—A place of Arcadia, near Megalopolis, where Orestes was cured from the persecution of the furies, who had a temple there. Paus. 8, v. 34.

ACERÁTUS, a soothsayer, who remained alone at Delphi when the approach of Xerxes frightened away the inhabitants. Herodot. 8, c. 37.

ACERBAS, a priest of Hercules at Tyre, who married Dido. vid. Sichæus.—Justin. 18, c. 4.

ACERRÆ, [a town of Italy, west of Cremona and north of Placentia, now La Girola or Gherra.]—another in Campania, [now Acerria] near the river Clanis. It still subsists, and the frequent inundations from the river which terrified its ancient inhabitants, are now prevented by the large drains dug there. Virg. G. 2, v. 225.—Liv. 8, c. 17.

ACESIA, part of the island of Lemnos, which received this name from Philoctetes, whose wound was cured there. Philostr.

[ACESINES, a large and rapid river of India, falling into the Indus. It is commonly supposed to be the modern Ravei, but Major Rennell makes it to be the Jenau. Arrian. 5, c. 22. Theophrast. 4, c. 12.—Plin. 37, c. 12.]

ACESIUS, a surname of Apollo, in Elis and Attica, as a god of medicine. Paus. 6, c. 24.

ACESTA, a town of Sicily, called after king Acestes, and known also by the name of Segesta. It was built by Æneas, who left here part of his followers as he was going to Italy. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 746, &c.

ACESTES, son of Criniscus and Egesta, was king of the country near Drepanum in Sicily. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and kindly entertained Æneas during his voyage, and helped him to bury his father on mount Eryx. In commemoration of this, Æneas built a city there, called Acesta, from Acestes. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 746.

ACESTODORUS, a Greek historian, who mentions the review which Xerxes made of his forces before the battle of Salamis. Plut. in Themist.

ACHABYOTOS, a lofty mountain in Rhodes, where Jupiter had a temple.

ACHEI, [the descendants of Achæus one of the sons of Xuthus. Achæus, having committed an accidental homicide, fled into Laconia, where he died, and where his posterity remained under the name of Achæi until they were expelled by the Heraclidæ. Upon this, they laid claim to the quarter occupied by the Ionians or descendants of Ion the other son of Xuthus, dispossessed them of their cities, and called the country, from their own name, Achaia.] The names of these cities are Pellene, Ægira, Ægæ, Bura, Tritæa, Ægium, Rhytes, Olenos, Helice, Patræ, Dyme, and Pharæ. The inhabitants of these three last began a famous confederacy, 284 years B. C. which continued formidable upwards of 130 years, under the name of the Achaean league, and was most illustrious whilst supported by the splendid virtues and abilities of Aratus and Philopœmen. Their arms were directed against the Ætoli-ans for three years, with the assistance of Philip of Macedon, and they grew powerful by the accession of neighbouring states, and freed their country from foreign slavery, till at last they were attacked by the Romans, and, after one year's hostilities, the Achaean league was totally destroyed, B. C. 147. [The Peloponnesus was reduced to a Roman province, under the name of the province of Achaia. It was so called, because at the taking of Corinth, the Achæans were the most powerful of the Grecian communities.] The name of Achæi is generally applied to all the Greeks indiscriminately, by the poets. vid. Achaia. Herodot. 1, c. 145, l. 8, c. 36.—Stat. Theb. 2, v. 164.—Polyb.—Liv. 1. 27, 32, &c.—Plut. in Philop.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 605.—Paus. 7, c. 1, &c.—Also a people of Asia on the borders of the Euxine. Ovid. ep. ex Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 27.

ACHÆMÊNES, a king of Persia, among the progenitors of Cyrus the Great; whose descendants were called Achæmenides, and formed a separate tribe in Persia, of which the kings were members. Cambyses, son of Cyrus, on his death-bed, charged his nobles, and particularly the Achæmenides, not to suffer the Medes to recover their former power, and abolish the empire of Persia. Herodot. 1, c. 125, l. 3, c. 65, l. 7, c. 11.—Horat. 2. od. 12, v. 21.—A Persian, made governor of Egypt by Xerxes, B. C. 484.

ACHÆMENIDES, a native of Ithaca, son of Adramastus, and one of the companions of Ulysses, abandoned on the coast of Sicily, where Æneas, on his voyage to Italy, found him. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 624. Ovid. ib. 417.

ACHÆRUM STATIO, a place on the coast of the Thracian Chersonesus, where Polyxena was sacrificed to the shade of Achilles, and where Hecuba punished Polymnestor, who had murdered her son Polydorus.

ACHÆUS, a king of Lydia, hung by his subjects for his extortion. *Ovid. in ib.—A son of Xuthus of Thessaly. He fled, after the accidental murder of a man, to Laconia; where the inhabitants were called from him Achæi. Strab. 8.—Paus. 7. c. 1. vid. Achæi.—A tragic poet of Eretria, who wrote 43 tragedies, of which some of the titles are preserved, such as Adrastus, Linus, Cynus, Eumenides, Philoctetes, Pirithous, Theseus, CEdipus, &c.; of these only one obtained the prize. He lived some time after Sophocles.—Another of Syracuse, author of ten tragedies.—A river which falls into the Euxine. *Arrian in Periopl.—A relation of Antiochus the Great, appoint- ed governor of all the king's provinces beyond Taurus. He aspired to sovereign power, which he disputed for 8 years with Antiochus, and was at last betrayed by a Cretan. His limbs were cut off, and his body sewed in the skin of an ass, was exposed on a gibbet. Polyb. 8.

ACHAIA, a country of Peloponnesus at the north of Elis on the bay of Corinth. It was originally called Ægialus (shore) from its situation. The Ionians called it Ionia, when they settled there; and it received the name of Achaia from the Achæi, who dispossessed the Ionians. vid. Achæi.—A small part of Phthiotis was also called Achaia, of which Alos was the capital.

ACHAÏCUM BELLUM. vid. Achæi.

ACHARNÆ, a village of Attica. Thucyd. 2, c. 19.

ACHATES, a friend of Æneas, whose fidelity was so exemplary, that Fidus Achates became a proverb. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 316.—A river of Sicily.

ACHELŌIDES, a patronymic given to the Sirens as daughters of Achelous. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 15.

ACHELŌUS, the son of Oceanus or Sol, by Terra or Tethys, god of the river of the same name in Epirus. As one of the numerous suitors of Dejanira, daughter of Æneus, he entered the list against Hercules, and being inferior, changed himself into a serpent, and afterwards into an ox. Hercules broke off one of his horns, and Achelous being defeated, retired in disgrace into his bed of waters. The broken horn was taken up by the nymphs, and filled with fruits and flowers; and after it had for some time adorned the hand of the conqueror, it was presented to the goddess of Plenty. Some say that he was changed into a river after the victory of Hercules. The river is in Epirus, and rises in mount Pindus, and after dividing Acarnania from Ætolia, falls into the Ionian sea. The sand and mud which it carries down, have formed some islands at its mouth. [The Achelous is now called Aspro Potamo, or the White river. The fable respecting the contest of Hercules with the river god, alludes evidently to the draining of the neighbouring land, and one branch of the river. The islands at its mouth are the Echinades. Near them are the Oxææ, now Curolari.] Herodot. 2, c. 10.—Strab. 10.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 5, l. 9, fab. 1. Amor. 3, el 6, v. 35.—Apollod. 1, c. 3 and 7, l. 2, c. 7. Hygin. pref. fab.—A river of Arcadia, falling into the Alpheus.—Another flowing from mount Sipylus. Paus 8, c. 38.

ACHËRON, a river of Thesprotia, in Epirus, [now the Delchi,] falling into the bay of Ambracia. Homer called it, from the dead appearance of its waters, one of the rivers of hell, and the fable has been adopted by all succeeding poets, who make the god of the stream to be the son of Ceres without a father, and say that he concealed himself in hell for fear of the Titans, and was changed into a bitter stream, over which the souls of the dead are at first conveyed. It receives, say they, the souls of the dead, because a deadly languor seizes them at the hour of dissolution. Some make him son of Titan, and suppose that he was plunged into hell by Jupiter, for supplying the Titans with water. The word Acheron is often taken for hell itself. Horat. 1, od. 3, v. 36.—Virg. G. 2, v. 292. Æn. 2 v. 295, &c.—Strab. 7.—Lucan. 3, v. 16.—Sil. 2 Silv. 6, v. 80.—Liv. 8, c. 24.—Also a river in the country of the Bruttii, in Italy, [now the Savuto.] Justin. 12, c. 2.

ACHERONTIA, a town of Apulia on a mountain, thence called Nidus by Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 14 [now Acerenza.]

ACHERŪSIA, a lake of Egypt near Memphis, over which, as Diodorus, lib. 1, mentions, the bodies of the dead were conveyed, and received sentence according to the actions of their life. The boat was called Baris, and the ferryman Charon. Hence arose the fable of Charon and the Styx, &c. afterwards imported into Greece by Orpheus, and adopted in the religion of the country.—There was a lake of the same name in Epirus.

ACHERŪSIAS, a peninsula of Bithynia, where Hercules, as is reported, dragged Cerberus out of hell. Xenoph. Anab. 6.

ACHILLAS, a general of Ptolemy who murdered Pompey the Great. Plut. in Pomp.—Lucan. 8, v. 538.

[ACHILLĒA, an island near the mouth of the Borysthenes, or more properly the western part of the Dromus Achillis insulated by a small arm of the sea. Strabo 7. vid. Dromus Achillis and Leuce.]

[ACHILLĒUM, a town on the Cimmerian Bosphorus, where anciently was a temple of Achilles. It lay near the modern Buschuk. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. Vol. 4. p. 326.]

ACHILLĒUS or AQUILEUS, a Roman general in Egypt, in the reign of Dioclesian, who rebelled, and for five years maintained the imperial dignity at Alexandria. Dioclesian at last marched against him; and because he had supported a long siege, the emperor ordered him to be devoured by lions.

ACHILLĒIS, a poem of Statius, in which he describes the education and memorable actions of Achilles. This composition is imperfect. The poet's immature death deprived the world of a valuable history of the life and exploits of this famous hero. vid. Statius.

ACHILLES, the son of Peleus and Thetis, was the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. During his infancy, Thetis plunged him in the Styx, and made every part of his body invulnerable, except the heel by which she held him. His education was intrusted to the centaur Chiron, who taught him the art of war, and made him master of music, and by feeding him with the marrow of wild beasts, rendered him vigorous and active. He was taught eloquence by Phœnix, whom he ever after loved and respected. Thetis, to prevent him from going to the Trojan war, where she knew he was to perish, privately sent him to the court of Lycomedes, where he was disguised in a female dress, and, by his familiarity with the king's daughters, made Deidamia mother of Neoptolemus. As Troy could not be taken without the aid of Achilles, Ulysses went to the court of Lycomedes, in the habit of a merchant, and exposed jewels and arms to sale. Achilles, choosing the arms, discovered his sex, and went to war. Vulcan, at the entreaties of Thetis, made him a strong suit of armour, which was proof against all weapons. He was deprived by Agamemnon of his favourite mistress, Briseis, who had fallen to his lot at the division of the booty of Lyrnessus. For this affront he refused to appear in the field till the death of his friend Patroclus recalled him to action, and to revenge. vid. Patroclus. He slew Hector, the bulwark of Troy, tied the corpse by the heels of his chariot, and dragged it three times round the walls of Troy. After thus appeasing the shade of his friend, he yielded to the tears and entreaties of Priam, and permitted the aged father to ransom and carry away Hector's body. In the 10th year of the war, Achilles was charmed with Polyxena; and as he solicited her hand in the temple of Minerva, it is said that Paris aimed an arrow at his vulnerable heel, of which wound he died. His body was buried at Sigæum and divine honours were paid to him, and temples raised to his memory. It is said, that after the taking of Troy, the ghost of Achilles appeared to the Greeks, and demanded of them Polyxena, who accordingly was sacrificed on his tomb by his son Neoptolemus. Some say that this sacrifice was voluntary, and that Polyxena was so grieved at his death, that she killed herself on his tomb. The Thessalians yearly sacrificed a black and a white bull on his tomb. It is reported that he married Helen after the siege of Troy; but others maintain, that this marriage happened after his death, in the island of Leuce, where many of the ancient heroes lived, as in a separate elysium. vid. Leuce. When Achilles was young, his mother asked him whether he preferred a long life, spent in obscurity and retirement, or a few years of military fame and glory? and to his honour he made choice of the latter. Some ages after the Trojan war, Alexander, going to the conquest of Persia, offered sacrifices on the tomb of Achilles, and admired the hero who had found a Homer to publish his fame to posterity. Xenoph. de venat.—Plut. in Alex.—De facie in Orbe Lun. De music. De amic. mult. *Quest. Juno when she fled from Jupiter's courtship—the preceptor of Chiron the centaur—a son of Jupiter and Lamia, declared by Pan to be fairer than Venus—a man who instituted the ostracism at Athens.—Tatius, a native of Alexandria, in the age of the emperor Claudius, originally a pagan, but converted to christianity, and made a bishop. He wrote a mixed history of great men, a treatise on the sphere, tactics, a romance on the loves of Clitophon and Leucippe, &c. Some manuscripts of his works are preserved in the Vatican, and Palatinate libraries. [The best edition of his works, is that by Boden, Lips. 1776. 8vo.]

ACHIVI, [a name given by the Roman poets to the people of Greece, or Achaia. Homer uses the term to express all the enemies of the Trojans.]

ACHLADÆUS, a Corinthian general, killed by Aristomenes. Paus. 4, c. 19.

ACICHŌRIUS, a general with Brennus in the expedition which the Gauls undertook against Pæonia. Paus. 10, c. 10.

ACIDALIA, a surname of Venus, from a fountain of the same name in Bœotia, sacred to her. The Graces bathed in the fountain.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 720.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 468.

ACIDAS, a river of Peloponnesus, formerly called Jardanus. Paus. 5, c. 5.

ACILIA, a plebeian family at Rome, which traced its pedigree up to the Trojans.—The mother of Lucan.

ACILIA LEX was enacted, A. U. C. 556, by Acilius the tribune, for the plantation of five colonies in Italy. Liv. 32, c. 29.—Another called also Calpurnia, [A. U. C. 683, that in trials for extortion, sentence should be passed after the cause was once pleaded, and that there should not be a second hearing. Cic. proem in Verr. 17. 1. Ascon in Cic.]

M. ACILIUS BALBUS, was consul with Portius Cato, A. U. C. 640. It is said, that during his consulship, milk and blood fell from heaven. Plin. 2, c. 26.—Glabrio, a tribune of the people, who with a legion quelled the insurgent slaves in Etruria. Being consul with P. Corn. Scipio Nasica, A. U. C. 563, he conquered Antiochus at Thermopylæ, for which he obtained a triumph, and three days were appointed for a public thanksgiving. He stood for the censorship against Cato, but desisted on account of the improper measures used by his competitor. Justin. 31, c. 6.—Liv. 30, c. 40, l. 31, c. 50, l. 35, c. 10, &c.—The son of the preceding, erected a temple to Piety, which his father had vowed to this goddess when fighting against Antiochus. He raised a golden statue to his father, the first that appeared in Italy. The temple of piety was built on the spot where once a woman had fed with her milk her aged father, whom the senate had imprisoned, and excluded from all aliment. Val. Max. 2, c. 5.—The enactor of a law against bribery.—A pretor in the time that Verres was accused by Cicero.—A man accused of extortion, and twice defended by Cicero. He was proconsul of Sicily, and lieutenant to Cæsar in the civil wars. Cæs. Bell. Civ. 3, c. 15.—A consul, whose son was killed by Domitian, because he fought with wild beasts. The true cause of this murder was, that young Glabrio was stronger than the emperor, who therefore envied him.—Juv. 4, v. 94.

ACILLA, a town of Africa, near Adrumetum (some read Acolla). Cæs. Afr. c. 33.

ACIS, a shepherd of Sicily, son of Faunus and the nymph Simethus. Galatea passionately loved him; upon which his rival, Polyphemus, though jealousy, crushed him to death with a piece of a broken rock. The gods changed Acis into a stream which rises from mount Ætna. Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 8.

ACMON, a native of Lyrnessus, who accompanied Æneas into Italy. His father's name was Clytus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 128.

ACMONIDES, one of the Cyclopes. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 288.

ACETES, the pilot of the ship whose crew found Bacchus asleep, and carried him away. As they ridiculed the god, they were changed into sea-monsters. But Acetes was preserved. Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 8, &c.

ACONTES, one of Lycaon's 50 sons. Apollod. 3, c. 8.

ACRIDOPHĀGI, an Æthiopian nation, who fed upon locusts, and lived not beyond their 40th year. At the approach of old age, swarms of winged lice attacked them, and gnawed their belly and breast, till the patient by rubbing himself drew blood, which increased their number, and ended in his death. Diod. 3.—Plin. 11, c. 29.—Strab. 16.

ACRĪON, a Pythagorean philosopher of Locria. Cic. de fin. 5, c. 29.

ACRISONEUS, a patronymic applied to the Argives, from Acrisius, one of their ancient kings, or from Acrisione, a town of Argolis, called after a daughter of Acrisius of the same name. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 410.

ACRISIŌIDES, a patronymic of Perseus, from his grandfather Acrisius. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 70.

ACRISIUS, son of Abas, king of Argos, by Ocalea, daughter of Mantineus. He was born at the same birth as Prætus, with whom it is said that he quarrelled even in his mother's womb. After many dissensions Prætus was driven from Argos. Acrisius had Danae by Eurydice daughter of Lacedæmon; and being told by an oracle, that his daughter's son would put him to death, he confined Danae in a brazen tower, to prevent her becoming a mother. She however became pregnant, by Jupiter changed into a golden shower; and though Acrisius ordered her, and her infant called Perseus, to be exposed on the sea, yet they were saved; and Perseus soon after became so famous for his actions, that Acrisius, anxious to see so renowned a grandson, went to Larissa. Here Perseus, wishing to show his skill in throwing a quoit, killed an old man who proved to be his grandfather, whom he knew not, and thus the oracle was unhappily fulfilled. Acrisius reigned about 31 years. Hygin. fab. 63.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 16.—Horat. 3, od. 16.—Apollod. 2, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 16, &c.—Vid. Danaë, Perseus, Polydectes.

The word comes from ακρῶν, high, and κεραυνῶν, a thunderbolt, because, on account of their great height, they were often struck with thunder. Lucret. 6, v. 420.—Plin. 4, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 506.—Strab. 6.—Horat. 1, od. 3, v. 20.

ACRO-CORINTHUS, [a high hill overhanging the city of Corinth, on which was erected a citadel, called also by the same name. This situation was so important a one, as to be styled by Philip the fetters of Greece. The fortress was surprised by Antigonus, but recovered in a brilliant manner by Aratus. Strab.

8.—Paus. 2, c. 4.—Plut. in Arat.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 106.]

ACRON, a king of the Cæninenses, killed by Romulus in single combat, after the rape of the Sabines. His spoils were dedicated to Jupiter Feretrius. Plut. in Romul.—A physician of Agrigentum, B. C. 439, educated at Athens with Empedocles. He wrote physical treatises in the Doric dialect, and cured the Athenians of a plague, by lighting fire near the houses of the infected. Plin. 29, c. 1.—Plut. in Isid.—One of the friends of Æneas, killed by Mezentius. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 719.

ACROFĀTOS, one of Alexander's officers, who obtained part of Media, after the king's death. Justin. 13, c. 4.

ACROPŌLIS, the citadel of Athens, built on a rock, and accessible only on one side. [Here stood the Parthenon, or temple of Minerva.] Paus. in Attic.

ACROTĀTUS, son of Cleomenes, king of Sparta, died before his father, leaving a son called Areus. Paus. 1, c. 13, l. 3, c. 6.—A son of Areus, who was greatly loved by Chelidonis, wife of Cleonymus. This amour displeased her husband who called Pyrrhus the Epirot, to avenge his wrongs. When Sparta was besieged by Pyrrhus, Acrotatus was seen bravely fighting in the middle of the enemy, and commended by the multitude, who congratulated Chelidonis on being mistress to such a warlike lover. Plut. in Pyrrh.

ACROTHOOS. vid. Acroathon.

ΑΚΤΕ (ακτις) [denotes properly a peninsula or promontory on which the waves break. It was a name given to the sea-coast about mount Athos, in which were six towns mentioned by Thucydidēs—Acte was likewise the ancient name of Attica, which was so called from its being washed on two sides by the sea. Thucyd. 4, c. 109.—Strabo. 9.]

ΑΚΤΑ, a place near mount Athos, on the Ægean Sea. Thucyd. 4, c. 109.

ΑΚΤÆON, a famous huntsman, son of Aristæus and Autonoe daughter of Cadmus, whence he is called Autoneius heros. He saw Diana and her attendants bathing near Gargaphia, for which he was changed into a stag, and devoured by his own dogs. Paus. 9, c. 2.—Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 3.—A beautiful youth son of Melissus of Corinth, whom Archias, one of the Heraclidæ, endeavoured to debauch and carry away. He was killed in the struggle which in consequence of this happened between his father and ravisher. Melissus complained of the insult, and drowned himself; and soon after, the country being visited by a pestilence, Archias was expelled. Plut. in Amat.

ΑΚΤÆUS, a powerful person who made himself master of a part of Greece, which he called Attica. His daughter Agraules married Cecrops, whom the Athenians called their first king, though Actæus reigned before him. Paus. 1, c. 2 and 14.—The word is of the same signification as Atticus an inhabitant of Attica.

ACTE, a mistress of Nero, descended from Attalus. Sueton. in Ner. 28.—One of the Horæ. Hygin. fab. 183.

ACTIA, the mother of Augustus. As she slept in the temple of Apollo she dreamt that a dragon had lain with her. Nine months after, she brought forth, having previously dreamt that her bowels were scattered all over the world. Suet. in Aug. 94.—Games sacred to Apollo in commemoration of the victory of Augustus over M. Antony at Actium. [Some maintain that they were celebrated every third year; but the opinion of Strabo is deemed more correct, according to whom they only returned every fifth year.] Plut. in Anton.—Strab. 7.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 280, l. 8, v. 675.—A sister of Julius Cæsar. Plut. in Cic.

ACTIS, son of Sol, went from Greece into Egypt, where he taught astrology, and founded Heliopolis. Diod. 5.

ACTISANES, a king of Æthiopia, who conquered Egypt, and expelled king Amasis. He was famous for his equity, and his severe punishment of robbers, whose noses he cut off, and whom he banished to a desert place, where they were in want of all aliment, and lived only upon crows. Diod. 1.

ACTIUM, now Azio, a town and promontory of Epirus, famous for the naval victory which Augustus obtained over Antony and Cleopatra, the 2d of September, B. C. 31, in honour of which the conqueror built on the site of his camp the town of Nicopolis, and instituted games. vid. Actia.—Plut. in Anton.—Sueton. in Aug.—A promontory of Corcyra. Cic. ad Att. 7, ep. 2.

Trist.* 1, el. 8.—A man called also Aruncus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 93.—One of the friends of Æneas. Id. 9, v. 500.—A son of Neptune by Agameda. Hygin. fab. 14.—A son of Deion and Diomedes. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—The father of Eurytus, and brother of Augeas. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—A son of Acastus one of the Argonauts. Hygin. fab. 14.—The father of Astyoche. Homer. Il. 2.—Paus. 9, c. 37.—A king of Lemnos. Hygin. 102.

ACTORIDES, a patronymic given to Patroclus, grandson of Actor. Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 1.—Also to Erithus, son of Actor. Id. Met. 5, fab. 3.—Two brothers so fond of each other, that in driving a chariot, one generally held the reins, and the other the whip; whence they are represented with two heads, four feet and one body. Hercules conquered them. Pindar.

ACTORIS, a maid of Ulysses. Homer. Od. 23.

M. ACTORIUS NASO, a Roman historian. Sueton. in Jul. 9.

C. ACULEO, a Roman lawyer celebrated as much for the extent of his understanding, as for his knowledge of law. He was uncle to Cicero. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 43.

ACŪPHIS, an ambassador from India to Alexander. Plut. in Alex.

ACUSILĀUS and DAMAGĒTUS, two brothers of Rhodes, conquerors at the Olympic games. The Greeks strewed flowers upon Diagoras their father, and called him happy in having such worthy sons. Paus. 6, c. 7.—An historian of Argos, often quoted by Josephus. He wrote on genealogies in a style simple and destitute of all ornament. Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 28.—Suidas.—An Athenian who taught rhetoric at Rome under Galba.

M. ACUTICUS, an ancient comic writer, whose plays were known under the name of Leones, Gemini, Anus, Bœotia, &c.

ADA, a sister of queen Artemisia, who married Hidrieus. After her husband's death, she succeeded to the throne of Caria; but being expelled by her younger brother she retired to Alindæ, which she delivered to Alexander, after adopting him as her son. Curt. 2, c. 8.—Strab. 14.

ADAD, a deity among the Assyrians, supposed to be the sun.

ADÆUS, a native of Mitylene, who wrote a Greek treatise on statuary. Athen. 13.

ADAMANTÆA, Jupiter's nurse in Crete, who suspended him in his cradle to a tree, that he might be found neither in the earth, the sea, nor in heaven. To drown the infant's cries, she had drums beat, and cymbals sounded, around the tree. Hygin. fab. 139.

ADĀMAS, a Trojan prince, killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13, v. 560.—A youth who raised a rebellion on being emasculated by Coctys king of Thrace. Arist. Pol. 5, c. 10.

ADAMASTUS, a native of Ithaca, father of Achæmenides. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 614.

ADASPII, a people at the foot of mount Caucasus. Justin. 12, c. 5.

ADDEPHAGIA, a goddess of the Sicilians. Ælian 1, V. H. c. 27.

[ADDUA, now Adda, a river of Cisalpine Gaul. It rises among the Rhætian Alps, traverses the Lacus Larius, and falls into the Po to the west of Cremona. Plin. 2, c. 103.]

ADELPHIUS, a friend of M. Antonius, whom he accompanied in his expedition into Parthia, of which he wrote the history. Strab. 11.

ADEMŌN, raised a sedition in Mauritania to avenge his master Ptolemy, whom Caligula had put to death. Sueton. in Calig. 35.

ADES, or HADES, the god of hell among the Greeks, the same as the Pluto of the Latins. The word is derived from α & ιδειν, [non videre] because hell is deprived of light. It is often used for hell itself by the ancient poets.

ADGANDESTRIVS, a prince of the Catti, who sent to Rome for poison to destroy Arminius, and was answered by the senate, that the Romans fought their enemies openly, and never used perfidious measures. Tacit. An. 2, c. 88.

ADHERBAL, son of Micipsa, and grandson of Masinissa, was besieged at Cirta, and put to death by Jugurtha, after vainly imploring the aid of Rome, B. C. 112. Sallust. in Jug.

ADHERBAS, the husband of Dido. Vid. Sichæus.

ADIANTE, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod. 2, c. 11.

ADILTÖRIX, a governor of Galatia, who to gain Antony's favour, slaughtered, in one night, all the inhabitants of the Roman colony of Heraclea, in Pontus. He was taken at Actium, led in triumph by Augustus, and strangled in prison. Strab. 12.

ADIMANTUS, a commander of the Athenian fleet, taken by the Spartans. All the men of the fleet were put to death, except Adimantus, because he had opposed the designs of his countrymen, who intended to mutilate all the Spartans. Xenoph. Hist. Græc. Pausanias says, 4, c. 17, l. 10, c. 9, that the Spartans had bribed him.—A brother of Plato. Laert. 3.—A Corinthian general, who reproached Themistocles with his exile.—A king struck with thunder, for saying that Jupiter deserved no sacrifices. Ovid. Ibis. 329.

ADMËTA, daughter of Eurystheus, was priestess of Juno's temple at Argos. She expressed a wish to possess the girdle of the queen of the Amazons, and Hercules obtained it for her. Apollod. 2, c. 23.—one of the Oceanides. Hesiod. Theog. v. 349.

ADMËTUS, son of Pheres and Clymene, king of Phæræ in Thessaly, married Theone daughter of Thestor, and after her death, Alceste daughter of Pelias. Apollo, when banished from heaven, is said to have tended his flocks for nine years, and to have obtained from the Parcæ, that Admetus should never die, if another person laid down his life for him; a proof of unbounded affection, which his wife Alceste cheerfully exhibited by devoting herself voluntarily to death. Admetus was one of the Argonauts, and was at the hunt of the Calydonian boar. Pelias promised his daughter in marriage only to him who could bring him a chariot drawn by a lion and a wild boar; and Admetus effected this by the aid of Apollo, and obtained Alceste's hand. Some say that Hercules brought him back Alceste from hell. Senec. in Medea.—Hygin. fab. 50, 51, & 243.—Orid. de Art. Am. 3.—Apollod. 1, c. 8 & 9, &c.—Tibul. 2, el. 3.—Paus. 5, c. 17.—A king of the Molossi, to whom Themistocles fled for protection. C. Nep. in Them. 8.—An officer of Alexander killed at the siege of Tyre. Diod. 17.

ADÖNIA, festivals in honour of Adonis, first celebrated at Byblos in Phœnicia. They lasted two days, the first of which was spent in howlings and lamentations, the second in joyful clamours, as if Adonis was returned to life. In some towns of Greece and Egypt they lasted eight days; the one half of which was spent in lamentations, and the other in rejoicings. [Only women were admitted.] The time of the celebration was supposed to be very unlucky. The fleet of Nicias sailed from Athens to Sicily on that day, whence many unfortunate omens were drawn. Plut. in Nicia.—Amian. 22, c. 9.

ADÖNIS, son of Cinyras, by his daughter Myrrha, (vid. Myrrha) was the favourite of Venus. He was fond of hunting, and was often cautioned by his mistress not to hunt wild beasts for fear of being killed in the attempt. This advice he slighted, and at last received a mortal wound from a wild boar which he had wounded, and Venus, after shedding many tears at his death, changed him into a flower called anemomy. Proserpine is said to have restored him to life, on condition that he should spend six months with her, and the rest of the year with Venus. This implies the alternate return of summer and winter. Adonis is often taken for Osiris, because the festivals of both were often begun with mournful lamentations, and finished with a revival of joy, as if they were returning to life again. Adonis had temples raised to his memory, and is said by some to have been beloved by Apollo and Bacchus. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Propert. 2, el. 13, v. 53.—Virg. Ecl. 40, v. 13.—Bion. in Adon.—Hygin. 58, 164, 248, &c.—*Ovid. ADRASTIA, a fountain of Sicily. Paus. 2, c. 15.—A mountain. Plut. in Lucul.—A country near Troy, called after Adrastus, who built there a temple to Nemesis. Here Apollo had an oracle. Strab. 13.—A daughter of Jupiter and Necessity. She is called by some Nemesis, and is the punisher of injustice. The Egyptians placed her above the moon, whence she looked down upon the actions of men. Strab. 13.—A daughter of Melisseus, to whom some attribute the nursing of Jupiter. She is the same as Adresta. Apol. 1, c. 1.

ADRASTII CAMPI, a plain near the Granicus, where Alexander first defeated Darius. Justin. 11, c. 6.

ADRASTUS, son of Talaus and Lysimache, was king of Argos. Polynices being banished from Thebes by his brother Eteocles, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, daughter of Adrastus. The king assisted his son-in-law, and marched against Thebes with an army headed by seven of his most famous generals. All perished in the war except Adrastus, who, with a few men saved from slaughter, fled to Athens, and implored the aid of Theseus against the Thebans, who opposed the burying of the Argives slain in battle. Theseus went to his assistance, and was victorious.

—Adrastus, after a long reign, died through grief, occasioned by the death of his son Egialeus. A temple was raised to his memory at Sicyon, where a solemn festival was annually celebrated. Homer. Il. 5.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 480.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 7.—*Stat. ADRIANUM, or ADRIATICUM MARE, a sea lying between Illyricum and Italy, now called the gulf of Venice, first made known to the Greeks by the discoveries of the Phœacians. Herodot. 1.—Horat. 1, od. 33, l. 3, od. 3 and 9.—Catull. 4, 6.

ADRIANOPŌLIS, a town of Thrace on the Hebrus.—Another in Ætolia.—Pisidia, and Bithynia.

ADRIANUS, or Hadrianus, the 15th emperor of Rome. He is represented as an active, learned, warlike and austere general. He came to Britain, where he had a wall between the modern towns of Carlisle and Newcastle [68 English or 74 Roman miles long,] to protect the Britons from the incursions of the Caledonians. [He sent also a Roman colony to Jerusalem, calling the city Ælia Capitolina, after the name of his family, and erected a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the ancient temple, which caused a revolt of the Jews.] His memory was so retentive, that he remembered every incident of his life, and knew all the soldiers of his army by name. He was the first emperor who wore a long beard, and this he did to hide the warts on his face. Adrian went always bareheaded, and in long marches generally travelled on foot. In the beginning of his reign, he followed the virtues of his adopted father and predecessor Trajan; he remitted all arrears due to his treasury for 16 years, and publicly burnt the account books, that his word might not be suspected. His peace with the Parthians proceeded from a wish of punishing the other enemies of Rome, more than from the effects of fear. The travels of Adrian were not for the display of imperial pride, but to see whether justice was distributed impartially; and public favour was courted by a condescending behaviour, and the meaner familiarity of bathing with the common people. It is said that he wished to enrol Christ among the gods of Rome; but his apparent lenity towards the Christians was disapproved, by the erection of a statue to Jupiter on the spot where Jesus rose from the dead, and one to Venus on mount Calvary. The weight of diseases became intolerable. Adrian attempted to destroy himself; and when prevented, he exclaimed, that the lives of others were in his hands, but not his own. He wrote an account of his life, and published it under the name of one of his domestics. He died of a dysentery at Baizæ, July 10, A. D. 138, in the 62d year of his age, after a reign of 21 years. Dio.—An officer of Lucullus. Plut. in Luc.—A rhetorician of Tyre in the age of M. Antoninus, who wrote seven books of metamorphoses, besides other treatises now lost.

ADRIMETUM, a town of Africa, on the Mediterranean, built by the Phœnicians. [Now, according to some, Mahometta.] Salust. in Jug.

ADUATICA, a town of Belgic Gaul, now Tongres, on the Maese.

ADŪLA, a mountain among the Rhetian Alps, near which the Rhine takes its rise, now St. Gothard.

ADŪLIS, [a town of Ethiopia. Now, Er-cocca, on the coast of Abex.]

ADYRMACHIDÆ, a maritime people of Africa, near Egypt. Herodot. 4, c. 168.

[ÆA, the city of king Æetes, said to have been situate on the river Phasis in Colchis. The most probable opinion is, that it existed only in the imaginations of the poets. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. Vol. 4, p. 397.]—A town of Thessaly.—Of Africa.—A fountain of Macedonia near Amydon.

ÆACĒA, games at Ægina, in honour of Æacus.

ÆACĪDAS, a king of Epirus, son of Neoptolemus, and brother to Olympias. He was expelled by his subjects for his continual wars with Macedonia. He left a son, Pyrrhus, only two years old, whom Chaucus, king of Illyricum educated. Paus. 1, c. 11.

ÆACĪDES, a patronymic of the descendants of Æacus, such as Achilles, Peleus, Telamon, Pyrrhus, &c. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 103, &c.

ÆACUS, son of Jupiter by Ægina daughter of Asopus, was king of the island of Cœnopia, which he called by his mother's name. A pestilence having destroyed all his subjects, he entreated Jupiter to re-people his kingdom; and according to his desire, all the ants which were in an old oak were changed into men, and called by Æacus myrmidons, from μυρμηξ, an ant.—Æacus married Endeis, by whom he had Telamon and Peleus. He afterwards had Phocus by Psamathe, one of the Nereids. He was a man of such integrity that the ancients have made him one of the judges of hell, with Minos and Rhadamanthus. Horat. 2, od. 16, l. 4, od. 3.—Paus. 1, c. 44, l. 2, c. 29.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 25, l. 13, v. 25.—Proper. 4, el. 12.—Plut. de consol. ad Apoll.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Diod. 4.

ÆEA, the name of an island, the fabled residence of Circe. [Its situation is doubtful. Most locate it high upon the western coast of Italy. According to Mannert, however, it lay off the western coast of Sicily.—Mannert. Anc. Geogr. Vol. 4, p. 19.]

ÆANTEUM, a city of Troas, where Ajax was buried. Plin. 5, c. 30.—An island near the Thracian Chersonesus. Id. 4, c. 12.

ÆANTIDES, a tyrant of Lampsacus, intimate with Darius. He married a daughter of Hippias, tyrant of Athens. Thucyd. 6, c. 59.—One of the 7 poets, called Pleiades.

ÆAS, a river of Epirus falling into the Ionian sea. In the fable of Io, Ovid describes it as falling into the Peneus, and meeting other rivers at Tempe. This some have supposed to be a geographical mistake of the poet. Lucan. 6, v. 361.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 580.

ÆATUS, son of Philip, and brother of Polyceia, was descended from Hercules. An oracle having said that whoever of the two touched the land after crossing the Achelous should obtain the kingdom, Polyceia pretended to be lame, and prevailed upon her brother to carry her across on his shoulders. When they came near the opposite side, Polyceia leaped ashore from her brother's back, exclaiming that the kingdom was her own. Æatus joined her in her exclamation, and afterwards married her, and reigned conjointly with her. Their son Thessalus gave his name to Thessaly. Polyæn. 3.

ÆCHMACORAS, a son of Hercules, by Phylone, daughter of Alcimedon. When the father heard that his daughter had had a child, he exposed her and the infant in the woods to wild beasts, where Hercules, conducted by the noise of a magpie which imitated the cries of a child, found and delivered them. Paus. 2, c. 12.

ÆCHMIS, succeeded his father Polymnestor on the throne of Arcadia, in the reign of Theopompus of Sparta. Paus. 3, c. 5.

ÆDEPSUM, a town of Eubœa. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 10.

ÆDESSA, or Edessa, a town near Pella. Caranus king of Macedonia took it by following goats that sought shelter from the rain, and called it, from that circumstance Æga. from αἴξ, capra. It was the burying-place of the Macedonian kings; and an oracle had said, that as long as the kings were buried there, so long would their kingdom subsist. Alexander was buried in a different place; and on that account, some authors have said that the kingdom became extinct. Justin. 7, c. 1.

ÆDIECLA Ridiculi, a temple raised to the god of Mirth, from the following circumstance: after the battle of Cannæ, Hannibal marched to Rome, whence he was driven back by the inclemency of the weather; which caused so much joy in Rome, that the Romans raised a temple to the god of mirth. This deity was worshipped at Sparta. Plut. in Lyc. Agid. & Cleom.—Pausanias also mentions a Ἐἰς γέλασθαι.

ÆDILES, [Roman magistrates, of three kinds, Ædiles Plebei, Curules, and Cereales. The Ædiles Plebei, were first created A. U. C. 260, in the Comitia Curiata, at the same time with the tribunes of the commons, to be as it were their assistants, and to determine certain minor causes which the tribunes committed to them. They were afterwards created, as the other inferior magistrates, at the Comitia Tributa. The Ædiles Curules were created from the patricians, wore the toga prætexta, had the right of images, and used the sella curulis, whence their name. They were first created A. U. C. 387, to perform certain public games. The office of the Ædiles generally, was to take care of the buildings, streets, markets, weights, measures, &c.—The Ædiles Cereales, were two in number, added by Julius Cæsar, to inspect the public stores of corn and other provisions.—Dionys. 6, c. 90.—Liv. 6, c. 42—7, c. 1.—Sueton. Jul. c. 41.—Cic. de Legg. 3, c. 3.]

ÆDIPUS, a town in Eubœa, now Dipso, abounding in hot-baths.

VAL. ÆDITUUS, a Roman poet before the age of Cicero, successful in amorous poetry and epigrams.

ÆDON, daughter of Pandarus, married Zethus brother to Amphion, by whom she had a son called Itylus. She was so jealous of her sister Niobe, because she had more children than herself, that she resolved to murder the elder, who was educated with Itylus. She by mistake killed her own son, and was changed into a goldfinch as she attempted to kill herself. Homer. Od. 19, v. 518.

ÆDUI, or Hedui, a powerful nation of Celtic Gaul, known for their valour in the wars of Cæsar. When their country was invaded by this celebrated general, they were at the head of a faction in opposition to the Sequani and their partisans, and they had established their superiority in frequent battles. To support their cause, however the Sequani obtained the assistance of Ariovistus king of Germany, and soon defeated their opponents. The arrival of Cæsar changed the face of affairs, the Ædui were restored to the sovereignty of the country, and the artful Roman, by employing one faction against the other, was enabled to conquer them all, though the insurrection of Ambiorix, and that more powerfully supported by Vercingetorix, shook for a while the dominion of Rome in Gaul, and checked the career of the conqueror. Cæs. in Bell. G.

ÆETA, or Æetes, king of Colchis, son of Sol, and Perseis daughter of Oceanus, was father of Medea, Apsyrtus, and Chalciope, by Ida, one of the Oceanides. He killed Phryxus son of Athamas, who had fled to his court on a golden ram. This murder he committed to obtain the fleece of the golden ram. The Argonauts came against Colchis, and recovered the golden fleece by means of Medea, though it was guarded by bulls that breathed fire, and by a venomous dragon. Their expedition has been celebrated by all the ancient poets. (vid. Jason, Medea, & Phryxus.) Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 1, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 3.—Justin. 42, c. 2.—Flacc. & Orpheus in Argon.

ÆETIAS, a patronymic given to Medea, as daughter of Æetes. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 9.

ÆGA, an island of the Ægean sea between Tenedos and Chios.

[ÆGÆ, a town of Æolis, south of Cuma, and east of Phocæa.]

ÆGÆ, a city of Macedonia, the same as Ædessa.—Plin. 4, c. 10.—A town of Eubœa, whence Neptune is called Ægæus. Strab. 9.

ÆGÆ, a town and sea port of Cilicia. Lucan. 3, v. 227.

ÆGÆON, one of Lycaon's 50 sons. Apollod. 3, c. 8.—The son of Coelus, or of Pontus and Terra, the same as Briareus. (vid. Briareus.) It is supposed that he was a notorious pirate chiefly residing at Æga, whence his name; and that the fable about his 100 hands arises from his having 100 men to manage his oars in his piratical excursions. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 565.—Hesiod. Th. 149.—Homer. Il. 10, v. 404.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 10.

ÆGÆUM MARE (now Archipelago), part of the Mediterranean, dividing Greece from Asia Minor. It is full of islands, some of which are called Cyclades, others Sporades, &c. The word Ægæum is derived by some from Ægæ, a town of Eubœa; or from the number of islands which it contains, that appear above the sea, as αἴγες, goats; or from the promontory Æga, or from Ægea, a queen of the Amazons; or from Ægeus, who is supposed to have drowned himself there. Plin. 4, c. 11.—Strab. 7. [vid. Archipelagus.]

ÆGALEOS, or Ægaleum, a mountain of Attica opposite Salamis, on which Xerxes sat during the engagement of his fleet with the Grecian ships in the adjacent sea. Herodot. 8, c. 90.—Thucyd. 2, c. 19.

ÆGATES, three islands lying northwest of Cape Lilybæum, on the western coast of Sicily. [Near these islands the Roman fleet under L. Catulus, obtained a decisive victory over that of the Carthaginians, commanded by Hanno, which put an end to the first Punic war.] Liv. 21, c. 10. 41. 49 and 22, c. 54, 56.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

ÆGÆLEON, a town of Macedonia taken by king Attalus. Liv. 31, c. 46.

ÆGËRIA. Vid. Egeria.

ÆGESTA, the daughter of Hippotes, and mother of Ægestus called Acestes. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 554.—An ancient town of Sicily near mount Eryx, destroyed by Agathocles. It was sometimes called Segesta and Acesta. Diod. 10.

ÆGEUS, king of Athens, son of Pandion, being desirous of having children, went to consult the oracle, and in his return, stopped at the court of Pittheus king of Trœzene, who gave him his daughter Æthra in marriage. He left her pregnant, and told her, that if she had a son, to send him to Athens as soon as he could lift a stone under which he had concealed his sword. By this sword he was to be known to Ægeus, who did not wish to make any public discovery of a son, for fear of his nephews, the Pallantides, who expected his crown. Æthra became mother of Theseus, whom she accordingly sent to Athens with his father's sword. At that time Ægeus lived with Medea, the divorced wife of Jason. When Theseus came to Athens, Medea attempted to poison him; but he escaped, and upon showing Ægeus the sword he wore, discovered himself to be his son. When Theseus returned from Crete after the death of the Minotaur, he forgot, agreeable to the engagement made with his father, to hoist up white sails as a signal of his success; and Ægeus, at the sight of black sails, concluding that his son was dead, threw himself from a high rock into the sea; which from him, as some suppose, has been called the Ægean. Ægeus reigned 48 years, and died B. C. 1235. He is supposed to have first introduced into Greece the worship of Venus Urania, to render the goddess propitious to his wishes in having a son. (vid. Theseus, Minotaurus & Medea.) Apollod. 1, c. 8, 9, 1. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 5, 22, 38, 1. 4, c. 2.—Plut. in These.—Hygin. fab. 37, 48, 79, and 173.

ÆGIÆLE, one of Phaeton's sisters changed into poplars, and their tears into amber. They are called Heliades.—A daughter of Adrastus, by Amphitea daughter of Pronax. She married Diomedes, in whose absence, during the Trojan war, she prostituted herself to her servants, and chiefly to Cometes, whom the king had left master of his house. At his return, Diomedes being told of his wife's wantonness, went to settle in Daunia. Some say that Venus implanted those vicious and lustful propensities in Ægiæle, to revenge herself on Diomedes, who had wounded her in the Trojan war. Ovid. in Ib. v. 350.—Homer. Il. 5, v. 412.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Stat. 3, Silv. 5, v. 48.

ÆGIALËA, an island near Peloponnesus, in the Cretan sea.—Another in the Ionian sea, near the Echinades. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 107.—The ancient name of Peloponnesus. Strab. 12. Mela. 2, c. 7.

ÆGIALËUS, son of Adrastus by Amphitea or Democanassa, was one of the Epigoni, i. e. one of the sons of those generals who were killed in the first Theban war. They went against the Thebans, who had refused to give burial to their fathers, and were victorious. They all returned home safe, except Ægiæleus, who was killed. That expedition is called the war of the Epigoni. Paus. 1, c. 43, 44. 1. 2, c. 20, 1. 9, c. 5.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, 1. 3, c. 7.—The same as Absyrtus brother to Medea. Justin. 42, c. 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3.—Diod. 4.

ÆGIËLUS, son of Phoroneus, was intrusted with the kingdom of Achaia by king Apis going to Egypt. Peloponnesus was called Ægialea from him.—A man who founded the kingdom of Sicily 2091 before the Christian era, and reigned 52 years.

ÆGIALUS, a name given to part of Peloponnesus. vid. Achaia. Paus. 5, c. 1, l. 7, c. 1.—An inconsiderable town of Pontus.—A city of Asia Minor.—A city of Galatia.—A city of Pontus.—Another in Æthiopia.

ÆGILIA, an island between Crete and Peloponnesus.—A place in Eubœa. Herodot. 6, c. 101.

[ÆGIMŪRUS, a small island in the gulf of Carthage. There were two rocks near this island, called ara Ægimuri, which were so named, because the Romans and Carthaginians concluded a treaty on them. The modern Zowamoore or Zumbra is the Ægimurus of the ancients. Plin. 5, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 1. 109.]

ÆGINA, daughter of Asopus, had Æacus by Jupiter changed into a flame of fire. She afterwards married Actor, son of Myrmidon, by whom she had some children, who conspired against their father. Some say that she was changed by Jupiter into the island which bears her name. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2, c. 5 and 29.—An island formerly called Enopia and Oenone, in a part of the Ægean sea, called Saronicus Sinus, about 26 miles in circumference. [The soil of this island was at first very stony and barren, but through the exertions of its inhabitants, who were called Myrmidons (emmetts) from their industry, it became very fruitful.—It is now called Engia.] They were once a very powerful nation by sea, but they cowardly gave themselves up to Darius when he demanded submission from all the Greeks. The Athenians under Pericles made war against them: and after taking 70 of their ships in a naval battle, they expelled them from Ægina. The fugitives settled in Peloponnesus, and after the ruin of Athens by Lysander, they returned to their country, but never after rose to their former power or consequence. Herodot. 5, 6 and 7.—Paus. 2, c. 29, l. c. 8, 44.—Strab. 8.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 10.

ÆGINETA PAULUS, a physician born in Ægina. He flourished in the 3d, or, according to others, the 7th century, and first deserved to be called man-midwife. He wrote De Re Medicâ, in seven books.

ÆGINĒTES, a king of Arcadia, in whose age Lycurgus instituted his famous laws. Paus. 1, c. 5.

ÆGIŌCHUS, a surname of Jupiter, from his being brought up by the goat Amalthœa, and using her skin, on his shield, in the war of the Titans. Diod. 5.

ÆGIPIAN, a name of Pan, because he had goat's feet.

[ÆGIRA, a town of Achaia, between Ægium and Sicily. Paus. 7, c. 26.]

ÆGIROESSA, a town of Ætolia. Herodot. 1, c. 149.

ÆGIS, the shield of Jupiter, αγορης αγορης, a she-goat. This was the goat Amalthœa, with whose skin he covered his shield. The goat was placed among the constellations. Jupiter gave this shield to Pallas, who placed upon it Medusa's head, which turned into stones all those who fixed their eyes upon it. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 352 and 435.

ÆGISTHUS, king of Argos, was son of Thyestes by his daughter Pelopea. Thyestes being at variance with his brother Atreus, was told by the oracle, that his wrongs could be revenged only by a son born of himself and his daughter. To avoid such an incest, Pelopea had been consecrated to the service of Minerva by her father, who some time after met her in a wood, and ravished her, without knowing who she was. Pelopea kept the sword of her ravisher, and finding it to be her father's, exposed the child she had brought forth. The child was preserved, and when grown up presented with the sword of his mother's ravisher. Pelopea soon after this melancholy adventure, had married her uncle Atreus, who received into his house her natural son. As Thyestes had debauched the first wife of Atreus, Atreus sent Ægisthus to put him to death; but Thyestes knowing the assassin's sword, discovered he was his own son, and, fully to revenge his wrongs, sent him back to murder Atreus. After this murder, Thyestes ascended the throne, and banished Agamemnon and Menelaus, the sons, or as others say, the grandsons of Atreus. These children fled to Polyphidus of Sicily; but as he dreaded the power of their persecutors, he remitted the protection of them to Ceneus, king of Ætolia. By their marriage with the daughters of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, they were empowered to recover the kingdom of Argos, to which Agamemnon succeeded, while Menelaus reigned in his father-in-law's place. Ægisthus had been reconciled to the sons of Atreus; and when they went to the Trojan war, he was left guardian of Agamemnon's kingdoms, and of his wife Clytemnestra. Ægisthus fell in love with Clytemnestra, and lived with her. On Agamemnon's return, these 2 adulterers murdered him, and, by a public marriage, strengthened themselves on the throne of Argos. Orestes, Agamemnon's son, would have shared his father's fate, had not his sister Electra privately sent him to his uncle Strophius, king of Phocis, where he contracted the most intimate friendship with his cousin Pylades. Some time after, Orestes came to Mycenæ, the residence of Ægisthus, and resolved to punish the murderers of his father, in conjunction with Electra, who lived in disguise in the tyrant's family. To accomplish this more effectually, Electra publicly declared that her brother Orestes was dead: upon which Ægisthus and Clytemnestra went to the temple of Apollo, to return thanks to the god for his death. Orestes, who had secretly concealed himself in the temple, attacked them, and put them both to death, after a reign of seven years. They were buried without the city walls. (vid. Agamemnon, Thyestes, Orestes, Clytemnestra, Pylades, and Electra.) *Ovid. de Rem. Cæsar Ægisthus, on account of his adultery with his wife Mutia, whom he repudiated after she had borne him three children. Suet. in Cæs. 50.

ÆGIUM, [a town of Achaia, where the States of Achaia held their general council. Now, Vostitza. Pausan. 7, c. 24.—Liv. 28, c. 7.]

ÆGLE, the youngest daughter of Æsculapius and Lampetie.—A nymph, daughter of Sol and Neära. Virg. Ec. 6, v. 20.—A nymph, daughter of Panepeus, beloved by Thésëus after he had left Ariadne. Plut. in Thes.—One of the Hesperides.—One of the Graces.

ÆGLES, a Samian wrestler, born dumb. Seeing some unlawful measures pursued in a contest, he broke the string which held his tongue, through the desire of speaking, and ever after spoke with ease. Val. Max. 1, c. 3.

ÆGLËTES, a surname of Apollo.

ÆGLÔGE, a nurse of Nero. Sueton. in Ner. 50.

ÆGOBÔLUS, a surname of Bacchus at Potnia, in Bœotia.

ÆGOCËROS, or Capricornus, an animal into which Pan transformed himself when flying before Typhon in the war with the giants. Jupiter made him a constellation. Lucret. 1, v. 613.

ÆGON, a shepherd. Virg. Ecl.—Theocrit. Idyll.—A promontory of Lemnos.—A name of the Ægean Sea. Flacc. 1, v. 628.—A boxer of Zacynthus; who dragged a large bull by the heel from a mountain into the city. Theocrit. Idyll. 4.

ÆGOS POTAMOS, i. e. the goat's river. [a stream in the Thracian Chersonese, with a town called Ægos at its mouth.] Here the Athenian fleet, consisting of 180 ships, was defeated by Lysander, on the 13th Dec. B. C. 405, in the last year of the Peloponnesian war. Mela. 2, c. 2.—Plin. 2, c. 58.—Paus. 3, c. 8 and 11.

ÆGOSAGË, an Asiatic nation under Attalus with whom he made conquests in Asia, and to whom he gave a settlement near the Hellespont. Polyb. 5.

ÆGUS and ROSCILLUS, two brothers amongst the Allobroges, who deserted from Cæsar to Pompey. Cæs. bell. civ. 3, c. 59.

ÆCÛSA, the middle island of the Ægates near Sicily.

ÆGY, a town near Sparta, destroyed because its inhabitants were suspected by the Spartans of favouring the Arcadians. Paus. 3, c. 2.

ÆGYPTIANES, a nation in the middle of Africa, whose body is human above the waist, and that of a goat below. Mela. 1, c. 4 and 8.

ÆGYPSUS, a town of the Getæ, near the Danube [Near this place according to DANVILLE, Darius Hystaspes constructed his bridge over the Danube, in his expeditions against the Scythians.] Ovid. ex Pont. 1. ep. 3. 1. 4, ep. 7.

ÆGYPTIUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean sea which is on the coast of Egypt.

ÆGYPTUS, son of Belus, and brother to Danaus, gave his 50 sons in marriage to the 50 daughters of his brother. Danaus who had established himself at Argos, and was jealous of his brother, who, by following him from Egypt into Greece, seemed envious of his prosperity, obliged all his daughters to murder their husbands the first night of their nuptials. This was executed; but Hypermenestra alone spared her husband Lynceus. Even Ægyptus was killed by his niece Polyxena. vid. Danaus, Danaides, Lynceus.—Ægyptus was king, after his father, of a part of Africa, which from him has been called Ægyptus. Hygin. fab. 168, 170.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Heroid. 14.—Paus. 7, c. 21.—

—An extensive country of Africa, bounded on the east by the Red Sea, and on the west by Libya. Its name is derived from Ægyptus brother to Danaus. Its extent, according to modern calculation, [is 700 miles from north to south, and it measures about 30' miles on the shore of the Mediterranean;] but at the distance of 50 leagues from the sea, it diminishes so much as scarce to measure 7 or 8 leagues between the mountains on the east and west. It is divided into Lower, which lies near the Mediterranean, and Upper, which is towards the south. Upper Egypt was famous for the town of Thebes, but Lower Egypt was the most peopled, and contained the Delta, a number of large islands, which, from their form, have been called after the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. This country has been the mother of arts and sciences. The greatest part of Lower Egypt has been formed by the mud and sand carried down by the Nile. The Egyptians reckoned themselves the most ancient nation in the universe, (vid. Psammelichus.) but some authors make them of Ethiopian origin. They are remarkable for their superstition; they paid as much honour to the cat, the crocodile, the bull, and even to onions, as to Isis. Rain never or seldom falls in this country; the fertility of the soil originates in the yearly inundations of the Nile, which rises [to the height of about 20 cubits on an average,] and exhibits a large plain of waters, in which are scattered here and there the towns and villages, as the Cyclades in the Ægean sea. The air is not wholesome, but the population is great and the cattle very prolific. It is said that Egypt once contained 20,000 cities, the most remarkable of which were Thebes, Memphis, Alexandria, Pelusium, Coptos, Arsinoe, &c. It was governed by kings who have immortalized themselves by the pyramids they have raised and the canals they have opened. The priests traced the existence of the country for many thousand years, and fondly imagined that the gods were the first sovereigns, and that monarchy had lasted 11,340 years according to Herodotus. According to the calculation of Constantine Manasses, the kingdom of Egypt lasted 1663 years from its beginning under Misraim the son of Ham, 2188 B. C. to the conquest of Cambyses, 525 B. C. Egypt revolted afterwards from the Persian power B. C. 414, and Amyrtæus then became king. After him succeeded Psammetichus, whose reign began 408 B. C. Nephereus 394; Acoris, 389; Psammuthis, 376, Nephertes 4 months, and Nectanebus, 375; Tachos, or Teos, 363; Nectanebus, 361.—It was conquered by Ochus, 350 B. C.; and after the conquest of Persia by Alexander, Ptolemy refounded the kingdom, and began to reign 323 B. C. Philadelphus, 284; Euergetes, 246; Philopater, 221; Epiphanes, 204; Philometer, 180 and 169, conjointly with Euergetes II. or Physcon, for 6 years; Euergetes II. 145; Lathurus Soter, and his mother Cleopatra, 116; Alexander of Cyprus, and Cleopatra, 106; Lathurus Soter restored, 88; Cleopatra II. 6 months, with Alexander the second 19 days, 81; Ptolemy, surnamed Alexander III. 80; Dionysius, surnamed Auletes, 65; Dionysius II. with Cleopatra III. 51; Cleopatra III. with young Ptolemy, 46, and in 30 B. C. it was reduced by Augustus into a Roman province. The history of Egypt, therefore, can be divided into three epochas; the first beginning with the foundation of the empire, to the conquest of Cambyses; the second ends at the death of Alexander; and the third comprehends the reign of the Ptolemies, and ends at the death of Cleopatra, in the age of Augustus.—Justin. 1.—Hirtius in Alex. 24.—*Macrob. in somn. ÆGYS. Vid. Ægy.

ÆGYSTHUS. Vid. Ægisthus.

ÆLIA, the wife of Sylla. Plut. in Syll.—The name of some towns built or repaired by the emperor Adrian.

ÆLIA lex, enacted by Ælius Tubero the tribune, A. U. C. 559, to send two colonies into the country of the Brutii. Liv. 34, c. 53.—Another A. U. C. 568, ordaining, that in public affairs, the augurs should observe the appearance of the sky, and the magistrates be empowered to postpone the business.—Another called Ælia Sexta, by Ælius Sextus, A. U. C. 756, which enacted, that all slaves who bore any marks of punishment received from their masters, should not rank as Roman citizens, [but should remain in the state of the Dedititii.]

ÆLIA PETINA, of the family of Tubero; married Claudius Cæsar, by whom she had a son. The emperor divorced her, to marry Messalina. Sueton. in Claud. 26.

ÆLIANUS CLAUDIUS, a Roman sophist of Præneste, in the reign of Adrian. He first taught rhetoric at Rome; but being disgusted with his profession, he became author and published treatises on animals in 17 books, on various history in 14 books, &c. in Greek, a language which he preferred to Latin. In his writings he shows himself very fond of the marvellous, and relates many stories which are often devoid of elegance and purity of style; though Philostratus has commended his language as superior to what could be expected from a person who was neither born nor educated in Greece. Ælian died in the 60th year of his age, A. D. 140. The best editions of his works collected together are that of Conrad Gesner, folio, printed Tiguri, 1556, though now seldom to be met with, that of Kuenius, 2 vol. 8vo. Lips. 1780, [and that of Lehnert, 2 vol. 8vo. Lips. 1794.]—Some attribute the treatise on the tactics of the Greeks to another Ælian.

ÆLIUS and ÆLIA, a family in Rome, so poor that 16 lived in a small house, and were maintained by the produce of a little field. Their poverty continued till Paulus conquered Perseus king of Macedonia, and gave his son-in-law Æl. Tubero five pounds of gold from the booty. Val. Max. 4, c. 4.

ÆLIUS ADRIANUS, an African, grandfather to the emperor Adrian.—Gallus, a Roman knight, the first who invaded Arabia Felix. He was very intimate with Strabo the geographer, and sailed on the Nile with him to take a view of the country. Plin. 6, c. 28.—Publius, one of the first questors chosen from the plebeians at Rome. Liv. 4, c. 54.—Q. Æl. Pætus, son of Sextus or Publius. As he sat in the senate-house, a wood-pecker perched on his head; upon which a soothsayer exclaimed, that if he preserved the bird, his house would flourish and Rome decay; and if he killed it, the contrary must happen. Hearing this, Ælius, in the presence of the senate, bit off the head of the bird. All the youths of the family were killed at Cannæ, and the Roman arms were soon attended with success. Val. Max. 5, c. 6.—Satur-ninus, a satyrist, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock for writing verses against Tiberius.—Sejanus, vid. Sejanus.—Sextus Catus, censor, with M. Cethegus. He separated the senators from the people in the public spectacles. During his consulship, the ambassadors of the Ætolians found him feasting in earthen dishes, and offered him silver vessels, which he refused, satisfied with the earthen cups, &c. which, for his virtues, he had received from his father-in-law, L. Paulus, after the conquest of Macedonia. He is greatly commended by Cicero for his learning, and called cordatus homo by Ennius for his knowledge of law. Plin.

33, c. 11.—Cic. de Orat. 1.—Spartianus, wrote the lives of the emperors Adrian, Antoninus Pius, and M. Aurelius. He flourished A. D. 240.—Tubero, grandson of L. Paulus, was austere in his morals, and a formidable enemy to the Gracchi. His grandson was accused before Cæsar, and ably defended by Cicero. Cic. ep. ad Brut.—Verus Cæsar, the name of L. C. Commodus Verus, after Adrian had adopted him. He was made prætor and consul by the emperor, who was soon convinced of his incapacity in the discharge of public duty. He killed himself by drinking an antidote; and Antoninus, surnamed Pius, was adopted in his place. Ælius was father to Antoninus Verus, whom Pius adopted.—A physician mentioned by Galen—L. Gallus, a lawyer, who wrote 12 books concerning the signification of all law words.

ÆLLO, one of the Harpies (from ἄλλοσα ἄλλο, alienum tollens, or ἄλλα, tempestas.) Flac. 4, v. 450.—Hesiod. Th. 267.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 710.—One of Actæon's dogs.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 220.

ÆLÛRUS, (a cat.) a deity worshipped by the Egyptians; and, after death, embalmed, and buried in the city of Bubastis. Herodot. 2, c. 66, &c.—Diod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1.—A. Gell. 20, c. 7.—Plut. in Pr.

ÆMATHION, & ÆMATHIA. vid. Emathion.

ÆMILIA LEX, was enacted by the dictator Æmilius, A. U. C. 309. It ordained that the censorship, which was before quinquennial, should be limited to one year and a half. Liv. 9, c. 33.—Another in the second consulship of Æmilius Mamercus, A. U. C. 391. It gave power to the eldest prætor to drive a nail in the capitol on the ides of September. Liv. 7, c. 3. The driving of a nail was a superstitious ceremony, by which the Romans supposed that a pestilence could be stopped, or an impending calamity averted.

ÆMILIÂNUS, (C. Julius) a native of Mauritania, proclaimed emperor after the death of Decius. He marched against Gallus and Valerian, but was informed they had been murdered by their own troops. He soon after shared their fate.—One of the thirty tyrants who rebelled in the reign of Gallienus.

ÆMILIUS. vid. Æmylius.

ÆMNESTUS, tyrant of Enna, was deposed by Dionysius the elder. Diod. 14.

ÆMON. vid. Hæmon.

ÆMONIA, a country of Greece, which received its name from Æmon, or Æmus, and was afterwards called Thessaly. Achilles is called Æmonius, as being born there. Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 11, l. 4, el. 1.—Horat. 1, od. 37. It was also called Pyrrha, from Pyrrha, Deucalion's wife, who reigned there.—The word has been indiscriminately applied to all Greece by some writers. Plin. 4, c. 7.

ÆMONIDES. A priest of Apollo, in Italy, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 537.

ÆMUS, an actor in Domitian's reign. Juv. 6, v. 197.

ÆMYLIA, a noble family in Rome, descended from Mamercus, son of Pythagoras, who for his humanity was called ἄμυλος, blandus.

—A vestal who rekindled the fire of Vesta, which was extinguished, by putting her veil over it. Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Dionys. Hal. 2.

—The wife of Africanus the elder, famous for her behaviour to her husband, when suspected of infidelity. Val. Max. 6, c. 7.—

Lepida, daughter of Lepidus, married Drusus the younger, whom she disgraced by her wantonness. She killed herself when accused of adultery with a slave. Tacit. 6, c. 40.—

A part of Italy called also Flaminia. Martial. 6, ep. 85.—A public road leading from Flaccientia to Ariminum; called after the consul Æmylius, who is supposed to have made it. Martial. 3, ep. 4.

ÆMYLIÂNUS, a name of Africanus the younger, son of P. Æmylius. In him the families of the Scipios and Æmylii were united. Many of that family bore the same name. Juv. 8, v. 2.

ÆMYLIÏ, a noble family in Rome, descended from Æmylius the son of Ascanius.—Plutarch says, that they are descended from Mamercus, the son of Pythagoras, surnamed Æmylius from the sweetness of his voice, in Num. & Emyl.—The family was distinguished in the various branches of the Lepidi, Mamerci, Mamercini, Barbulæ, Pauli, and Scauri.

ÆMYLIUS, a beautiful youth of Sybaris, whose wife met with the same fate as Procris. vid. Procris.—Censorinus, a cruel tyrant of Sicily, who liberally rewarded those who invented new ways of torturing. Paterculus gave him a brazen horse for this purpose, and the tyrant made the first experiment upon the donor. Plut. de Fort. Rom.—Lepidus, a youth who had a statue in the capitol, for saving the life of a citizen in a battle. Val. Max. 4, c. 1.—A triumvir with Octavius. vid. Lepidus.—Macer, a poet of Verona in the Augustan age. He wrote some poems upon serpents, birds, and, as some suppose, on bees. vid. Macer.—Marcus Scaurus, a Roman who flourished about 100 years B. C. and wrote three books concerning his own life. Cic. in Brut.—A poet in the age of Tiberius, who wrote a tragedy called Atheus, and destroyed himself.—Sura, another writer on the Roman year.—Mamercus, three times dictator, conquered the Fidenates, and took their city. He limited to one year and a half the censorship, which before his time was exercised during five years. Liv. 4, c. 17, 19, &c.—Papinianus, son of Hostilius Papinianus, was in favour with the emperor Severus, and was made governor to his sons Geta and Caracalla. Geta was killed by his brother, and Papinianus for upbraiding him was murdered by his soldiers. From his school the Romans have had many able lawyers, who were called Papinianists.—Pappus, a censor, who banished from the senate, P. Corn. Rufinus, who had been twice consul, because he had at his table ten pounds of silver plate, A. U. C. 473. Liv. 14.—Porcina, an elegant orator. Cic. in Brut.—Rectus, a severe governor of Egypt, under Tiberius. Dio.—Regillus, conquered the general of Antiochus at sea, and obtained a naval triumph. Liv. 37. c. 31.—Scarus, a noble, but poor citizen of Rome. His father, to maintain himself, was a coal-merchant. He was ædile, and afterwards prætor, and fought against Jugurtha. His son Marcus was son-in-law to Sylla, and in his ædileship he built a very magnificent theatre. Plin. 36. c. 15.—A bridge at Rome, called also Sublicius. Juv. 6. v. 32.

ÆNARIA, an island in the bay of Puteoli, abounding with cypress trees. It received its name from Æneas, who is supposed to have landed there on his way to Latium. It is called Pithecusa by the Greeks, and now Ischia, and was famous once for its mineral waters. Liv. 3. c. 22.—Plin. 3. c. 6. l. 31. c. 2.—Stat. 3. Sylv. 5. v. 104.

ÆNARIUM, a grove near Olenos in Achaia, sacred to Jupiter, [where the Achæans held their public assemblies.]

ÆNÆA or ÆNEIA, a town of Macedonia, 15 miles from Thessalonica, founded by Æneas. Liv. 40. c. 4. l. 44. c. 10.

ÆNEADES, a town of Chersonesus, built by Æneas. Cassander destroyed it, and carried the inhabitants to Thessalonica, lately built. Dionys. Hal. 1.

ÆNEADÆ, a name given to the friends and companions of Æneas, by Virg. Æn. 1. v. 161.

ÆNEAS, a Trojan prince, son of Anchises and the goddess Venus. The opinions of authors concerning his character are different. His infancy was intrusted to the care of a nymph, and at the age of 5 he was recalled to Troy. He afterwards improved himself in Thessaly under Chiron, a venerable sage, whose house was frequented by the young princes and heroes of the age. Soon after his return home he married Creusa, Priam's daughter, by whom he had a son called Ascanius. During the Trojan war, he behaved with great valour, in defence of his country, and came to an engagement with Diomedes and Achilles. Yet Strabo, Dictys of Crete, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Dares of Phrygia, accuse him of betraying his country to the Greeks, with Antenor, and of preserving his life and fortune by this treacherous measure. He lived at variance with Priam, because he received not sufficient marks of distinction from the king and his family, as Homer, Il. 3, says. This might have provoked him to seek revenge by perfidy. Authors of credit report, that when Troy was in flames, he carried away, upon his shoulders, his father Anchises, and the statues of his household gods, leading in his hand his son Ascanius, and leaving his wife to follow behind. Some say that he retired to Mount Ida, where he built a fleet of 20 ships, and set sail in quest of a settlement. Strabo and others maintain that Æneas never left his country, but rebuilt Troy, where he reigned, and his posterity after him. Even Homer, who lived 400 years after the Trojan war, says, Il. 20. v. 30, &c. that the gods destined Æneas and his posterity to reign over the Trojans. This passage Dionys. Hal. explained, by saying that Homer meant the Trojans who had gone over to Italy with Æneas, and not the actual inhabitants of Troy. According to Virgil and other Latin authors, who, to make their court to the Roman emperors, traced their origin up to Æneas, and described his arrival in Italy as indubitable, he with his fleet first came to the Thracian Chersonesus, where Polynestor, one of his allies, reigned. After visiting Delos, the Strophades, and Crete, where he expected to find the empire promised him by the oracle, as in the place where his progenitors were born, he landed at Drepanum, the Court of king Acestes, in Sicily, where he buried his father. From Sicily he sailed for Italy, but was driven on the coast of Africa, and kindly received by Dido, queen of Carthage, to whom, on his first interview, he gave one of the garments of the beautiful Helen. Dido being enamoured of him, wished to marry him; but he left Carthage by order of the gods. In his voyage he was driven to Sicily, and from thence he passed to Cumæ, where the Sybil conducted him to hell, that he might hear from his father the fates which attended him and all his posterity. After a voyage of seven years, and the loss of 13 ships, he came to the Tyber. Latinus, the king of the country, received him with hospitality, and promised him his daughter Lavinia, who had been before betrothed to king Turnus by her mother Amata. To prevent this marriage, Turnus made war against Æneas; and after many battles, the war was decided by a combat between the two rivals, in which Turnus was killed. Æneas married Lavinia, in whose honour he built the town of Lavinium, and succeeded his father-in-law. After a short reign, Æneas was killed in a battle against the Etrurians. Some say that he was drowned in the Numicus, and his body weighed down by his armour; upon which the Latins, not finding their king, supposed that he had been taken up to heaven, and therefore offered him sacrifices as to a god. Dionys. Hal. fixes the arrival of Æneas in Italy in the 54th olymp. Some authors suppose that Æneas, after the siege of Troy, fell to the share of Neoptolemus, together with Andromache, and that he was carried to Thessaly, whence he escaped to Italy. Others say, that after he had come to Italy, he returned to Troy, leaving Ascanius king of Latium. [The story of the loves of Dido and Æneas is a mere poetical embellishment, and introduced by a glaring anachronism. vid. Dido.] Homer. Victor.—Ælian. V. H. 8. c. 22.—A son of Æneas and Lavinia, called Sylvius, because his mother retired with him into the woods after his father's death. He succeeded Ascanius in Latium, though opposed by Iulus the son of his predecessor. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 770. Liv. 1, c. 3.

—An ambassador sent by the Lacedæmonians to Athens, to treat of peace, in the 8th year of the Peloponnesian war.—An ancient author who wrote on tactics, besides other treatises, which, according to Ælian, were epitomised by Cineas the friend of Pyrrhus—A native of Gaza, who, from a platonic philosopher became a christian, A. D. 485, and wrote a dialogue called Thiophrastus, on the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection.

ÆNEIA, or ÆNIA, a place near Rome, afterwards called Janiculum.—A city of Troas. Strab. 17.—A city of Macedonia. Dionys Hal. 1.

ÆNEIDES, a patronymic given to Ascanius, as son of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 653.

ÆNEIS, a poem of Virgil, which has for its subject the settlement of Æneas in Italy. The great merit of this poem is well known. The author has imitated Homer, and, as some say, Homer is superior to him only because he is more ancient, and is an original. Virgil died before he had corrected it, and at his death desired it might be burnt. This was happily disobeyed, and Augustus saved from the flames, a poem which proved his family to be descended from the kings of Troy. The Æneid had engaged the attention of the poet for 11 years, and in the first six books it seems that it was Virgil's design to imitate Homer's Odyssey, and in the last the Iliad. The action of the poem comprehends eight years, one of which only, the last, is really taken up by the action, as the seven first are merely episodes, such as Juno's attempts to destroy the Trojans, the loves of Æneas and Dido, the relation of the fall of Troy, &c. In the first book of the Æneid, the hero is introduced, in the seventh year of his expedition, sailing in the Mediterranean, and shipwrecked on the African coast, where he is received by Dido. In the second, Æneas, at the desire of the Phœnician queen, relates the fall of Troy, and his flight through the general conflagration to mount Ida. In the third, the hero continues his narration, by a minute account of his voyage through the Cyclades, the places where he landed, and the dreadful storm, with the description of which the poem opened. Dido, in the fourth book, makes public her partiality to Æneas, which is slighted by the sailing of the Trojans from Carthage, and the book closes with the suicide of the disappointed queen. In the fifth book, Æneas sails to Sicily, where he celebrates the anniversary of his father's death, and thence pursues his voyage to Italy. In the sixth he visits the Elysian fields, and learns from his father the fate which attends him and his descendants the Romans. In the seventh book, the hero reaches the destined land of Latium, and concludes a treaty with the king of the country, which is soon broken by the interference of Juno, who stimulates Turnus to war. The auxiliaries of the enemy are enumerated; and in the eighth book, Æneas is assisted by Evander, and receives from Venus a shield wrought by Vulcan, on which are represented the future glory and triumphs of the Roman nation. The reader is pleased, in the ninth book, with the account of battles between the rival armies, and the immortal friendship of Nisus and Euryalus. Jupiter, in the tenth, attempts a reconciliation between Venus and Juno, who patronised the opposite parties; the fight is renewed, Pallas killed, and Turnus saved from the avenging hand of Æneas, by the interposition of Juno. The eleventh book gives an account of the funeral of Pallas, and of the meditated reconciliation between Æneas and Latinus, which the sudden appearance of the enemy defeats. Camilla is slain, and the combatants separated by the night. In the last book, Juno prevents the single combat agreed upon by Turnus and Æneas. The Trojans are defeated in the absence of their king; but on the return of Æneas, the battle assumes a different turn, a single combat is fought by the rival leaders, and the poem is concluded by the death of king Turnus. Plin. 7, c. 30, &c.

ÆNESIDEMUS, a brave general of Argos. Liv. 32, c. 25.—A Cretan philosopher, who wrote 8 books on the doctrine of his master Pyrrho. Diog. in Pyr.

ÆNESIUS, a surname of Jupiter, from mount Ænum.

ÆNETUS, a victor at Olympia, who, in the moment of victory, died through excess of joy. Paus. 3, c. 18.

ÆNIA. vid. ÆNEIA.

ÆNOBARBUS, or Ahenobarbus, the surname of Domitius. When Castor and Pollux acquainted him with a victory, he discredited them; upon which they touched his chin and beard, which instantly became of a brazen colour, whence the surname given to himself and his descendants.

ÆNOS, now Eno, an independent city of Thrace, at the eastern mouth of the Hebrus, confounded with Æneia, of which Æneas was the founder. Mela, 2, c. 2.

[ÆNUS, a river of Germany, separating Vindelicia from Noricum, now the Inn. It rises in the Rhætian Alps, and falls into the Danube. On its banks was the Æni Pons of Antonine, which Mannert locates near the modern village of Langen Pfunsen. Mannert Anc. Geogr. Vol. 3. p. 627.]

ÆOLIA, a name given to Arne. Sappho is called Æolia puella, and lyric poetry Æolian carmen, because of Alcæus and Sappho, natives of Lesbos, Horat. 4, od. 3, v. 12, and od. 9, v. 12.

ÆOLIA, or Æolis, [a country of Asia Minor, so called from the Æolians who settled there. It extended, in the interior, from the Hermus to the Caicus, and along the coast, from Cumæ to Pitane. It contained originally 12 cities, but Smyrna, one of the number, was afterwards taken by the Ionians. It sent forth colonies along the whole northern coast, and also to the island of Lesbos. Cumæ was the principal city. The Æolians received their name from Æolus, the son of Hellen.] They migrated from Greece about 1124 B. C. 80 years before the migration of the Ionian tribes. Herodot. 1, c. 26, &c.—Strab. 1, 2 and 6.—Plin. 5, c. 30.—Mela, 1, c. 2 and 18—Thesaly has been anciently called Æolia. Bœotus, son of Neptune, having settled there, called his followers Bœotians, and their country Bœotia.

ÆOLIE and ÆOLIDES, seven islands between Sicily and Italy; called Lipara, Hiera, Strongyle, Didyme, Ericusa, Phœnicusa, and Enonymos. They were the retreat of the winds; and Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, calls them Æolia, and the kingdom of Æolus the god of storms and winds. They sometimes bear the name of Vulcania and Hephaestides, and are known now among the moderns under the general appellation of Lipari islands. Lucan. 5, v. 609.—Justin. 4, c. 1.

ÆOLIDES, a patronymic of Ulysses, from Æolus: because Anticlea, his mother, was pregnant by Sisyphus, the son of Æolus, when she married Laertes. It is also given to Athamas and Misenus, as sons of Æolus. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 511, l. 13, v. 31.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 164 and 529.

ÆOLUS, the king of storms and winds, was the son of Hippotas. He reigned over Æolia; and because he was the inventor of sails, and a great astronomer, the poets have called him the god of the wind. It is said that he confined in a bag, and gave Ulysses all the winds that could blow against his vessel when he returned to Ithaca. The companions of Ulysses untied the bag, and gave the winds their liberty. Æolus was indebted to Juno for his royal dignity, according to Virgil. The name seems to be derived from αιολος, varius, because the winds over which he presided are ever varying.—There were two others, a king of Etruria, father to Macareus and Canace, and a son of Hellen, often confounded with the god of the winds. This last married Enaretta, by whom he had seven sons and five daughters. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 1.—Met. 11, v. 478, l. 14, v. 224.—Apollon 4, Argon.—Flacc. 1, v. 556.—Diod. 4 and 5.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, &c.

ÆORA, a festival in Athens, in honour of Erigone.

ÆPULO, a general of the Istrians, who drank to excess, after he had stormed the camp of A. Manlius, the Roman general. Being attacked by a soldier, he fled to a neighbouring town, which the Romans took, and killed himself for fear of being taken. Flor. 2, c. 10.

ÆPÏRUS, king of Mycenæ, son of Chrestophontes and Merope, was educated in Arcadia with Cypselus, his mother's father. To recover his kingdom, he killed Polyphontes, who had married his mother against her will, and usurped the crown. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 4, c. 8.—A son of Hippothous, who forcibly entered the temple of Neptune, near Mantinea, and was struck blind by the sudden eruption of salt water from the altar. He was killed by a serpent in hunting. Paus. 4, c. 4 and 5.

ÆQUI or ÆAVICOLI, a people of Latium, near Tybur; they were great enemies to Rome in its infant state, and were conquered with much difficulty. Flor. 1, c. 11.—Liv. 1, c. 32, l. 2, c. 30, l. 3, c. 2, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 4. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 746, 9, v. 684.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 93.—Dionys. Hal. 2, c. 19.

ÆQUIMELIUM, a place in Rome where the house of Melius stood, who aspired to sovereign power: for which crime his habitation was levelled to the ground. Liv. 4, c. 16.

ÆRÔPE, the wife of Atreus.

ÆRÏPUS, a person appointed regent to Orestes, the infant son of Archelaus king of Macedonia.

WSACUS, a river of Troy near Ida.—H son of Priam, by Alexirhoe; or, according to others, by Arisba. He became enamoured of Hesperia, whom he pursued into the woods. The nymph threw herself into the sea, and was changed into a bird. Æsacus followed her example, and was changed into a cormorant by Tethys. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 11.

ÆSCHINES, an Athenian orator, who flourished about 342 B. C. and distinguished himself by his rivalry with Demosthenes. His father's name was Atrometus, and he boasted of his descent from a noble family, though Demosthenes reproached him as being the son of a courtesan. The first open signs of enmity between the rival orators appeared at the court of Philip, where they were sent as ambassadors; but the character of Æschines was tarnished by the acceptance of a bribe from the Macedonian prince, whose tyranny had hitherto been the general subject of his declamation. When the Athenians wished to reward the patriotic labours of Demosthenes with a golden crown, Æschines impeached Ctesiphon, who proposed it; and to their subsequent dispute we are indebted for the two celebrated orations de coronâ. Æschines was defeated by his rival's superior eloquence, and banished to Rhodes; but as he retired from Athens, Demosthenes ran after him, and nobly forced him to accept a present of silver. In his banishment, the orator repeated to the Rhodians, what he had delivered against Demosthenes; and after receiving much applause, he was desired to read the answer of his antagonist. It was received with greater marks of approbation; but, exclaimed Æschines, how much more would your admiration have been raised had you heard Demosthenes himself speak it! Æschines died in the 75th year of his age, at Rhodes, or, as some suppose, at Samos. He wrote three orations, and nine epistles, which, from their number, received the names, the first of the graces, and the last of the muses. The orations alone are extant. [They are generally printed with those of Demosthenes. Among the best editions are, that of Foulkes and Friend, Oxon, 1695. 8vo.—and that of Stock, Dublin, 1774, 2 vols. 8vo.—An edition however of the entire works of Æschines and Demosthenes is now publishing in London, which promises to equal all others that have preceded it.] Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 24, l. 2, c. 53. in Brut. c. 17.—Plut. in Demosth.—Diog. 2 and 3.—Plin. 7, c. 30.—A philosopher, disciple of Socrates, who wrote several dialogues, some of which bore the following titles: Aspasia, Phædon, Alcibiades, Draco, Eryx, Polyænus, Telauges, &c. The dialogue entitled Axiochus, and ascribed to Plato, is supposed to be his composition. The best editions are, that of Leovard, 1718, with the notes of Horæus, in 8vo. and that of Fischer, 8vo. Lips. 1786.

ÆSCHRION, a Mitylenean poet, intimate with Aristotle. He accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic expedition.—An iambic poet of Samos Athen.—A physician commended by Galen. A treatise of his on husbandry has been quoted by Pliny.

ÆSCHYLUS, an excellent soldier and poet of Athens, son of Euphorion, and brother to Cynægius. He was in the Athenian army at the battles of Marathon, Salamis, and Plataea. But the most solid fame he has obtained, is the offspring less of his valour in the field of battle than of his writings. Of ninety tragedies, however, the fruit of his ingenious labours, 40 of which were rewarded with the public prize, only seven have come safe to us: Prometheus vinculus, Septem duces apud Thebas, Persæ, Agamemnon, Choephore, Eumenides, Supplices. Æschylus is the first who introduced two actors on the stage, and clothed them with dresses suitable to their character. He likewise removed murder from the stage. It is said, that when he composed his countenance betrayed the greatest ferocity; and according to one of his scholiasts, when his Eumenides were represented, many children died through fear, and several pregnant women actually miscarried in the house, at the sight of the horrible masks that were introduced. The imagination of the poet was strong and comprehensive, but disorderly and wild; fruitful in prodigies, but disdainful of probabilities. His style is obscure, and the labours of an excellent modern critic have pronounced him the most difficult of all the Greek classics. A few expressions of impious tendency in one of his plays, nearly proved fatal to Æschylus; he was condemned to death; but his brother Amyntas, it is reported, reversed the sentence, by uncovering an arm, of which the hand had been cut off at the battle of Salamis in the service of his country, and the poet was pardoned. Æschylus has been accused of drinking to excess, and of never composing except when in a state of intoxication. In his old age he retired to the court of Hiero in Sicily. Being informed that he was to die by the fall of a house, he became dissatisfied with the fickleness of his countrymen, and withdrew from the city into the fields, where he sat down. An eagle with a tortoise in her bill, flew over his bald head, and supposing it to be a stone, dropped her prey upon it to break the shell, and Æschylus instantly died of the blow in the 69th year of his age, 456 B. C. It is said that he wrote an account of the battle of Marathon in elegiac verses. [The best edition of his works is that of Butler, Cantab. 1809. 4 vols. in 4to, and 8 vols. in 8vo.—Many of his tragedies have also been separately edited with great ability, especially by Blomfield, Cantab. 1812, &c.]—Horat. Art. poet. 278.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plin. 10, c. 3.—Val. Max. 9, c. 12.—The 12th perpetual archon of Athens.—A native of Cnidus, teacher of rhetoric to Cicero. Cic. in Brut.

ÆSCULAPIUS, son of Apollo, by Coronis, or, as some say, by Larissa, daughter of Phlegias, was god of medicine. After his union with Coronis, Apollo set a crow to watch her, and was soon informed that she admitted the caresses of Ischys of Æmonia. The god, in a fit of anger, destroyed Coronis with lightning, but saved the infant from her womb, and gave him to be educated to Chiron, who taught him the art of medicine. Some authors say, that Coronis left her father to avoid the discovery of her pregnancy, and that she exposed her child near Epidaurus. A goat of the flocks of Arethanas gave him her milk, and the dog who kept the flock stood by him to shelter him from injury. He was found by the master of the flock, who went in search of his stray goat, and saw his head surrounded with resplendent rays of light. Æsculapius was physician to the Argonauts, and considered so skilled in the medicinal power of plants, that he was called the inventor as well as the god of medicine. He restored many to life, of which Pluto complained to Jupiter, who struck Æsculapius with thunder, but Apollo, angry at the death of his son, killed the Cyclops who made the thunderbolts. Æsculapius received divine honours after death, chiefly at Epidaurus, Pergamus, Athens, Smyrna, &c. Goats, bulls, lambs, and pigs, were sacrificed on his altars, and the cock and the serpent were sacred to him. Rome, A. U. C. 462, was delivered of a plague and built a temple to the god of medicine, who, as was supposed, had come there in the form of a serpent, and hid himself among the reeds in an island of the Tyber. Æsculapius was represented with a large beard, holding in his hand a staff, round which was wreathed a serpent; his other hand was supported on the head of a serpent. Serpents are more particularly sacred to him, not only as the ancient physicians used them in their prescriptions, but because they were the symbols of prudence and foresight, so necessary in the medical profession. He married Epione, by whom he had two sons, famous for their skill in medicine, Machaon and Podalirus; and four daughters, of whom Hygiea, goddess of health, is the most celebrated. Some have supposed that he lived a short time after the Trojan war. Hesiod makes no mention of him. Homer Il. 4, v. 193. Hymn. in Æscul.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Apollon. 4. Argon.—Hygin. fab. 49.—Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 11 and 27, l. 7, c. 23. &c.—Diod. 4.—Pindar. Pyth. 3.—Lucian.

Dial. de Saltat.—Val. Max. 1, c. 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 22, says there were three of this name; the 1st, a son of Apollo, worshipped in Arcadia; [the 2d, the brother of the second Mercury, the 3d, a man who first introduced tooth-drawing and the use of cathartics.]

ÆSERNA, a city of the Samnites, in Italy, [now Isernia.] Liv. 27, c. 12.

ÆSIS, a river of Italy, which separates Umbria from Picenum. [Now the Iesi.]

ÆSON, son of Cretheus, was born at the same birth as Pelias. He succeeded his father in the kingdom of Iolchos, but was soon exiled by his brother. He married Alcimeda, by whom he had Jason, whose education he intrusted to Chiron, being afraid of Pelias. When Jason was grown up, he demanded his father's kingdom from his uncle, who gave him evasive answers, and persuaded him to go in quest of the golden fleece. vid. Jason. At his return, Jason found his father very infirm; and Medea, vid. Medea, at his request, drew the blood from Æson's veins, and re-filled them with the juice of certain herbs which she had gathered, and immediately the old man recovered the vigour and bloom of youth. Some say that Æson killed himself by drinking bull's blood to avoid the persecution of Pelias. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 285.—Hygin. fab. 12.—A river of Thessaly, with a town of the same name.

ÆSONIDES, a patronymic of Jason, as being descended from Æson.

ÆSÖPUS, a Phrygian philosopher, who, though originally a slave, procured his liberty by the sallies of his genius. He travelled over the greatest part of Greece and Egypt, but chiefly resided at the court of Cræsus, king of Lydia, by whom he was sent to consult the oracle of Delphi. In this commission Æsop behaved with great severity, and satirically compared the Delphians to floating sticks, which appear large at a distance, but are nothing when brought near. The Delphians, offended with his sarcastic remarks, accused him of having secreted one of the sacred vessels of Apollo's temple, and threw him down from a rock, 561 B. C. Maximus Planudes has written his life in Greek; but no credit is to be given to the biographer, who falsely asserts that the mythologist was short and deformed. Æsop dedicated his fables to his patron Cræsus: but what appears now under his name, is no doubt a compilation of all the fables and apologies of wits before and after the age of Æsop, conjointly with his own. [The best editions of his fables are, that of Klotzius, Lips. 1776. 8vo. and that of Ernesti. Lips. 1731. 2mo.] Plut. in Solon.—Phad. 1, fab. 2, i. 2, fab. 9.—Claudius, an actor on the Roman stage, very intimate with Cicero. He amassed an immense fortune. His son, to be more expensive, melted precious stones to drink at his entertainments. Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 239.—Val. Max. 8, c. 10, l. 9, c. 1.—Plin. 9, c. 35, l. 10, c. 51.

ÆTHALIA, or ILVA, now Elba, an island between Etruria and Corsica. Plin. 3, c. 6, l. 6, c. 30.

ÆTHIOPIA, an extensive country of Africa, [divided by the ancients into Superior and Inferior. The former lay to the south of Egypt and answers to modern Abyssinia, the latter corresponds with the southern regions of Africa, known to the ancients only in name. Homer has styled the Æthiopians the most just of men and the favourites of the gods, who feasted among them for 12 days each year.] Diod. 4, says, that the Æthiopians were the first who worshipped the gods, for which, as some suppose, their country had never been invaded by a foreign enemy. Lucan. 3, v. 253, l. 9, v. 651.—Juv. 2, v. 23.—Virg. ecl. 6, v. 68.—Plin. 6, c. 29. Paus. 1, c. 33.—Homer. Od. 1, v. 22. Il. 1, v. 423.

ÆTHRA, daughter of Pittheus king of Træzene, had Theseus by Ægeus. vid. Ægeus. She was carried away by Castor and Pollux, when they recovered their sister Helen, whom Theseus had stolen, and intrusted to her care. vid. Helen. She went to Troy with Helen. Homer. Il. 3, v. 144.—Paus. 2, c. 31, l. 5, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 37 and 79.—Plut. in These.—Ovid. Her. 10, v. 131.

ÆTHÛSA, a daughter of Neptune by Amphitrite, or Alcyone, mother by Apollo of Eleuthere and two sons. Paus. 9, c. 20.

ÆTION, or EETION, the father of Andromache, Hector's wife. He was killed at Thebes, with his seven sons, by the Greeks.—A famous painter. He drew a painting of Alexander going to celebrate his nuptials with Roxane. This piece was much valued, and was exposed to public view at the Olympic games, where it gained so much applause that the president of the games gave the painter his daughter in marriage. Cic. Br. 18.

ÆTNA, a mountain of Sicily, now called Gibello, famous for its volcano, which, for about 3000 years, has thrown out fire at intervals. It is 2 miles in perpendicular height, and measures 180 miles round at the base, with an ascent of 30 miles. Its crater forms a circle about 2 miles in circumference, and its top is covered with snow and smoke at the same time, whilst the sides of the mountain, from the great fertility of the soil, exhibit a rich scene of cultivated fields and blooming vineyards. Pindar is the first who mentions an eruption of Ætna; and the silence of Homer on the subject is considered as a proof that the fires of the mountain were unknown in his age. Hesiod. Theog. v. 860.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 570.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 6, l. 15, v. 340.—Ital. 14, v. 59.

ÆTŌLIA, a country. It received its name from Ætolus. The inhabitants were little known in Greece, till after the ruin of Athens and Sparta they assumed a consequence in the country, and afterwards made themselves conspicuous as the allies of Rome and as its enemies, till they were conquered by Fulvius. Liv. 26, c. 24, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 9.—Strab. 8.

and 10.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 2.—Paus. 10, c. 18.—Plut. in Flam.

ÆTOLUS, son of Endymion of Elis and Iphianassa, married Pronoe, by whom he had Pleuron and Calydon. Having accidentally killed Apis, son of Phoroneus, he left his country, and came to settle in that part of Greece which has been called, from him, Ætolia. Apollod. 1, c. 7 and 9.—Paus. 5, c. 1.

ÆX, a rocky island between Tenedos and Chios. Plin. 4, c. 11.

AFER, an inhabitant of Africa.—An informer under Tiberius and his successors. He became also known as an orator and as the preceptor of Quintilian, and was made consul by Domitian. He died A. D. 59.

LUC. AFRANIUS, a Latin comic poet in the age of Terence, often compared to Menander, whose style he imitated. Quint. 10, c. 1.—Sueton. Ner. 11.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 57.—Cic. de fin. 1, c. 3.—A. Gell. 13, c. 8.—A general of Pompey, conquered by Cæsar in Spain. Sueton. in Cæs. 34.—Plut. in Pomp.—Q. a man who wrote a severe satire against Nero, for which he was put to death in the Pisonian conspiracy. Tacit.—Potitus, a plebeian, who said before Caligula, that he would willingly die if the emperor could recover from the distemper he laboured under. Caligula recovered, and Afranius was put to death that he might not forfeit his word. Dio.

AFRICA, called Libya by the Greeks, one of the three parts of the ancient world, and the greatest peninsula of the universe, bounded on the east by Arabia and the Red Sea, on the north by the Mediterranean, south and west by the ocean. [In its greatest length it extends 4300 miles, and in its greatest breadth it is 3500 miles. Very little of this division of the globe was known to the ancients, except the parts adjacent to the coast of the Mediterranean, and along the banks of the Nile. The interior they thought uninhabitable from the excessive heat, or peopled it with fabulous monsters, of which Africa was proverbially the nurse.]—There is a part of Africa, called Propria, which [corresponds with the modern Tunis.]

AFRICANUS, a blind poet, commended by Ennius.—A christian writer, who flourished A. D. 222. In his chronicle, which was universally esteemed, he reckoned 5500 years from the creation of the world to the age of Julius Cæsar. Nothing remains of this work, but what Eusebius has preserved. In a letter to Origen, Africanus proved, that the history of Susanna is supposititious; and in another to Aristides, still extant, he endeavours to reconcile the seeming contradictions that appear in the genealogies of Christ in St. Matthew and Luke. He is supposed to be the same who wrote nine books, in which he treats of physic, agriculture, &c.—A lawyer, disciple to Papinian, and intimate with the emperor Alexander.—The surname of the Scipios, from the conquest of Africa. vid. Scipio.

AFRICUM MARE, is that part of the Mediterranean which is on the coast of Africa.

AGAMÉDES and TROPHONIUS, two architects who made the entrance of the temple of Delphi, for which they demanded of the god, whatever gift was most advantageous for a man to receive. Three days after they were found dead in their bed. Plut. de cons. ad Apol.—Cic. Tusc. 1, 47.—Paus. 9, c. 11 and 37, gives a different account.

AGAMÉMNON, king of Mycenæ and Argos, was brother to Menelaus, and son of Plisthenes, the son of Atreus. Homer calls them sons of Atreus, which is false upon the authority of Herodotus, Apollodorus, &c. vid. Plisthenes. When Atreus was dead, his brother Thyestes seized the kingdom of Argos, and removed Agamemnon and Menelaus, who fled to Polyphidus king of Sicyon, and hence to Ceneus, king of Ætolia, where they were educated. Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, and Menelaus Helen, both daughters of Tyndarus king of Sparta, who assisted them to recover their father's kingdom. After the banishment of the usurper to Cythera, Agamemnon established himself at Mycenæ, whilst Menelaus succeeded his father-in-law at Sparta. When Helen was stolen by Paris, Agamemnon was elected commander in chief of the Grecian forces going against Troy; and he showed his zeal in the cause by furnishing 100 ships, and lending 60 more to the people of Arcadia. The fleet was detained at Aulis, where Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter to appease Diana. vid. Iphigenia. During the Trojan war, Agamemnon behaved with much valour; but his quarrel with Achilles, whose mistress he took by force, was disastrous to the Greeks. vid. Briseis. After the ruin of Troy, Cassandra fell to his share, and foretold him that his wife would put him to death. He gave no credit to this, and returned to Argos with Cassandra. Clytemnestra, with her adulterer Ægisthus, (vid. Ægisthus.) prepared to murder him; and as he came from the bath, to embarrass him, she gave him a tunic whose sleeves were sewed together, and while he attempted to put it on, she brought him to the ground with a stroke of a hatchet, and Ægisthus seconded her blows.—His death was revenged by his son Orestes. vid. Clytemnestra, Menelaus, and Orestes. Homer. Il. 1, 2, &c. Od. 4, &c.—Ovid. de Rem. Am. v. 777.—Met. 12, v. 30.—Hygin. fab. 88 and 97.—Strab. 8.—Thucyd. 1, c. 9.—Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 26.—*Dietyl. AGANIPPE, a celebrated fountain of Bœotia, at the foot of mount Helicon. It flows into the Permessus, and is sacred to the muses, who, from it, were called Aganippedes—[Ovid. (Fast. 5, 7.) makes Hippocrene and Aganippe the same; but Solinus and others distinguish them, and ascribe their being united to poetic license.]—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Pro- part. 2, el. 3.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 312.—Plin. 4, c. 7

AGAPĒNOR, the son of Ancæus, and grandson of Lycurgus, who after the ruin of Troy, was carried by a storm to Cyprus, where he built Paphos. Paus. 8, c. 5.—Homer. Il.

AGARĒNI, a people of Arabia. Trojan destroyed their city, called Agarum. Strab. 16.

AGARISTA, daughter of Clisthenes, was courted by all the princes of Greece. She married Megacles. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 24.—Herodot. 6, c. 12. &c.—A daughter of Hippocrates, who married Xantippus. She dreamed that she had brought forth a lion, and some time after became mother of Pericles.—Plut. in Pericl.—Herodot. 6, c. 131.

AGASICLES, king of Sparta, was son of Archidamus, and one of the Proclidæ. He used to say that a king ought to govern his subjects as a father governs his children. Paus. 3, c. 7.—Plut. in Apoph.

AGĀSUS, a harbour on the coast of Apulia, [supposed to be the same with Porto Greco.] Plin. 3, c. 11.

AGĀTHA, a town of France, now Agde in Languedoc. Mela, 2, c. 5.

AGATHARCHĪDES, a Samian philosopher and historian, who wrote a treatise on stones, and a history of Persia and Phœnice, besides an account of the Red Sea, of Europe, and Asia. Some make him a native of Cnidus, and add that he flourished about 177 B. C. Joseph. cont. Ap.

AGĀTHIAS, a Greek historian of Æolia. A poet and historian in the age of Justinian, of whose reign he published the history in five books. Several of his epigrams are found in the Anthologia. His history is a sequel of that of Procopius. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1660.

AGĀTHO, [an Athenian tragic and comic poet, the disciple of Prodicus and Socrates. There is now nothing extant of his productions except a few quotations preserved by Aristotle, Athenæus, Ælian, and others.]

AGATHOCLEĀ, a beautiful courtesan of Egypt. One of the Ptolemies destroyed his wife Eurydice to marry her. She, with her brother, long governed the kingdom, and attempted to murder the king's son. Plut. in Cleon.—Justin. 30, c. 1.

AGATHOCLES, a tyrant of Sicily, son of a potter, who, by entering in the Sicilian army, arrived to the greatest honours, and made himself master of Syracuse. He reduced all Sicily under his power, but being defeated at Himera by the Carthaginians, he carried the war into Africa, where, for four years, he extended his conquests over his enemy. He afterwards passed into Italy, and made himself master of Crotona. He died in his 72d year, B. C. 289, after a reign of 23 years of mingled prosperity and adversity. Plut. in Apoph.—Justin. 22 and 23.—Polyb. 15.—Diod. 13, &c.—A son of Lysimachus, taken prisoner by the Getæ. He was ransomed, and married Lysandra daughter of Ptolemy Lagus. His father, in his old age, married Arsinoë, the sister of Lysander. After his husband's death; Arsinoë, fearful for her children, attempted to murder Agathocles. Some say that she fell in love with him, and killed him because he slighted her. When Agathocles was dead, 283 B. C. Lysandra fled to Seleucus. Strab. 13.—Plut. in Pyrrh. and Demetr.—Paus. 1, c. 9 and 10.—A Grecian historian of Babylon, who wrote an account of Cyzicus. Cic. de div. 1, c. 24.

AGĀTHON, vid. Agatho.

AGATHYRSI, an effeminate nation of Scythia, who had their wives in common. [They pretended to be descended from Agathysis, the son of Hercules the Libyan.] Herodot. , c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 146.

AGĀVE, daughter of Cadmus and Hermione, married Echion, by whom she had Pentheus, who was torn to pieces by the Bacchanals. vid. Pentheus. She is said to have killed her husband in celebrating the orgies of Bacchus. She received divine honours after death, because she had contributed to the education of Bacchus. Theocrit. 26.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 7. 5.—Lucan. 1, v. 574.—Stat. Theb. 11, v. 318.—Apollod. 3, c. 4.

AGDESTIS, [a mountain of Phrygia, near the city of Pessinus. It had a double summit, one of which was called Agdistis, and hence the name Agdistis applied to Cybele. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. Vol. 6, part 3, p. 63.]

AGELASTUS, a surname of Crassus, the grandfather of the rich Crassus. He only laughed once in his life, and this, it is said, was upon seeing an ass eat thistles. Cic. de fin. 5.—Plin. 7, c. 19.—The word is also applied to Pluto, from the sullen and melancholy appearance of his countenance.

AGELĀUS, a son of Hercules and Omphale, from whom Cræsus was descended.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—A servant of Priam, who preserved Paris when exposed on mount Ida. Id. 3, c. 12.

AGENDĪCUM, now Sens, a town of Gaul, the capital of the Senones. [Called Agedicum by Ptolemy, and by others Agradicum.] Cæs. bell. Gall. 6, c. 44.

AGĒNOR, king of Phœnicia, was son of Neptune and Libya, and brother to Belus. He married Telephassa, by whom he had Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, and Europa. Hygin. fab. 6.—Ital. 1, v. 15, l. 17, v. 58.—Apollod. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 1.

AGESANDER, [a sculptor of Rhodes, one of the three who jointly executed the famous group of Laocœon. He flourished about the 83th Olympiad.—His name stands first upon the plinth of the group.]

AGESIAS, platonic philosopher who taught the immortality of the soul. One of the Ptolemies forbade him to continue his lectures, because his doctrine was so prevalent that many of his auditors committed suicide.

AGESILĀUS, king of Sparta, of the family of the Agidæ, was son of Doryssus, and father of Archelaus. During his reign, Lycurgus instituted his famous laws. Herodot. 7.

c. 204.—Paus. 3, c. 2.—A son of Archidamus of the family of the Proclidae, made king in preference to his nephew Leotyichides. He made war against Artaxerxes Mnemon king of Persia with success; but in the midst of his conquests in Asia, he was recalled home to oppose the Athenians and Bœotians, who desolated his country; and his return was so expeditious that he passed in thirty days over that tract of country which had taken up a whole year of Xerxes' expedition. He defeated his enemies at Coronea; [but the Spartans were in turn defeated at Leuctra and Mantinea by the Thebans under Epaminondas.] Though deformed, small of stature, and lame, he was brave, and greatness of soul compensated for all the imperfections of nature. He was as fond of sobriety as of military discipline; and when he went, in his 80th year, to assist Tachus king of Egypt, the servants of the monarch could hardly be persuaded that the Lacedæmonian general was eating with his soldiers on the ground, bareheaded, and without any covering to repose upon. Agesilaus died on his return from Egypt, after a reign [of 41 years, and in the 84th year of his age,] and his remains were embalmed and brought to Lacedæmon. Justin. 6, c. 1.—Plut. and C. Nep. in vit.—Paus. 3, c. 9.—Xenoph. Orat. pro Ages.—A brother of Themistocles, who was sent as a spy into the Persian camp, where he stabbed Marodonius instead of Xerxes. Plut. in Parall.

AGESIPOLIS, 1st, king of Lacedæmon, son of Pausanias, obtained a great victory over the Mantineans. He reigned 14 years, and was succeeded by his brother Cleombrotus, B. C. 380. Paus. 3, c. 5, l. 8, c. 8. Xenoph. 3. Hist. Græc.—2d, son of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, was succeeded by Cleomenes 2d, B. C. 370. Paus. 1, c. 13, l. 3, c. 5.

AGESISTRATA, the mother of king Agis. Plut. in Agid.

AGGRAMMES, a cruel king of the Gangarides. His father was a hair-dresser, of whom the queen became enamoured, and whom she made governour to her children, to gratify her passion. He killed them, to raise Aggrammes, his son by the queen, to the throne. Curt. 9, c. 2.

AGIDÆ, the descendants of Eurysthenes, who shared the throne of Sparta with the Proclidæ; the name is derived from Agis, son of Eurysthenes. The family became extinct in the person of Cleomenes son of Leonidas. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 682.

AGIS, king of Sparta, succeeded his father, Eurysthenes, and after a reign of one year, was succeeded by his son Echestratus, B. C. 1058. Paus. 3, c. 2.—Another king of Sparta, who waged bloody wars against Athens, and restored liberty to many Greek cities. He attempted to restore the laws of Lycurgus at Sparta, but in vain; the perfidy of friends, who pretended to second his views, brought him in o difficulties, and he was at last dragged from a temple, where he had taken refuge, to a prison, where he was strangled by order of the Ephori. Plut. in Agid.—

Another son of Archidamus, who signalized himself in the war which the Spartans waged against Epidaurus. He obtained a victory at Mantinea, and was successful in the Peloponnesian war. He reigned 27 years. Thucyd. 3 and 4.—Paus. 3, c. 8 and 10.—

Another, son of Archidamus, king of Sparta, who endeavoured to deliver Greece from the empire of Macedonia, with the assistance of the Persians. He was conquered in the attempt and slain by Antipater, Alexander's general, and 5,300 Lacedæmonians perished with him. Curt. 6, c. 1.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 2, c. 1, &c.—Another, son of Eudamidas, killed in a battle against the Mantineans. Paus. 8, c. 10.—A poet of Argos, who accompanied Alexander into Asia, and said that Bacchus and the sons of Leda, would give way to his hero, when a god. Curt. 8, c. 5.

AGLAIÀ, one of the graces, called sometimes Pasiphae. Her sisters were Euphrosyne and Thalia, and they were all daughters of Jupiter and Eurynome. Paus. 9, c. 35.

AGLAONICE, daughter of Hegemon, was acquainted with astronomy and eclipses, whence she boasted of her power to draw the moon from heaven. Plut. de Orac. defect.

AGLAOPHON, an excellent Greek painter, Plin. 32, c. 8.

AGLAUROS, or AGRAULOS, daughter of Erechtheus the oldest king of Athens, was changed into a stone by Mercury. Some make her daughter of Cecrops. vid. Herse.—Ovid Met. 2, fab. 12.

AGLÆUS, the poorest man of Arcadia, pronounced by the oracle more happy than Gyges king of Lydia. Plin. 7, c. 46.—Val. Max. 7, c. 1.

AGNO, one of the nymphs who nursed Jupiter. She gave her name to a fountain on mount Lycæus. When the priest of Jupiter, after a prayer, stirred the waters of this fountain with a bough, a thick vapour arose, which was soon dissolved into a plentiful shower.—Paus. 8, c. 31, &c.

AGNOÏCE, an Athenian virgin, who disguised her sex to learn medicine. She was taught by Hierophilus the art of midwifery, and when employed, always discovered her sex to her patients. This brought her into so much practice, that the males of her profession, who were now out of employment, accused her before the Areopagus of corruption. She confessed her sex to the judges, and a law was immediately made to empower all freeborn women to learn midwifery. Hygin. fab. 174.

AGNON, son of Nicias, was present at the taking of Samos by Pericles. In the Peloponnesian war he went against Potidæa, but abandoned his expedition through disease. He built Amphipolis, whose inhabitants rebelled to Brasidas, who they regarded as their founder, forgetful of Agnon. Thucyd. 2, 3, &c.

AGNONIDES, a rhetorician of Athens, who accused Phocion of betraying the Piræus to Nicanor. When the people recollected what services Phocion had rendered them, they raised him statues, and put to death his accuser. Plut. and Nep. in Phocion.

AGONĀLIA and AGONIA, festivals in Rome, celebrated three times a year, in honour of Janus, or Agonius. They were instituted by Numa, and on the festive days the chief priest used to offer a ram. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 347.—Varro de L. 6.

AGONES CAPITOLĪNI, games celebrated every fifth year upon the Capitoline hill, [instituted by Domitian.] Prizes were proposed for agility and strength, as well as for poetical and literary compositions. The poet Statius publicly recited there his Thebaid, which was not received with much applause.

AGONIUS, a Roman deity, who presided over the actions of men. vid. Agonalia.

AGORACRĪTUS, a sculptor of Pharos, who made a statue of Venus for the people of Athens, B. C. 150.

AGORANŌMI, ten magistrates at Athens, who watched over the city and port, and inspected whatever was exposed to sale.

AGORĀNIS, a river falling into the Ganges. Arrian. de Ind. [According to Rennell, the Gagra, but, in the opinion of Mannert, more properly the Gawrah.]

AGOREŪS, a surname of Mercury among the Athenians, from his presiding over the markets. Paus. 1, c. 15.

AGRA, a place of Bœotia where the Ilissus rises. Diana was called Agræa, because she hunted there.

AGRĀGAS or ACRĀGAS, a river, town, and mountain of Sicily: called also Agrigentum. The town was built by the people of Gela, who were a Rhodian colony. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 703.—Diod. 11.

AGRARIA LEX was enacted to distribute among the Roman people all the lands which they had gained by conquest [and for limiting the quantity of ground possessed by each person, to a certain number of acres.] It was first proposed A. U. C. 268, by the consul Sp. Cassius Vicellinus, and rejected by the Senate. This produced dissensions between the senate and the people, and Cassius, upon seeing the ill success of the new regulations he proposed, offered to distribute among the people, the money which was produced from the corn of Sicily, after it had been brought and sold in Rome. This act of liberality the people refused, and tranquillity was soon after re-established in the state. [vid. Cassius.] It was proposed a second time A. U. C. 377, by the tribune Licinius Stilo; but with no better success; and so great were the tumults which followed, that one of the tribunes of the people was killed, and many of the senators fined for their opposition. Mutius Scævola, A. U. C. 620, persuaded the tribune Tiberius Gracchus to propose it a third time; and though Octavius his colleague in the tribuneship, opposed it, yet Tiberius made it pass into a law, after much altercation, and commissioners were authorized to make a division of the lands. [The prosecution of this matter, however, brought the republic to the brink of destruction, and cost the two brothers, the Gracchi, their lives. Their efforts were of little avail, as the laws they laboured to introduce were gradually abolished after their death.]

AGRAULIA, a festival at Athens in honour of Agraulos. The Cyprians also observed these festivals, by offering human victims.

AGRAULOS, a daughter of Cecrops.—A surname of Minerva.

AGRIĀNES, a river of Thrace. Herodot. 4, c. 9.—[now, the Ergene.] Id. 5, c. 16.

AGRICŌLA, the father-in-law of the historian Tacitus, who wrote his life. He was eminent for his public and private virtues. He was governor of Britain, and first discovered it to be an island. Domitian envied his virtues; he recalled him from the province he had governed with equity and moderation, and ordered him to enter Rome in the night, that no triumph might be granted to him. Agricola obeyed, and without betraying any resentment, he retired to a peaceful solitude, and the enjoyment of the society of a few friends. He died in his 56th year, A. D. 93. [He is supposed to have been poisoned by the tyrant.] Tacit. in Agric.

AGRIGENTUM, now Girgenti, a town of Sicily, 18 stadia from the sea. It was founded by a Rhodian colony [from Gela.] The inhabitants were famous for their hospitality, and for their luxurious manner of living. In its flourishing situation, Agrigentum contained 200,000 inhabitants, who submitted with reluctance to the superior power of Syracuse. The government was monarchical, but afterwards a democracy was established. The famous Phalaris usurped the sovereignty, which was also for some time in the hands of the Carthaginians. Agrigentum can now boast of more venerable remains of antiquity than any other town in Sicily. Polyb. 9.—Strab. 6.—Diod. 13.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 707.—Sil. It. 14, v. 211.

AGRIŌNIA, annual festivals in honour of Bacchus, celebrated generally in the night. They were instituted, as some suppose, because the god was attended with wild beasts.

M. AGRIPPA VIPSANIUS, a celebrated Roman, who obtained a victory over S. Pompey, and favoured the cause of Augustus at the battles of Actium and Philippi, where he behaved with great valour. He advised his imperial friend to re-establish the republican government at Rome, but he was over-ruled by Mecænas. In his expeditions in Gaul and Germany he obtained several victories, but refused the honours of a triumph, and turned his liberality towards the embellishing of Rome, and the raising of magnificent buildings, one of which, the Pantheon, still exists. [When Augustus was dangerously ill, in the year before Christ 23, he committed his ring to Agrippa, which being considered as a preference of him for his successor, offended Marcellus, and rendered it necessary on the recovery of Augustus to remove Agrippa from court by an honourable exile to the rich government of Syria. Upon the death of Marcellus he was recalled to Rome, where he was married to Julia, the daughter of the Emperor and Marcellus's widow. After this he performed important services to the empire in Gemany, Spain, and the countries of the East. Upon his return, he was attacked with a fever in Campania, which soon terminated in his death, A. U. C. 742, B. C. 12, in the 51st year of his age.] His body was placed in the tomb which Augustus had prepared for himself. He had been married three times, to Cæcilia Attica, daughter of Atticus, to Marcella, daughter of Octavia, and to Julia, by whom he had five children, Caius and Lucius Cæsares, Posthumus Agrippa, Agrippina, and Julia. His son, C. Cæsar Agrippa, was adopted by Augustus, and made consul, by the flattery of the Roman people, at the age of 14 or 15. This promising youth went to Armenia, on an expedition against the Persians, where he received a fatal blow from the treacherous hand of Lollius, the governor of one of the neighbouring cities. He languished for a little time, and died in Lycia. His younger brother, L. Cæsar Agrippa, was likewise adopted by his grandfather Augustus; but he was soon after banished to Campania, for using seditious language against his benefactor. In the 7th year of his exile he would have been recalled, had not Livia and Tiberius, jealous of the partiality of Augustus for him, ordered him to be assassinated in his 26th year. He has been called ferocious and savage; and he gave himself the name of Neptune, because he was found of fishing. [One of his servants assumed his name after his death, and raised commotions.] Verg. Æn. 8, v. 682.—Horat. 1, od. 6.—Sylvius, a son of Tiberinus Sylvius, king of Latium. He reigned 33 years, and was succeeded by his son Romulus Sylvius. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 8.—Herodes, son of Aristobulus, grandson of the Great Herod. [He was brought up at Rome with Drusus the son of Tiberius, but having reduced himself to penury by his profusion, he, upon the death of Drusus, retired to Judæa. Here he attached himself to Caius Cæsar, but having offended Tiberius by some expressions, he was thrown into prison and loaded with chains.] When Caligula ascended the throne, his favourite was released, presented with a chain of gold as heavy as that which had lately confined him, and made king of Judæa. He was a popular character with the Jews: and it is said that while they were flattering him with the appellation of God, an angel of God struck him with the lousy disease, of which he died, A. D. 43. His son, of the same name, was the last king of the Jews, deprived of his kingdom by Claudius, in exchange for other provinces. He was with Titus at the celebrated siege of Jerusalem, and died A. D. 94. It was before him that St. Paul pleaded. Juv. 6, v. 156.—Tacit. 2. Hist. c. 81.—Menenius, a Roman general, who obtained a triumph over the Sabines, appeased the populace of Rome by the well known fable of the belly and limbs, and favoured the erection of the new office of tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 261. He died poor, but universally regretted; his funeral was at the expense of the public, from whom also his daughters received dowries. Liv. 2, c. 32. Flor. 1, c. 23.—A mathematician in the reign of Domitian; he was a native of Bithynia.

AGRIPPINA, a wife of Tiberius. The emperor repudiated her to marry Julia. Sueton. in Tib. 7.—A daughter of M. Agrippa, and grand-daughter to Augustus. She married Germanicus, whom she accompanied into Syria; and when Piso poisoned him, she carried his ashes to Italy, and accused his murderer, who stabbed himself. She fell under the displeasure of Tiberius, who exiled her to an island, where she died, A. D. 26, for want of bread. She left nine children, and was universally distinguished for intrepidity and conjugal affection. Tacit. 1, Ann. c. 2, &c.—Sueton. in Tib. 52.—Julia, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, married Domitius Ænobarbus, by whom she had Nero. After her husband's death she married her uncle the emperor Claudius, whom she destroyed to make Nero succeed to the throne. After many cruelties and much licentiousness, she was assassinated by order of her son, and as she expired, she exclaimed, "strike the belly which could give birth to such a monster." She died A. D. 59. [She was a female of most abandoned character, her crimes were of the darkest hue, and her memory is deserving of universal detestation.] She left memoirs which assisted Tacitus in the composition of his annals. The town which she built, where she was born on the borders of the Rhine, and called Agrippina Colonia, is the modern Cologne. Tacit. Ann. 5, c. 75, 4. 12, c. 7, 22, &c.

AGRIUS, son of Parthæon, drove his brother Cæneus from the throne. He was afterwards expelled by Diomedes, the grandson of Cæneus, upon which he killed himself. Hygin. fab. 175 and 242.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Hom. Iliad. 11, v. 117.

AGRÔLAS, surrounded the citadel of Athens with walls, except that part which afterwards was repaired by Cimon. Paus. 1, c. 23.

AGRON, a king of Illyria, who, after conquering the Ætolians, drank to such excess that he died instantly, B. C. 231. Polyb. 2, c. 4.

AGROTËRA, an anniversary sacrifice of goats offered to Diana at Athens. It was instituted by Callimachus the Polemarch, who vowed to sacrifice to the goddess so many goats as there might be enemies killed in a battle which he was going to fight against the troops of Darius, who had invaded Attica. The quantity of the slain was so great, that a sufficient number of goats could not be procured; therefore they were limited to 500 every year, till they equalled the number of Persians slain in battle.—A temple of Ægira in Peloponnesus erected to the goddess under this name. Paus. 7, c. 26.

AGYIEUS, from αγυια, a street, a surname of Apollo, because sacrifices were offered to him in the public streets of Athens. Horat. 4. od. 6.

AGYLLA, a town of Etruria, founded by a colony of Pelasgians, and governed by Mezentius when Æneas came to Italy. It was afterwards called Cære, by the Lydians, who took possession of it. [It is now Cer Veteri.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 652, l. 8, v. 479.

AGYRIUS, a tyrant of Sicily, assisted by Dionysius against the Carthaginians. Diod. 14.

AGYRIUM, a town of Sicily, where Diodorus the historian was born. The inhabitants were called Agyrinenses. [It is now, San Filippo d'Argirone.] Diod. 14.—Cic. in Verr. 2. c. 65

AGYRIUS, an Athenian general who succeeded Thrasybulus. Diod. 11.

AHĀLA, the surname of the Servilii at Rome.

AHFNORBUBUS, vid. Ænobarbus.

AJAX, son of Telamon by Peribœa or Eriboea daughter of Alcahous, was next to Achilles the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. He engaged Hector, with whom at parting he exchanged arms. After the death of Achilles, Ajax and Ulysses disputed their claim to the arms of the dead hero. When they were given to the latter, Ajax was so enraged, that he became bereaved of his understanding, and slaughtered a whole flock of sheep, supposing them to be the sons of Atreus and the Greeks who had given the preference to Ulysses, and stabbed himself with his sword. The blood which ran to the ground from the wound, was changed into the flower hyacinth. Some say that he was killed by Paris in battle, others, that he was murdered by Ulysses. His body was buried on the promontory of Sigæum, and his tomb was visited and honoured by Alexander. Hercules, according to some authors, prayed to the gods that his friend Telamon, who was childless, might have a son, with a skin as impenetrable as the skin of the Nemean lion, which he then wore. His prayers were heard. Jupiter, under the form of an eagle, promised to grant the petition, and when Ajax was born, Hercules wrapped him up in the lion's skin, which rendered his body invulnerable, except that part which was left uncovered by a hole in the skin, through which Hercules hung his quiver. This vulnerable part was in his breast, or, as some say, behind his neck. Q. Calab. 1 and 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 10 and 13.—Philostr. in Heroic. c. 12.—Pindar. Isthm. 6.—Homer. Il. 1, &c. Od. 11.—Dictys. Cret. 6.—Dares. Phry. 9.—Ovid. Met. 13.—Horat. 2. Sat. 3, v. 197.—Hygin. fab. 107 and 242.—Paus. 1, c. 35, l. 5, c. 19.—The son of Oilcus king of Locris, was surnamed Locrian, in contradistinction to the son of Telamon. He went with 40 ships to the Trojan war, as being one of Helen's suitors. The night that Troy was taken, he offered violence to Cassandra, who fled into Minerva's temple; and for this offence, as he returned home, the goddess, who had obtained the thunders of Jupiter, and the power of tempests from Neptune, destroyed his ship in a storm. Ajax swam to a rock, and said that he was safe in spite of all the gods. Such impiety offended Neptune, who struck the rock with his trident, and Ajax tumbled into the sea with part of the rock and was drowned. His body was afterwards found by the Greeks, and black sheep offered on his tomb. According to Virgil's account, Minerva seized him in a whirlwind, and dashed him against a rock, where he expired, consumed by thunder. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 43, &c.—Homer. Il. 2, 13, &c. Od. 4.—Hygin. fab. 116 and 273.—Philostr. Ico. 2, c. 13.—Senec. in Agam.—Horat. epod. 10, v. 13.—Paus. 10, c. 26 and 31.—The two Ajaxes were, as some suppose, placed after death in the island of Leuce, a separate place reserved only for the bravest heroes of antiquity.

AIDŌNEUS, a surname of Pluto.—A king of the Molossi, who imprisoned Theseus, because he and Pirithous attempted to ravish his daughter Proserpine, near the Acheron; whence arose the well-known fable of the descent of Theseus and Pirithous into hell. Plut. in Thes.—A river near Troy. Paus. 10, c. 12.

AIMŪLUS, son of Ascanius, was, according to some, the progenitor of the noble family of the Æmilii in Rome.

AIVS LOCUTIVS, a deity to whom the Romans erected an altar, from the following circumstance: one of the common people, called Ceditius, informed the tribunes, that as he passed one night through one of the streets of the city, a voice more than human, near Vesta's temple, told him that Rome would soon be attacked by the Gauls. His information was neglected, but his veracity was proved by the event; and Camillus, after the conquest of the Gauls, built a temple to that supernatural voice which had given Rome warning of the approaching calamity, under the name of Aivs Locutius.

ALABANDA, α. or orum, [an inland town of Caria, south of the river Mæander. Pococke, and after him Chandler, have located it near the small village of Karpuseli. Its inhabitants were called Alabandi, Alabandii, and Alabandenses.] The name is derived from Alabandus, a deity worshipped there. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 15.—Herodot. 7, c. 195.—Strab. 14.

ALABASTRUM, a town of [Thebais in] Egypt. Plin. 36, c. 7.

ALÆSA, a city on a mountain of Sicily, [near the river Alæsus. Now Caronia.]

ALÆA, a surname of Minerva in Peloponnesus. Her festivals are also called Alæa. Paus. 8, c. 4, 7.

ALÆI, a number of islands in the Persian gulf, abounding in tortoises. Arrian. in Perrip.

ALĀLA, the goddess of war, sister to Mars. Plut. de glor. Athen.

ALALCOMENÆ, a city of Bœotia, [south-east of Cheronæa.] where some suppose that Minerva was born. Plut. Quæst. Gr.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 330.

ALALIA, [or ALĀLIS, a town of Syria, placed by Ptolemy in Palmyrene, near the Euphrates, and by D'Anville, north-west of Resafa.]

ALAMĀNES, a statuary of Athens, disciple of Phidias.

ALAMANNI. vid. ALEMANNI.

ALĀNI, a people of Sarmatia, near the Palus Mæotis. [They penetrated into Europe, advanced from the Danube to the Rhine, traversed Gaul, and settled at the foot of the Pyrenees. The Goths in Spain and the Franks in Gaul dispersed them and they became gradually confounded with their conquerors.]

ALARĪCUS, a famous king of the Goths, who plundered Rome in the reign of Honorius. He was greatly respected for his military valour, and during his reign he kept the Roman empire in continual alarms. He died after a reign of 13 years, A. D. 410.

ALARŌDII, a nation near Pontus. Herodot. 3, c. 94.

ALASTOR, one of Pluto's horses when he carried away Proserpine. Claud. de Rapt Pros. 1, v. 286.

ALAUDE, soldiers of one of Cæsar's legions in Gaul. Sueton. in Jul. 24.

ALĀZON, [a river of Albania, rising in Mount Caucasus, and flowing into the Cyrus. Now the Alozon or Alason. Plin. 6 10.—Strab. 11.]

ALBA SYLVIVS, son of Latinus Sylvius, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Latium, and reigned 36 years. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 612.—Longa, a city of Latium, built by Ascanius, B. C. 1152, on the spot where Æneas found, according to the prophecy of Helenus, (Virg. Æn. 3, v. 390, &c.) and of the god of the river, (Æn. 8, v. 43), a white sow with 30 young ones. It was called longa because it extended along the hill Albanus. The descendants of Æneas reigned there in the following order: 1. Ascanius, son of Æneas, with little intermission, 6 years. 2. Sylvius Posthumus, 29 years. 3. Æneas Sylvius, 31 years. 4. Latinus, 5 years. 5. Alba, 36 years. 6. Atys or Capetus, 26 years. 7. Capys, 28 years. 8. Capetus, 13 years. 9. Tiberinus, 8 years. 10. Agrippa, 33 years. 11. Remulus, 19 years. 12. Aventinus, 38 years. 13. Procas, 13 years. 14. Numitor and Amulius. Alba, which had long been the powerful rival of Rome, was destroyed by the Romans 665 B. C. and the inhabitants were carried to Rome. Liv.—Flor.—Justin. &c.—A city of the Marsi in Italy.—Pompeia, a city of Liguria. Plin. 3, c. 5.

ALBĀNI and ALBENSES, names applied to the inhabitants of the two cities of Alba. Cic. ad Her. 2, c. 28.

ALBANIA, a country of Asia, between the Caspian sea and Iberia. [Now Schirwan and East Georgia. The country in former days was, and still continues to be, extremely fertile and pleasant.] Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 15.—Justin. 42, c. 3.—Strab. 11.—Plin. 8, c. 40.—

Mela, 3, c. 5.—The Caspian sea is called Albanum, as being near Albania. Plin. 6, c. 13.

ALBĀNUS, a mountain with a lake in Italy, 16 miles from Rome, near Alba. It was on this mountain that the Lavinæ feræ were celebrated with great solemnity. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 27.—[A river of Albania, thought by D'Anville to be the Samura.]

ALBIA TERENTIA, the mother of Otho. Suet.

ALBĪCI, a people of Galliæ Provincia. [Their history is unknown. Cæsar describes them as little inferior to the Romans in bravery.] Cæs. Bell. Civ. 1, c. 34.

ALBIGAUNUM, a town of Liguria. [Now, Albenga.] Mela, 2, c. 4.

ALBINI, two Roman orators of great merit, mentioned by Cicero in Brut. This name is common to many tribunes of the people. Liv. 2, c. 33, 1. 6, c. 30.—Sallust. de Jug. Bell.

ALBINOVĀNUS CELSUS. vid. Ovid.—Pedo, a poet contemporary with Ovid. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and heroic poetry in a style so elegant that he merited the epithet of divine. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 10.—Quintil. 10, c. 5.

ALBINTEMĒLIUM, a town of Liguria. [Now Vintimiglia.] Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 13.

ALBINUS, was born at Adrumetum in Africa, and made governor of Britain, by Commodus. After the murder of Pertinax, he was elected emperor by the soldiers in Britain. Severus had also been invested with the imperial dignity by his own army; and these two rivals, with about 150,000 men each, came into Gaul to decide the fate of the empire. Severus was conqueror, and he ordered the head of Albinus to be cut off, and his body to be thrown into the Rhone. A. D. 198. Albinus, according to the exaggerated account of a certain writer called Codrus, was famous for his voracious appetite, and sometimes eat for breakfast no less than 500 figs, 100 peaches, 20 pound of dry raisins, 10 melons, and 400 oysters.—A pretorian sent to Sylla, as ambassador from the senate during the civil wars. He was put to death by Sylla's soldiers. Plut. in Syll.—A Roman plebeian who received the vestals into his chariot in preference to his family, when they fled from Rome, which the Gauls had sacked. Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Liv. 5, c. 40.—Flor. 1, c. 13.—A. Posthumus, consul with Lucullus, A. U. C. 603, wrote an history of Rome in Greek.

ALBĪON, son of Neptune by Amphitrite, came into Britain, where he established a kingdom, and first introduced astrology and the art of building ships. He was killed at the mouth of the Rhone, with stones thrown by Jupiter, because he opposed the passage of Hercules. Mela, 2, c. 5.—The greatest island of Europe, now called Great Britain. It is called after Albion, who is said to have reigned there; or from its chalky white (albus) rocks, which appear at a great distance. Plin. 4, c. 16.—Tacit. in Agric. [Some etymologists have recourse to the Hebrew, and some to the Phœnician tongue, alben in the former signifying white, and alp or alpin in the latter denoting high, and high mountain, the land appearing so as you approach it from the continent.] The ancients compared its figure to a long buckler, or to the iron of a hatchet.

ALBIS, a river of Germany falling into the German ocean, and now called the Elbe. [The only Roman who passed this river with an army was L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, A. U. C. 744, and though he made no farther progress, the passage of the Albis was deemed worthy of a triumph.] Lucan 2, v. 52.

ALBŪLA, the ancient name of the river Tiber. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 332.—Liv. 1, c. 3.

ALBŪNEA, a wood near Tiber and the river Anio, sacred to the muses. It received its name from a Sibyl, called also Albunea, worshipped as a goddess at Tiber, whose temple still remains. Near Albunea there was a small lake of the same name, whose waters were of a sulphureous smell, and possessed some medicinal properties. This lake fell by a small stream called Albula, into the river Anio, with which it soon lost itself in the Tiber. Horat. 1. Od. 7, v. 12.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 83.

ALBURNUS, a lofty mountain of Lucania, [on the shores of the Sinus Pæstanus or Gulf of Salerno, near which was a harbour of the same name. The Silarus here discharges itself into the sea]

ALBUS PĀGUS, a place near Sidon, where Antony waited for the arrival of Cleopatra. —[A port of Arabia, on the Sinus Arabicus, supposed by Mannert to be the same with the modern harbour of Jambo. It was called in Greek Λευκὴ Κόμμη.]

ALBŪTIUS, a prince of Celtiberia, to whom Scipio restored his wife. Arrian.—A sordid man, father to Canidia. He beat his servants before they were guilty of any offence, least, said he, I should have no time to punish them when they offend. Horat. 2. Sat. 2.

—A rhetorician in the age of Seneca.—An ancient satirist. Cic. in Brut.—Titus an epicurean philosopher, born at Rome; so fond of Greece and Grecian manners, that he wished not to pass for a Roman. He was made governor of Sardinia; but he grew offensive to the senate and was banished. It is supposed that he died at Athens.

ALCÆUS, a celebrated lyric poet, of Mitylene in Lesbos, about 600 years before the christian æra. He fled from a battle, and his enemies hung up, in the temple of Minerva, [at Sigæum,] the armour which he left in the field, as a monument of his disgrace. He is the inventor of alcaic verses. He was contemporary with the famous Sappho to whom he paid his addresses. Of all his works nothing but a few fragments remain, found in Athenæus. [The principal subjects of his muse seem to have been the praise of liberty and hatred of tyrants. Against the latter he was always very active, particularly against Pittacus; but, his courage forsaking him in the day of battle, he was made prisoner while endeavoring to save himself by flight. Pittacus generously granted him both life and liberty. He was afterwards however sent into exile.] Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Herodot. 5, c. 95.—Hor. 4, d. 9.—Cic. 4. Tusc. c. 33.—A poet of Athens, said by Suidas to be the inventor of tragedy.—A writer of epigrams.—A comic poet.—A son of Androgeus, who went with Hercules into Thrace, and was made king of part of the country. Apolod. 2, c. 5.—A son of Perseus, father of Amphitryon and Anaxo. From him Hercules has been called Alcides. Apol. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 8, c. 14.

ALCAMENES, one of the Agidæ, king of Sparta, known by his apophthegms. He succeeded his father Teclclus, and reigned 37 years. The Helots rebelled in his reign. Paus. 3, c. 2, l. 4, c. 4 and 5.—A statuary, who lived 448 B. C. and was distinguished for his statues of Venus and Vulcan. Paus. 5, c. 10.—The commander of a Spartan fleet, put to death by the Athenians. Thucyd. 4, c. 5, &c.

ALCANDER, a Lacedæmonian youth, who accidentally put out one of the eyes of Lycurgus, and was generously forgiven by the sage. Plut. in Lyc.—Paris. 3, c. 18.

ALCATHŌE, a name of Megara in Attica, because rebuilt by Alcaethous son of Pelops. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 8.

ALCATHŌUS, a son of Pelops, who being suspected of murdering his brother Chrysipus, came to Megara, where he killed a lion which had destroyed the king's son. He succeeded to the kingdom of Megara, and, in commemoration of his services, festivals, called Alcatheia, were instituted at Megara. Paus. 1, c. 41, &c.—A Trojan who married Hippodamia, daughter of Anchises. He was killed in the Trojan war, by Idomeneus. Hom. Il. 12, v. 93.

ALCE, a town of Spain, which surrendered to Gracchus, now Alcazar, [south-east of Toletum.] Liv. 40, c. 47.

ALCENOR, an Argive, who along with Chromius, survived in the battle between 300 of his countrymen and 300 Lacedæmonians. [vid. Othryades.] Herodot. 1, c. 82.

ALCESTE, or ALCESTIS, daughter of Pelias and Anaxibia, married Admetus. [When Medea prevailed upon the daughters of Pelias to cut their father in pieces in expectation of seeing him restored to youth, Alcestis alone concurred not in the fatal deed. Acastus, however, having pursued them all, Alcestis fled to her cousin Admetus at Phæræ. Admetus refusing to deliver her up, was attacked by Acastus with a numerous army, and being taken prisoner, was redeemed from death, by the generous offer of Alcestis, whom he had made his wife, and who was sacrificed in his stead to appease the shades of her father.] Some say that Alcestis, with an unusual display of conjugal affection, laid down her life for her husband, when she had been told by an oracle, that he could never recover from a disease except some one of his friends died in his stead. According to some authors, Hercules brought her back from hell. She had many suitors while she lived with her father. vid. Admetus. Juv. 6, v. 651.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Paus. 5, c. 17.—Hygin. fab. 251.—Eurip. in Alcest.

ALCETAS, a king of the Molossi, descended from Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles. Paus. 1, c. 11.—A general of Alexander's army, brother to Perdicas. —The eighth king of Macedonia, who reigned 29 years. —An historian, who wrote an account of every thing that had been dedicated in the temple of Delphi. Athen.—A son of Arybas, king of Epirus. Paus. 1, c. 11.

ALCHIMACHUS, a celebrated painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ALCIBIADES, an Athenian general, [the son of Clinias, the nephew of Pericles, and lineally descended from Ajax:] famous for his enterprising spirit, versatile genius, and natural foibles. He was disciple to Socrates, whose lessons and example checked for a while his vicious propensities. In the Peloponnesian war he encouraged the Athenians to make an expedition against Syracuse. He was chosen general in that war, and in his absence, his enemies accused him of impiety, and confiscated his goods. Upon this he fled, stirred up the Spartans to make war against Athens, and when this did not succeed, he retired to Tissaphernes, the Persian general. Being recalled by the Athenians, he obliged the Lacedæmonians to sue for peace, made several conquests in Asia, and was received in triumph at Athens. His popularity was of short duration. [Lysander, the Spartan commander, having defeated the Athenian fleet, and slain Antiochus, to whom Alcibiades had left it in charge, when departing for Caria in order to raise money, the latter was again exposed to the resentment of the people, and fled to Pharnabazus whom he almost induced to make war upon Lacedæmon.] This was told to Lysander, the Spartan general, who prevailed upon Pharnabazus to murder Alcibiades. Two servants were sent for that purpose, and they set on fire the cottage where he was, and killed him with darts as he attempted to make his escape. He died in the 46th year of his age, 404 B. C. after a life of perpetual difficulties. If the fickleness of his countrymen had known how to retain among them the talents of a man who distinguished himself, and was admired wherever he went, they might have risen to greater splendour, and to the sovereignty of Greece. His character has been cleared from the aspersions of malevolence, by the writings of Thucydides, Timæus, and Theopompus; and he is known to us as a hero, who to the principles of the debauchee, added the intelligence and sagacity of the statesman, and the cool intrepidity of the general. Plut. & C. Nep. in Alcib.—Thucyd. 5, 6 and 7.—Xenoph. Hist. Græc. 1, &c.—Diod. 12.

ALCIDAMAS, a celebrated wrestler. Stat. Theb. 10, v. 500.—A philosopher and orator, who wrote a treatise on death. He was pupil to Gorgias, and flourished B. C. 423. Quintil. 3, c. 1.

ALCIDAMĒA, was mother of Bonus by Mercury.

ALCIDAMĪDAS, a general of the Messenians, who retired to Rhegium, after the taking of Ithome by the Spartans, B. C. 723, Strab. 6.

ALCIDĀMUS, an Athenian rhetorician, who wrote an eulogy on death, &c. Cic. 1 Tuscul. c. 48.—Plut. de Orat.

ALCIDAS, a Lacedæmonian, sent with 23 galleys against Corcyra, in the Peloponnesian war. Thucyd. 3, c. 16, &c.

ALCIDĒS, a name of Hercules, from his strength, ἄλκη, or from his grandfather Alcaeus. —A surname of Minerva in Macedonia. Liv. 42, c. 51. [For Alcidem in the passage of Livy here quoted, we should no doubt read, according to the conjectural emendation of Turnebus (Advers. 30, 57.) Alcidemum, "the people's strength."]]

ALCIDĒE, the mother of Tyro, by Salmones. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

ALCIMĀCHUS, an eminent painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ALCIMĒDON, a plain of Arcadia, with a cave, the residence of Alcimedon, whose daughter Philo was ravished by Hercules. Paus. 8, c. 12.—An excellent carver. Virg. Ecl. 3.

ALCIMĒNES, a tragic poet of Megara. —A comic writer of Athens. —A man killed by his brother Bellerophon. Apollod. 2, c. 3.

ALCIMUS, an historian of Sicily, who wrote an account of Italy.

ALCINOÛS, son of Nausithous, was king of the Phæacians, and is praised for his love of agriculture. He married his niece Arete, by whom he had several sons and a daughter Nausicaa. He kindly entertained Ulysses, who had been shipwrecked on his coast, and heard the recital of his adventures; whence arose the proverb of the stories of Alcinoüs, to denote improbability. [The gardens of Alcinoüs are beautifully described by Homer, and have afforded also a favourite theme to succeeding poets. The island of the Phæacians is called by Homer, Scheria. Its more ancient name was Drepane. After the days of Homer, it was called Corcyra. Now, Corfu.] Homer. Od. 7.—Orph. in Argon.—Virg. G. 2, v. 87.—Stat. 1. Syl. 3, v. 81.—Juv. 5, v. 151.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 10, v. 26.—Plato de Rep. 10.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. A philosopher in the second century, who wrote a book De doctrina Platonis, the best edition of which is the 8vo. printed Oxon. 1667.

ALCIPHRON, a philosopher of Magnesia, in the age of Alexander. There are some epistles in Greek, that bear his name, and contain a very perfect picture of the customs and manners of the Greeks. They are by some supposed to be the production of a writer of the 4th century. [The best edition is that of Wagner. Lips. 1798. 2 vols. in 8vo.]

ALCIPPE, a daughter of the god Mars, by Agraulos. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—The wife of Metion, and mother to Eupalamus. Id. 3, c. 16.—The daughter of CEnomaus, and wife of Evenus, by whom she had Marpessa.

ALCITHŒE, a Theban woman who ridiculed the orgies of Bacchus. She was changed into a bat, and the spindle and yarn with which she worked, into a vine and ivy. Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 1.

ALCMÆON, was son of the prophet Amphiarus and Eriphyle. His father going to the Theban war, where, according to an oracle, he was to perish, charged him to revenge his death on Eriphyle, who had betrayed him. vid. Eriphyle. As soon as he heard of his father's death, he murdered his mother, for which crime the furies persecuted him till [the river-god] Phlegæus purified him and gave him his daughter Alphisibœa in marriage. Alcmæon gave her the fatal collar which his mother had received to betray his father, and afterwards abandoned her, and married Callirhoe, the daughter of Acheïous, to whom he promised the necklace he had given to Alphisibœa. When he attempted to recover it, Alphisibœa's brothers murdered him on account of the treatment he had shown their sister, and left his body a prey to dogs and wild beasts. Alcmæon's children by Callirhoe revenged their father's death by killing his murderers. vid. Alphisibœa, Amphiarus. Paus. 5, c. 17, l. 6, c. 18, l. 8, c. 24.—Plut. de Exil.—Apollod. 3, c. 7.—Hyg. fab. 73 and 245.—Stat. Theb. 2 and 4.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 44. Mel. 9, fab. 10.—A son of Ægyptus, the husband of Hippomedusa. Apollod.—A philosopher, disciple to Pythagoras, born in Crotona. He wrote on physic, and he was the first who dissected animals to examine into the structure of the human frame. Cic. de Nat. D. 6, c. 27.—A son of the poet Æschylus, the 13th archon of Athens.—A son of Syllus, driven from Messenia with the rest of Nestor's family by the Heraclidæ. He came to Athens, and from him the Alcmæonidæ are descended. Paus. 1, c. 18.

ALCMÆONIDÆ, a noble family of Athens, descended from Alcmæon. They undertook for 300 talents to rebuild the temple of Delphi, which had been burnt, and they finished the work in a more splendid manner than was required, in consequence of which they gained popularity, and by their influence the Pythia prevailed upon the Lacedæmonians to deliver their country from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. Herodot. 5 and 6.—Thucyd. 6, c. 59.—Plut. in Solon.

ALCMAN, [a lyric poet, born in Lydia, but carried away at an early age and sold into slavery at Lacedæmon. The Spartans, perceiving his poetical talent, manumitted him, and sought to claim him as their countryman. He wrote in the Doric dialect. Of the many poems attributed to him by the ancients, nothing remains but a few fragments occurring in Athenæus and other ancient writers. He was remarkable for his voracious appetite. The question respecting his birth-place is ably discussed by Perizonius, JElan. V. H. 12, c. 50. in notis.]

ALCMÆNA, [was daughter of Electryon, king of Mycænæ, and Anaxo whom Plutarch calls Lysidice, and Diodorus Siculus Eurymede. She was engaged in marriage to her cousin Amphytrion, son of Alcæus, when an unexpected event caused the nuptials to be deferred. Electryon had undertaken an expedition against the Teleboans or subjects of Taphius, in order to avenge the death of his sons, whom the sons of Taphius had slain in a combat. Returning victorious he was met by Amphytrion, and killed by an accidental blow. This deed, though involuntary, lost Amphytrion the kingdom, which he would otherwise have enjoyed in right of his wife. Sthenelus, the brother of Alcmena, availing himself of the public odium against Amphytrion, drove him from Argolis, and seized upon the vacant throne, the possession of which devolved at his death, upon his son Eurystheus. Amphytrion fled to Thebes, where he was purified by Creon; but when he expected that Alcmena, who had accompanied him thither, would have given him her hand, she declined on the ground that she was not satisfied with the punishment inflicted by her father on the Teleboans, and intended to give her hand to him who should make war upon them. Amphytrion, in consequence of this, made an alliance with Creon and other neighbouring princes, and ravaged the isles of the Teleboans. During this expedition, Alcmena gave birth to Hercules. Whether it was that Amphytrion had been actually married to Alcmena previous to his going on this expedition, or whether he returned privately to Thebes during its continuance, still the report was spread abroad that Jupiter was the father of Hercules, and that to deceive Alcmena, he had assumed the form of her husband. According to the ancient poets, Juno retarded the birth of Hercules until the mother of Eurystheus was delivered of a son, unto whom, by reason of a rash oath of Jupiter, Hercules was made subject. The above account varies in many particulars from that which Plautus has made the basis of one of his comedies, but it rests upon higher authority, and has the merit of being purer in its details.] Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 5, &c. says that Juno was assisted by Lucina to put off the bringing forth of Alcmena, and that Lucina, in the form of an old woman, sat before the door of Amphytrion with her legs and arms crossed. This posture was the cause of infinite torment to Alcmena, till her servant, Galanthis, supposing the old woman to be a witch, and to be the cause of the pains of her mistress, told her that she had been delivered. [Lucina arose upon this information and retired, and Alcmena immediately brought forth. Some accounts make her on this occasion the mother of twins, of Hercules by Jupiter, and Iphicles by Amphytrion. Hyginus however mentions only Hercules.] After Amphytrion's death, Alcmena married Rhadamanthus, and retired to Ocalea in Bœotia. This marriage, according to some authors, was celebrated in the island of Leuce. The people of Megara said that she died in her way from Argos to Thebes, and that she was buried in the temple of Jupiter Olympius. Paus. 1, c. 41, l. 5, c. 18, l. 9, c. 16.—Plut. in Thes. & Romul.—Homer. Od. 11, l. 19.—*Pindar. ALCON, a famous archer, who one day saw his son attacked by a serpent, and aimed at him so dexterously with an arrow that he killed the beast without hurting his son.—A surgeon under Claudius, who gained much money by his profession, in curing hernias and fractures.—A son of Mars. A son of Amycus. These two last were at the chase of the Calydonian boar. Hygin. fab. 173.

ALCYÖNE or HALCYÖNE, daughter of Æolus, married Ceyx, who was drowned as he was going to Claros to consult the oracle. The gods apprised Alcyone, in a dream, of her husband's fate; and when she found, on the morrow, his body washed on the seashore, she threw herself into the sea, and was with her husband changed into birds of the same name, who keep the waters calm and serene, while they build and sit on their nests on the surface of the sea, for the space of 7, 11, or 14 days. [The Halcyon or kingfisher builds its nest on the rocks. The ancients believed that it made its nest in such a way that it floated on the water, with the parent bird and its young contained in it. Ælian. de Animal. 9, c. 17.] Virg. G. 1, v. 399.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 10.—Hygin. fab. 65.—One of the Pleiades, daughter of Atlas. She had Arethusa by Neptune, and Eleuthera by Apollo. She, with her sisters, was changed into a constellation. vid. Pleiades. Paus. 2, c. 30, l. 3, c. 18. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. fab. 157.—The daughter of Evenus, carried away by Apollo after her marriage. Her husband pursued the ravisher with bows and arrows, but was not able to recover her. Upon this, her parents called her Alcyone, and compared her fate to that of the wife of Ceyx. Homer. Il. 9, v. 558.

ALCYÖNEUS, a youth of exemplary virtue, son to Antigonus. Plut. in Pyrrh.—Diog. 4.—A giant, brother to Porphyryon. He was killed by Hercules. His daughters, mourning his death, threw themselves into the sea, and were changed into alcyons, by Amphitrite. Claudian. de Rap. Pros.—Apollod. 1, c. 6.

ALCYONIA, a pool of [Corinthia in] Greece, whose depth the emperor Nero attempted in vain to find. Paus. 2, c. 37.

[ALCYONIUM MARE, a name given to an arm of the Sinus Corinthiacus, or Gulf of Lepanto, which stretched between the western coast of Eubœa, the northern coast of Megaris, and the north-western extremity of Corinthia, as far as the promontory of Olmia.]

ALDUABIS. vid. Dubis.

ALËA, a surname of Minerva, from her temple, built by Alens, son of Aphidas at Tegœa in Arcadia. The statue of the goddess, [together with the tusks of the Calydonian boar,] was carried by Augustus to Rome. Paus. 8, c. 4 and 46.—A town of Arcadia, built by Aleus. [It had three famous temples, that of the Ephesian Diana, of Minerva Alea, and of Bacchus. The feast of Bacchus, called Skiria, was celebrated here every third year, at which time, according to Pausanias, the women were scourged, in obedience to a command of the oracle at Delphi. Paus. 8, c. 23.]

ALECTO, one of the furies, is represented with flaming torches and scourges, her head covered with serpents, and breathing vengeance, war, and pestilence. The name is derived from α. non, and αλγω. desino, because she incessantly pursues the wicked.] vid. Eumenides. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 324, & c. l. 10, v. 41.

ALECTOR, succeeded his father Anaxagoras in the kingdom of Argos, and was father to Iphis and Capaneus. Paus. 2, c. 18.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.

ALECTRYON, a youth whom Mars stationed at the door of Venus's apartment, to watch against the approach of the sun. He fell asleep, and Apollo came and discovered the lovers, who were exposed by Vulcan before all the gods. Mars was so incensed, that he changed Alectryon into a cock, which still mindful of his neglect, early announces the approach of the sun. Lucian. in Alect.

[ALËIUS CAMPUS, a tract in Cilicia Campestris, to the east of the river Sarus, between Adana and the sea. The poets fabled that Bellerophon wandered and perished here, after having been thrown from the horse Pegasus. The name comes from αλαομαι, erro. Homer. Il. 6, v. 201. Dionys. Perieg. 872.—Ovid. in Ibid. 259.]

[ALEMANNI, or ALAMANNI, a name assumed by a confederacy of German tribes situate between the Neckar and the Upper Rhine, who united to resist the encroachments of Roman power. According to Mannert, the shattered remains of the army of Ariovistus retired after the defeat and death of their leader to the mountainous country of the Upper Rhine. Their descendants, in after days, in order to oppose a barrier to the continued advance of the Roman arms, united in a common league with the German tribes which had originally settled on the left bank of the Rhine, but had been driven across by their more powerful opponents. The members of this union styled themselves Alemanni or all-men, i. e. men of all tribes, to denote at once their various lineage and their common bravery. They first appeared in a hostile attitude on the banks of the Mein, but were defeated by Caracalla, who was hence honoured with the surname of Alemanicus. In the succeeding reigns, we find them at one time ravaging the Roman territories, at another, defeated and driven back to their native forests. At last, after their overthrow by Clovis king of the Saliar Franks, they ceased to exist as one nation, and were dispersed over Gaul, Switzerland, and northern Italy.]

[ALES, vid. Hales.]

[ALESA, ALOESA, or HALESA, a very ancient city of Sicily built by Archonides, B. C. 403. It stood near the modern city of Caronia, on the river Alæsus, or Fiume di Caronia. The inhabitants were exempted by the Romans from taxes. Diod. Sic. 14, c. 16.]

[ALEZIA or ALEXIA, now Alise, a famous and strongly fortified city of the Mandubii, in Gallia Celtica. It was so ancient a city that Diodorus Siculus ascribes the building of it to Hercules in his war against Geryon. It was situate on a high hill, supposed to be Mont Auxois, near the sources of the Sequana or Seine, and washed on two sides by the small rivers Lutosa and Osera, now Oze and Oserain. It was taken and destroyed by Cæsar, after a famous siege, but was rebuilt, and became a place of considerable consequence under the Roman Emperors. It was laid in ruins in the 9th century. Flor. 3, c. 10.—Cæs. B. G. 7, c. 69.]

ALÆTHES, the first of the Heraclidæ, who was king of Corinth. He was son of Hippotas. Paus. 2, c. 4.

ALETIDES, (from αλεουαι, erro.) certain sacrifices at Athens, in remembrance of Erigone, who wandered with a dog after her father Icarus.

ALEUADÆ, a royal family of Larissa in Thessaly, descended from Aleuas king of that country. They betrayed their country to Xerxes. The name is often applied to the Thessalians without distinction. Diod. 16.—Herodot. 7, c. 6, 172.—Paus. 3, c. 8, 1, 7, c. 10.—Ælian. Anim. 8, c. 11.

ALEX, a river in the country of the Brutii. Dionys. Perieg. [Now, the Alise.]

ALEXAMENUS, an Ætolian, who killed Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon, and was soon after murdered by the people. Liv. 35, c. 34.

ALEXANDER 1st, son of Amyntas, was the tenth king of Macedonia. He killed the Persian ambassadors for their immodest behaviour to the women of his father's court, and was the first who raised the reputation of the Macedonians. He reigned 43 years, and died 451 B. C. Justin. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 5, 7, 3 and 9.

ALEXANDER 2d, son of Amyntas 2d, king of Macedonia, was treacherously murdered, B. C. 370, by his younger brother Ptolemy, who held the kingdom for four years, and made way for Perdicas and Philip. Justin. 7, c. 5, says, Eurydice, the wife of Amyntas, was the cause of his murder.

ALEXANDER 3d, surnamed the Great, was son of Philip and Olympias. He was born B. C. 356, that night on which the famous temple of Diana at Ephesus was burnt by Erostratus. This event, according to the magicians, was an early prognostic of his future greatness, as well as the taming of Bucephalus, a horse whom none of the king's courtiers could manage; upon which Philip said with tears in his eyes, that his son must seek another kingdom, as that of Macedonia would not be sufficiently large for the display of his greatness. Olympias, during her pregnancy, declared that she was with child by a dragon; and the day that Alexander was born, two eagles perched for some time on the house of Philip, as if foretelling that his son would become master of Europe and Asia. He was pupil to Aristotle during five years, and he received his learned preceptor's instructions with becoming deference and pleasure, and ever respected his abilities. When Philip went to war, Alexander, in his 16th year, was left governor of Macedonia, where he quelled a dangerous sedition, and soon after followed his father to the field, and saved his life in a battle. He was highly offended when Philip divorced Olympias to marry Cleopatra, and retired from court to his mother Olympias, but was recalled; and when Philip was assassinated, he punished his murderers; and, by his prudence and moderation gained the affection of his subjects. He conquered Thrace and Illyricum, and destroyed Thebes; and after he had been chosen chief commander of all the forces of Greece, he declared war against the Persians, who, under Darius and Xerxes, had laid waste and plundered the noblest of the Grecian cities. With 32,000 foot and 5000 horse, he invaded Asia, and after the defeat of Darius at the Granicus he conquered all the provinces of Asia Minor. He obtained two other celebrated victories over Darius at Issus and Albela, took Tyre after an obstinate siege of seven months, and the slaughter of 2000 of the inhabitants in cool blood, and made himself master of Egypt, Media, Syria, and Persia. From Egypt he visited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and bribed the priest who saluted him as the son of their god, and enjoined his army to pay him divine honours. He built a town which he called Alexandria, on the western side of the Nile, near the coast of the Mediterranean, an eligible situation, which his penetrating eye marked as best entitled to become the future capital of his immense dominions, and to extend the commerce of his subjects from the Mediterranean to the Ganges. His conquests were spread over India, where he fought with Porus, a powerful king of the country; and after he had invaded Scythia, and visited the Indian ocean, he retired to Babylon, loaded with the spoils of the east. His entering the city was foretold by the magicians as fatal, and their prediction was fulfilled. He died at Babylon the 21st of April, in the 32d year of his age, after a reign of 12 years and 8 months of brilliant and continued success, 323 B. C. His death was so premature that some have attributed it to the effects of poison, and excess of drinking. Antipater has been accused of causing the fatal poison to be given him at a feast; and perhaps the resentment of the Macedonians, whose services he seemed to forget by intrusting the guard of his body to the Persians, was the cause of his death. He was so universally regretted, that Babylon was filled with tears and lamentations; and the Medes and Macedonians declared that no one was able or worthy to succeed him. Many conspiracies were formed against him by the officers of his army, but they were all seasonably suppressed. His tender treatment of the wife and mother of king Darius, who were taken prisoners, has been greatly praised; and the latter, who had survived the death of her son, killed herself when she heard that Alexander was dead. His great intrepidity more than once endangered his life: he always fought as if sure of victory, and the terror of his name was often more powerfully effectual than his arms. He was always forward in every engagement, and bore the labour of the field as well as the meanest of his soldiers. During his conquests in Asia, he founded many cities, which he called Alexander, after his own name. When he had conquered Darius he ordered himself to be worshipped as a god; and Callisthenes, who refused to do it, was shamefully put to death. He murdered, at a banquet, his friend Clitus, who had once saved his life in a battle, because he enlarged upon the virtues and exploits of Philip, and preferred them to those of his son. His victories and success increased his pride; he dressed himself in the Persian manner, and gave himself up to pleasure and dissipation. He set on fire the city of Persepolis, in a fit of madness and intoxication, encouraged by the courtizan Thais. Yet among all his extravagancies, he was fond of candour and of truth; and when one of his officers read to him, as he sailed on the Hydaspes, an history which he had composed of the wars with Porus, and in which he had too liberally panegyrised him, Alexander snatched the book from his hand, and threw it into the river, "saying, what need is there of such flattery? are not the exploits of Alexander sufficiently meritorious in themselves, without colourings of falsehood?" He in like manner rejected a statu-ary, who offered to cut mount Athos like him, and represent him as holding a town in one hand, and pouring a river from the other. He forbade any statu-ary to make his statue except Lysippus, and any painter to draw his picture except Apelles. On his death-bed he gave his ring to Perdiccas, and it was supposed that by this singular present, he wished to make him his successor. Some time before his death, his officers asked him whom he appointed to succeed him on the throne? and he answered, the worthiest among you; but I am afraid added he, my best friends will perform my funeral obsequies with bloody hands. Alexander, with all his pride, was humane and liberal, easy and familiar with his friends, a great patron of learning, as may be collected from his assisting Aristotle with a purse of money to effect the completion of his natural history. He was brave often to rashness; he frequently lamented that his father conquered every thing, and left him nothing to do; and exclaimed, in all the pride of regal dignity, Give me kings for competitors, and I will enter the lists at Olympia. All his family and infant children were put to death by Cassander. The first deliberation that was made after his decease, among his generals, was to appoint his brother Philip Aridæus successor, until Roxane, who was then pregnant by him, brought into the world a legitimate heir. Perdiccas wished to be supreme regent, as Aridæus wanted capacity; and, more strongly to establish himself, he married Cleopatra, Alexander's sister, and made alliance with Eumenes. As he endeavoured to deprive Ptolemy of Egypt, he was defeated in a battle by Seleucus and Antigonus, on the banks of the river Nile, and assassinated by his own cavalry. Perdiccas was the first of Alexander's generals who took up arms against his fellow-soldiers, and he was the first who fell a sacrifice to his rashness and cruelty. To defend himself against him, Ptolemy made a treaty of alliance with some generals, among whom was Antipater, who had strengthened himself by giving his daughter Phila, an ambitious and aspiring woman, in marriage to Craterus, another of the generals of Alexander. After many dissensions and bloody wars among themselves, the generals of Alexander laid the foundation of several great empires in the three quarters of the globe. Ptolemy seized Egypt, where he firmly established himself, and where his successors were called Ptolemies, in honour of the founder of their empire, which subsisted till the time of Augustus. Seleucus and his posterity reigned in Babylon and Syria. Antigonus at first established himself in Asia Minor, and Antipater in Macedonia. The descendants of Antipater were conquered by the successors of Antigonus, who reigned in Macedonia till it was reduced by the Romans in the time of king Perseus. Lysimachus made himself master of Thrace; and Leonatus, who had taken possession of Phrygia, meditated for a while to drive Antipater from Macedonia. Eumenes established himself in Cappadocia, but was soon overpowered by the combinations of his rival Antigonus, and put to death. During his life-time, Eumenes appeared so formidable to the successors of Alexander, that none of them dared to assume the title of king. *Curt. He was driven from the throne by Demetrius, the lawful heir, and Ptolemy Philometor.—Another surnamed Zebenna. By the assistance of Ptolemy Physcon he conquered Nicanor, but was afterwards killed by Antiochus Grypus, son of the latter.]—Ptolemy, was one of the Ptolemaic kings in Egypt. His mother Cleopatra, raised him to the throne, in preference to his brother Ptolemy Lathurus, and reigned conjointly with him. Cleopatra, however, expelled him, and soon after recalled him; and Alexander, to prevent being expelled a second time, put her to death, and for this unnatural action was himself murdered by one of his subjects. Joseph. 13. *Ant. ALEXANDRIA, the name of several cities which were founded by Alexander, during his conquests in Asia; the most famous are—A great and extensive city, built B. C. 332, by Alexander. [It was situate about 12 miles west of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, between the lake Mareotis and the beautiful harbour formed by the isle of Pharos. It was the intention of its founder to make Alexandria at once the seat of empire and the first commercial city of the world. The latter of these plans completely succeeded; and for a period of 1800 years, from the time of the Ptolemies to the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, the capital of Egypt commanded the principal trade of the east. The goods being brought up the Red Sea to Berenice, were thence transported across to the Nile, conveyed down that river and through a canal to the city. From the port of Alexandria the commodities of India and the east were diffused over the western world.] Alexandria was distinguished for its schools, not only of theology and philosophy, but of physic, where once to have studied was a sufficient recommendation to distant countries. The astronomical school, founded by Philadelphus, maintained its superior reputation for 10 centuries till the time of the Saracens. [It was to its splendid library, however, which had been formed and continually enlarged under the munificent patronage of the Ptolemies, that this great city owed its more enduring fame. This celebrated collection, consisting of 700,000 volumes, 200,000 of which had been brought from Pergamus by Antony and Cleopatra, is said to have been destroyed by the Saracens at the command of the Caliph Omar, A. D. 642, and to have furnished fuel during 6 months to the 4000 baths of Alexandria. The narrative, however, rests on the sole authority of the historian Abulpharagius, and its authenticity has been greatly suspected. The modern name of the city is Scanderia, though the use of its ancient one is more common among Europeans. It contains 10 or 15,000 inhabitants. The population in the days of its ancient greatness was about 600,000. *Curt. Strabo. It is supposed to be in the vicinity of Cogend.]

ALEXANDRINA AQUA, baths in Rome, built by the emperor Alexander Severus.

ALEXANDOR, a son of Machaon, who built in Sycionia a temple to his grandfather Æsculapius. Paus. 2, c. 11.

ALEXAS, of Laodicea, was recommended to M. Antony by Timagenes. He was the cause that Antony repudiated Octavia to marry Cleopatra. Augustus punished him severely after the defeat of Antony. Plut. in Anton.

ALEXICACUS, a surname given to Apollo by the Athenians, because he delivered them from the plague during the Peloponnesian war.

ALEXINUS, a disciple of Ebulides the Milesian, famous for the acuteness of his genius and judgment, and for his fondness for contention and argument. He died of a wound he had received from a sharp-pointed reed, as he swam in the river Alpheus. Diog. in Euclid.

ALEXION, a physician intimate with Cicero. Cic. ad Att. 3, ep. 16.

ALEXIPPUS, a physician of Alexander. Plut. in Alex.

ALEXIS, a comic poet, 336 B. C. of Thurium, who wrote 45 comedies, of which some few fragments remain.—A statuary, disciple to Polycletus, 87 Olym. Plin. 34, c. 8.

ALFATERNA, vid. Nuceria.

P. ALFENUS VARUS, a native of Cremona, who, by the force of his genius and his application, raised himself from his original profession of a cobbler, to offices of trust at Rome, and at last became consul. [He flourished about A. U. C. 754. According to some he was originally a barber.] Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 130.

ALGIDUM, a town of Latium near Tusculum, about 12 miles from Rome. There is a mountain in the neighbourhood, called anciently Algidus, now [Rocca del Papa.—The modern name of the town is Aglio.] Horat. 1, od. 21.

[ALIAMON, vid. Haliacmon.]

[ALIARTUS, vid. Haliartus.]

ALICIS, a town of Laconia.—A tribe of Athens. Strab.

ALIENUS CÆCINA, a questor in Bætica, appointed, for his services, commander of a legion in Germany, by Galba. The emperor disgraced him for his bad conduct, for which he raised commotions in the empire. Tacit. 1, Hist. c. 52.

ALIFÆ, ALIFA, or ALIPHA, [a town of Samnium, north-west of the Vulturinus, famous for the large-sized drinking cups made there. It is now Alifi.]—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 39.—Liv. 8, c. 25.

ALILÆI, a people of Arabia Felix.

ALIMENTUS, C. an historian in the second Punic war, who wrote in Greek an account of Annibal, besides a treatise on military affairs. Liv. 21 and 30.

ALINDÆ, a town of Caria, [south-east of Stratonicea, near Mogla.] Arrian.

ALIPHËRIA, a town of Arcadia, situate on a hill. Polyb. 4, c. 77.

ALLIROTIIUS, a son of Neptune. Hearing that his father had been defeated by Minerva, in his dispute about giving a name to Athens, he went to the citadel, and endeavoured to cut down the olive which had sprung from the ground, and given the victory to Minerva; but in the attempt he missed his aim, and cut his own legs so severely that he instantly expired.

ALLIA, [a river of Italy, running down, according to Livy, from the mountains of Crustumium, at the 11th mile stone, and flowing into the Tiber. It is now the Aia. On its banks the Romans were defeated by the Gauls under Brennus, July 17th, B. C. 387. 40,000 Romans were either killed or put to flight. Hence in the Roman Calendar, "Alliensis dies" was marked as a most unlucky day. Liv. 5, c. 37.—Flor. 1, c. 13.—Plut. in Cam.]

ALLOBRÔGES, [a people of Gallia, between the Isara or Isere, and the Rhodanus or Rhone, in the country answering to Dauphiné, Piedmont, and Savoy. Their chief city was Vienna, now Vienne, on the left bank of the Rhodanus, 13 miles below Lugdunum or Lyons. They were finally reduced beneath the Roman power by Fabius Maximus, who hence was honoured with the surname of Allobrox. Cicero praises their ambassadors for refusing to join in Catiline's conspiracy.—Horace, however, speaks of their fickleness as a nation. Strab. 4.—Cic. Cat. 3.—Horat. Epod. 16.—Sallust. Cat. 41.]

ALLOTRIGES, [a people in the north of Spain, according to Strabo. They have been supposed to be the same with the Altrigonæ of Ptolemy, and the Austrigones of Pliny. Strab. 2. et Comment. Casauboni in locum.

ALLUTIUS, or ALBUTIUS, a prince of the Celtiberi, to whom Scipio restored the beautiful princess he had taken in battle.

ALMO, a small river near Rome, falling into the Tiber. [Now, the Dachia, a corruption of Aqua d'Acio. At the junction of this stream with the Tiber, the priests of Cybele, every year, on the 25th March, washed the statue and sacred things of the Goddess. vid. Lara.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 337.—Lucan. 1, v. 600.]

ALŌA, festivals at Athens in honour of Bacchus and Ceres, by whose beneficence the husbandmen received the recompense of their labours. The oblations were the fruits of the earth. Ceres has been called, from this, Aloas and Alois.

ALŌEUS, a giant, son of Titan and Terra. He married Iphimedia, by whom Neptune had the twins, Othus and Ephialtus. Aloeus educated them as his own, and from that circumstance they have been called Aloides. They made war against the gods, and were killed by Apollo and Diana. They grew up nine inches every month, and were only nine years old when they undertook the war. Paus. 9, c. 29.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 532.—Homer. Il. 5, Od. 11.

ALŌIDES and ALŌIDÆ, the sons of Aloeus. vid. Aloeus.

ALŌPE, daughter of Cereyon, king of Eleusis, had a child by Neptune, whom she exposed in the woods, covered with a piece of her gown. The child was preserved, and carried to Alope's father, who, upon knowing the gown, ordered his daughter to be put to death. Neptune, who could not save his mistress, changed her into a fountain. The child called Hippothoon was preserved by some shepherds, and placed by Theseus upon his grandfather's throne. Pans. 1, c. 5 and 39.—Hygin. fab. 187.—A town of Thessaly. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 682.—[Another in Attica.—Another in Pontus.—Another among the Locri.]

ALŌPECE, an island in the Palus Mæotis [near the mouth of the Tanais. Now Isle de Renards. Strab. 11.]—Another in the Cimærian Bosphorus. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Another in the Ægean sea, opposite Smyrna. Id. 5, c. 31.

ALŌPECES, a small village of Attica, where was the tomb of Anchimolius, whom the Spartans had sent to deliver Athens from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. Socrates and Aristides were born there. Æschin. contra Timarch.—Herodot. 5, c. 64.

ALŌS, [a town of Argolis.—Another in Phthiotis in Thessaly, upon the river Amphrysus.] Strab. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 7.

ALŌTIA, festivals in Arcadia, in commemoration of a victory gained over Lacedæmon by the Arcadians; [in which they took a large number of prisoners (ἀλωτους).]

ALPĒNUS, a city of the Locri, at the north of Thermopylæ. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.

ALPES, [a chain of mountains, separating Italia from Gallia, Helvetia, and Germania. They extend from the Sinus Flanaticus or Gulf of Carnero, at the top of the Gulf of Venice, and the sources of the river Colapis or Kulpe, to Vada Sabatia or Savona on the Gulf of Genoa. The whole extent, which is in a crescent form, Livy makes only 250 miles, Pliny 700 miles. The true amount is nearly 600 British miles. The name is said to be derived from the ancient Scythian or Scandinavian term Alp, signifying a mountain. They have been divided by both ancient and modern geographers into various portions, of which the principal are, 1. Alpes Maritimæ, Mont Viso: arising from the gulf of Genoa and reaching inland to the sources of the Varus or Var. 2. Alpes Cotticæ, Mont Genevre, where Annibal is believed to have crossed into Italy. vid. Cottius. 3. Alpes Graiæ, Little St. Bernard, so called by the ancients from Hercules being supposed to have passed this way from Spain into Italy. 4. Alpes Penninæ, Great St. Bernard, deriving their name from the Celtic Penn, a summit, not as Livy and other ancient writers, together with some moderns, pretend, from Annibal having crossed into Italy by this path, and who therefore make the orthography Penninæ from Pennus. 5. Alpes Summæ, St. Gothard.—There are also the Alpes Leponticæ, Rhæticiæ, Juliæ or Carnicæ, &c. Among the Pennine Alps is Mont Blanc, 14,676 feet high. The principal passes over the Alps at the present day are, that over the Great St. Bernard, that over Mont Simplon, and that over Mont St. Gothard. The manner in which Annibal is said to have effected his passage over the Alps is now generally regarded as a fiction. Augustus first subdued the wild and barbarous inhabitants of these regions. Strab. 2 and 5.—Liv. 21, c. 35 & 38.—Polyb. 3, c. 47.]

ALPHEIA, a surname of Diana in Elis. It was given her when the river Alpheus endeavoured to ravish her without success.—A surname of the nymph Arethusa, because loved by the Alpheus. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 487.

ALPHĒNUS. vid. Alfenus.

ALPHESIBÆA, daughter of the river Phlegæus, married Alcæon, son of Amphiraus, who had fled to her father's court after the murder of his mother. [vid. Alcæon.] She received as a bridal present, the famous necklace which Polynices had given to Eriphyle, to induce her to betray her husband Amphiraus. Alcæon, being persecuted by the manes of his mother, left his wife by order of the oracle, and retired near the Achelous, whose daughter Callirhoe had two sons by him, and begged of him, as a present, the necklace which was then in the hands of Alpheisibæa. He endeavoured to obtain it, and was killed by Temeneus and Axion, Alpheisibæa's brothers, who thus revenged their sister, who had been abandoned. Hygin. fab. 244.—Propert. 1, el. 15, v. 15.—Paus. 8, c. 24.

ALPHEUS, now Alphæo, a famous river of Peloponnesus, which rises in Arcadia, and after passing through Elis, falls into the sea. The god of this river fell in love with the nymph Arethusa, and pursued her till she was changed into a fountain by Diana. The fountain Arethusa is in Ortygia, a small island near Syracuse; and the ancients affirm, that the river Alpheus passes under the sea from Peloponnesus, and without mingling itself with the salt waters, rises again in Ortygia, and joins the stream of Arethusa. If any thing is thrown into the Alpheus in Elis, according to their traditions, it will re-appear, after some time, swimming on the waters of Arethusa near Sicily. [It was a prevalent opinion among the ancients that rivers passed under ground for a considerable distance from one place to another.] Hercules made use of the Alpheus to clean the stables of Augeas. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 694.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 10.—Lucan. 3, v. 176.—Stat. Theb. 1 and 4.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 7, l. 6, c. 21.—Marcellin. 25.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

ALPHIUS AVITUS, a writer in the age of Severus, who gave an account of illustrious men, and an history of the Carthaginian war.

ALPINUS, (CORNELIUS) a contemptible poet, whom Horace ridicules for the awkward manner in which he introduces the death of Memnon in a tragedy, and the pitiful style with which he describes the Rhine in an epic poem he had attempted on the wars in Germany. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 36.—Julius, one of the chiefs of the Helvetii. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 68.

ALPIS, a river falling into the Danube. [Mannert supposes this to have been the same with the Ænus or Inn. It is mentioned by Herodotus, 4, c. 29.]

ALSIUM, [a maritime town of Etruria, south-east from Cære, now Palo. Sil. 8, v. 475.]

ALSUS, a river of Achaia in Peloponnesus, flowing from mount Sipylus. Paus. 7, c. 27.

ALTHÆA, daughter of Thestius and Eurymemis, married Ceneus, king of Calydon, by whom she had many children, among whom was Meleager. When Althæa brought forth Meleager, the Parca placed a log of wood in the fire, and said, that as long as it was preserved, so long would the life of the child just born be prolonged. The mother saved the wood from the flames, and kept it very carefully; but when Meleager killed his two uncles, Althæa's brothers, Althæa, to revenge their death, threw the log into the fire, and as soon as it was burnt, Meleager expired. She was afterwards so sorry for the death which she had caused, that she killed herself, unable to survive her son. vid. Meleager.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 4.—Homer. Il. 9.—Paus. 8, c. 45, l. 10, c. 31.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.

ALTHÆMÈNES, a son of Catreus king of Crete. Hearing that he was to be his father's murderer, he fled to Rhodes, where he made a settlement to avoid becoming a parricide, and built, on Mount Atabyrus, the famous temple of Jupiter Atabyrius.] After the death of all his other sons, Catreus went after his son Althæmenes; when he landed in Rhodes, the inhabitants attacked him, supposing him to be an enemy, and he was killed by the hand of his own son. When Althæmenes knew that he had killed his father, he entreated the gods to remove him, and the earth immediately opened, and swallowed him up, Apollod. 3, c. 2. [According to Diodorus Siculus, he shunned the society of men after the fatal deed, and died eventually of grief. Diod. 5, c. 59.]

ALTINUM, a flourishing city of Italy, south-west of Aquileia, famous for its wool. Marzial. 14, ep. 25.—Plin. 3, c. 18.

ALTIS, a sacred grove round Jupiter's temple at Olympia. Paus. 5, c. 10 & 15.

ALUNTIUM, a town of Sicily. [Now Aluntio.] Plin. 5, c. 8.—Cic. in Verr. 4.

ALYATTES, [a king of Lydia, father of Cræsus, succeeded Sarduyattes. He drove the Cimmerians from Asia, and made war against Cyaxares king of the Medes, the grandson of Dejoeces. He died after a reign of 37 years, and after having brought to a close a war against the Milesians. An immense barrow or mound was raised upon his grave, composed of stones and earth. This is still visible within about five miles of Sardis or Sart. An eclipse of the sun terminated a battle between this monarch and Cyaxares. —Herod. 1, c. 16, 17, 103.]

ALÛBA, a country near Mysia. Homer. Il. 2.

ALYCÆUS, son of Sciron, was killed by Theseus. A place in Megara received its name from him. Plut. in These.

ALYSSUS, a fountain of Arcadia, whose waters could cure the bite of a mad-dog. Paus. 8, c. 19.

ALYXOTHŒE, or ALEXIRHŒE, daughter of Dymus, was mother of Æsacus by Priam. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 763.

ALYZIA, a town of Acarnania on the western mouth of the Achelous, opposite to the Echinades. Cic. ad Fam. 16, ep. 2.

AMADŒCUS, a king of Thrace, defeated by his antagonist Seuthes. Aristot. 5, Polit. 10.

AMÁGE, a queen of Sarmatia, remarkable for her justice and fortitude. Polyæn. 9, c. 56.

AMALTHÆA, daughter of Melissus king of Crete, fed Jupiter with goat's milk. Hence some authors have called her a goat, and have maintained that Jupiter, to reward her kindnesses, placed her in heaven as a constellation, and gave one of her horns to the nymphs who had taken care of his infant years. This horn was called the horn of plenty, and had the power to give the nymphs whatever they desired. Diod. 3, 4, and 5.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 113.—Strab. 10.—Hygin. fab. 139.—Paus. 7, c. 26.—A Sibyl of Cumæ, called also Hierophile and Demophile. She is supposed to be the same who brought nine books of prophecies to Tarquin king of Rome, &c. Varro.—Tibul. 2, el. 5, v. 67. [vid. Sibyllæ.]

AMALTHEUM, a public place which Atticus had opened in his country-house, called Amalthea in Epirus, and provided with every thing which could furnish entertainment and convey instruction. Cic. ad Attic. 1, ep 13.

AMĀNUS, [a continuation of the chain of Mount Taurus, running from north-east to south-west. It is situate at the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean, near the Gulf of Issus, and separates Cilicia from Syria. The defile or pass in these mountains was called Portus Amanicus, or Pylæ Syriæ. The modern name of the chain is, according to Mannert, Almadag; but, according to D'Anville. Al-Lucan. Strab. 14.—Xen Anab. 1, c. 4.]

CN. SAL. AMANDUS, a rebel general under Dioclesian, who assumed imperial honours, and was at last conquered by Dioclesian's colleague.

AMANTES or AMANTĪNI, a people of Illyricum descended from the Abantes of Phocis Callimach.

AMĀNUS, [or OMĀNUS, the deity of the ancient Persians, which they believed to be the sun, or the perpetual fire adored by them as an image or emblem of the sun.]

AMĀRĀCUS, an attendant of Cinyras, changed into marjoram.

AMARDI, a nation near the Caspian sea. Mela. 1, c. 3.

AMARYLLIS, the name of a country woman in Virgil's eclogues. Some commentators have supposed, that the poet spoke of Rome under this fictitious appellation.

AMARYNCEUS, a king of the Epeans, buried at Bupraïum. Strab. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 1.

AMARYNTHUS, a village of Eubœa whence Diana is called Amarysia, and her festivals in that town Amarynthia. Paus. 1, c. 31.

AMAS, a mountain of Laconia, [near Gythium. Paus. 3.]

AMĀSĒNUS, a small river of Latium falling into the Tyrrhene sea, [now, la Toppia.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 635.

AMASĪA or AMASĒA, a city of Pontus, where Mithridates the Great, and Strabo the geographer, were born. [It was situate on the Irus. Its modern name is Amasieh.] Strab. 12.—Plin. 6, c. 3.

AMĀSĪS, a man who, from a common soldier, became king of Egypt. He died before the invasion of his country by Cambyses king of Persia. He made a law, that every one of his subjects should yearly give an account to the public magistrates, of the manner in which he supported himself. He refused to continue in alliance with Polycrates the tyrant of Samos, on account of his uncommon prosperity. When Cambyses came into Egypt, he ordered the body of Amasis to be dug up, and to be insulted and burnt; an action which was very offensive to the religious notions of the Egyptians. Herodot. 1, 2, 3.

AMASTRIS, the wife of Dionysius, tyrant of [Heraclea in Pontus,] was sister to Darius, whom Alexander conquered. Strab.—Also, the wife of Xerxes, king of Persia.

vid. Amestris.]—A city of Paphlagonia, on the Euxine sea, [now Amastro.] Catull.

AMASTRUS, one of the auxiliaries of Perseus, against Æetes king of Colchis, killed by Argus, son of Phryxus. Flacc. 6, v. 544.

AMĀTA, the wife of king Latinus. She had betrothed her daughter Lavinia to Turnus, before the arrival of Æneas in Italy. She zealously favoured the interest of Turnus; and when her daughter was given in marriage to Æneas, she hung herself to avoid the sight of her son-in-law. Virg. Æn. 7, &c.

AMĀTHUS, (gen. untis) acity on the southern side of the island of Cyprus, particularly dedicated to Venus. The island is sometimes called Amathusia, a name not unfrequently applied to the goddess of the place. [Amathus was afterwards called Limmesol, but is now utterly destroyed. Its site however is still called Limmesol Antica.] Virg. Æn. 10, v. 51.—Ptol. 5, c. 14.

AMAXIA, [vid. Hamaxia.]

[AMAXĪTUS, a borough of Troas, where Apollo had a temple, and where some suppose Chryses to have officiated.]

AMAZĒNES or MAZĒNES, a prince of the island Ooracta, who sailed for some time with the Macedonians and Nearchus in Alexander's expedition into the east. Arrian. in Indic.

AMĀZŌNES or AMĀZŌNĪDES, a nation of famous women who lived near the river Thermodon in Cappadocia. All their life was employed in wars and manly exercises. They never had any commerce with the other sex; but, only for the sake of propagation, they visited the inhabitants of the neighbouring country for a few days, and the male children which they brought forth were given to the fathers: according to Justin, they were strangled as soon as born, and Diodorus says that they maimed them and distorted their limbs. The females were carefully educated with their mothers, in the labours of war; their right breast was burnt off, that they might hurl a javelin with more force, and make a better use of the bow; from that circumstance, their name is derived (α non, μαζος, mamma). They founded an extensive empire in Asia Minor, along the shores of the Euxine, and near the Thermodon. They were defeated in a battle near the Thermodon by the Greeks, [who after their victory, endeavoured to carry them away in ships to their own country; but the Amazons when at sea, rose upon and overpowered the crews. Being ignorant of navigation, they were driven by the winds and waves to the shores of the Palus Mæotis. From their intercourse with the Scythians in this quarter, sprang the Sarmatæ.] Themysceyra was the most capital of their towns. Smyrna, Magnesia, Thyatira, and Ephesus, according to some authors, were built by them. Diodorus I. 3, mentions a nation of Amazons in Africa, more ancient than those of Asia. Some authors, among whom is Strabo, deny the existence of the Amazons, and of a republic supported and governed by women, who banished or extirpated all their males; but others particularly support it; and the latter says, that Penthesilea, one of their queens, came to the Trojan war, on the side of Priam, and that she was killed by Achilles, and from that time the glory and character of the Amazons gradually decayed, and was totally forgotten. The Amazons of Africa flourished long before the Trojan war, and many of their actions have been attributed to those of Asia. It is said, that after they had almost subdued all Asia, they invaded Attica, and were conquered by Theseus. Their most famous actions were, their expedition against Priam, and afterwards the assistance they gave him during the Trojan war; and their invasion of Attica, to punish Theseus, who had carried away Antiope, one of their queens. They were also conquered by Bellerophon and Hercules. Among their queens, Hippolyte, Antiope, Lampeto, Marpesia, &c. are famous. Curtius says, that Thalestris, one of their queens, came to Alexander whilst he was pursuing his conquests in Asia, for the sake of raising children from a man of such military reputation; and that after she had remained 13 days with him, she retired into her country. The Amazons were such expert archers, that, to denote the goodness of a bow or quiver, it was usual to call it Amazonian. [The history of the Amazons may have had some slight foundation in truth; as, for example, the women of some one tribe of barbarians may have lost their husbands in battle, and remained for a short time in a state of widowhood, but a community of women never could have been of long continuance. While the geographical knowledge of the Greeks was in its infancy, we find these female warriors located by them in the heart of Asia Minor; they are afterwards removed to the shores of Pontus, and we finally lose sight of them amid the wilds of Scythia. This frequent change of location is no weak argument towards proving that the Amazonian nation never existed.] Virg. Æn. 5, v. 311.—Jornand. de Reb. Get. c. 7.—Philostr. Hal. 4.—Paus. 7, c. 2.—Plut. in These.—Apollod. 3, c. 3 and 5.—Hygin. fab. 14 and 163.

AMAZONIA, a celebrated mistress of the emperor Commodus.—The country of the Amazons, near the Caspian sea.

AMAZONIUM, a place in Atica, where Theseus obtained a victory over the Amazons.

AMAZONIUS, a surname of Apollo at Lacedæmon.

AMBARRI, a people of Gallia Celtica, related to the Ædii, [supposed to have dwelt on the Arar, a little north of its junction with the Rhodanus.] Cæs. bell. G. 1, c. 11.

[AMBARVALIA, sacred rites in honour of Ceres, previous to the commencement of reaping. The fratres Ambarvales, who were twelve in number, offered up on this occasion sacrifices for the fertility of the ground, which were called sacra ambarvalia, because the victim was carried around the fields, (arva ambrebat.) A crowd of country people followed, adorned with garlands of oak leaves, and singing the praises of the goddess, to whom they offered libations of honey diluted with wine and milk. Virg. Georg. 1, v. 345. Macrob. 3, c. 5.]

AMBENUS, a mountain of European Sarmatia. Flacc. 6, v. 85.

AMBIANUM, a town of Belgium, [anciently Samarobriga,] now Amiens. Its inhabitants conspired against J. Cæsar. Cæs. 2, bell. G. c. 4.

AMBIATINUS VICUS, a village of Germany, where the emperor Caligula was born, [Between Confluentes and Baudobriga, supposed by some to be now Capelle on the Rhine; according to others Konigstuhl.] Suzton. in Gal. 8.

AMBIGATUS, a king of the Celtæ, in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. Seeing the great population of his country, he sent his two nephews, Sigovesus and Bellovesus, with two colonies, in quest of new settlements; the former towards the Hercynian woods, and the other towards Italy. Liv. 5, c. 24, &c.

AMBIORIX, a king of [one half of the Eburones in Gaul, Cativolcus being king of the other half. He was an inveterate foe to the Romans, and after being defeated, narrowly escaped the pursuit of Cæsar's men. Cæs. B. G. 6, c. 43.]

AMBLADA, a town of Pisidia. Strab.

AMBRACIA, [the royal city of Pyrrhus and his race, in Epirus, on the river Arethon. This river has communicated the name of L'Arta to a city a little above the site of the ancient Ambracia. The founding of Nicopolis caused the decline of Ambracia. vid. Nicopolis. Mela, 2, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 1.—Strab. 10.]

AMBRACIUS SINUS, a bay of the Ionian sea, near Ambracia, about 300 stadia deep, narrow at the entrance, but within near 100 stadia in breadth, and now called the gulph of [L'Arta.] Polyb. 4, c. 63.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Flor. 4, c. 11.—Strab. 10.

AMBRONES, [a people of Gaul. They invaded the Roman territories along with the Cimbric and Teutones, and were defeated with great slaughter by Marius. Plut. in Mario.]

AMBROSIA, festivals observed in honour of Bacchus, [in almost all the countries of Greece.] They were the same as the Bromalia of the Romans.—[The food on which the gods were supposed to feed. The word signifies immortal, being compounded of α non, and βροτος, mortalis. Their drink was nectar. The term Ambrosia, according to Wedelius, is sometimes used to denote honey, sometimes wine, sometimes perfumes, and particularly ambergris; sometimes the method and ingredients for embalming and preserving dead bodies; and sometimes for a state of immortality.]

AMBROSIVS, bishop of Milan, obliged the emperor Theodosius to make penance for the murder of the people of Thessalonica, and distinguished himself by his writings, especially against the Arians. His 3 books de officiis are still extant, besides 8 hymns on the creation. His style is not inelegant, but his diction is sententious, his opinions eccentric, though his subject is diversified by copiousness of thought. He died A. D. 397. The best edition of his works is that of the Benedictines, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1636.

AMBRYSUS, a city of Phocis, [between two chains of mountains, west of Lebedæa, and north-west of Anticyra,] which receives its name from a hero of the same name. Paus. 10, c. 35.

AMBÜBÄJÆ, Syrian women of immoral lives, who, in the dissolute period of Rome, attended festivals and assemblies as minstrels. The name is derived by some from Syrian words, which signify a flute. Horat. 1, Sat. 2.—Suet. in Ner. 27.

AMBULII, a surname of Castor and Pollux, in Sparta. [They were so named, it is said, from ἀμβολῆ, delay, because it was thought that they could delay the approach of death.]

AMÉLES, a river of hell, whose waters no vessel could contain. Plut. 10, de Rep.

AMENANUS, a river of Sicily, near mount Ætna, now [Judicello.] Sirab. 5.

AMENIDES, a secretary of Darius the last king of Persia. Alexander set him over the Ariaspæ Euergetæ. Curt. 7, c. 3.

AMERIA, [now Amelia, a town of Umbria, south-west of Spoletum. Roscius was a native of this place. The whole of its territory was assigned by Augustus to his veteran soldiers.]

AMESTRÁTUS, a town of Sicily, near the Halesus. The Romans besieged it for seven months, and it yielded at last after a third siege, and the inhabitants were sold as slaves. [It is called Myttistratus by Polybius, and Mystraton by Diodorus Siculus. It is now Mistretta, in the Val de Demona.]—Polyb. 3, c. 24.

AMESTRIS, queen of Persia, was wife to Xerxes. [Having discovered an intrigue between her husband and Artaynta, and imputing all the blame solely to the mother of the latter, she requested her from the king at a royal festival; and, when she had her in her power, cut off her breasts, nose, ears, lips, and tongue, and sent her home in this shocking condition. She also on another occasion sacrificed 14 Persian children of noble birth, "to propitiate," says Herodotus, "the deity who is said to dwell beneath the earth." Herod. 9, c. 110, 111 & 112, 7, c. 114.]—A daughter of Oxyartes, wife to Ly-simachus. Diod. 20.

AMIDA, [a city of Mesopotamia, taken and destroyed by Sapor king of Persia. It was re-peopled by the inhabitants of Nisibis, after Iovian's treaty with the Persians, and by a new colony which was sent to it. It was called also Constantia, from the emperor Constantius. Its ancient walls, constructed with black stones, have caused it to be termed by the Turks, Kara-Amid, although it is more commonly denominated Diar-Bekir, from the name of its district. Ammian. 19.]

AMILCAR, a Carthaginian general of great eloquence and cunning, surnamed Rhodanus. When the Carthaginians were afraid of Alexander, Amilcar went to his camp, gained his confidence, and secretly transmitted an account of all his schemes to Carthage. Trogus. 21, c. 6.—A Carthaginian, whom the Syracusians called to their assistance against the tyrant Agathocles, who besieged their city. [He was chosen umpire by the contending parties, and brought about a peace. Agathocles, afterwards, injuring the allies of Carthage in Sicily, and Amilcar not interposing, the latter was summoned to Carthage to trial, but died in Sicily before he could obey the summons.] Diod. 20.—Justin. 22, c. 2 and 3.—A Carthaginian, surnamed Barca, father to the celebrated Annibal. He was general in Sicily during the first Punic war; and after a peace had been made with the Romans, he quelled [an insurrection of the Lybians and Gallic mercenaries,] who had besieged Carthage, and taken many towns of Africa, and rendered themselves so formidable to the Carthaginians that the latter begged and obtained assistance from Rome. After this, he passed into Spain with his son Annibal, who was but nine years of age, and laid the foundation of the town of Barcelona. He was killed in a battle against the Vettones, B. C. 237. He had formed the plan of an invasion of Italy, by crossing the Alps, which his son afterwards carried into execution. His great enmity to the Romans was the cause of the second Punic war. He used to say of his three sons, that he kept three lions to devour the Roman power. C. Nep. in Vit.

Liv. 21, c. 1.—Polyb. 2.—[Appian. 8, c. 5.]—A Carthaginian general, who assisted the Insubres against Rome, and was taken by Cn. Cornelius. Liv. 32, c. 30, 1. 33, c. 8.—A son of Hanno, defeated in Sicily by Gelon, the same day that Xerxes was defeated at Salamis by Themistocles. [Herodotus says, that he disappeared after the battle and was never again seen; and adds a report of the Carthaginians, that he threw himself into the flames of a sacrifice consisting of the entire bodies of numerous victims, when he perceived the day to be lost. Polyænus, however, relates that Gelon destroyed him by a stratagem, while in the act of offering a sacrifice. Herodot. 7, c. 166, &c. Polyæn. 1. 27. 2.]

AMÍLOS, or AMÍLUS, a river of Mauritania, where the elephants go to wash themselves [at the new moon.] Plin. 8, c. 1.—A town of Arcadia. Paus. in Arcadic.

AMIMÖNE, or AMYMÖNE, a daughter of Danaus, changed into a fountain which is near Argos, and flows into the lake Lerna. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

AMINËA, or AMMINEA, a part of Campania, where the inhabitants were great husbandmen. Its wine was highly esteemed. [The more correct opinion appears to be, that the Amminæan wine was so called because made from a grape transplanted into Italy from Aminæum, a place in Thessaly. Macrobius, however, asserts that the Falernian wine was more anciently called Aminæan.] Virg. G. 2, v. 97.

AMINIAS, a famous pirate, whom Antigonus employed against Apollodorus, tyrant of Cassandria. Polyæn. 4, 6, c. 18.

[AMISENUS SINUS, a gulf of the Euxine, east of the mouth of the Halys, on the coast of Pontus, so called from the town of Amisus.]

AMISIAS, a comic poet, whom Aristophanes ridiculed for his insipid verses.

[AMISIA, now the Ems, a river of Germany, falling into the German ocean.]

[AMISUS, a city of Pontus, on the coast of the Euxine, north-west from the mouth of the Iris. It was founded by a colony of Milesians, was the largest city in Pontus next to Sinope, and was made by Pharnaces the metropolis of his kingdom. It is now called Samsoun.]

AMITERNUM, a town of the Sabines where Sallust was born. [Some remains of it are discernible at the present day near St. Vittorino.] Plin. 3, c. 5.—Liv. 28, c. 45.

AMMIANUS. vid. Marcellinus.

AMMON, and HAMMON, a name of Jupiter, worshipped in Libya. He appeared under the form of a ram to Hercules, or, according to others, to Bacchus, who, with his army, suffered the greatest extremities for want of water, in the deserts of Africa, and showed him a fountain. Upon this Bacchus erected a temple to his father, under the name of Jupiter Ammon, i. e. sandy, with the horns of a ram. The ram, according to some, was made a constellation. The temple of Jupiter Ammon was in the deserts of Libya, [12 days' journey from Memphis.] It had a famous oracle, which, according to ancient tradition, was established about 12 centuries before the time of Augustus, by two doves, which flew away from Thebais in Egypt, and came, one to Dodona, and the other to Libya, where the people were soon informed of their divine mission. The oracle of Hammon was consulted by Hercules, Perseus, and others; but when it pronounced Alexander to be the son of Jupiter, such flattery destroyed the long established reputation of this once famous oracle, and we learn that in the age of Plutarch it was scarce known. [Though the temple was surrounded by a sandy desert, yet its immediate vicinity abounded with trees bearing plenty of fruit, and was ornamented with fountains.]—Herodot. in Melpom.—Curt. 4, c. 7.—Plin. 6, c. 29.—Strab. 1, 11 and 17.—Plut. cur orac. edi desiderint, & in Isid.—Curt. 6, c. 10. l. 1, c. 5.—Herodot. 1, c. 6, l. 2, c. 32 and 55, l. 4, c. 44.—Paus. 3, c. 18, l. 4, c. 23.—Hygin. fab. 133. Poet. astr. 2, c. 20.—Justin. 1, c. 9, l. 11, c. 11.—[Here was the famous Fons Solis, which, according to Herodotus, was warm at dawn, cool as the day advanced, excessively cold at noon, diminishing in coldness as the day declined, warm at sunset, and boiling hot at midnight. Browne, an English traveller, discovered in 1792 the site of the temple of Ammon, in a fertile spot called the Oasis of Siuah, situated in the midst of deserts, five degrees nearly west of Cairo. In 1798, Horneman discovered the Fons Solis. In 1816 Belzoni visited the spot, and found the fountain situated in the midst of a beautiful grove of palms. He visited the fountain at noon, evening, midnight, and morning. He had unfortunately no thermometer with him, but judging from his feelings at these several periods, it might be, 100° at midnight, 80° in the morning early, and at noon about 40°. The truth appears to be that no change takes place in the temperature of the water, but in that of the surrounding atmosphere; for the well is deeply shaded, and about 60 feet deep. The account of Herodotus, who was never on the spot, is evidently incorrect. He must have misunderstood his informer.]

AMMŌNI, a nation of Africa, who derived their origin from the Egyptians and Æthiopians. Their language was a mixture of that of the two people from whom they were descended. Herodot. 2, 3 and 4.

AMMŌNIUS, a christian philosopher, who opened a school of platonic philosophy at Alexandria, 232 A. D. and had among his pupils Origen and Plotinus. His treatise Περὶ Ομοιωσῶν, was published in 4to. by Valckenaer, L. Bat. 1739.—A writer who gave an account of sacrifices, as also a treatise on the harlots of Athens. Athen. 13.

[AMMŌCHOSTUS, a promontory of Cyprus, whence by corruption comes the modern name Famagosta, or more properly Amgoste: now the principal place in the island.]

AMNĪSUS, a port of Crete, [south-east from Cnossus,] with a small river of the same name, near which Lucina had a temple. The nymphs of the place were called Amnisiades. Callim.

AMOMĒTUS, a Greek historian. Plin. 6, c. 17.

AMOR, the son of Venus, was the god of love. vid. Cupido.

AMORGOS, one of the islands called Cyclades. [Its modern name is Amago. To this island criminals were sometimes banished. Strab. 10.

AMPĒLUS, a promontory of Samos.—[Another of Macedonia, near the mouth of the Axius.—A town of Liguria.]—A favourite of Bacchus, son of a satyr and a nymph, made a constellation after death. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 407.

AMPELŪSIA, a promontory of Africa, in Mauritania, [now Cape Spartel.] Mela, 1, c. 5 and 6.

AMPHIARĀUS, son of Oicleus, or, according to others, of Apollo, by Hypermetra, was at the chase of the Calydonian boar, and accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition. He was famous for his knowledge of futurity, and hence he is called by some son of Apollo. He married Eriphyle, the sister of Adrastus king of Argos, by whom he had two sons, Alcæon and Amphiloehus. When Adrastus, at the request of Polynices, declared war against Thebes, Amphiarus secreted himself, not to accompany his brother-in-law in an expedition in which he knew he was to perish. But Eriphyle, who knew where he had concealed himself, was prevailed upon to betray him by Adrastus, who gave her, as a reward for her perfidy, a famous golden necklace set with diamonds. Amphiarus being thus discovered, went to the war, but previously charged his son Alcæon to put to death his mother Eriphyle. as soon as he was informed that he was killed. The Theban war was fatal to the Argives, and Amphiarus was swallowed up in his chariot by the earth as he fled from Periclymenes. [The earth, it is said, was split asunder by a thunderbolt, and this was ascribed to the kind interposition of Jupiter, who thus saved Amphiarus from the dishonour of being killed by his pursuer.] The news of his death was brought to Alcæon, who immediately executed his father's command, and murdered Eriphyle. Amphiarus received divine honours after death, and had a celebrated temple and oracle at Oropos in Attica. His statue was made of white marble, and near his temple was a fountain, whose waters were ever held sacred. They only who had consulted his oracle, or had been delivered from a disease, were permitted to bathe in it, after which they threw pieces of gold and silver into the stream. Those who consulted the oracle of Amphiarus, first purified themselves, and abstained from food for 24 hours, and three days from wine, after which they sacrificed a ram to the prophet, and spread the skin upon the ground, upon which they slept in expectation of receiving in a dream the answer of the oracle. Plutarch, de orat. defect. mentions, that the oracle of Amphiarus was once consulted in the time of Xerxes, by one of the servants of Mardonius, for his master, who was then with an army in Greece; and that the servant, when asleep saw, in a dream, [a minister of the god approach him, who commanded him to be gone, and upon his refusal threw a large stone at his head, so that he believed himself killed by the blow.] This oracle was verified in the death of Mardonius, who was actually killed by the blow of a stone he received on the head. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 40.—*Philost. in vit. AMPHICTYON, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned at Athens after Cranaus, and first attempted to give the interpretation of dreams, and to draw omens. Some say, that a deluge happened in his age, [which destroyed the greater part of the inhabitants of Greece.] Justin. 2, c. 6.

AMPHICTYONES, [the deputies of the cities and people of Greece, who represented their respective nations in a general assembly.] This august assembly consisted of 12 persons originally, sent [by the Ionians, Dorians, Peræbians, Bœotians, Magnesians, Achæans, Phthians, Melians, Dolopians, Ænians, Delphians, and Phocians.] Other cities in process of time sent also some of their citizens to the council of the Amphictyons, and in the age of Antoninus Pius, they were increased to the number of 30. They generally met twice every year at Delphi, and sometimes sat at Thermopylæ. [This council was principally instituted, to unite together the various Grecian communities in a common bond of amity, and make them mutually vigilant for the tranquillity and happiness of their common country. They were also the protectors of the Delphic oracle, the guardians of its treasures, and adjudged all differences arising between the Delphians and those who came to consult the oracle.] When the Phocians plundered the temple of Delphi, the Amphictyons declared war against them, and this war was supported by all the states of Greece, and lasted 10 years. The Phocians with their allies, the Lacedæmonians, were deprived of the privilege of sitting in the council of the Amphictyons, and the Macedonians were admitted in their place, for their services in support of the war. About 60 years after, when Brennus, with the Gauls, invaded Greece, the Phocians behaved with such courage, that they were reinstated in all their former privileges. Before they proceeded to business, the Amphictyons sacrificed an ox to the god of Delphi, and cut his flesh into small pieces, intimating that union and unanimity prevailed in the several cities which they represented. Their decisions were held sacred and inviolable, and even arms were taken up to enforce them. Paus. in Phocic. & Achæic.—Strab. 8.—Suidas.—Hesych.—Æschin.

AMPHICLĒA, a town of Phocis, where Bacchus had a temple.

AMPHIDRŌMĪA, a festival observed by private families at Athens, the fifth day after the birth of every child. It was customary to run round the fire with the child in their arms: whence the name of the festival.

AMPHIGENĪA, a town [situate in the southern part of Elis, comprehended by the ancients in Messenia.] Stat. 4. Theb. v. 178.

AMPHILŌCHUS, a son of Amphiarus and Eriphyle. After the Trojan war, he left Argos, his native country, [retired to Acarnania, and built here Argos Amphiloehium.] Strab. 7.—Paus. 2, c. 18.—An Athenian philosopher who wrote upon agriculture. Varro. de R. R. 1.

AMPHYLŪTUS, a soothsayer of Acarnania, who, [addressing Pisistratus in a fit of apparently divine inspiration, encouraged him] to seize the sovereign power of Athens. Herodot. 1, c. 62.

AMPHINŌMUS and ANAPIS, two brothers.

who, when Catania and the neighbouring cities were in flames, by an eruption from mount Ætna, saved their parents upon their shoulders. The fire, as it is said, spared them while it consumed others by their side; and Pluto, to reward their uncommon piety, placed them after death in the island of Leuce, and they received divine honours in Sicily. *Val. AMPHION, was a son of Jupiter, by Antiope daughter of Nycteus, who had married Lycus, and had been repudiated by him when he married Dirce. Amphion was born at the same birth as Zethus, on mount Citheron where Antiope had fled to avoid the resentment of Dirce; and the two children were exposed in the woods, but preserved by a shepherd. vid. Antiope. When Amphion grew up, he cultivated poetry, and made an uncommon progress in music. [Mercury was his instructor in this art, and gave him the lyre, by the sound of which he is said to have made the stones move, and to have thus built with them the walls of Thebes. He was the first who raised an altar to this god.] Zethus and Amphion united to avenge the wrongs which their mother had suffered from the cruelties of Dirce. They besieged and took Thebes, put Lycus to death, and tied his wife to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her through precipices till she expired. The fable of Amphion's moving stones and raising the walls of Thebes at the sound of his lyre, has been explained by supposing that he persuaded, by his eloquence, a wild and uncivilized people to unite together and build a town to protect themselves against the attacks of their enemies. Homer. Theb. 1, v. 10.—[According to another and probably more correct account, Amphion having seized the crown of Thebes from Laius the father of Œdipus, called the city Thebes in honour of his aunt by the mother's side. Homer says that in order to strengthen his usurped power, he fortified Thebes with a wall. Homer however says nothing of his skill in music, or of his building the walls by means of his lyre. Pausanias and Pliny make him to have acquired his musical reputation from his alliance with the family of Tantalus, whose daughter Niobe he married, and they both say that he learned music in Lydia, and bringing it thence into Greece was called the inventor of the Lydian mode.]—A famous painter and statuary, son of Ancestor of Gnosus. Plin. 36, c. 10.

AMPHIPÓLES, magistrates appointed at Syracuse, by Timoleon, after the expulsion of Dionysius the younger. The office existed for above 300 years. Diod. 16.

AMPHIPÓLIS, a town on the Strymon, between Macedonia and Thrace. An Athenian colony under Agnon, son of Nicias, drove the ancient inhabitants, called Edonians, from the country, and built a city, which they called Amphipolis, i. e. a town surrounded on all sides, because the Strymon flowed all around it. [D'Anville says, that it signifies a town belonging to two countries, viz. Macedonia and Thrace. It was also called Ennea Hodoi, or the nine ways; because Phyllis, who had been deserted by Demophoon, made nine journies here to watch for his return. It had also other names, such as Myrica, Eion, the town of Mars, &c. It is now called Iambolli.] It was the cause of many wars between the Athenians and Spartans. Thucyd. 4, c. 102, &c.—Herodot. 5, c. 1. 6, l. 7, c. 114.—Diod. 11, 12, &c.—C. Nep. in Cim.

AMPHIPYROS, a surname of Diana, because she carries a torch in both her hands. Sophocles in Trach.

AMPHIS, a Greek comic poet of Athens, son of Amphicrates, contemporary with Plato. Besides his comedies, he wrote other pieces, which are now lost. Suidas.—Diog.

AMPHISBÆNA, a two-headed serpent in the deserts of Libya, whose bite was venomous and deadly. Lucan. 9, v. 719.

AMPHISSA, or ISSA, a daughter of Macareus, beloved by Apollo. She gave her name to [the chief city of the Locri Ozolæ, now Salona, whence also the Sinus Crissæus is now called the gulf of Salona.] Iir. 37, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 703.—Lucan. 3, v. 172.

AMPHISTIDES, a man so naturally destitute of intellects, that he seldom remembered that he ever had a father. He wished to learn arithmetic, but never could comprehend beyond the number 5. Aristot. probl. 4.

AMPHITHEÁTRUM, [an edifice of an elliptical form, used for exhibiting combats of gladiators, wild beasts, and other spectacles. The word is derived from αμφι and θεατρον, from the spectators being so ranged as to see equally well from every side. The first durable amphitheatre of stone, was built by Statilius Taurus, at the desire of Augustus. The largest one was begun by Vespasian and completed by Titus, now called Colisæum, from the Colossus or large statue of Nero which Vespasian transported to the square in front of it. It is said to have contained 37,000 spectators, to have been 5 years in building, and to have cost a sum equal to 10 millions of crowns. 12,000 Jews were employed upon it, who were made slaves at the conquest of Jerusalem. Its magnificent ruins still remain.—There are amphitheatres still standing, in various degrees of perfection, at several other places besides Rome. At Pola in Istria, at Nismes, at Aries, Bourdeaux, and particularly at Verona.—The place where the gladiators fought was called Arena, because it was covered with sand or sawdust to prevent the gladiators from sliding, and to absorb the blood.]

AMPHITRÍTE, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, married Neptune, though she had made a vow of perpetual celibacy. She had by him Triton, one of the sea deities. She had a statue at Corinth in the temple of Neptune. She is often taken for the sea itself

AMPIA LABIENA LEX was enacted by T. Ampius and A. Labienus, tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 663. It gave Pompey the Great the privilege of appearing in triumphal robes and with a golden crown at the Circensian games, and with the prætexta and a golden crown [in the theatre, which mark of distinction he used only once. Vell. Paterc. 2, c. 40.]

AMSANCTUS, a lake in the country of the Hirpini, at the east of Capua, whose waters are so sulphureous that they infect and destroy whatever animals come near the place. It was through this place that Virgil made the fury Alecto descend into hell, after her visit to the upper regions. [It is now called Mufiti.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 565.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 86.

AMŪLIUS, king of Alba, was son of Procas, and youngest brother to Numitor. The crown belonged to Numitor by right of birth; but Amulius dispossessed him of it, and even put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated his daughter Rhea Sylvia to the service of Vesta, to prevent her ever becoming a mother. Yet, in spite of all these precautions, Rhea became pregnant by the god Mars, and brought forth twins, Romulus and Remus. Amulius, who was informed of this, ordered the mother to be buried alive for violating the laws of Vesta, which enjoined perpetual chastity, and the two children to be thrown into the river. They were providentially saved by some shepherds, or, as others say, by a she-wolf; and when they had attained the years of manhood, they put to death the usurper Amulius, and restored the crown to their grandfather. *Ovid. [AMPSĀGAS, a river of Africa, forming the boundary between Mauretania Cæsariensis and Numidia, and falling into the sea, to the east of Igūgilis or Jigel. On a branch of it stood Cirta the capital of Numidia. The modern name is Wad-il-Kibir, i. e. the Great River.]

AMŪCI PORTUS, [a harbour on the Thracian Bosphorus, north of Nicopolis and south of the temple of Jupiter Urius. Here Amycus, an ancient king of the Bebryces was slain in combat with Pollux. His tomb was covered, according to some, with a laurel, and hence they maintain that the harbour was also called Daphnes Portus. Arrian, however, speaks of a harbour of the insane Daphne, near this, which no doubt has given rise to the mistake.]

AMŪCLĀ, a daughter of Niobe, who, with her sister Melibœa, was spared by Diana, when her mother boasted herself greater than Diana. Paus. 2, c. 22. Homer says that all the daughters perished. Il. 24. vid. Niobe.—The nurse of Alcibiades.

AMŪCLĒ, [a town of Italy, said to have been peopled from Amyclæ in Laconia. Its situation has not been clearly ascertained, though it is supposed to have been between Terracina and Caieta.] The inhabitants were strict followers of the precepts of Pythagoras, and therefore abstained from flesh. [They were compelled to abandon their dwellings, from the number of serpents which infested them, which they thought impious to destroy, though in their own defence.] Plin. 8, c. 29. Once a false report prevailed in Amyclæ, that the enemies were coming to storm it; upon which the inhabitants made a law, [which prohibited any person from reporting the approach of an enemy,] and when the enemy really arrived, no one mentioned it or took up arms in his own defence, and the town was easily taken. From this circumstance the epithet of laciæ has been given to Amyclæ. [According to others it was so called from the prevalence of the Pythagorean system there, which recommended silence.] Virg. Æn. 10, v. 564.—Sil. 8, v. 329.—[A city of Laconia, south-west of Sparta, and near it,] built by Amyclas. Castor and Pollux were born there. The country was famous for dogs. AMŪCLAS, son of Lacedæmon and Sparta, built the city of Amyclæ. His sister Eurydice married Acrisius king of Argos, by whom she had Danæe. Paus. 3, c. 1. l. 7, c. 18.—The master of a ship in which Cæsar embarked in disguise. When Amyclas wished to put back to avoid a violent storm, Cæsar unveiling his head, discovered himself, and bidding the pilot pursue his voyage, exclaimed Cæsarem vehis, Cæsarisque fortunam. Lucan. 5, v. 520.

AMŪCUS, son of Neptune, by Melia, or Bithynis according to others, was king of the Bebryces. He was famous for his skill in the management of the cestus, and he challenged all strangers to a trial of strength. When the Argonauts in their expedition, stopped on his coasts, he treated them with great kindness, and Pollux accepted his challenge, and killed him when he attempted to overcome him by fraud. Apollon. 2. Argon.—Theocrit. Id. 22.—Apollon. 1, c. 9.

AMŪDON, a city of Pæonia in Macedonia. [upon the Axius,] which sent auxiliaries to Priam during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.

AMYMONE, daughter of Danaus and Europa, married Enceladus, son of Ægyptus, whom she murdered the first night of her nuptials. She wounded a satyr with an arrow which she had aimed at a stag. The satyr pursued her, and even attempted to offer her violence, but Neptune delivered her. It was said, that she was the only one of the 50 sisters who was not condemned to fill a leaky tub with water in hell, because she had been continually employed, by order of her father, in supplying the city of Argos with water in a great drought. Neptune saw her in this employment, and was enamoured of her. He carried her away, and in the place where she stood, he raised a fountain, by striking a rock. The fountain has been called Amymone. She had Nauplius by Neptune. Propert. 2, el. 26, v. 46.—Apollod. 2.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 37.—*Ovid. AMYNTAS 1st, was king of Macedonia after his father Alcetas. His son Alexander murdered the ambassadors of Megabyzus, for their wanton and insolent behaviour to the ladies of his father's court. Bubares, a Persian general, was sent with an army to revenge the death of the ambassadors; but instead of making war, he married the king's daughter, and defended his possessions. Justin. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 5, 7 and 8.—The second of that name was son of Menelaus, and king of Macedonia, after his murder of Pausanias. He was expelled by the Illyrians and restored by the Thessalians. He made war against the Illyrians and Olynthians, [with the assistance of the Lacedæmonians;] and lived to a great age. His wife Eurydice conspired against his life; but her snares were seasonably discovered by one of his daughters by a former wife. He had Alexander, Perdicas, and Philip, Alexander the Great's father by his first wife; and by the other he had Archelaus Aridæus, and Menelaus. He reigned 24 years; and soon after his death, his son Philip murdered all his brothers, and ascended the throne. Justin. 7, c. 4 and 6.—Diod. 14, &c. C. Nep. & Plut. in Pelopid.—There is another king of Macedonia of the same name, but of his life few particulars are recorded in history.—A man who succeeded Dejotarus, in the kingdom of Gallogræcia. After his death it became a Roman province under Augustus. Strab. 12.—One of Alexander's officers.—Another officer who deserted to Darius, and was killed as he attempted to seize Egypt. Curt. 3, c. 9.—A son of Antiochus, who withdrew himself from Macedonia because he hated Alexander.—An officer in Alexander's cavalry. He had two brothers, called Simias and Polemon. He was accused of conspiracy against the king, on account of his great intimacy with Philotas, and acquitted. Curt. 4, c. 15, l. 6, c. 9, l. 8, c. 12.—A Greek writer who composed several works quoted by Athenæus 10 and 12.

AMYNTIANUS, an historian in the age of Antoninus, who wrote a treatise in commendation of Philip, Olympias, and Alexander.

AMYRICUS CAMPUS, a plain of Thessaly. Polyb. 3.

AMYTHAÏON, a son of Cretheus king of Iolchos, by Tyro. He married Idomene, by whom he had Bias and Melampus. After his father's death, he established himself in Elis, with his brother Neleus, and re-established or regulated the Olympic games.—Melampus is called Amythaonius, from his father Amythaon. *Virg. ANACES or ANACTES, a name given to Castor and Pollux among the Athenians. Their festivals were called Anaceia. Plut. in Thes. Cic. N. D. 3, c. 21.

ANACHARSIS, [a Scythian philosopher, was the son of a Scythian chief by a native of Greece, and flourished about 600 years B. C. He was entrusted with an embassy to Athens, in the first year of the 47th Olympiad, 592 B. C. He soon became intimate with Solon and the principal citizens at Athens, and was the first stranger upon whom the Athenians conferred the right of citizenship. After the death of Solon he left Athens, and travelled into other countries. On his return to Scythia, he was slain with an arrow levelled at him by the king's own hand, while performing sacred rites to Cybele, in fulfilment of a vow. It was his intention to have introduced among his countrymen the civilization and worship of Greece, but his death unhappily frustrated this design. He was distinguished for his wisdom, his temperance, his ingenious sayings, and for the manly energy of his language. Two epistles bearing his name have come down to us, but they are generally considered as spurious. He is said to have added the second fluke to the anchor, and to have invented the potter's wheel.] The name of Anacharsis is become very familiar to modern ears, by that elegant, valuable, and truly classical work of Bartholemi, called the travels of Anacharsis. Herodot. 4, c. 6, 47 and 48.—Plut. in Conviv.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 32.—Strab. 7.

ANACIUM, a mountain in Attica, with a temple sacred to the Anaces. Polygen. 1, c. 21.

ANACREON, a famous lyric poet of Teos, in Ionia, highly favoured by Polycrates, and Hipparchus son of Pisistratus. He was of a lascivious and intemperate disposition, much given to drinking. His odes are still extant, and the uncommon sweetness and elegance of his poetry have been the admiration of every age and country. He lived to his 35th year, and after every excess of pleasure and debauchery, choked himself with a grape stone and expired. Plato says that he was descended from an illustrious family, and that Codrus, the last king of Athens, was one of his progenitors. His statue was placed in the citadel of Athens, representing him as an old drunken man, singing, with every mark of dissipation and intemperance. Anacreon flourished 532 B. C. Very few of the compositions which usually go under his name are to be ascribed to Anacreon. The fragments collected by Ursinus, with a few others, seem to be his most genuine productions. The best editions of Anacreon are, that of Maittaire. 4to. London 1725, of which only one hundred copies were printed, and the very correct one of Barnes, 12mo. Cantab. 1721, to which may be added that of Brunck, 12mo. Argentor., 1786, [and that of Fischer, Lips. 1790. 8vo. This last deserves in fact to be ranked before all the others.] Paus. 1, c. 2, 25 — Strab. 14 — Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 4. — Horat. epod. 14, v. 20. — Plin. 7, c. 7 — Herodot. 3, c. 121.

ANACTORIA and ANACTORIUM, a town of Epirus, [north of Leucadia, at the entrance of the Sinus Ambracius. It is now called Vonizza.] It was founded by a Corinthian colony, and was the cause of many quarrels between the Corycreans and Corinthians. — Augustus carried the inhabitants to the city of Nicopolis, after the battle of Actium. Strab. 10. — Thucyd. 1, c. 55. — Plin. 4, c. 1. l. 5, c. 29. — An ancient name of Miletus.

ANADYOMENE, a valuable painting of Venus, represented as rising from the sea, by Apelles. Augustus bought it, and placed it in the temple of J. Cæsar. The lower part of it was a little defaced and there were found no painters in Rome able to repair it. Plin. 35, c. 10.

ANAGNIA, now Anagni, the capital of the Hernici in Latium. [It is 36 miles east of Rome.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 634. — Strab. 5. — Ital. 3, v. 392.

ANAGOÏA, a festival celebrated by the people of Eryx in Sicily, in honour of Venus. Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 15. H. A. 4, c. 2.

ANAITIS, a goddess of Armenia. The virgins who were consecrated to her service, esteemed themselves more dignified by public prostitution. The festivals of the deity were called Sacrum Festa: and when they were celebrated, both sexes assisted at the ceremony, and inebriated themselves to such a degree that the whole was concluded by a scene of the greatest lasciviousness and intemperance. They were first instituted by Cyrus, when he marched against the Sacæ, and covered tables with the most exquisite dainties, that he might detain the enemy by the novelty and sweetness of food to which they were unaccustomed, and thus easily destroy them. [The Romans under Antony plundered the temple of this goddess in Acilisene, a district of Armenia Major, in the angle between the northern and southern branches of the Euphrates, on which occasion her statue of massy gold was carried off and broken to pieces.] Strab. 11. — Diana was also worshipped under this name by the Lydians. Plin. 33, c. 4.

ΑΝΑΨΙΕ, [one of the Sporades, north-east of Thera. It was said to have been made to rise by thunder from the bottom of the sea, in order to receive the Argonauts during a storm, on their return from Colchis. The meaning of the fable evidently is, that the island was of volcanic origin. A temple was erected here to Apollo Ægletes or dazzling, in commemoration of the event. — The island is now called Nanphio.]

ANAPHLYSTUS, a small village of Attica near the sea, called after an ancient hero of the same name, who was son of Træzen. [Now Elinos.]

ANAPUS, a river of Epirus. Thucyd. 2, c. 32. — Of Sicily, near Syracuse, Id. 6, c. 96.

ANAS, a river of Spain, [now, the Guadiana, from the Arabic, Wadi-Ana, i. e. the river Ana.]

ANAVRUS, a river of Thessaly, near the foot of mount Pelion, where Jason lost one of his sandals. Callim. in Dian. — A river of Troas near Ida. Colath.

ANAX, a son of Cælus and Terra, father to Asterius, from whom Miletus has been called Anactoria. Paus. 1, c. 36, l. 7, c. 2.

ANAXAGÓRAS, succeeded his father Megapenthes on the throne of Argos. — A Clazomenian philosopher, son of Hegesibulus, disciple to Anaximenes, and preceptor to [Euripides and Pericles, to whom some add Socrates and Themistocles, but the latter was born several years before the philosopher.] He disregarded wealth and honours, to indulge his fondness for meditation and philosophy. He applied himself to astronomy, was acquainted with eclipses, and predicted that one day a stone would fall from the sun, which it is said really fell into the river Ægos. Anaxagoras travelled into Egypt for improvement, and used to say that he preferred a grain of wisdom to heaps of gold. Pericles was in the number of his pupils, and often consulted him in matters of state; and once dissuaded him for starving himself to death. [Several doctrines are ascribed to Anaxagoras which might seem to indicate no inconsiderable knowledge of nature: such as, that the wind is produced by the rarefaction of the air; that the rainbow is the effect of the reflection of the solar rays from a thick cloud, placed opposite to it like a mirror; that the moon is an opaque body, enlightened by the sun, and inhabited, &c. With these, however, strange and absurd notions are found intermingled, for which evidently we are indebted, not to the philosopher, but to the writers who profess to state his opinions. There must have been either gross misconception or wilful misrepresentation on their part. They make him maintain that the sun was a flat circular mass of hot iron, somewhat larger than the Peloponnesus;

and that the stars were formed from stones whirled from the earth by violent circumvolution of its surrounding ether.] He was accused of impiety, and condemned to die; but he ridiculed the sentence, and said it had long been pronounced upon him by nature. Being asked whether his body should be carried into his own country, he answered, no, as the road that led to the other side of the grave was as long from one place as the other. His scholar Pericles pleaded eloquently and successfully for him, and the sentence of death was exchanged for banishment. In prison, the philosopher is said to have attempted to square the circle, or determine exactly the proportion of its diameter to the circumference. When the people of Lampsacus asked him before his death, whether he wished any thing to be done in commemoration of him: Yes, says he, let the boys be allowed to play on the anniversary of my death. This was carefully observed, and that time dedicated to relaxation, was called Anaxagoreia. He died at Lampsacus in his seventy-second year, 428 B. C. His writings were not much esteemed by his pupil Socrates. *Diog. in Vita.—Plut. in Nicias & Pericli.—Cic. Acad. Q. 4, c. 23.—Tusc. 1, c. 43. [Enfield's Hist. Phil. ANAXANDER, of the family of the Heraclidæ, was son of Eurycrates, and king of Sparta. The second Messenian war began in his reign, in which Aristomenes so egregiously signalized himself.—Plut. in Apoph.—Paus. 3, c. 3, l. 4, c. 15 and 16.

ANAXANDRIDES, son of Leon, and father to Cleomenes 1st, and Leonidas, was king of Sparta. By the order of the Ephori, he divorced his wife, of whom he was extremely fond, on account of her barrenness; and he was the first Lacedæmonian who had two wives. *Herodot. 1, 5 and 7.—Plut. in Apoph. 1.—Paus. 3, c. 3, &c.—A son of Theopompus. Herodot. 3, c. 131.—A comic poet of Rhodes in the age of Philip and Alexander. He was the first poet who introduced love-adventures upon the stage. He was of such a passionate disposition that he tore to pieces all his compositions which met with no success. He composed 65 plays, of which ten obtained the prize. Some fragments of his poetry remain in Athenæus. He was starved to death by order of the Athenians, for satirizing their government. *Aristot. 3, Rhet.

ANAXARCHUS, a philosopher of Abdera, one of the followers of Democritus, and the friend of Alexander. When the monarch had been wounded in a battle, the philosopher pointed to the place, adding, that is human blood, and not the blood of a god. The freedom of Anaxarchus offended Nicocreon, tyrant of Cyprus, at Alexander's table, and the tyrant, in revenge, seized the philosopher after the death of Alexander, and pounded him in a stone mortar with iron hammers. He bore this with much resignation, and exclaimed, "Pound the body of Anaxarchus, for thou dost not pound his soul." Upon this, Nicocreon threatened to cut out his tongue, and Anaxarchus bit it off with his teeth, and spit it out into the tyrant's face. Ovid. in Ib. v. 571.—Plut. in Symp. 7.—Diog. in Vita.—Cic. in Tusc. 2, c. 22.

ANAXARÈTE, a girl of Salamis, who so arrogantly despised the addresses of Iphis, a youth of ignoble birth that the lover hung himself at her door. She saw this sad spectacle without emotion or pity, and was changed into a stone. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 748.

ANAXENOR, a musician, whom M. Antony greatly honoured, and presented with the tribute of four cities. Strab. 14.

ANAXIBIA, a sister of Agamemnon, mother of seven sons and two daughters by Nestor. *Paus. 2, c. 29.—A daughter of Bias, brother to the physician Melampus. She married Pelias, king of Iolchos, by whom she had Acastus, and four daughters, Pisidice, Pelopea, Hippothoe, and Alceste. *Apollod. 1, c. 9.

ANAXIDÄMUS, succeeded his father Zeuxidamus on the throne of Sparta. Paus. 3, c. 7, l. 4, c. 15.

ANAXILAS, and ANAXILÄUS, a Messenian, tyrant of Rhegium. He took Zancle, and was so mild and popular during his reign, that when he died, 476 B. C. he left his infant sons to the care of one of his servants, and the citizens chose rather to obey a slave than revolt from their benevolent sovereign's children. Justin. 3, c. 2.—Paus. 4, c. 23, l. 5, c. 26.—Thucyd. 6, c. 5.—Herodot. 6, c. 23, l. 7, c. 167.—Hal.—A comic writer, about the 100 olympiad.

ANAXILIDES, wrote some treatises concerning philosophers, and mentioned that Plato's mother became pregnant by a phantom of the god Apollo, from which circumstance her son was called the prince of wisdom. Diog. in Plut.

ANAXIMANDER, a Milesian philosopher, the companion and disciple of Thales. [Mathematics and astronomy were greatly indebted to him. He framed a connected series of geometrical truths, and wrote a summary of his doctrine. He was the first who undertook to delineate the surface of the earth, and mark the divisions of land and water upon an artificial globe. The invention of the sun-dial is also ascribed to him. This, however, is probably incorrect. He believed that the stars are globular collections of air and fire, borne about in their respective spheres, and animated by portions of the Divinity; that the earth is a globe in the midst of the universe and stationary; that the sun is 28 times larger than the earth. He died at the age of 64, B. C. 547.] *Cic. Acad. Quæst. 4, c. 37.—Diog. in Vit.—Plin. 2, c. 79. [Enfield's Hist. Phil. Vol. 1, p. 155.] He had a son who bore his name. *Strab. 1.

ANAXIMENES, a philosopher, son of Ergasistratus, and disciple of Anaximander, whom he succeeded in his school. He said that the air was the cause of every created being, and a self-existent divinity, [that all minds are air; that fire, water and earth proceed from it by rarefaction or condensation; that the sun and moon are fiery bodies, whose form is that of a circular plate.] He considered the earth as a plain, and the heavens as a solid concave sphere, on which the stars were fixed like nails, an opinion prevalent at that time, and from which originated the proverb, τι οὐρανὸς ἐμπροστί; what if the heavens should fall? to which Horace has alluded, 3 Od. 3, v. 7. He died 504 years B. C. Cic. Acad. Quæst. 4, c. 37, de Nat. D. 1, c. 10. Plut. Ph. [Enfield Hist. Phil. Vol. 1, p. 156.] Plin. 2, c. 76.—A native of Lampsacus, son of Aristocles. He was pupil to Diogenes the Cynic, and Zoilus, who railed against Homer, and preceptor to Alexander the Great, in rhetoric, of whose life, and that of Philip, he wrote his history. When Alexander, in a fit of anger, threatened to put to death all the inhabitants of Lampsacus, because they had maintained a long siege against him, Anaximenes was sent by his countrymen to appease the king, who, as soon as he saw him, swore he would not grant the favour he was going to ask. Upon this, Anaximenes begged the king to destroy the city and enslave the inhabitants, and by his artful request the city of Lampsacus was saved from destruction. Besides the life of Philip and his son, he wrote an history of Greece in 12 books, all now lost. His nephew bore the same name, and wrote an account of ancient paintings. Paus. 6, c. 18.—Val. Max. 7, c. 3.—Diog. in Vit.

ANAXIPÓLIS, a comic poet of Thasos. Plin. 14, c. 14.

ANAXIPPUS, a comic writer, in the age of Demetrius. He used to say, that philosophers were wise only in their speeches, but fools in their actions. Athen.

ANAXIS, a Bœotian historian, who wrote an history down to the age of Philip son of Amyntas. Diod. 15.

[ANAZARBUS, a city of Cilicia Campestris, situate on the river Pyramus, at some distance from the sea. The adjacent territory was famed for its fertility. By a decree of the Roman senate it was allowed to assume the name of Cæsarea in acknowledgment of the privileges conferred upon it by Augustus. It was afterwards called successively Justinopolis and Justinianopolis, in honour of the emperors Justin and Justinian. It was the birth-place of Dioscorides and Oppian. The Turks call it Ain-Zerbeh.]

ANCÆUS, the son of Lycurgus and Antioe, was in the expedition of the Argonauts. He was at the chase of the Calydonian boar, in which he perished. Hygin. fab. 173, and 243.—Ovid. Met. 8.—The son of Neptune and Astypalæa. He went with the Argonauts, and succeeded Tiphys as pilot of the ship Argo. He reigned in Ionia, where he married Samia, daughter of the Mæander, by whom he had four sons, Perilas, Enodus, Samus, Alithersus, and one daughter called Parthenope. (Orpheus Argon.)—He was once told by one of his servants, whom he pressed with hard labour in his vineyard, that he never would taste of the produce of his vines. He had already the cup in his hand, and called the prophet to convince him of his falsehood; when the servant, yet firm in his prediction, uttered this well known proverb, Πολλὰ μετὰ ζυπέλιου καὶ χυλίου ἀκροῦ.

Multa cadunt inter calicem supremaque labra.

And that very moment Ancæus was told that a wild boar had entered his vineyard; upon which, he threw down the cup and ran to drive away the wild beast. He was killed in the attempt.

ANCALĪTES, a people of Britain, [near the Atrebatii, and probably a clan of that nation. Baxter supposes them to have been the herdsmen and shepherds of the Atrebatii, and to have possessed those parts of Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire most proper for pasturage.] Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 21.

ANCHEMŌLUS, a son of Rhœtus, king of the Varrubii in Italy, ravished his mother-in-law Casperia, for which he was expelled by his father. He fled to Turnus, and was killed by Pallas, son of Evander, in the wars of Æneas against the Latins. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 389.

ANCHISĪTES, a wind which blows from Anchisa, a harbour of Epirus. Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 1. Dionys. Hal.

ANCHESMUS, a mountain of Attica, where Jupiter Anchesmus had a statue. Now Agios Georgios or Mount St. George.]

ANCHIĀLE, a city on the sea-coast of Cilicia. Sardanapālus, the last king of Assyria, built it. [The founder was buried here, and had a statue upon his tomb, of a man in the act of clapping his hands, with an Assyrian inscription to this effect, "Sardanapalus, the son of Anacyndaraxes, built Anchiāle and Tarsus in one day; but do thou, O stranger, eat, drink and sport, since the rest of human things are not worth this," i. e. a clap of the hands. Arrian. 2, c. 5.]

ANCHIĀLUS, a god of the Jews as some suppose, in Martial's epigrams, 11 ep. 95. [The term, according to Scaliger, is incorrectly written by Martial, and is compounded of Chai and Alah, i. e. per Deum viventem.—This was also the name of a city in Thrace, on the Euxine, south-west of Hæmi-extrema.—Another in Epirus.]

ANCHIMOLUS, a Spartan general sent against the Pisistratidæ, and killed in the expedition. Herodot. 5, c. 63.

[ANCHISÆ FORTUS, a name given to the port of Onchesmus in Epirus, by the Romans.]

ANCHISES, a son of Capys by Themis, daughter of Ilus. He was of such a beautiful complexion, that Venus came down from heaven to mount Ida, in the form of a nymph, to enjoy his company. The goddess became pregnant, and forbade Anchises ever to mention the favours he had received, on pain of being struck with thunder. The child which Venus brought forth, was called Æneas; he was educated as soon as born by the nymphs of Ida, and when of a proper age, was intrusted to the care of Chiron the centaur. When Troy was taken, Anchises was become so infirm that Æneas, whom the Greeks permitted to take away whatever he esteemed most, carried him through the flames upon his shoulders, and thus saved his life. He accompanied his son in his voyage towards Italy, and died in Sicily in the 80th year of his age. He was buried on mount Eryx, by Æneas and Acestes king of the country, and the anniversary of his death was afterwards celebrated by his son and the Trojans, on his tomb. Some authors have maintained that Anchises had forgot the injunctions of Venus, and boasted at a feast, that he enjoyed her favours on mount Ida, upon which he was killed with thunder. Others say, that the wounds he received from the thunder were not mortal, and that they only weakened and disfigured his body. Virgil, in the 6th book of the Æneid, introduces him in the Elysian fields, relating to his son the fates that were to attend him, and the fortune of his descendants, the Romans. vid. Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, 2. &c.—Hygin. fab. 94, 254, 260, 270.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 1010.—Apollod. 3.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 34.—Homer. Il. 20. & Hymn. in Vener.—Xenop. Cynege. c. 1.—Dionys. Hal. 1, de Antiq. Rom.—Pausanias. 3, c. 12, says, that Anchises was buried at the foot of a mountain in Arcadia, which, from him, has been called Anchisia.

ANCHISIA, a mountain of Arcadia, at the bottom of which was a monument of Anchises. Paus. 3, c. 12 and 13.

ANCHŌA, a town near the mouth of the Cephissus, [in Bœotia,] where there is a lake of the same name. Strab.

ANCHŌRA, [vid. Nicæa.]

ANCHŪRUS, a son of Midas, king of Phrygia, who sacrificed himself for the good of his country, when the earth had opened and swallowed up many buildings. The oracle had been consulted, and gave for answer, that the gulf would never close, if Midas did not throw into it whatever he had most precious. Though the king had parted with many things of immense value, yet the gulf continued open, till Anchurus, thinking himself the most precious of his father's possessions, took a tender leave of his wife and family, and leaped into the earth, which closed immediately over his head. Midas erected there an altar of stones to Jupiter, and that altar was the first object which he turned into gold, when he had received his fatal gift from the gods. This unpolished lump of gold existed still in the age of Plutarch. Plut. in Parall.

ANCILE and ANCYLE, a sacred shield, which, according to the Roman authors, fell from heaven in the reign of Numa, when the Roman people laboured under a pestilence. Upon the preservation of this shield depended the fate of the Roman empire, and therefore Numa ordered 11 of the same size and form to be made, that if ever any attempt was made to carry them away, the plunderer might find it difficult to distinguish the true one. They were made with such exactness, that the king promised Veterius Mamurius, the artist, whatever reward he desired. vid. Mamurius. They were kept in the temple of Vesta, and an order of priests were chosen to watch over their safety. These priests were called Salii, and were twelve in number; they carried every year, on the first of March, the shields in a solemn procession round the walls of Rome, dancing and singing praises to the god Mars. This sacred festival continued three days after, during which every important business was stopped. It was deemed unfortunate to be married on those days, or to undertake any expedition, and Tacitus, in 1 Hist. c. 90, has attributed the unsuccessful campaign of the emperor Otho against Vitellius, to his leaving Rome during the celebration of the Anciliorum festum. These two verses of Ovid explain the origin of the word Ancile, which is applied to these shields;

Idque ancile vocal, quod ab omni parte recisum est,

Quaque notes oculis, angulus omnis abest:

ANCON and ANCŌNA, a town of Picenum, built by the Sicilians, with a harbour in the form of a crescent or elbow, (αγκων) on the shores of the Adriatic. [It was famous for its purple dye, which yielded only to that of Phœnicia. The harbour was greatly improved by the emperor Trajan, in commemoration of which service an arch was erected to him on the mole, which still remains. Ancona is at the present day a flourishing trading town, and retains its ancient name.] Near this place is the famous chapel of Loretto, supposed by monkish historians to have been brought through the air by angels, August 10, A. D. 1291, from Judæa, where it was a cottage, inhabited by the virgin Mary. The reputed sanctity of the place has often brought 100,000 pilgrims in one day to Loretto. Plin. 3, c. 13.—Lucan. 2, v. 402.—Ital. 8, v. 437.

ANCUS MARTIUS, the 4th king of Rome, was grandson to Numa, by his daughter. [His name Ancus was derived from the Greek αγκων, because he had a crooked arm which he could not stretch out to its full length.] He waged a successful war against the Latins, Veientes, Fidenates, Volsci, and Sabines, joined mount Janiculum to the city by a bridge, and enclosed the Aventine mount within the walls of the city. He extended the confines of the Roman territories to the sea, where he built the town of Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber. He inherited the valour of Romulus with the moderation of Numa. He died B. C. 661, after a reign of 24 years, and was succeeded by Tarquin the elder. Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 32, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 815.

[ANCYRA, a city of Galatia, west of the

Italy. According to Pausanias, it was founded by Midas, and the name was derived from an anchor which was found here and preserved in the temple of Jupiter. This city was greatly enlarged by Augustus, and under Nero, was styled the metropolis of Galatia. It is now called by the Turks Angoura, and by the Europeans, Angora, and is the place whence the celebrated shawls and hosiery made of goats-hair were originally brought. Near this place Bajazet was conquered and made prisoner by Timur, or, as the name is commonly, though incorrectly written, Tamerlane.]

ANDABATÆ, certain gladiators who fought blindfolded, whence the proverb, Andabatarum more to denote rash and inconsiderate measures. [The name comes from the Greek αναβάται, because they fought in chariots or on horseback.] Cic. 7, ad Famil. ep. 10.

ANDANIA, a city of Arcadia, where Aristomenes was educated. Paus. 4, c. 1, &c. It received its name from a gulf of the same name. Id. 4, c. 3.

ANDECAVI [or ANDES, a people of Gaul, east of the Namnetes and north of the Liger, or Loire. Their capital was Juliomagus, now Angers. Cæs. B. G. 2, 35.]

ANDES, a village of Italy, near Mantua, where Virgil was born; hence he is called Andinus. Ital. 3, v. 594. [But Ruperti reads, Aonio.]

ANDOCIDES, an Athenian orator, son of Leogoras. He lived in the age of Socrates the philosopher, and was intimate with the most illustrious men of his age. He was often banished, but his dexterity always restored him to favour. Plut. has written his life in 10 orat. Four of his orations are extant. [vid. Antiphon.]

ANDOMÁTIS, a river of India, falling into the Ganges. Arrian. [According to D'Anville, the modern Sonn-sou. vid. Sonus.]

[ANDRAMITTIIUM, vid. Adramyttium.]

ANDREAS, a statuary of Argos. Paus. 6, c. 16.—A man of Panormus, who wrote an account of all the remarkable events that had happened in Sicily. Athen.—A son of the Peneus. Part of Bœotia, especially where Orchomenos was built, was called Andreis after him. Paus. 9, c. 34, &c.

ANDRICLUS, [a mountain of Cilicia Trachœa, north of the promontory Anemurium.] Strab. 14.

ANDRÏUS, a river of Troas falling into the Scamander. Plin. 5, c. 27.

ANDRISCUS, a man who wrote an history of Naxos. Athen. 1.—A worthless person called Pseudophilippus, on account of the likeness of his features to king Philip. He incited the Macedonians to revolt against Rome, and was conquered and led in triumph by Metellus, 152 B. C. Flor. 2, c. 14.

ANDROBIUS, a famous painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ANDROCLËA, a daughter of Antipœnus of Thebes. She, with her sister Alcida, sacrificed herself in the service of her country, when the oracle had promised the victory to her countrymen, who were engaged in a war against Orchomenos, if any one of noble birth devoted himself for the glory of his nation. Antipœnus refused to do it, and his daughters cheerfully accepted it, and received great honour after death. *Hercules, who fought on the side of Thebes, dedicated to them the image of a lion in the temple of Diana. Paus. 9, c. 17.

ANDROCLÏDES, a noble Theban, who defended the democratical against the encroachments of the oligarchical power. He was killed by one of his enemies.—A sophist in the age of Aurelian, who gave an account of philosophers.

ANDRŒCLUS, a son of Codrus, who reigned in Ionia, and took Ephesus and Samos. Paus. 7, c. 2.

ANDRODÁMUS. vid. Andromadas.

ANDRŒDUS, a slave known and protected in the Roman circus, by a lion whose foot he had cured. Gell. 5, c. 15.

ANDRŒGEUS, son of Minos and Pasiphæ, was famous for his skill in wrestling. He overcame every antagonist at Athens, and became such a favourite of the people, that Ægeus king of the country grew jealous of his popularity, and caused him to be assassinated as he was going to Thebes. Some say that he was killed by the wild bull of Marathon. Minos declared war against Athens to revenge the death of his son, and peace was at last re-established on condition that Ægeus sent yearly seven boys and seven girls from Athens to Crete to be devoured by the minotaur. vid. Minotaurus. The Athenians established festivals by order of Minos, in honour of his son, and called them Androgeia. Hygin. fab. 41, Diod. 4.—Vir. Æn. 6, v. 20.—Paus. 1, c. 1 and 27.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 1 and 15.—Plut. in Thes.

ANDROGÏNÆ, a fabulous nation of Africa, beyond the Nasamones. Every one of them bore the characteristics of the male and female sex; and one of their breasts was that of a man, and the other that of a woman. Lucr. 5, v. 837.—Plin. 7, c. 2.

ANDROMÁCHE, a daughter of Eetion, king of Thebes in Cilicia, married Hector son of Priam king of Troy, by whom she had Astyanax. She was so fond of her husband, that she even fed his horses with her own hand. During the Trojan war she remained at home employed in her domestic concerns. Her parting with Hector who was going to a battle, in which he perished, has always been deemed the best, most tender and pathetic of all the passages in Homer's Iliad. She received the news of her husband's death with extreme sorrow; and after the taking of Troy, she had the misfortune to see her only son Astyanax, after she had saved him from the flames, thrown headlong from the walls of the city, by the hands of the man whose father had killed her husband.—(Senec. in Trœad.) Andromache, in the division of the prisoners by the Greeks, fell to the share of Pyrrhus, who treated her as his wife, and carried her to Epirus. He had by her three sons, Molossus, Pielus and Pergamus, and afterwards repudiated her. After this divorce she married Helenus son of Priam, who, as herself, was a captive of Pyrrhus. She reigned with him over part of the country, and became mother by him of Cestrinus. Some say that Astyanax was killed by Ulysses, and Euripides says that Menelaus put him to death. *Hom. ANDROMÁCHUS, an opulent person of Sicily, father to the historian Timæus, [and founder of Tauromenium.] Diod. 16. He assisted Timoleon in recovering the liberty of the Syracusans.—A general of Alexander, to whom Parmenio gave the government of Syria. He was burnt alive by the Samaritans. Curt. 4, c. 5 and 8.—[A brother-in-law of Seleucus Callinicus.—A traitor who discovered to the Parthians all the measures of Crassus, and, on being chosen guide, led the Roman army into a situation whence there was no mode of escape.]—A poet of Byzantium.—A physician of Crete in the age of Nero, [he was physician to the emperor, and inventor of the famous medicine, called after him, Theriaca Andromachi.]—A sophist of Naples, in the age of Dioclesian.

ANDROMÁDAS, or ANDRODAMUS, a native of Rhegium, who made laws for the [people of Chalcis in Macedonia.] Aristot.

ANDROMÉDA, a daughter of Cepheus, king of Æthiopia, by Cassiope. She was promised in marriage to Phineus, her uncle, when Neptune drowned the kingdom, and sent a sea monster to ravage the country, because Cassiope had boasted herself fairer than Juno and the Nereides. The oracle of Jupiter Ammon was consulted, and nothing could stop the resentment of Neptune, if Andromeda was not exposed to the sea monster. She was accordingly tied naked on a rock, and at the moment that the monster was going to devour her, Perseus, who returned through the air from the conquest of the Gorgons, saw her, and was captivated with her beauty. He promised to deliver her and destroy the monster, if he received her in marriage as a reward for his trouble. Cepheus consented, and Perseus changed the sea monster into a rock, by showing him Medusa's head, and untied Andromeda and married her. He had by her many children, among whom were Sthenelus, Ancæus, and Electryon. The marriage of Andromeda with Perseus was opposed by Phineus, who after a bloody battle was changed into a stone by Perseus. Some say that Minerva made Andromeda a constellation in heaven after her death. vid. Medusa, Perseus.—Hygin. fab. 64.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 43.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Manil. 5, v. 533.—Propert. 3, el. 21.—According to Pliny, l. 5, c. 31, it was at Joppa in Judæa that Andromeda was tied to a rock. He mentions that the skeleton of the huge sea monster, to which she had been exposed, was brought to Rome by Scaurus and carefully preserved. The fable of Andromeda and the sea monster has been explained, by supposing that she was courted by the captain of a ship, who attempted to carry her away, but was prevented by the interposition of another more faithful lover.

ANDRON, a man set over the citadel of Syracuse by Dionysius. Hermocrates advised him to seize it and revolt from the tyrant, which he refused to do. The tyrant put him to death for not discovering that Hermocrates had incited him to rebellion. Polyæn. 5, c. 2.—A man of Halicarnassus who composed some historical works. Plut. in Thes.—A native of Ephesus, who wrote an account of the seven wise men of Greece. Diog.

ANDRONICUS LIVIUS. vid. Livius.

ANDRONICUS, a peripatetic philosopher of Rhodes, who flourished 59 years B. C. He was the first who published and revised the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus. His periphrase is extant, the best edition of which is that of Heinsius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1617. Plut. in Syll.—A Latin grammarian, whose life Suetonius has written.—An astronomer of Athens, who built a marble octagonal tower in honour of the eight principal winds, on the top of which was placed a Triton with a stick in his hand, pointing always to the side whence the wind blew.

ANDROPHÁGI, a savage nation of European Scythia. Herodot. 4, c. 18, 102.

ANDROPOMPUS, a Theban who killed Xanthus in single combat by fraud. Paus. 2, c. 18.

ANDROS, an island in the Ægean sea, known by the different names of Epagris, Antandros, Lasia Cauros, Hydrusia, Nonagria. It received the name of Andros from Andros son of Anius, one of its kings, who lived in the time of the Trojan war, [and the name of Antandros, i. e. for one man, from its having been given as his ransom by Ascanius the son of Æneas, when taken prisoner by the Pelasgians. It is still one of the most fertile and pleasant of the Grecian isles, and watered with numerous springs, whence one of its ancient names Hydrusia. Its modern name is Andro. The chief town of the island was likewise called Andros.] Ovid. Met. 13, v. 648.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 80. Juv. 3, v. 70.—Plin. 2, c. 103. Mela, 1 and 2.

ANDROSTHÈNES, a governor of Thessaly, who favoured the interest of Pompey. He was conquered by J. Cæsar. Cæs. 3. Bell. Civ. c. 80.—A statuary of Thebes. Paus. 10, c. 19.—A geographer in the age of Alexander.

ANDROTION, a Greek, who wrote a history of Attica, and a treatise on agriculture. Plin.—Paus 10, c. 8.

ANEMOLIA, city of Phocis, afterwards called Hyampolis, [now Jamboli.] Strab.

ANGELION, a statuary, who made Apollo's statue at Delphi. Paus. 2, c. 32.

ANGËTES, a river of Thrace, falling into the Strymon, [above Amphipolis.] Herodot. 7, c. 113.

ANGLI, [a people of Germany at the base of the Cieronesas Cimbrica, in the country answering now to the north-eastern part of the Dutchy of Holstein. From them the English have derived their name. There is still at the present day in that quarter, a district called Angeln. Tacit. Germ. 40.—vid. Saxones.]

ANGRUS, [a river of Illyricum, pursuing a northern course, according to Herodotus, and joining the Brongus, which flows into the Danube.] Herodot. 4, c. 49.

ANGUITIA, a wood in the country of the Marsi, between the lake Fucinus and Alba. [The name is derived, according to Soinus, from a sister of Circe who dwelt in the vicinity. It is now Silva d'Albi. The Marsi, especially those of them who dwelt near this wood, are said by the ancient writers to have possessed power over serpents, and never to have been injured by them.] Sil. 3.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 759.

ANIA, a Roman widow, celebrated for her beauty. One of her friends advised her to marry again. No, said she, if I marry a man as affectionate as my first husband, I shall be apprehensive for his death; and if he is bad, why have him, after such a kind and indulgent one?

ANICETUS, a freedman who directed the education of Nero, and became the instrument of his crimes. Suet. in Ner.

ANICIA, a family at Rome, which in the flourishing times of the republic, produced many brave and illustrious citizens. — A relation of Atticus. C. Nepos.

ANICIUS GALLUS, triumphed over the Illyrians and their king Gentius, and was pro-prætor of Rome, A. U. C. 585.—A consul with Corn. Cethegus, A. U. C. 594.—Probus, a Roman consul in the fourth century, famous for his humanity.

ANIGRUS, [a river of Triphylia in Elis, to the north of Lepreum. Near this river was a cavern, called the cave of the nymphs Anigrades or Anigrades, and it was pretended that any person who had a complaint of the skin, might be cured, if, after having sacrificed to the nymphs and rubbed his body well, he swam over the Anigrus. The river in fact would seem to have possessed some mineral properties, as Pausanias and Strabo speak of an unpleasant smell emitted from it, which the latter states was perceptible at the distance of 20stadia. The natives however accounted for the smell by a tradition that Chiron or some one of the centaurs washed in the stream the wounds which Hercules had inflicted, and that the water was hence infected with the poison of the Hydra.—Paus. 5, c. 5.—Strab. 8.]

ANIO and ANIEN, now the Teverone, a river of Italy, flowing through the country of Tiber, and falling into the river Tiber, about three miles north of Rome. It receives its name, as some suppose, from Anius a king of Etruria, who drowned himself there when he could not recover his daughter, who had been carried away. [This river is celebrated for its beautiful cascades at the town of Tibur, or Tivoli.] Stat. 1. Sylb. 3, v. 20.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 683.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 7, v. 13.—Plut. de Fort. Rom.

ANITORGIS, a city of Spain, near which a battle was fought between Asdrubal and the Scipos. [Strabo calls it Conistorgis, a name given to it from its being among the Conii, as Anitorgis was applied to it, from its being near the Anas. Strab. 3. Liv 25, c. 32.]

ANIUS, the son of Apollo and Rhea, was king of Delos, and father of Andrus. He had by Dorippe three daughters, Oeno, Spermo, and Elais, to whom Bacchus had given the power of changing whatever they pleased into wine, corn, and oil. When Agamemnon went to the Trojan war, he wished to carry them with him to supply his army with provisions; but they complained to Bacchus, who changed them into doves. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 642.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Diod. 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 80.

ANNA, a goddess, in whose honour the Romans instituted festivals. She was, according to some, Anna the daughter of Belus and sister of Dido, who, after her sister's death, fled from Carthage, which Jarbas had besieged, and came to Italy, where Æneas met her, as he walked on the banks of the Tiber, and gave her an honourable reception, for the kindnesses she had shown him when he was at Carthage. Lavinia, the wife of Æneas, was jealous of the tender treatment which was shown to Anna, and meditated her ruin. Anna was apprized of this by her sister in a dream, and she fled to the river Numicus, of which she became a deity, and ordered the inhabitants of the country to call her Anna Perenna, because she would remain for ever under the waters. Her festivals were performed with many rejoicings, and the females often, in the midst of their cheerfulness, forgot their natural decency. They were introduced into Rome, and celebrated the 15th of March. The Romans generally sacrificed to her, to obtain a long and happy life; and hence the words Annare and Perennare. Some have supposed Anna to be the moon, quia mensibus impleat annum; others call her Themis, or Io, the daughter of Inachus, and sometimes Maia. Another more received opinion maintains, that Anna was an old industrious woman of Bovillæ, who, when the Roman populace had fled from the city to mount Sacer, brought them cakes every day; for which kind treatment the Romans, when peace was re-established, decreed immortal honours to her whom they called Perenna ab perennitate cultus, and who, as they supposed, was become one of their deities. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 659, &c.—Sil 8, v. 73.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 9, 20, 421, and 500.

ANNA COMNENA, a princess of Constantinople, known to the world for the Greek history which she wrote of her father Alexias emperor of the east. The character of this history is not very high for authenticity or beauty of composition; the historian is lost in the daughter: and instead of simplicity of style and narrative, as Gibbonsays, an elaborate affectation of rhetoric and science betrays in every page the vanity of a female author, [and yet it forms an useful contrast to the degrading and partial statements of the Latin historians of the time.] The best edition of Anna Comnena, is that of Paris, folio, 1651.

ANNÆUS, a Roman family which was subdivided into the Lucani, Senecæ, Floris, &c.

ANNÆLES, a chronological history which gives an account of all the important events of every year in a state, without entering into the causes which produced them. The annals of Tacitus may be considered in this light. In the first ages of Rome, the writing of the annals was one of the duties and privileges of the high-priest; whence they have been called Annales Maximi, from the priest Pontifex Maximus, who consecrated them, and gave them as truly genuine and authentic. [The Annales Maximi consisted of 80 books. They were most of them destroyed in the burning of the city by the Gauls. After the time of Sylla, the pontifices seem to have dropt the custom of compiling annals. Several private persons, however, as Cato, Pictor, Hortensius, and Tacitus, composed historical accounts of Roman affairs, which from their similarity to the former they likewise styled Annals.]

ANNALIS LEX, settled the age at which, among the Romans, a citizen could be admitted to exercise the offices of the state. This law originated in Athens, and was introduced in Rome.

ANNIANUS, a poet in the age of Trajan.

ANNIBAL, a celebrated Carthaginian general, son of Amilcar. He was educated in his father's camp, and inured from his early years to the labours of the field. He passed into Spain when nine years old, and at the request of his father, took a solemn oath he never would be at peace with the Romans. After his father's death, he was appointed over the cavalry in Spain: and some time after, upon the death of Asdrubal, he was invested with the command of all the armies of Carthage, though not yet in the 25th year of his age. In three years of continual success, he subdued all the nations of Spain which opposed the Carthaginian power, and took Saguntum after a siege of eight months. The city was in alliance with the Romans, and its fall was the cause of the second Punic war, which Annibal prepared to support with all the courage and prudence of a consummate general. He levied three large armies, one of which he sent to Africa, he left another in Spain, and marched at the head of the third towards Italy. This army some have calculated at 20,000 foot and 6,000 horse; others say that it consisted of 100,000 foot and 20,000 horse. Liv. 21, c. 38. He came to the Alps which were deemed almost inaccessible, and had never been passed over before him but by Hercules, and after much trouble gained the top in nine days. He conquered the uncivilized inhabitants that opposed his passage, and after the amazing loss of 30,000 men, made his way so easy, by softening the rocks with fire and vinegar, that even his armed elephants descended the mountains without danger or difficulty, where a man disencumbered of his arms, could not walk before in safety. [Annibal, according to most authorities, passed into Italy over the Cottian Alps. The more accurate opinion, however, is in favour of the modern Mont Cenis. vid. Alpes. The manner in which this passage is said to have been effected by him, is rejected by many authors as fictitious. Polybius is altogether silent on the subject. Pliny, it is true, makes mention of the quality of vinegar above alluded to, but whence could Annibal have procured a sufficient supply for his purpose?—After having crossed the Alps, the Carthaginian commander was opposed by the Romans as soon as he entered upon the plains of Italy, the first battle was fought on the banks of the Ticinus, the consul P. Corn. Scipio commanding the Romans. Victory declared for the Carthaginians, and Scipio was compelled to leave the field severely wounded. A second battle was fought on the banks of the Trebia, in which Annibal conquered the united forces of the consuls Scipio and Sempronius. After wintering in Cisalpine Gaul and drawing over to his cause the greater part of its inhabitants, he invaded Etruria. Here at the lake Trasimenus he defeated with great slaughter the consul Flaminius,] and soon after met the two consuls C. Terentius and L. Æmilius at Cannæ. His army consisted of 40,000 foot and 10,000 horse when he engaged the Romans at the celebrated battle of Cannæ. The slaughter was so great, that no less than 40,000 Romans were killed, and the conqueror made a bridge with the dead carcases; and as a sign of his victory, he sent to Carthage three bushels of gold rings which had been taken from 5630 Roman knights slain in the battle. [Annibal has been censured for not immediately marching to Rome after this victory. So consummate a commander, however, as he undoubtedly was, could scarcely have neglected doing this, had he not been influenced by some powerful motive which delayed his approach to the capital. It is very probable that he felt the necessity of giving his soldiers some repose after so hard fought a battle, and was conscious that they were in no condition immediately to take the field against fresh and desperate opponents. Besides, the check which he had received at Spoletum in Umbria, must have taught him how ill-fitted his army was for the operations of a siege.] The delay of Annibal gave the enemy spirit and boldness, and when at last he approached the walls of Rome, he was informed that the piece of ground on which his army then stood, was selling at a high price in the Roman forum. After hovering for some time round the city, he retired to Capua, where the Carthaginian soldiers soon forgot to conquer in the pleasures and riot of this luxurious city. From that circumstance it has been said, and with propriety, that Capua was a Cannæ to Annibal. After the battle of Cannæ the Romans became more cautious, and when the dictator Fabius Maximus had defied the artifice as well as the valour of Annibal, they began to look for better times. Marcellus, who succeeded Fabius in the field, first taught the Romans at Nola, that Annibal was no invincible. After many important debates in the senate, it was decreed, that war should be carried into Africa, to remove Annibal from the gates of Rome; and [Publius Cornelius Scipio, the son of him who commanded the Romans at the battle of Ticinus,] who was the first proposer of the plan, was empowered to put it into execution. When Carthage saw the enemy on her coasts, she recalled Annibal from Italy: and that great general is said to have left with tears in his eyes, a country, which during sixteen years he had kept under continual alarm, and which he could almost call his own. He and Scipio met near Carthage, and after a parley, in which neither would give the preference to his enemy, they determined to come to a general engagement. The battle was fought near Zama: Scipio made a great slaughter of the enemy, 20,000 were killed and the same number made prisoners. Annibal, after he had lost the day, fled to Adrumetum, and soon after this decisive battle, the Romans granted peace to Carthage, on hard conditions. [Annibal's credit, however, was not destroyed among his countrymen by the issue of this battle. He was employed by them in some other military operations, until the Roman senate refusing to deliver up the hostages while he was suffered to remain at the head of the army, he was compelled to lay down his command. After this he was employed in a civil capacity, and displayed as great abilities here as he had done in military affairs. He regulated the finances, corrected abuses, exposed various frauds, and would eventually have proved of more real service to his country than he had been while leading her armies, had not this bold and honest line of conduct rendered him so unpopular that he was compelled to leave Africa. At Tyre he was received with the greatest distinction. Thence he passed to Antiochus at Antioch, and urged him to make war on the Romans. Annibal's advice to the monarch was, that Italy should be made the seat of war, for the conducting of which he offered his services. Antiochus, however, distrusting his sincerity, adopted a different plan of operations, was conquered, and the surrender of Annibal was stipulated as one of the conditions of peace. He escaped however to Prusias king of Bithynia, whom he incited to make war on Eumenes king of Pergamus. Eumenes complaining to the Romans, the latter sent an embassy to Prusias, and among other things, demanded that Annibal should be delivered up.] A party of soldiers, in consequence of this order, were sent to seize Annibal, who, when he heard that his house was besieged on every side, and all means of escape fruitless, took a dose of poison, which he always carried with him in a ring on his finger, and as he breathed his last, exclaimed, Solvanus æturrnâ curâ populum Romanum, quando mortem senis expectare longum censet. He died in his 70th year, according to some, about 182 years B. C. That year was famous for the death of the three greatest generals of the age, Annibal, Scipio, and Philipœmen. The death of so formidable a rival was the cause of great rejoicings in Rome; he had always been a professed enemy to the Roman name, and ever endeavoured to destroy its power. If he shone in the field, he also distinguished himself by his studies. He was taught Greek by Sosilus a Lacedæmonian and he even wrote some books in that language on different subjects. It is remarkable, that the life of Annibal, whom the Romans wished so many times to destroy by perfidy, was never attempted by any one of his soldiers or countrymen. He made himself as conspicuous in the government of the state, as at the head of armies, and though his enemies reproached him with the rudeness of laughing in the Carthaginian senate, while every senator was bathed in tears for the misfortunes of the country, Annibal defended himself by saying, that in him, who had been bred all his life in a camp, ought to be dispensed with all the more polished feelings of a capital. He was so apprehensive for his safety, that when he was in Bithynia, his house was fortified like a castle, and on every side there were secret doors which could give immediate escape if his life was ever attempted. When he quitted Italy, and embarked on board a vessel for Africa, he so strongly suspected the fidelity of his pilot, who told him that the lofty mountain which appeared at a distance was a promontory of Sicily, that he killed him on the spot; and when he was convinced of his fatal error, he gave a magnificent burial to the man whom he had so falsely murdered, and called the promontory by his name [Pelorus.] The labours which he sustained, and the inclemency of the weather to which he exposed himself in crossing the Alps, so weakened one of his eyes, that he ever after lost the use of it. The Romans have celebrated the humanity of Annibal, who, after the battle of Cannæ, sought the body of the fallen consul [Emilius] amidst the heaps of slain, and honoured it with a funeral becoming the dignity of Rome. He performed the same friendly offices to the remains of Marcellus and Tib. Gracchus, who had fallen in battle. He often blamed the unsettled measures of his country; and when the enemy had thrown into his camp the head of his brother Asdrubal, who had been conquered as he came from Spain with a reinforcement into Italy, Annibal said that the Carthaginian arms would no longer meet with their usual success. Juvenal, in speaking of Annibal, observes, that the ring which caused his death made a due atonement to the Romans for the many thousand rings which had been sent to Carthage after the battle of Cannæ. Annibal, when in Spain, married a woman of Castulo. The Romans entertained such a high opinion of him as a commander, that Scipio who conquered him, calls him the greatest general that ever lived, and gives the second rank to Pyrrhus the Epirot, and places himself the next to these in merit and abilities. It is plain that the failure of Annibal's expedition in Italy did not arise from his neglect, but from that of his countrymen, who gave him no assistance; far from imitating their enemies of Rome, who even raised in one year 18 legions to oppose the formidable Carthaginian. Livy has painted the character of Annibal like an enemy, and it is much to be lamented that this great historian has withheld the tribute due to the merits and virtues of the greatest of generals. C. Hist. Græc.—A son of Gison, and grandson of Amilcar, sent by the Carthaginians to the assistance of Egæsta a town of Sicily. He was overpowered by Hermocrates, an exiled Syracusan. Justin. 22 and 23.—A Carthaginian, surnamed Senior. He was conquered by the consul, C. Sulpit. Paternus, in Sardinia, and hung on a cross by his countrymen for his ill success.

ANNICERIS, [a philosopher of Cyrene and disciple of Aristippus. He so far receded from the doctrine of his master, as to acknowledge the merit of filial piety, friendship, and patriotism, and to allow that a wise man might retain the possession of himself in the midst of external troubles; but he inherited so much of his frivolous taste as to value himself upon the most trivial accomplishments, particularly upon his dexterity in being able to drive a chariot twice round a course in the same ring. Enfield. Hist. Phil. Vol. 1, p. 196.]

ANNO and HANNO, a Carthaginian general conquered in Spain by Scipio, and sent to Rome. He was son of Bomilcar, whom Annibal sent privately over the Rhone to conquer the Gauls. Liv. 21, c. 27.—A Carthaginian who taught birds to sing "Anno is a god," after which he restored them to their native liberty; but the birds lost with their slavery what they had been taught. Ælian. V. H. ult. lib. c. 30.—[A Carthaginian commander sent forth to plant colonies on the Atlantic coast of Africa. He is supposed by Mannert to have discovered as far as the 4th degree of north latitude. The same writer makes him to have been a little prior to the time of Herodotus. According to Dodwell, however, he lived in the age of Alexander or a little after; and according to Vossius, shortly after the Trojan war. Hanno wrote an account of his discoveries in the Punic language, which was translated into Greek. Many consider the whole work as devoid of authenticity, and ascribe it to a Sicilian Greek; Mannert, however, successfully defends its credibility. It was first published by Froben, 1533, and afterwards in Hudson's Geograph. Vet. Scriptores Græci minores, 1698.—*Mannert. Anv. Geogr. ΑΝΟΡΕΑ, [a mountain of Greece, part of the chain of Oeta. A small pass in this mountain, called by the same name, formed a communication between Thessaly and the country of the Epicnemidian Locri. Herod. 7, c. 216.]

ANSER, a Roman poet whom Ovid, Trist. 3, el. 1, v. 425, calls bold and impertinent. Virgil and Propertius are said to have played upon his name with some degree of severity.

ΑΝΤΕΑΣ, a king of Scythia, who said that the neighing of a horse was far preferable to the music of Ismenias, a famous musician who had been taken captive. Plut.

ΑΝΤΕΥΣ, a giant of Libya, son of Terra and Neptune. He was so strong in wrestling, that he boasted that he would erect a temple to his father with the skulls of his conquered antagonists. Hercules attacked him, and as he received new strength from his mother as often as he touched the ground, the hero lifted him up in the air, and squeezed him to death in his arms. *Lucan. 4, v. 598.—Stat. 6. [ΑΝΤΕΟΠΟΛΙΣ, a city of Thebais on the eastern side of the Nile, named after Antæus. It is called now Kau-il-Kubbara.]

ΑΝΤΑΓΟΡΑΣ, a Rhodian poet, much admired by Antigonus. One day as he was cooking some fish, the king asked him whether Homer ever dressed any meals when he was recording the actions of Agamemnon? And do you think, replied the poet, that he ever inquired whether any individual dressed fish in his army? Plut. Symp. & Apoph.

ΑΝΤΑΛΚΙΔΑΣ, of Sparta, son of Leon, was sent into Persia, where he made a peace with Artaxerxes very disadvantageous to his country, by which, B. C. 387, the Greek cities of Asia became tributary to the Persian monarch. Paus. 9, c. 1, &c.—Diod. 14.—Plut. in Artax.

ΑΝΤΑΝΔΡΟΣ, now St. Dimitri, [a city of Troas on the north side of the gulf of Adramyttium. The Cimærians are said to have possessed it for a century, and to have made it their place of arms. According to Serriut it was founded by inhabitants of Andros, driven from their island by a sedition. Some place it at the foot of Mount Ida.] Strab. 13. —Mela. 1, c. 18.

ANTEIUS PUBLIUS was appointed over Syria by Nero. He was accused of sedition and conspiracy, and drank poison, which operating slowly, obliged him to open his veins. Tacit. An. 13, &c.

ANTEMNÆ, a city of the Sabines [at the confluence of the Anio and Tiber.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 631. Dionys. Hal.

ANTĒNOR, a Trojan prince related to Priam. It is said that during the Trojan war, he always kept a secret correspondence with the Greeks, and chiefly with Menelaus and Ulysses. In the council of Priam, Homer introduces him as advising the Trojans to restore Helen, and conclude the war. He advised Ulysses to carry away the Trojan paladium, and encouraged the Greeks to make the wooden horse, which, at his persuasion was brought into the city of Troy by a breach made in the walls. Æneas has been accused of being a partner of his guilt; and the night that Troy was taken, they had a number of Greeks stationed at the doors of their houses to protect them from harm. [After the destruction of his country, Antenor, according to a fabulous account, led a colony of Heneti, a people of Paphlagonia, into Italy, near the mouth of the Po, where, expelling the Euganei from their possessions, he settled in them and founded Patavium or Padua.] His children were also concerned in the Trojan war, and displayed much valour against the Greeks. Their names were Polybius, Acamas, Agenor, and according to others, Polydamas and Helicaon. Liv. 1, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 13.—*Virg. ANTĒROS, (ἀντι and ἔργος,) a son of Mars and Venus. He was not, as the derivation of his name implies, a deity that presided over an opposition to love, but he was the god of mutual love and of mutual tenderness. Venus had complained to Themis, that her son Cupid always continued a child, and was told that if he had another brother, he would grow up in a short space of time. As soon as Anteros was born, Cupid felt his strength increase, and his wings enlarge; but if ever his brother was at a distance from him, he found himself reduced to his ancient shape. From this circumstance it is seen, that return of passion gives vigour to love. Anteros had a temple at Athens raised to his honour, when Meles had experienced the coldness and disdain of Timagoras, whom he passionately esteemed, and for whom he had killed himself. vid. Meles. Cupid and Anteros are often represented striving to seize a palm-tree from one another, to teach us that true love always endeavours to overcome by kindness and gratitude. They were always painted in the Greek academies, to inform the scholars that it is their immediate duty to be grateful to their teachers, and to reward their trouble with love and reverence. [The original meaning of the name Anteros is, the Deity who avenges slighted love. By later writers it is applied to a brother of Cupid, but in constant opposition to him; and in the palæstra at Elis, he was represented contending with him. The signification of mutual love is only given to the word by later writers, according to Boettiger. Pausan. 1, 30. id. 6, 23.—Plutarch. Erot. 20.]—A grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of the emperor Claudius.

ANTHĒA, a town of Achaia. Paus. 7, c. 18.—Of Messenia, Id. 4, c. 31.

ANTHĒAS, a son of Eumelus, killed in attempting to sow corn from the chariot of Triptolemus drawn by dragons. Paus. 7, c. 18.

ANTHĒDON, a city of Bœotia, [a little to the north-east of Mount Messapius.] It received its name from the flowery plains that surrounded it, or from Anthedon, a certain nymph. [In the midst of the city was a temple of the Cabiri, and near it a sacred wood of Ceres and a temple of Proserpine with her statue in white marble. It had also a temple of Bacchus.] Paus. 7, c. 10, l. 9, c. 22.—[A town of Palestine, called also Agrippias, on the sea coast to the south-west of Gaza. Herod gave it the second name in honour of Agrippa. It is now called Daron. Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 7.]

ANTHĒLA, a town near [the straits of Thermopylæ, and watered by the Asopus,] near which Ceres and Amphictyon had a temple. Herodot. 7, c. 176.

ANTHĒMIS, [one of the names of the island of Samos.] Strab. 10.

ANTHĒMUS, a city of Macedonia [to the north-east of Thessalonica.]

ANTHĒMUSIA, a city of Mesopotamia, [to the south-east of Samosata, and just below Edessa. The name was derived from the Macedonian city Anthemus.] Strab.

ANTHĒNE, a town of [Cynuria in Argolis.] Thucyd. 5, c. 41.

ANTHERMUS, a Chian sculptor, son of Miceiaides, and grandson to Malas. [His sons Bupalus and Anthermus] made a statue of the poet Hipponax, which caused universal laughter, on account of the deformity of its countenance. The poet was so incensed upon this, and inveighed with so much bitterness against the statuaries, that they hung themselves, according to the opinion of some authors. Plin. 36, c. 5.

ANTHES, a native of Anthedon, who first invented hymns. Plut. de Mus.

ANTHESPHORĪA, festivals celebrated in Sicily, in honour of Proserpine, who was carried away by Pluto as she was gathering flowers. [The word is derived ἀπο του φερειν ανθια, i. e. from carrying flowers.] Claudian. de Rapt. Pros.—Festivals of the same name were also observed at Argos in honour of Juno, who was called Antheia. Paus. Corinth.—Pollux. Onom. 1, c. 1.

ANTHĒSTERĪA, festivals in honour of Bacchus among the Greeks. They were celebrated in the month of February, called Anthesterion, whence the name is derived, and continued three days. The first was called Πύθια ἀπο τοῦ πύθου οἴνου, because they tapped their barrels of liquor. The second day was called Ξεός, from the measure χόα, because every individual drank of his own vessel, in commemoration of the arrival of Orestes, who, after the murder of his mother, came, without being purified, to Demophoon, or Pandion, king of Athens, and was obliged with all the Athenians, to drink by himself, for fear of polluting the people by drinking with them before he was purified of the parricide. It was usual on that day, to ride out in chariots, and ridicule those that passed by. The best drinker was rewarded with a crown of leaves, or rather of gold, and with a cask of wine. The third day was called Χυρτοί, from χυρτα, a vessel brought out full of all sorts of seed and herbs, deemed sacred to Mercury, and therefore not touched. The slaves had the permission of being merry and free during these festivals; and at the end of the solemnity a herald proclaimed, Θυράζε Καρτε, συκ στ' Ἀνδερτορετα, i. e. Depart, ye Carian slaves, the festivals are at an end. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

ANTHIA, a sister of Priam, seized by the Greeks. She compelled the people of Palene to burn their ships, and build Scione. Polyæn. 7, c. 47.

ANTHIUM, a town of Thrace, afterwards called Apollonia. [The name was subsequently changed to Sozopolis, and is now pronounced Sizeboli. Plin. 4, c. 11.—A city of Italy.]

ANTHIUS, (flowery.) a name of Bacchus worshipped at Athens. He had also a statue at Patræ.

ANTHO, a daughter of Amulius king of Alba.

ANTHROPOPHAGI, a people of Scythia that fed on human flesh. They lived near the country of the Massagetæ. Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 6, c. 30.—Mela, 2, c. 1.

ANTHYLLA, a city of Egypt [about west from the Canopic branch of the Nile, and north-west from Naucratis. It is supposed by Larcher to have been the same with Gynæopolis. It maintained the queens of the country in shoes, or, according to Athenæus 1, in girdles. Herodot. 2, c. 98.

ANTIA LEX was made for the suppression of luxury at Rome. Its particulars are not known. The enactor was Antius Restio, who afterwards never supped abroad for fear of being himself a witness of the profusion and extravagance which his law meant to destroy, but without effect. Macrob. 3, c. 17.

ANTICLEA, a daughter of Autolyceus and Amphithea. Her father, who was a famous robber, permitted Sisyphus, son of Æolus, to enjoy the favours of his daughter, and Anticlea was really pregnant of Ulysses when she married Laertes king of Ithaca. Laertes was nevertheless the reputed father of Ulysses. Ulysses is reproached by Ajax in Ovid. Met. as being the son of Sisyphus. It is said that Anticlea killed herself when she heard a false report of her son's death. Homer. Od. 11, 19.—Hygin. fab. 201, 243.—Paus. 10, c. 29.

ANTICLIDES, a Greek historian, whose works are now lost. They are quoted by Athenæus, and Plut. in Alex.

ANTICRAGUS, [a detached chain of the ridge of Mount Cragus in Lycia, running in a north-east direction along the coast of the Sinus Glaucus.] Strab. 4.

ANTICRATES, a Spartan, who wounded Epaminondas, the Theban general, at the battle of Mantinea. Plut. in Ages.

ANTICYRA, [a city of Phocis, on the isthmus of a small peninsula in the Sinus Corinthiacus, west of the Sinus Crissæus. It is supposed by Pausanias to have been the city called by Homer Cyparissa. Above the port was a temple consecrated to Neptune. Its modern name is Aspro-Spita, or the white houses, from some traces of buildings which still remain. There was another of the same name in Thessaly at the mouth of the Sperchius.—Both these places were famous for the hellebore which they produced, the great remedy for madness among the ancients. Strabo says that the second Anticyra produced better hellebore than the first, but that the article was better prepared at the latter. The proverb Naviget Anticyram was applied by the ancients to a person deemed insane. Horace has been supposed by some to allude to three places of this name, but this is a mistake, the poet merely speaks of a head so insane as not to be cured by the produce of three Anticyras, if there even were three and not two merely.] Paus. 10, c. 36.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 166. De. Art. Poet. v. 300.—Persius 4, v. 16.—Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Pont. 4, ep. 3, v. 53.

ANTIGENIDAS, a famous musician of Thebes, disciple, to Philoxenus. He taught his pupil Ismenias to despise the judgment of the populace. Cic. in Brut. 97.

ANTIGONA, daughter of Berenice, was wife to king Pyrrhus. Plut. in Pyrrh.

ANTIGONE, a daughter of Œdipus, king of Thebes, by his mother Jocasta. She paid the last sad offices to her brother Polyneices, against the positive orders of Creon, who, when he heard of it, ordered her to be buried alive. She however killed herself before the sentence was executed, and Hæmon, the king's son, who was passionately fond of her, and had not been able to obtain her pardon, killed himself on her grave. The death of Antigone is the subject of one of the tragedies of Sophocles. The Athenians were so pleased with it at the first representation, that they presented the author with the government of Samos. This tragedy was represented 32 times at Athens, without interruption. Sophocles. in Antig.—Hygin. fab. 67, 72, 243, 254.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 3.

—Philostrat. 2, c. 29.—Stat. Theb. 12, v. 350.

—A daughter of Eurytion king of Phthia in Thessaly. Apollod.—A daughter of Laomedon. She was the sister of Priam, and was changed into a stork for comparing herself to Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 93.

ANTIGONIA, a town of Epirus, [south-west of Apollonia.] Plin. 4, c. 1.—One of Macedonia, [in the district of Mygdonia,] founded by Antigonus, son of Gonatas. Id. 4, c. 10.—One in Syria, on the borders of the Orontes, [built by Antigonus, and intended as the residence of the governors of Egypt and Syria, but destroyed by him when Seleucia was built, and the inhabitants removed to the latter city.] Strab. 16.—Another in Bithynia, called also Nicæa. Id. 12.—Another in Arcadia, [founded on the ruins of the ancient Mantinea.] Paus. 8, c. 3.—One of Troas in Asia Minor, [probably the same with that which was called Alexandria.] Strab. 13.

ANTIGONUS, one of Alexander's generals, universally supposed to be the illegitimate son of Philip, Alexander's father. In the division of the provinces after the king's death, he received Pamphylia, Lycia, and Phrygia. He united with Antipater and Ptolemy, to destroy Perdiccas and Eumenes: and after the death of Perdiccas, he made continual war against Eumenes, whom, after three years of various fortune, he took prisoner, and put to death. He afterwards declared war against Cassander, and had several engagements by his generals with Lysimachus. He obliged Seleucus to retire from Syria, and fly for refuge and safety to Egypt. Ptolemy, who had established himself in Egypt, promised to defend Seleucus, and from that time all friendship ceased between Ptolemy and Antigonus, and a new war was begun, [in which Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus and Cassander arrayed themselves against Antigonus. After varied success, the confederates made a treaty with him and surrendered to him the possession of the whole of Asia, upon condition that the Grecian cities should remain free. This treaty was soon broken, and Ptolemy made a descent into Lesser Asia and on some of the Greek isles, which was at first successful, but he was defeated in a sea-fight by Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, who took the island of Cyprus, made 16,000 prisoners, and sunk 200 of his ships.] After this famous naval battle, which happened 26 years after Alexander's death, Antigonus and his son assumed the title of kings, and their example was followed by all the rest of Alexander's generals. [From this period, B. C. 306, his own reign in Asia, that of Ptolemy in Egypt, and those of the other captains of Alexander in their respective territories, properly commence. Antigonus now formed the design of driving Ptolemy from Egypt, but failed. His power soon became so formidable that a new confederacy was formed against him by Cassander, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy. The contending parties met in the plain of Ipsus in Phrygia.

B. C. 301. Antigonus was defeated and died of his wounds, and his son Demetrius fled from the field. Antigonus was 84 years old when he died.] During his life, he was master of all Asia Minor, as far as Syria; but after his death, his son Demetrius lost Asia, and established himself in Macedonia upon the death of Cassander, and some time after attempted to recover his former possessions, but died in captivity, in the court of his son-in-law, Seleucus. Antigonus was concerned in the different intrigues of the Greeks. He made a treaty of alliance with the Ætolians, and was highly respected by the Athenians, to whom he showed himself very liberal and indulgent. Antigonus discharged some of his officers because they spent their time in taverns, and he gave their commissions to common soldiers, who performed their duty with punctuality. A certain poet called him divine; but the king despised his flattery, and bade him go and inquire of his servants whether he was really what he supposed him. Strab. 13.—Diod. 17, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 6, &c.—Justin. 13, 14, and 15.—C. Nep. in Eumen.—Plut. in Demetr. Eumen. & Arat.—Gonatas, [so called from the place of his birth,] son of Demetrius, and grandson to Antigonus, was king of Macedonia. He conquered the Gauls, [who had made an irruption into his kingdom,] and at last was expelled by Pyrrhus, who seized the throne. [He afterwards recovered a great part of Macedonia, and followed Pyrrhus to the neighbourhood of Argos. In a conflict that ensued there, Pyrrhus was slain.] After the death of Pyrrhus, he recovered all Macedonia, and died after a reign of 34 years, leaving his son Demetrius [the 2d] to succeed, B. C. 243. Justin. 21 and 25.—Polyb.—Plut. in Demetr.—The guardian of his nephew, Philip, the son of Demetrius, who married the widow of Demetrius, and usurped the kingdom. He was called Doson, from his promising much and giving nothing. He conquered Cleomenes king of Sparta, and obliged him to retire into Egypt, because he favoured the Ætolians against the Greeks. He died B. C. 221, after a reign of 11 years, leaving his crown to the lawful possessor, Philip, who distinguished himself by his cruelties and the war he made against the Romans. Justin. 28 and 29.—Polyb. 2.—Plut. in Cleom.—A son of Aristobulus [the 2d] king of Judæa, who obtained an army from the king of Parthia, by promising him 1000 talents and 500 women. With these foreign troops he attacked his country, and cut off the ears of Hircanus [his uncle] to make him unfit for the priesthood. Herod, with the aid of the Romans, took him prisoner, and he was put to death by Antony. Joseph. 14.—Dion. & Plut. in Anton.—Carystius, an historian in the age of Philadelphus, who wrote the lives of some of the ancient philosophers, [also an heroic poem, entitled "Antipater," mentioned by Athenæus, and other works. The only remains we have of them are his "collections of wonderful Stories" concerning animals and other natural bodies. This work was first published at Basle, 1568, and was afterwards reprinted at Leyden by Meursius, 1619, in 4to. It forms a part also of the volume entitled, Historiarum Mirabilium Auctores Græci, printed at Leyden in 1622, in 4to.] Diog.—Athen.

ANTILIBANUS, [a ridge of mountains in Syria, east of and running parallel with the ridge of Libanus. Near it rises the Orontes.] Strab.—Plin. 5, c. 20.

ANTILŌCHUS, a king of Messenia.—The eldest son of Nestor by Eurydice. He went to the Trojan war with his father, and was killed by Memnon, the son of Aurora. Homer. Od. 4.—Ovid. Heroid. says he was killed by Hector.—A poet who wrote a panegyric upon Lysander, and received a hat filled with silver. Plut. in Lys.—An historian commended by Dionys. Hal.

ANTIMACHUS, a Greek poet of Ionia. He wrote a treatise on the age and genealogy of Homer, and endeavoured to prove him a native of Colophon. He wrote a poem upon the Theban war; and before he had brought his heroes to the city of Thebes, he had filled 24 books. [At a public recital of this poem all his auditory deserted him except Plato, upon which Antimachus declared that he would read on, as Plato alone was equal to a whole audience. Quintilian ranks him next to Homer in Epic poetry, but at a great distance. The emperor Adrian endeavoured to revive his fame when it was almost forgotten, and to rank him above Homer, but in vain.] He was surnamed Clarius, from Claros, a mountain near Colophon, where he was born. [He flourished about 408 B. C.] Paus. 9, c. 35.—Plut. in Lysand. & Timol.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 45.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Another poet of the same name, surnamed Psecas, because he praised himself. Suidas.—A Trojan whom Paris bribed to oppose the restoring of Helen to Menelaus and Ulysses, who had come as ambassadors to recover her. His sons, Hippolochus and Pisander, were killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 11, v. 123, l. 12, v. 138.—A native of Heliopolis, who wrote a poem on the creation of the world, in 3780 verses.

ANTINŌE, one of the daughters of Pelias, Apollod. 1.—Paus. 8, c. 11.

ANTINOËIA, annual sacrifices and quinquennial games in honour of Antinous, instituted by the emperor Adrian at Mantinea, where Antinous was worshipped as a divinity. [They were celebrated also at Argos.]

ANTINOOPŌLIS [or ANTINŌE,] a town of Egypt, built in honour of Antinous, [opposite Hermopolis Magna, on the eastern bank of the Nile. It was previously an obscure place called Besa, but became a magnificent city, vid. Antinous. It is now called Ensené, and a revered sepulchre has also caused it to receive the name of Shek-Abadé.]

ANTINŌUS, a youth of Bithynia, of whom the emperor Adrian was so extremely fond, that at his death he erected a temple to him, and wished it to be believed that he had been changed into a constellation. Some writers suppose that Antinous was drowned in the Nile. [According to another account, Adrian, consulting an oracle at Besa, was informed that he was threatened with great danger, unless a person that was dear to him, was immolated for his preservation. Upon hearing this Antinous threw himself from a rock into the Nile as an offering for the safety of the emperor, who built Antinoopolis on the spot, in memory of him.]—A native of Ithaca, son of Eupheithes and one of Penelope's suitors. He was brutal and cruel in his manners; and excited his companions to destroy Telemachus, whose advice comforted his mother Penelope. When Ulysses returned home, he came to the palace in a beggar's dress, and begged for bread, which Antinous refused, and even struck him. After Ulysses had discovered himself to Telemachus, and Eumæus, he attacked the suitors, who were ignorant who he was, and killed Antinous among the first. Homer. Od. 1, 16, 17 and 22.—Propert. 2, el. 5, v. 7.

ANTIOCHIA, a city of Syria, once the third city of the world for beauty, greatness, and population. [It was built by Seleucus Nicator in memory of his father Antiochus, on the river Orontes, about 20 miles from its mouth, and was equi-distant from Constantinople and Alexandria, being about 700 miles from each. Here the disciples of our Saviour were first called Christians, and the chief patriarch of Asia resided. It was afterwards known by the name of Tetrapolis, being divided as it were into four cities, each having its separate wall, besides a common one enclosing all. The first was built by Seleucus Nicator, the second by those who repaired thither on its being made the capital of the Syro-Macedonian empire, the third by Seleucus Callinicus, and the fourth by Antiochus Epiphanes. It is now called Antakia, and has suffered severely by a late earthquake. At the distance of 4 or 5 miles below was a celebrated grove called Daphne; whence, for the sake of distinction, it has been called Antiochia near Daphne. vid. Daphne.] Dionys. Perieg.—A city called also Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, built by Seleucus, son of Antiochus.—A city of Pisidia, [situate however, in Phrygia, above Pisidia.]—A city [at the foot] of mount Cragus.—Another in Margiana, called Alexandria and Seleucia.—Another [at the foot] of mount Taurus, [in the province of Syria, called Comagene.]—Another of Caria, on the river Meander.

ANTIŌCHIS, the name of the mother of Antiochus, the son of Seleucus.—A tribe of Athens.

ANTIŌCHUS, surnamed Soter, was son of Seleucus, and king of Syria and Asia. He made a treaty of alliance with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. He fell into a lingering disease, which none of his father's physicians could cure for some time, till it was discovered that his pulse was more irregular than usual when Stratonice his stepmother entered his room, and that love for her was the cause of his illness. This was told the father, who willingly gave Stratonicæ to his son, that his immoderate love might not cause his death. He died 291 B. C. after a reign of 19 years. [He was called Soter or Saviour by the provinces of Lower Asia, from his having freed them from the Gauls, whom he defeated in battle.] Justin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Val. Max. 5.—Polyb. 4. Appian.—The second of that name, surnamed Theos (God) by the Milesians, because he put to death their tyrant Timarchus, was son and successor of Antiochus Soter. [In the third year of his reign, a bloody war broke out between him and Ptolemy Philadelphus of Egypt. During this, he lost all his provinces beyond the Euphrates by a revolt of the Parthians and the Bactrians. These losses compelled him to sue for peace unto Ptolemy, and it was only granted on condition of his divorcing his former wife Laodice, and marrying Ptolemy's daughter Berenice. The male issue of this marriage were also to succeed to the crown. Ptolemy died two years after this, and Antiochus repudiated Berenice and restored Laodice. The latter resolving to secure the succession to her son, poisoned Antiochus,] and suborned Artemon, whose features were similar to his, to represent him as king. Artemon, subservient to her will, pretended to be indisposed, and, as king, called all the ministers, and recommended to them Seleucus, surnamed Callinicus, son of Laodice, as his successor. After this ridiculous imposture, it was made public that the king had died a natural death, and Laodice placed her son on the throne, and dispatched Berenice and her son, 246 years before the christian era. Appian.—The third of that name, surnamed the Great, brother to Seleucus Ceraunus, was king of Syria and Asia, and reigned 36 years. He was defeated by Ptolemy Philopater at Raphia, [and was compelled to surrender to him the whole of Cœlesyria and Palestine. He was more successful, however, in Upper Asia, where he recovered possession of Media, and made treaties with the kings of Parthia and Bactria, who agreed to aid him in regaining other of his former provinces, if their respective kingdoms were secured to them. He crossed over also into India, and renewed his alliance with the king of that country.] After the death of Philopater, he endeavoured to crush his infant son Epiphanes; but his guardians solicited the aid of the Romans, and Antiochus was compelled to resign his pretensions. He conquered the greatest part of Greece, of which some cities implored the aid of Rome; and Annibal, who had taken refuge at his court, encouraged him to make war against Italy. He trusted however the sincerity of Annibal. His measures were dilatory, and not agreeable to the advice of the Carthaginian commander, and he was conquered and obliged to retire beyond mount Taurus, and pay a yearly fine of 2000 talents to the Romans. His revenues being unable to pay the fine, he attempted to plunder the temple of Belus in Susiana, which so incensed the inhabitants that they killed him with his followers, 187 years before the christian era. [According to Aurelius Victor, he became very dissolute at the close of his life, and was killed at an entertainment by a guest whom he had insulted.] In his character of king, Antiochus was humane and liberal, the patron of learning, and the friend of merit: and he published an edict, ordering his subjects never to obey except his commands were consistent with the laws of the country. He had three sons, Seleucus Philopater, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Demetrius. The first succeeded him, and the two others were kept as hostages by the Romans. Justin. 31 and 33.—Strab. 16.—Liv. 34, c. 59.—Flor. 2, c. 1.—Appian. Bell. Syr.—The fourth Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, or Illustrious, was king of Syria, after the death of his brother Seleucus, and reigned eleven years. He destroyed Jerusalem, and was so cruel to the Jews, that they called him Epimanes, or Furious, and not Epiphanes. He attempted to plunder Persepolis without effect. He was of a voracious appetite, and fond of childish diversions; he used for his pleasure to empty bags of money in the streets, to see the people's eagerness to gather it; he bathed in the public baths with the populace, and was fond of perfuming himself to excess. He invited all the Greeks he could at Antioch, and waited upon them as a servant, and danced with such indecency among the stage-players, that even the most dissipate and shameless blushed at the sight. [It is of this Antiochus that some relate the attempt to plunder the temple in Elimais. He is said to have been repulsed in this attempt; and to have died of a sudden and severe malady when marching to extirpate the Jews.] Polybius.—Justin. 34, c. 3.—The fifth, surnamed Eupator, or Noble, succeeded his father Epiphanes on the throne of Syria, 164 B. C. He made a peace with the Jews, and in the second year of his reign was put to death by his uncle Demetrius, who said that the crown was lawfully his own, and that it had been seized from his father. Justin. 34.—Joseph. 12.—The sixth, king of Syria, was surnamed Theos. His father Alexander Balas, entrusted him to the care of Malcus, an Arabian; and he received the crown from Tryphon, in opposition to his brother Demetrius, whom the people hated. Before he had been a year on the throne, Tryphon murdered him, 143 B. C. and reigned in his place for three years. Joseph. 13.—The seventh, called Sidetes, or the Hunter, reigned nine years. In the beginning of his reign, he was afraid of Tryphon, and concealed himself, but he soon obtained the means of destroying his enemy. He made war against Phraates king of Parthia, [entered Parthia, and regained the provinces which Phraates had separated from the Syrian empire. His soldiers however having been dispersed after this in winter-quarters, were attacked and cut to pieces, and Antiochus along with them.] Justin. 36, c.

1.—Appian. Bell. Syr.—The eighth, surnamed Grypus, from his aquiline nose, was son of Demetrius Nicanor by Cleopatra. His brother Seleucus was destroyed by Cleopatra, and he himself [some time after, on his manifesting an inclination to be independent of his mother,] would have shared the same fate, had he not discovered his mother's artifice, and compelled her to drink the poison which was prepared for himself. He killed Alexander Zebina, whom Ptolemy had set to oppose him on the throne of Syria, and was at last assassinated B. C. 112, after a reign of [29 years according to Josephus, and 26 years according to Porphyrius.] Justin. 39, &c.—Joseph.—Appian.—The ninth, surnamed Cyzenicus, from the city of Cyzicus where he received his education, was son of Antiochus Sidetes, by Cleopatra. He disputed the kingdom with his brother Grypus, who ceded to him Coelosyria, part of his patrimony. He was at last conquered by his nephew Seleucus near Antioch, and rather than to continue prisoner in his hands, he killed himself, B. C. 93. While a private man, he seemed worthy to reign; but when on the throne, he was dissolute and tyrannical. He was fond of mechanics, and invented some useful military engines. Appian.—Joseph.—The tenth, was ironically surnamed Pi-girus, because he married Selena, the wife of his father and of his uncle. He was the son of Antiochus ninth, and he expelled Seleucus the son of Grypus from Syria, and was killed in a battle he fought against the Parthians, in the cause of the Galatians. Joseph.—Appian.—After his death, the kingdom of Syria was torn to pieces by the factions of the royal family or usurpers, who under a good or false title, under the name of Antiochus or his relations, established themselves for a little time as sovereigns either of Syria, or Damascus, or other dependent provinces. At last Antiochus, surname Asiaticus, the son of Antiochus the ninth, was restored to his paternal throne by the influence of Lucullus the Roman general, on the expulsion of Tigranes king of Armenia from the Syrian dominions; but four years after, Pompey deposed him, and observed, that he who hid himself while an usurper sat upon his throne, ought not to be a king. From that time, B. C. 65, Syria became a Roman province, and the race of Antiochus was extinguished. Justin. 40.—A philosopher of Ascalon, famous for his writings, and the respect with which he was treated by his pupils, Lucullus, Cicero, and Brutus. Plut. in Lucull.—An historian of Syracuse, son of Xenophanes, who wrote, besides other works, an history of Sicily, in nine books, in which he began at the age of king Cocalus. Strab.—Diod. 12.—A sculptor, said to have made the famous statue of Pallas, preserved in the Ludovisi gardens at Rome.

ANTIOPE, daughter of Nycteus, king of Thebes, by Polyxo, was beloved by Jupiter, who, to deceive her, changed himself into a satyr. She became pregnant, and, to avoid the resentment of her father, she fled to mount Cithæron, where she brought forth twins, Amphion and Zethus. She exposed them, to prevent discovery, but they were preserved. After this she fled to Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who married her. Some say that Epopeus carried her away, for which action Nycteus made war against him, and at his death left his crown to his brother Lycus, intreating him to continue the war and punish the ravisher of his daughter. Lycus obeyed his injunctions, killed Epopeus, and recovered Antiope, whom he loved, and married, though his niece. His first wife, Dirce, was jealous of his new connection; she prevailed upon her husband, and Antiope was delivered into her hands, and confined in a prison, where she was daily tormented. Antiope, after many years imprisonment, obtained means to escape, and went after her sons, who undertook to avenge her wrongs upon Lycus and his wife Dirce. They took Thebes, put the king to death, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her till she died. Bacchus changed her into a fountain, and deprived Antiope of the use of her senses. In this forlorn situation she wandered all over Greece, and at last found relief from Phocus, son of Ornytion, who cured her of her disorder, and married her. Hyginus, fab. 7, says that Antiope was divorced by Lycus, because she had been ravished by Epopeus, whom he calls Epaphus, and that after her repudiation she became pregnant by Jupiter. Meanwhile Lycus married Dirce, who suspected that her husband still kept the company of Antiope, upon which she imprisoned her. Antiope however escaped from her confinement, and brought forth on mount Cithæron. Some authors have called her daughter of Asopus, because she was born on the banks of that river. The Schol. iast on Apollon. 1, v. 735, maintains that there were two persons of the name, one the daughter of Nycteus, and the other of Asopus, and mother of Amphion and Zethus. Paus. 2, c. 6, l. 9, c. 17.—Ovid. 6. Met. v. 110—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Propert. 3, el. 15.—Hom. Od. 11, v. 259.—Hygin. fab. 7, 8, and 155.—A daughter of Mars, queen of the Amazons, taken prisoner by Hercules, and given in marriage to Theseus. She is also called Hippolyte. vid Hippolyte.

ANTIPIROS, a small island in the Ægean sea, opposite Paros, [and separated from it by a strait about 7 miles wide. Its most ancient name was Olearos, and it was settled by a colony of Sidonians. This island is famous for its grotto, which is of great depth, and was believed by the ancient Greeks to communicate beneath the waters with some of the neighbouring islands.]

ANTIPIATER, [a Macedonian of noble birth, distinguished by his natural talents and excellent education. He was minister to Philip, and during the absence of Alexander in Asia, was governor of Macedonia, and of all Greece.] Antipater exerted himself in the cause of his king; he made war against Sparta, and was soon after called into Persia with a reinforcement by Alexander. He has been suspected of giving poison to Alexander, to raise himself to power.—After Alexander's death, his generals divided the empire among themselves, and [the government of the European provinces] was allotted to Antipater. The wars which Greece, and chiefly Athens, meditated during Alexander's life, now burst forth with uncommon fury as soon as the news of his death was received. The Athenians levied an army of 30,000 men, and equipped 200 ships against Antipater, who was master of Macedonia. Their expedition was attended with much success. Antipater was routed in Thessaly, and even besieged in the town of Lamia. But when Leosthenes the Athenian general was mortally wounded under the walls of Lamia, the fortune of the war was changed. Antipater obliged the enemy to raise the siege, and soon after received a reinforcement from Craterus from Asia, with which he conquered the Athenians at Cranon in Thessaly. After this defeat, Antipater and Craterus marched into Bœotia, and conquered the Ætolians, and granted peace to the Athenians, on the conditions which Leosthenes had proposed to Antipater when besieged in Lamia, viz. that he should be absolute master over them. Besides this, he demanded from their ambassadors, Demades Phocion and Xenocrates, that they should deliver into their hands the orators Demosthenes and Hyperides, whose eloquence had inflamed the minds of their countrymen, and had been the primary causes of the war. The conditions were accepted, [the popular government, that of Solon, was abolished, and a Macedonian governor with a garrison was stationed in Athens.] Antipater and Craterus were the first who made hostile preparations against Perdiccas; and during that time, Polysperchon defeated the Ætolians, who made an invasion into Macedonia. Antipater gave assistance to Eumenes in Asia, against Antigonus according to Justin. 14, c. 2. At his death, B. C. 319, Antipater appointed Polysperchon master of all his possessions; and as he was the oldest of all the generals and successors of Alexander, he recommended that he might be the supreme ruler in their councils, that every thing might be done according to his judgment. As for his son Cassander, he left him in a subordinate station under Polysperchon. But Cassander was of too aspiring a disposition tamely to obey his father's injunctions. He recovered Macedonia, and made himself absolute. Curt. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 10.—Justin. 11, 12, 13, &c.—Diod. 17, 18, &c. C. Nep. in Phoc. & Eumen.—Plut. in Eumen. Alexand. &c.—A son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, and son-in-law of Lysimachus. He killed his mother, because she wished his brother Alexander to succeed to the throne. Alexander, to revenge the death of his mother, solicited the assistance of Demetrius; but peace was re-established between the two brothers by the advice of Lysimachus, and soon after Demetrius killed Antipater, and made himself king of Macedonia, 294 B. C. Justin. 26, c. 1.—A king of Macedonia, who reigned only 45 days, 277 B. C.—A powerful prince, father to Herod. He was appointed governor of Judea by Cæsar, whom he had assisted in the Alexandrine war. Joseph.—A celebrated sophist of Hieropolis, preceptor to the children of the emperor Severus.—[A philosopher of Sidon, or Tarsus, commended by Cicero and Seneca, flourished about 80 B. C. He was the disciple and successor of Diogenes the Babylonian, and his chief opponent was Carneades.]—A disciple of Aristotle, who wrote two books of letters.—A poet of Thessalonica, in the age of Augustus.

ANTIPATRIA, a city of Macedonia, [on the eastern confines, north-east of Nicæa.] Liv. 31, c. 27.

ANTIPATRIS, [or Capharsaba, a town of Palestine, situate in Samaria, near the coast, south-east of Apollonias. It was rebuilt by Herod the Great, and called Antipatris, in honour of his father Antipater.]

ANTIPHANES, an ingenious statuary of Argos. Paus. 5, c. 17.—A comic poet of Rhodes, or rather of Smyrna, who wrote above 90 comedies, and died in the 74th year of his age, by the fall of an apple upon his head.—A physician of Delos, who used to say that diseases originated from the variety of food that was eaten. Clem. Alex.—Athen.

ANTIPHATES, a king of the Læstrygones, descended from Lamus, the founder of Formis. Ulysses, returning from Troy, came upon his coast, and sent three men to examine the country. Antiphates devoured one of them, and pursued the others, and sunk the fleet of Ulysses with stones, except the ship in which Ulysses was. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 232.

ANTIPHILI PORTUS, a harbour on the African side of the Red Sea. Strab. 16.

ANTIPHILUS, an Athenian who succeeded Leosthenes at the siege of Lamia against Antipater. Diod. 18.—A noble painter, who represented a youth leaning over a fire and blowing it, from which the whole house seemed to be illuminated. He was an Egyptian by birth; he imitated Apelles, and was disciple to Ctesidemus. Plin. 35, c. 10.

ANTIPHON, a poet.—A native of Rhamnus, called Nestor, from his eloquence and prudence. [He was the first who wrote precepts on oratory. He exerted himself in establishing the tyranny of the 400 at Athens, and was for this offence condemned and executed. 60 orations under his name were formerly extant, but there now remain only 16. They are printed in the editions of the Greek Orators.]—An Athenian who interpreted dreams, and wrote an history of his art. Cic. de Div. 1 and 2.—A poet of Attica, who wrote tragedies, epic poems, and orations. Dionysius put him to death, because he refused to praise his compositions. Being once asked by the tyrant, what brass was the best? he answered, that with which the statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton were made. Plut.—Aristot.

ANTIPHUS, a son of Thessalus, grandson to Hercules. He went to the Trojan war in 30 ships. Homer. Il. 2, v. 185.—A brother of Ctimenus, was son of Ganymetor the Naupactian. These two brothers murdered the poet Hesiod, on the false suspicion that he had offered violence to their sister, and threw his body into the sea. The poet's dog discovered them, and they were seized and convicted of the murder. Plut. de Solert. Anim.

ANTIPŒLIS, a city of Gaul, [on the coast of the Mediterranean, south-east of the river Varus, built and colonised by the Massilians. It is now Antibes.] Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 15.

ANTIRRHĪUM, a promontory of Ætolia, opposite Rhium in Peloponnesus, whence the name. [It is on the Sinus Corinthiacus or Gulf of Lepanto. The two promontories, being fortified with castles, have been called the Dardanelles of Lepanto.]

ANTISSA, [a city of Lesbos, between the promontory Sigeum and Methymne. Having offended the Romans, it was depopulated by Labeo, and the inhabitants were removed to Methymne. It was afterwards rebuilt, and is supposed to have been insulated by an arm of the sea from the rest of the island. Hence the name Antissa, it being opposite to Lesbos, whose more ancient name was Issa. Strab. 1.—Plin. 2, c. 91.]

ANTISTHĒNES, a philosopher [founder of the Cynic sect,] born of an Athenian father and of a Phrygian mother. He taught rhetoric, and had among his pupils the famous Diogenes; but when he had heard Socrates, he shut up his school, and told his pupils, "Go seek for yourselves a master, I have now found one." One of his pupils asked him what philosophy had taught him? "To live with myself," said he. He sold his all, and preserved only a very ragged coat, which drew the attention of Socrates, and tempted him to say to the cynic, who carried his contempt of dress too far, "Antisthenes, I see thy vanity through the holes of thy coat." [He paid little regard to the gods and the religion of his country, though, as might be expected from a disciple of Socrates, he thought justly respecting the Supreme Being. He wrote many books, of which none are extant, except two declamations under the names of Ajax and Ulysses. These were published in the collection of ancient orators by Aldus in 1513; by H. Stephens in 1575, and by Canter, as an appendix to his edition of Aristides, printed at Basle in 1566.] His doctrines of austerity were followed as long as he was himself an example of the cynical character, but after his death they were all forgotten. Antisthenes flourished 396 years B. C. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 36.—Diod. 6.—Plut. in Lyc.

ANTISTIUS LABEŒ, an excellent lawyer at Rome, who defended in bold language, the liberties of his country against Augustus, [for which Horace, paying court to Augustus, taxes him with madness.] Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 82.—Sueton. in Aug. 54.—Petro of Gabii, was the author of a celebrated treaty between Rome and his country, in the age of Tarquin the Proud. Dionys. Hal. 4.

ANTITAVRUS, [a chain of mountains, running from Armenia through Cappadocia to the west and south-west. It connects itself with the chain of Mount Taurus, between Cataonia and Lycaonia. vid. Paryadres. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. Vol. 6, part. 2, p. 5.]

ANTIUM, a maritime town of Italy, built by Ascanius, or, according to others, by a son of Ulysses and Circe, upon a promontory 32 miles from Ostia. It was the capital of the Volsci, who made war against the Romans, for above 200 years. Camillus took it, and carried all the beaks of their ships to Rome, and placed them in the forum, on a tribunal, which from thence was called Rostra. This town was dedicated to the goddess of fortune, [who had here a splendid temple. Nero was born in this city. It is now Anzio.] Cic. de Div. 1.—Horat. 1, od. 35.—Liv. 8, c. 14.

ANTOMĒNES, the last king of Corinth. After his death, magistrates with regal authority were chosen annually.

ANTŒNIA LEX, was enacted by M. Antony, the consul, A. U. C. 710. It abrogated the Lex Atia, and renewed the Lex Cornelia, by taking away from the people the privilege of choosing priests, and restoring it to the college of priests, to which it originally belonged. Dio. 44.—Another by the same. It allowed an appeal to the people, to those who were condemned de majestate, or of perfidious measures against the state.—Another by the same, during his triumvirate. It made it a capital offence to propose ever after the election of a dictator, and for any person to accept of the office. Appian. de Bell. Civ. 3.

ANTŒNIA, a daughter of M. Antony, by Octavia. She married Domitius Ænobarbus, and was mother of Nero, and two daughters.—A sister of Germanicus.—The wife of Drusus the son of Livia, and brother to Tiberius. She became mother of three children, Germanicus, Caligula's father; Claudius the emperor: and the debauched Livia. Her husband died very early, and she never would marry again, but spent her time in the education of her children. Some people suppose her grandson Caligula ordered her to be poisoned, A. D. 38. Val. Max. 4, c. 3.—A castle of Jerusalem, which received this name in honour of M. Antony. [Its previous name was Baris. It was situate at the north-west angle of the temple on a steep hill, and founded by Hyrcanus. Herod enlarged and fortified it, and called it Antonia. It was taken by Titus, who thus became master of the temple and city, as it commanded both. Joseph. Bell. Jud. 5, c. 15.]

ANTONĪNUS PIUS, [or Titus Aurelius Fulvius Boionius Antoninus,] was adopted by the emperor Adrian, to whom he succeeded. The prince is remarkable for all the virtues that can form a perfect statesman, philosopher, and king. He rebuilt whatever cities had been destroyed by wars in former reigns.

In cases of famine or inundation, he relieved the distressed, and supplied their wants with his own money. He suffered the governors of the provinces to remain long in the administration, that no opportunity of extortion might be given to new-comers. In his conduct towards his subjects, he behaved with affability and humanity, and listened with patience to every complaint brought before him. When told of conquering heroes, he said with Scipio, I prefer the life and preservation of a citizen, to the death 100 enemies. He did not persecute the christians like his predecessors, but his life was a scene of universal benevolence. His last moments were easy, though preceded by a lingering illness. When consul of Asia, he lodged at Smyrna in the house of a sophist, who in civility obliged the governor to change his house at night. The sophist, when Antoninus became emperor, visited Rome, and was jocosely desired to use the palace as his own house, without any apprehension of being turned out at night. He extended the boundaries of the Roman province in Britain, by means of his general Lollius Urbicus, who, having reconquered the Mæatæ, restored the second wall of Agricola, which is hence commonly called the val-lum Antonini. It lay between the Clyde and Forth. vid. Britannia;] but he waged no wars during his reign, and only repulsed the enemies of the empire who appeared in the field. He died in the 75th year of his age, after a reign of 29 years, A. D. 161. He was succeeded by his adopted son M. Aurelius Antoninus, surnamed the philosopher, a prince as virtuous as his father. [He raised to the imperial dignity L. Aurelius Commodus, who had been equally intended for the succession along with him by Antoninus Pius, but had been excluded by the latter on account of his vices. He gave him his own original name of Verus, by which he was afterwards known.] His voluptuousness and dissipation were as conspicuous as the moderation of the philosopher. During their reign, the Quadi, Parthians, and Marcomanni were defeated. Antoninus wrote a book in Greek, entitled, τακταῖς αὐτοῦ, concerning himself, the best editions of which are the 4to. Cantab. 1652, and the 8vo. Oxon. 1704. After the war with the Quadi had been finished, Verus died of an apoplexy, and Antoninus survived him eight years, and died [at Vindobona, now Vienna, of a pestilential disorder which prevailed in the army, in the 57th year of his age, after a reign of somewhat more than 19 years.] Dio. Cassius.—Basianus Caracalla, son of the emperor Septimus Severus, was celebrated for his cruelties. He killed his brother Geta in his mother's arms, and attempted to destroy the writings of Aristotle, observing that Aristotle was one of those who sent poison to Alexander. He married his mother, and publicly lived with her, which gave occasion to the people of Alexandria to say that he was an Œdipus, and his wife a Jocasta. This joke was fatal to them; and the emperor, to punish their ill language, slaughtered many thousands in Alexandria. After assuming the name and dress of Achilles, and styling himself the conqueror of provinces he had never seen, he was assassinated at Edessa by Macrinus, April 8, in the 43d year of his age, A. D. 217. His body was sent to his wife Julia, who stabbed herself at the sight.—There is extant a Greek itinerary, and another book called Iter Britannicum, which some have attributed to the emperor Antoninus, though it was more probably written by a person of that name whose age is unknown.

[ANTONINOPŒLIS, a city of Mesopotamia, placed by D'Anville on the northern confines of the country, but more correctly by Mannert in the vicinity, and to the north-east of Charræ and Edessa. It is supposed to have been founded by Severus or Caracalla, and named after the Emperor Antoninus. It was subsequently called Constantia, from Constantine, who enlarged and strengthened it. Mannert supposes it to be the same with the ruined city of Uran Schar, mentioned by Niebuhr.]

M. ANTONIUS GNIPHO, a poet of Gaul who taught rhetoric at Rome; Cicero and other illustrious men frequented his school. He never asked any thing for his lectures, whence he received more from the liberality of his pupils. Sueton. de Illust. Gr. 7.—An orator, grandfather to the triumvir of the same name. He was killed in the civil wars of Marius, and his head was hung in the forum. Val. Max. 9, c. 3.—Lucan. 2, v. 121.—Marcus, the eldest son of the orator of the same name, by means of Cotta and Cethegus, obtained from the senate the office of managing the corn on the maritime coasts of the Mediterranean with unlimited power. This gave him many opportunities of plundering the provinces and enriching himself. Sallust. Frag.—Caius, another son of the orator of that name, who obtained a troop of horse from Sylla, and plundered Achaia. He was carried before the prætor M. Lucullus, and banished from the senate by the censors, for pillaging the allies, and refusing to appear when summoned before justice.—Caius, son of Antonius Caius, was consul with Cicero.—Marcus, the triumvir, was grandson to the orator M. Antonius, and son of Antonius, surnamed Cretensis, from his wars in Crete. He was augur and tribune of the people, in which he distinguished himself by his ambitious views. He always entertained a secret resentment against Cicero, which arose from Cicero's having put to death Corn. Lentulus, who was concerned in Catiline's conspiracy. This Lentulus had married Antonius's mother after his father's death. When the senate was torn by the factions of Pompey's and Cæsar's adherents, Antony proposed that both should lay aside the command of their armies in the provinces; but as this proposition met not with success, he privately retired from Rome to the camp of Cæsar, and advised him to march his army to Rome. In support of his attachment, he commanded the left wing of his army at Pharsalia, and according to a premeditated scheme, offered him a diadem in the presence of the Roman people. When Cæsar was assassinated in the senate-house, his friend Antony spoke an oration over his body; and to ingratiate himself and his party with the populace, he reminded them of the liberal treatment they had received from Cæsar. [Antony soon became powerful, and began to tread in Cæsar's footsteps, and govern with absolute sway. The arrival of Octavius at Rome, thwarted, however, his ambitious views. The latter soon raised a formidable party in the Senate, and was strengthened by the accession of Cicero to his cause. Violent quarrels soon ensued between Octavius and Antony. Endeavours were used to reconcile them, but in vain. Antony, in order to have a pretence of sending for the legions from Macedonia, prevailed on the people to grant him the government of Cisalpine Gaul, which the senate had before conferred on Decimus Brutus, one of the conspirators against Cæsar. Matters soon came to an open rupture. Octavius offered his aid to the senate, who accepted it, and passed a decree, approving of his conduct and that of Brutus, who at the head of three legions was preparing to oppose Antony, then on his march to seize Cisalpine Gaul. Brutus, not being strong enough to keep the field against Antony, shut himself up in Mutina, where his opponent besieged him. The senate declared Antony an enemy to his country. The Consuls Hirtius and Pansa took the field against him along with Octavius, and advanced to Mutina in order to raise the siege. In the first engagement Antony had the advantage and Pansa was mortally wounded, but he was defeated the same day by Hirtius as he was returning to his camp. In a subsequent engagement, Antony was again vanquished, his lines were forced, and Octavius had an opportunity of distinguishing himself, Hirtius being slain in the action, and the whole command devolving on the former. Antony, after this check, abandoned the siege of Mutina, and crossed the Alps, in hopes of receiving succours from his friends. This was all that Octavius wanted; his intent was to humble Antony, not to destroy him, foreseeing plainly that the republican party would be uppermost, and his own ruin must soon ensue. A reconciliation was soon effected between him and Antony, who had already gained an accession of strength by the junction of Lepidus. These three leaders had an interview near Bononia, in a small island of the river Rheus, where they came to an agreement to divide all the provinces of the empire and the supreme authority among themselves for five years, under the name of triumvirs, and as reformers of the republic with consular power. Thus was formed the second triumvirate. The most horrid part of the transaction was the cold-blooded proscription of many of their friends, and relatives, and Cicero's head was given in exchange by Augustus for Antony's uncle and for the uncle of Lepidus. Octavius and Antony then passed into Macedonia and defeated Brutus and Cassius at Philippi. After this, the latter passed over to the eastern provinces, where he lived for a time in great dissipation and luxury with the famous Cleopatra at Alexandria. Upon the death of his wife Fulvia, he became reconciled with Octavius, against whom Fulvia had raised an army in Italy, for the purpose, it is supposed, of drawing her husband away from Cleopatra and inducing him to come to the latter country. Augustus gave Antony his sister Octavia in marriage, and a new division was made of the empire. Octavius had Dalmatia, Italy, the two Gauls, Spain, and Sardinia, Antony all the provinces east of Codropolis in Illyricum, as far as the Euphrates, while Lepidus received Africa. On returning to the east, Antony once more became enslaved by the charms of Cleopatra. An unsuccessful expedition against the Parthians ensued, and at last the repudiation of Octavia involved him in a new war with Octavius. The battle of Actium put an end to this contest and to all the hopes of Antony. It was fought at sea, contrary to the advice of Antony's best officers, and chiefly through the persuasion of Cleopatra, who was proud of her naval force. She abandoned him in the midst of the fight with her 50 gallees, and took to flight. This drew Antony from the battle and ruined his cause.]—After the battle of Actium, Antony followed Cleopatra into Egypt, where he was soon informed of the defection of all his allies and adherents, and saw the conqueror on his shores. He stabbed himself, and Cleopatra likewise killed herself by the bite of an asp. Antony died in the 56th year of his age, B. C. 30, and the conqueror shed tears when he was informed that his enemy was no more. Antony left seven children by his three wives. He has been blamed for his great effeminacy, for his uncommon love of pleasures, and his fondness of drinking. It is said that he wrote a book in praise of drunkenness. He was fond of imitating Hercules, from whom, according to some accounts, he was descended; and he is often represented as Hercules, with Cleopatra in the form of Omphale, dressed in the arms of her submissive lover, and beating him with her sandals. In his public character, Antony was brave and courageous, but with the intrepidity of Cæsar, he possessed all his voluptuous inclinations. He was prodigal to a degree, and did not scruple to call, from vanity, his sons by Cleopatra, kings of kings. His fondness for low company, and his debauchery, form the best parts of Cicero's Philippics. It is said that the night after Cæsar's murder, Cassius supped with Antony; and being asked whether he had a dagger with him, answered, yes, if you, Antony, aspire to sovereign power. Plutarch has written an account of his life. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 685.—Horat. ep. 9.—Juv. 10, v. 122.—C. Nep. in Attic.—Cic. in Philip.—Justin. 41 and 42.—Julius, son of Antony the triumvir, by Fulvia, was consul with Paulus Fabius Maximus.

He was surnamed Africanus, and put to death by order of Augustus. Some say that he killed himself. It is supposed that he wrote an heroic poem on Diomedes, in 12 books. Horace dedicated [the 2d Ode of the 4th Book] to him. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 44.—Lucius, the triumvir's brother, was besieged in Pelusium by Augustus, and obliged to surrender himself with 300 men by famine. The conqueror spared his life. Some say that he was killed at the shrine of Cæsar.—A noble, but unfortunate youth. His father, Julius, was put to death by Augustus, for his criminal conversation with Julia, and he himself was removed by the emperor to Marseilles, on pretence of finishing his education. Tacit. 5, Ann. c. 44.—Felix, a freedman of Claudius, appointed governor of Judæa. He married Drusilla, the grand-daughter of Antony and Cleopatra. Tacit. 4, Hist. 9.—Musa, a physician of Augustus. Plin. 29.

ANŪBIS, an Egyptian deity, represented under the form of a man with the head of a dog. His worship was introduced from Egypt into Greece and Italy. [The dog was first consecrated to Anubis, afterwards the figure of this animal was substituted for that of Anubis himself, and lastly the head of a dog was annexed to a human body as an emblem of the new deity.] Diod. 1.—Lucan. 3, v. 331.—*Ovid. ANXUR, called also Terracina, a city of the Volsci, taken by the Romans, A. U. C. 348. It was sacred to [Jupiter aëvagos, or the beardless. La Cerda and others contend that in conformity with this derivation, the name of the place should be written Axur, as it is even found on some old coins; Heyne, however, rejects the Greek derivation of the name, and makes Anxur to have been a Volscian term, and the letter n to have been sometimes omitted on account of its slight sound. Heyne Comment. ad Virg. Æn. 7, v. 799. The modern name is Terracina.] Liv. 4, c. 59.—Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 26.—Lucan. 3, v. 84.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 799.

ANŶTUS, an Athenian rhetorician, who, with Melitus and Lacon, accused Socrates of impiety, and was the cause of his condemnation. These false accusers were afterwards put to death by the Athenians. Diog.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 13.—Horat. 2, Sat. 4, v. 3.—Plut. in Alcib.

[ANZARBAS, a river near the Tigris. Marcel. 18. [vid. Zabatus.]

AOLLIVS, a son of Romulus by Hersilia, afterwards called Abillius.

AON, a son of Neptune, who came to Eubœa and Bœotia, from Apulia, where he collected the inhabitants into cities, and reigned over them. They were called Aones, and the country Aonia, from him.

AONES, the inhabitants of Aonia, called afterwards Bœotia. [They, jointly with the Hyantes, succeeded the Ectenes. On the arrival of Cadmus, the Hyantes took up arms to oppose him, but the Aones submitted, and were incorporated with the Phœnicians. The Muses were called Aoniæ from Mount Helicon in Bœotia.] Paus. 9, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 3, 7, 10, 13. Trist. el. 5, v. 10. Fast. 3, v. 456, l. 4, v. 245.—Virg. G. 3, v. 11.

AONIA, one of the ancient names of Bœotia.

AŌRIS, a famous hunter, son of Aras, king of Corinth. He was so fond of his sister Arathyræa, that he called part of the country by her name. Paus. 2, c. 12.—The wife of Neleus, called more commonly Chloris. Id. 9, c. 36.

AORNOS, AORNUS, AORNIS, a lofty rock in India, taken by Alexander. Hercules had besieged it, but was never able to conquer it. [It was situate on the Suastus or Suvat, and is now called Renas.] Curt. 8, c. 11.—Arian. 4.—Strab. 15.—Plut. in Alex.—[Another in Bactriana, east of Zariaspa Bactra. It is now Telckan, situate on a high mountain called Nork-Koh, or the mountain of silver.]—Another near Baizæ and Puteoli. It was also called Avernus. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 242.

[AORSI, a people on the shores of the Caspian, who, according to Strabo, carried on a trade in gold and various articles of merchandise with southern Asia and with India.]

APĀMA, a daughter of Artaxerxes, who married Parnabazus, satrap of Ionia.—A daughter of Antiochus. Paus. 1, c. 8.

APĀME, the mother of Nicomedes by Prusias king of Bithynia.—The mother of Antiochus Soter, by Seleucus Nicator.

APAMIA or APAMEA [a city of Phrygia, built by Antiochus Soter, on the site of the ancient Cibotus. The latter place was so called from κιβωτος, an ark or coffer, because it was the mart or common treasury of those who traded from Italy and Greece to Asia Minor. This name was afterwards added for a similar reason to Apamea. It was situate at the confluence of the Marsyas and Mæander, and is now called Aphiom-Kara-Hisar, or the black castle of opium, which drug is collected in its environs.—Another in Bithynia, originally called Myrlea, but destroyed by Philip, father of Perseus, and rebuilt by Prusias, who called it after his wife's name Apamea.—Another in Syria, at the confluence of the Orontes and Marsyas, which form a small lake. It was founded by Seleucus Nicator, and called after his wife. It is now Famieh. Seleucus is said to have kept in the adjacent pastures 500 war elephants.—Another in Mesopotamia, on the Tigris, in a district which lay between the canal and the river, whence the epithet Messene applied to this city, because it was in the midst of that small territory which is now called Digel.—Another on the confines of Media and Parthia, not far from Ragæ. It was surnamed Raphane.—Another at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates, now Koma.]

APATŪRIA, a festival at Athens, which received its name from απατη, deceit, because it was instituted in memory of a stratagem by which Xanthus king of Bœotia was killed by Melanthus king of Athens, upon the following occasion. When a war arose between the Bœotians and Athenians about a piece of ground which divided their territories, Xanthus made a proposal to the Athenian king to decide the battle by single combat. Thymætes, who was then on the throne of Athens, refused, but his successor Melanthus accepted the challenge. When they began the engagement, Melanthus exclaimed, that his antagonist had some person behind him to support him; upon which Xanthus looked behind, and was killed by Melanthus. From this success, Jupiter was called απατηνωξ, deceiver, and Bacchus, who was supposed to be behind Xanthus, was called Μελανχιτις, clothed in the skin of a black goat. Some derive the word from απατογια, i. e. ομοτογια, because on the day of the festival, the children accompanied their fathers to be registered among the citizens. The festival lasted three days, the first day was called δογια, because suppers, δογοι, were prepared for each separate tribe. The second day was called αναγγουσις, απο του αναγρειν, because sacrifices were offered to Jupiter and Minerva, and the head of the victims was generally turned up towards the heavens. The third was called Κυριωσις, from Κυριος, a youth, or Κυριζ, shaving, because the young men had their hair cut off before they were registered, when their parents swore that they were free-born Athenians. They generally sacrificed two ewes and a she-goat to Diana. This festival was adopted by the Ionians, except the inhabitants of Ephesus and Colophon.—A surname of Minerva—of Venus.

APELLA, a word, Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 10. which has given much trouble to critics and commentators. Some suppose it to mean circumcised (sine pelle) an epithet highly applicable to a Jew. Others maintain that it is a proper name, upon the authority of Cicero, ad Attic. 12, ep. 19, who mentions a person of the same name. [vid. Bentley, ep. ad Mill p. 520, ed. Lips.]

APELLES, a celebrated painter of Cos, or, as others say, of Ephesus, or Colophon, son of Pithius. He lived in the age of Alexander the Great, who honoured him so much that he forbade any man but Apelles to draw his picture. He was so attentive to his profession, that he never spent a day without employing his pencil, whence the proverb of Nulla dies sine lineâ. His most perfect picture was Venus Anadyomene. [The lower part of this became injured by time, but no one ventured to repair it. An unfinished Venus, of which the head and neck only were executed, was very much admired.] He made a painting of Alexander holding thunder in his hand, so much like life, that Pliny, who saw it, says that the hand of the king with the thunder seemed to come out of the picture. This picture was placed in Diana's temple at Ephesus. He made another of Alexander, but the king expressed not much satisfaction at the sight of it; and at that moment a horse passing by, neighed at the horse which was represented in the piece, supposing it to be alive; upon which the painter said, "One would imagine that the horse is a better judge of painting than your majesty." When Alexander ordered him to draw the picture of Campaspe, one of his mistresses, Apelles became enamoured of her, and the king permitted him to marry her.—He wrote three volumes upon painting, which were still extant in the age of Pliny. It is said that he was accused in Egypt of conspiring against the life of Ptolemy, and that he would have been put to death had not the real conspirator discovered himself, and saved the painter. Apelles never put his name to any pictures but three; a sleeping Venus, Venus Anadyomene, and an Alexander. The proverb of Ne sutor ultra crepidam, is applied to him by some. Plin. 35, c. 10.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 238.—Cic. in Famil. 1, ep. 9.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 401.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.—A tragic writer. Suet. Calig. 33.—A Macedonian general. &c.

APELLICON, a Teian peripatetic philosopher, whose fondness for books was so great that he is accused of stealing them, when he could not obtain them with money. He bought the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, [vid. Scepis. On removing the library to Athens, he caused the writings of Aristotle and Theophrastus to be copied, but the chasms occasioned by the depredations of time were supplied by the transcribers, and erroneous and faulty copies were consequently circulated.] The extensive library which he had collected at Athens, was carried to Rome when Sylla had conquered the capital of Attica, and among the valuable books was found an original manuscript of Aristotle. He died about 86 years before Christ. Strab. 13.

APENNINUS, a ridge of high mountains which run through the middle of Italy. [They may be regarded as a continuation of the Martime Alps, leaving that chain in lat. 44° 12' N.] Some have supposed that they once ran across to Sicily. Lucan. 2, v. 306.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 226.—Ital. 4, v. 743.—Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

APER, MARCUS, a Latin orator of Gaul, who distinguished himself as a politician, as well as by his genius. The dialogue on orators, inserted in the works of Tacitus and Quintilian, is attributed to him. He died A. D. 85.—Another. vid. Numerianus.

APEROPPIA, a small island on the coast of Argolis. Paus. 2, c. 34.

APËSUS, APESAS, or APESANTUS, a mountain of Peloponnesus, near Lerna. Stat. in Theb. 3, v. 461.

APHËCA, a town of Palestine, [between Helopolis and Byblus,] where Venus was worshipped, and where she had a temple and an oracle. [The temple is said to have been a school of wickedness, and was rased to the ground by Constantine the Great. Euseb. vita Const. Mag. 3, 55.]

APHĒA, a name of Diana, who had a temple in Ægina. Paus. 2, c. 30.

APHĪAR, the capital city of Arabia, [situate on the coast of the Red Sea, not far north from the Promontorium Aromaticum. It is now Al-Fara, between Mecca and Medina.] Arrian. in Periplus.

APHAREUS, a king of Messenia, son of Periere and Gorgophone, who married Arene daughter of Œbairus, by whom he had three sons. Paus. 3, c. 1.—A relation of Isocrates who wrote 37 tragedies.

APHAS, a river of Epirus, which falls into the bay of Ambracia. [D'Anville calls it the Avas. It is now the Vuvu.] Plin. 4, c. 1.

APHELLAS, a king of Cyrene, who with the aid of Agathocles, endeavoured to reduce all Africa under his power. Justin. 22, c. 7.

APHĒSAS, a mountain in Argolis, whence, as the poets have imagined, Perseus attempted to fly to heaven. Stat. 3. Theb. v. 461.

APHĒTĒ, [a city of Thessaly at the entrance of the Sinus Pelasgicus or Gulf of Volo, from which the ship Argo is said to have taken her departure for Colchis. It is now Fetio.]

APHIDNĒ, a borough of Attica, which received its name from Apidnus, one of the companions of Theseus. Herodot.

APHRICES, an Indian prince, who defended the rock Aornus with 20,000 foot and 15 elephants. He was killed by his troops, and his head sent to Alexander.

APHRODISIA, festivals in honour of Venus, celebrated in different parts of Greece, but chiefly in Cyprus. They were first instituted by Cinyras from whose family the priests of the goddess were always chosen. All those that were initiated offered a piece of money to Venus, as a harlot, and received as a mark of the favours of the goddess, a measure of salt and a Φαλλος; the salt, because Venus arose from the sea; the Φαλλος, because she is the goddess of wantonness. They were celebrated at Corinth by harlots, and in every part of Greece they were very much frequented. Strab. 14.—Athen.—A city of Thrace, north of the peninsula which joins the Thracian Chersonese to the continent, between Heraclea to the east and Cardia to the west.]

APHRODISIAS, a town of Caria, sacred to Venus, [now Gheira. It lay east of Alabanda, towards the confines of Phrygia.] Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 62.

APHRODISIUM or A, a town of Apulia built by Diomedes in honour of Venus.—A city in the north-eastern part of Cyprus, nine miles from Salamis.—[An island on the coast of Bœtica.—A promontory of Caria, near Cnidus.]

[APHRODITOPŌLIS, a city of Egypt, the capital of the 36th nome, now Atfieh.—Another in the same country, the capital of the 42d nome, now Itfu.—Another in the same country, belonging to the Nome Hermonthites, now Asf-un.]

APHRODITE, the Grecian name of Venus, from ἀφροσ, froth, because Venus is said to have been born from the froth of the ocean. Hesiod. Th. 195.—Plin. 36, c. 5.

APHYTĒ or APHYTIS, a city of Thrace, [in the peninsula of Pallene, on the Sinus Thermaicus,] where Jupiter Ammon was worshipped. Lysander besieged the town; but the god of the place appeared to him in a dream, and advised him to raise the siege, which he immediately did. Paus. 3, c. 18.

APIA, an ancient name of Peloponnesus, which it received from king Apis. It was afterwards called Ægialea, Pelasgia, Argia, and at last Peloponnesus, or the island of Pelops. Homer. Il. 1, v. 270.—Also the name of the earth, worshipped among the Lydians as a powerful deity. Herodot. 4, c. 59.

APIANUS, or APIŌN, was born at Oasis in Egypt, whence he went to Alexandria, of which he was deemed a citizen. He succeeded Theus in the profession of rhetoric in the reign of Tiberius, and wrote a book against the Jews, which Josephus refuted. He was at the head of an embassy which the people of Alexandria sent to Caligula, to complain of the Jews. [He flourished about the time of the Emperor Tiberius. He was the author also of a learned treatise on the Antiquities of Egypt.] Seneca, ep. 88.—Plin. prof. Hist.

APICATA, married Sejanus, by whom she had three children. She was repudiated. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 3.

APICUS, a famous glutton in Rome.—There were three of the same name, all famous for their voracious appetite. The first lived in the time of the republic, the second in the reign of Augustus and Tiberius, and the third under Trajan. The second was the most famous, as he wrote a book on the pleasures and incitements of eating. He destroyed himself after he had consumed the greatest part of his estate. The best edition of Apicius Cælius de Arte Coquinaria, is that of Amst. 12mo. 1709. [The third was in possession of a secret for preserving oysters, and sent some perfectly fresh to the emperor Trajan as far as Parthia.] Juv. 11, v. 3.—Martial. 2, ep. 69.

APIDANUS, one of the chief rivers of Thessaly, at the south of the Peneus, into which it falls [a little west of Larissa. It is now the Salampria.] Lucan. 6, v. 372.

APINA, and APINĒ, a city of Apulia, destroyed with Tricia, in its neighbourhood, by Diomedes; whence came the proverb of Apina & Tricia, to express trifling things. Martial. 4, ep. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 11.

APIOLA, and APIOLĒ, a town of Italy, taken by Tarquin the Proud. The Roman capitul was begun with the spoils taken from that city. Plin. 3, c. 5.

APIŌN, a surname of Ptolemy, one of the descendants of Ptolemy Lagus.—A grammarian. vid Apianus.

APIS, one of the ancient kings of Peloponnesus, son of Phoroneus and Laodice. Some say that Apollo was his father, and that he was king of Argos, while others call him king of Sicyon, and fix the time of his reign above 200 years earlier, which is enough to show he is but obscurely known, if known at all. He was a native of Naupactus, and descended from Inachus. He received divine honours after death, as he had been munificent and humane to his subjects. The country where he reigned was called Apia; and afterwards it received the name of Pelasgia, Argia, or Argolis, and at last, that of Peloponnesus, from Pelops. Some, amongst whom are Varro and St. Augustine, have imagined that Apis went to Egypt, with a colony of Greeks, and that he civilized the inhabitants, and polished their manners, for which they made him a god after death, and paid divine honours to him under the name of Serapis. This tradition, according to some of the moderns, is without foundation. Æschyl. in Suppl. August. de Civ. Dei. 18, c. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—A son of Jason, born in Arcadia: he was killed by the horses of Ætolus. Paus. 5, c. 1.—A town of Egypt on the lake Mareotis.—A god of the Egyptians worshipped under the form of an ox. Some say that Isis and Osiris are the deities worshipped under this name, because during their reign they taught the Egyptians agriculture. The Egyptians believed that the soul of Osiris was really departed into the ox, where it wished to dwell, because that animal had been of the most essential service in the cultivation of the ground, which Osiris had introduced into Egypt. The ox that was chosen was always distinguished by particular marks; his body was black; he had a square white spot upon the forehead, the figure of an eagle upon the back, a knot under the tongue like a beetle, the hairs of his tail where double, and his right side was marked with a whitish spot, resembling the crescent of the moon. Without these, an ox could not be taken, as the god Apis; and it is to be imagined that the priests gave these distinguishing characteristics to the animal on whom their credit and even prosperity depended. The festival of Apis lasted seven days, [and commenced with the annual inundation of the Nile. The crescent on the animal's right side, indicated, according to Ælian, the commencement of this inundation.] The ox was led in a solemn procession by the priests, and every one was anxious to receive him into his house, and it was believed that the children who smelt his breath received the knowledge of futurity. The ox was conducted to the banks of the Nile with much ceremony, and if he had lived to the time when their sacred books allowed, they drowned him in the river, and embalmed his body, and buried it in solemn state in the city of Memphis. [The period allowed for the life of the sacred Apis was 25 years. This number was the product of five by itself, and gave the number of the letters of the Egyptian Alphabet, as well as the animal's age; and this number marked a period of the sun and moon, to which luminaries Apis was consecrated. Hence it has been inferred that Apis was the tutelary divinity of the established form given to the solar year, which was to consist invariably of 365 days, and of the Cycle of 25 years discovered at the same time. The priests, by fixing the course of the sacred animal's life to 25 years, and by making the installation of a new Apis concur with the renewal of this period, had probably perceived, as the result of long meteorological observations, that this revolution always brought about abundant seasons. Hence the favourable reception with which the new Apis would meet, his appearance coinciding with abundant harvest. The name Api in Coptic signifies number, and seems to have had reference to the number of cubits which marked the Nile's rise, the great source of Egyptian fertility.] After his death, which sometimes was natural, the greatest cries and lamentations were heard in Egypt, as if Osiris was just dead; the priests shaved their heads, which was a sign of the deepest mourning. This continued till another ox appeared with the proper characteristics to succeed as the deity, which was followed with the greatest acclamations, as if Osiris was returned to life. This ox, which was found to represent Apis, was left 40 days in the city of Nilopolis before he was carried to Memphis, during which time none but women were permitted to appear before him, and this they performed, according to their superstitious notions, in a wanton and indecent manner. There was also an ox worshipped at Heliopolis, under the name of Mnevis; some supposed that he was Osiris, but others maintain that the Apis of Memphis was sacred to Osiris, and Mnevis to Isis. When Cambyses came into Egypt, the people were celebrating the festivals of Apis with every mark of joy and triumph, which the conqueror interpreted as an insult upon himself. He called the priests of Apis, and ordered the deity himself to come before him. When he saw that an ox was the object of their veneration, and the cause of such rejoicings, he wounded it on the thigh, ordered the priests to be chastised, and commanded his soldiers to slaughter such as were found celebrating such riotous festivals. The god Apis had generally two stables, or rather temples. If he eat from the hand, it was a favourable omen; but if he refused the food that was offered him, it was interpreted as unlucky. From this, Germanicus, when he visited Egypt, drew the omens of his approaching death. When his oracle was consulted, incense was burnt on an altar, and a piece of money placed upon it, after which the people that wished to know futurity, applied their ear to the mouth of the God and immediately retired, stopping their ears till they had departed from the temple. The first sounds that were heard, were taken as the answer of the oracle to their questions. Paus. 7, c. 22.—Herodot. 2 and 3.—Plin. 8, c. 38, &c.—Strab. 7.—Plut. in Isid. and Osir.—Apollod.

APITUS GALBA, a celebrated buffoon in the time of Tiberius. Juv. 5, v. 4.

APOLLINĀRES LUDI, games celebrated at Rome in honour of Apollo. They originated from the following circumstances; an old prophetic poem informed the Romans, that if they instituted yearly games to Apollo, and made a collection of money for his service, they would be able to repel the enemy whose approach already signified their destruction. The first time they were celebrated, Rome was alarmed by the approach of the enemy, and instantly the people rushed out of the city, and saw a cloud of arrows discharged from the sky on the troops of the enemy. With this heavenly assistance they easily obtained the victory. The people generally sat crowned with laurel at the representation of these games, which were usually celebrated at the option of the prætor till the year U. C. 545, when a law was passed to settle the celebration yearly on the same day, about the nones of July. When this alteration happened, Rome was infested with a dreadful pestilence, which however, seemed to be appeased by this act of religion. [These games were merely scenical.] Liv. 25, c. 12.

APOLLINĀRIS, C. Sulpitius, a grammarian of Carthage, [flourished in the second century, under the Antonines. He was succeeded in his profession by his scholar Helvius Pertinax, who afterwards became Emperor.] He is supposed to be the author of the verses prefixed to Terence's plays as arguments.—A writer better known by the name of Sidonius. vid. Sidonius.

[APOLLINIS Promontorium, was situate on the coast of Africa, east of Utica, and north of Carthage. It is now Ras-Zebid.]

[APOLLINOPŌLIS magna, the capital of the 52d Egyptian Nome, in the southern part of Uper Egypt, about 25 miles nearly north of the great cataracts. It is now Edfou, and is remarkable for its splendid temple, in a state of high preservation.]

[APOLLINOPŌLIS parva, a city of Egypt in the Nome of Coptos, north-west of Thebes. It is now Kous.]

[APOLLINIS funum, a town of Lydia, west of Thyatira.—A town of Africa propria, north-east of Tabraca.]

APOLLO, son of Jupiter and Latona, called also Phœbus, is often confounded with the sun. [vid. the end of this article.] According to Cicero, there were four persons of this name. The first was son of Vulcan, and the tutelary god of the Athenians. The second was son of a Corybæus, and was born in Crete, for the dominion of which he disputed even with Jupiter himself. The third was son of Jupiter and Latona, and came from the nations of the Hyperboreans to Delphi. The fourth was born in Arcadia, and called Nomius, because he gave laws to the inhabitants. To the son of Jupiter and Latona all the actions of the others seem to have been attributed. The Apollo, son of Vulcan, was the same as the Orus or Horus of the Egyptians, and was the most ancient, from whom the actions of the others have been copied. The three others seem to be of Grecian origin. The tradition that the son of Latona was born in the floating island of Delos, is taken from the Egyptian mythology, which asserts that the son of Vulcan, which is supposed to be Orus, was saved by his mother Isis from the persecution of Typhon, and intrusted to the care of Latona, who concealed him in the island of Chemmis. When Latona was pregnant by Jupiter, Juno, who was ever jealous of her husband's amours, raised the serpent Python to torment Latona, who was refused a place to give birth to her children, till Neptune, moved at the severity of her fate, raised the island of Delos from beneath the sea, where Latona brought forth Apollo and Diana. Apollo was the god of all the fine arts, of medicine, music, poetry, and eloquence, of all which he was deemed the inventor. He had received from Jupiter the power of knowing futurity, and he was the only one of the gods whose oracles were in general reputed over the world. His amours with Leucothoe, Daphne, Issa, Bolina, Coronis, Clymene, Cyrene, Chione, Acacallis, Calliope, &c. are well known, and the various shapes he assumed to gratify his passion. He was very fond of young Hyacinthus, whom he accidentally killed with a quoit; as also of Cypris, who was changed into a cypress tree. When his son Æsculapius had been killed with the thunders of Jupiter, for raising the dead to life, Apollo, in his resentment, killed the Cyclops who had fabricated the thunderbolts. Jupiter was incensed at this act of violence, and he banished Apollo from heaven, and deprived him of his dignity. The exiled deity came to Admetus king of Thessaly, and hired himself to be one of his shepherds, in which ignoble employment he remained nine years; from which circumstance he was called the god of shepherds, and at his sacrifices a wolf was generally offered, as that animal is the declared enemy of the sheepfold. During his residence in Thessaly, he rewarded the tender treatment of Admetus. He gave him a chariot, drawn by a lion and a bull, with which he was able to obtain in marriage Alceste the daughter of Pelias; and soon after, the Paræ granted, at Apollo's request, that Admetus might be redeemed from death, if another person laid down his life for him. He assisted Neptune in building the walls of Troy; and when he was refused the promised reward from Laomedon, the king of the country, he destroyed the inhabitants by a pestilence. As soon as he was born, Apollo destroyed with arrows the serpent Python, whom Juno had sent to persecute Latona; hence he was called Pythonius; and he afterwards vindicated the honour of his mother by putting to death the children of the proud Niobe. vid. Niobe. He was not the inventor of the lyre, as some have imagined, but Mercury gave it him, and received as a reward the famous caduceus with which Apollo was wont to drive the flocks of Admetus. His contest with Pan and Marsyas, and the punishment inflicted upon Midas are well known. He received the surnames of Phœbus, Delius, Cynthius, Pæan, Delphicus, Nomius, Lycius, Clarius, Ismenius, Vulturius, Smintheus, &c. for reasons which are explained under those words. Apollo is generally represented with long hair, and the Romans were fond of imitating his figure; and therefore in their youth they were remarkable for their fine head of hair, which they cut short at the age of seventeen or eighteen; he is always represented as a tall beardless young man with a handsome shape, holding in his hand a bow, and sometimes a lyre; his head is generally surrounded with beams of light. He was the deity who, according to the notions of the ancients, inflicted plagues, and in that moment he appeared surrounded with clouds. His worship and power were universally acknowledged; he had temples and statues in every country, particularly in Egypt, Greece, and Italy. His statue, which stood upon mount Actium, as a mark to mariners to avoid the dangerous coasts, was particularly famous, and it appeared a great distance at sea. Augustus, before the battle of Actium, addressed himself to it for victory. [He is crowned with laurel, which was sacred to him. The animals consecrated to him were the wolf and hawk, as symbols of his piercing eyes; the crow and raven, from their supposed faculty of predicting the future; the cock, from his announcing the dawn and the rising of the sun; the grasshopper and swan, from their tuneful powers;] and in his sacrifices, wolves and hawks were offered, as they were the natural enemies of the flocks over which he presided. Bulls and lambs were also immolated to him. As he presided over poetry, he was often seen on mount Parnassus with the nine muses. His most famous oracles were at Delphi, Delos, Claros, Tenedos, Cyrrha, and Patara. His most splendid temple was at Delphi, where every nation and individual made considerable presents when they consulted the oracle. Augustus, after the battle of Actium, built him a temple on mount Palatine, which he enriched with a valuable library. He had a famous Colossus in Rhodes, which was one of the seven wonders of the world. Apollo has been taken for the Sun; but it may be proved by different passages in the ancient writers, that Apollo, the Sun, Phœbus, and Hyperion, were all different characters and deities, though confounded together. When once Apollo was addressed as the Sun, and represented with a crown of rays on his head, the idea was adopted by every writer, and from thence arose the mistake. [The truth appears to be, that the worship of Apollo was a remnant of Sabæism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies, and that he was a type of the Sun. He was produced from Latona, who represented the night of Chaos, (Λυθη, oblivio); and from the Sun's being the animating and sustaining principle of nature, he is represented as a musician, poet, prophet, physician, &c. See the subject discussed more at large at the end of the article Jupiter.] *Ovid. APOLLOCRATES, a friend of Dion, supposed by some to be the son of Dionysius.

APOLLODORUS, a famous grammarian and mythologist of Atheas, son of Asclepiades, and disciple to [Aristarchus the grammarian, and the two Stoic philosophers, Panætius and Diogenes the Babylonian.] He flourished about 148 years before the christian era, and wrote an history of Athens, besides other works. But of all his compositions, nothing is extant but his Bibliotheca, a valuable work, divided into three books. It is an abridged history of the gods, and of the ancient heroes, of whose actions and genealogy it gives a true and faithful account. The best edition is that of Heyne, Goett. in 8vo. 3 vols. 1782. Athen.—Plin. 7, c. 37.—Diod. 4 and 13.—A tragic poet of Cilicia, who wrote tragedies entitled Ulysses, Thyestes, &c.—A comic poet of Gela in Sicily, in the age of Menander, who wrote 4 plays.—An architect of Damascus, who directed the building of Trajan's bridge across the Danube. He was banished, and afterwards put to death by Adrian, to whom, when in a private station, he had spoken in too bold a manner.—A writer who composed an history of Parthia.—A disciple of Epicurus the most learned of his school, and deservedly surnamed the illustrious. He wrote about 40 volumes on different subjects. Diog.—A painter of Athens, of whom Zeuxis was a pupil. Two of his paintings were admired at Pergamus in the age of Pliny: a priest in a suppliant posture, and Ajax struck with Minerva's thunders. He was of such an irascible disposition that he destroyed his own pieces upon the least provocation, [and was so conscious of his superiority, that he assumed a regal tiara as the prince of his profession.] Plin. 34, c. 8.—A rhetorician of Pergamus, preceptor and friend to Augustus, who wrote a book on rhetoric. Strab. 13.

APOLLONIA, a festival at Ægialea in honour of Apollo and Diana. It arose from this circumstance: these two deities came to Ægialea, after the conquest of the serpent Python; but they were frightened away, and fled to Crete. Ægialea was soon visited with an epidemical distemper, and the inhabitants, by the advice of their prophets, sent seven chosen boys with the same number of girls, to entreat them to return to Ægialea. Apollo and Diana granted their petition, in honour of which a temple was raised to Πισθα, the goddess of persuasion; and ever after, a number of youths of both sexes were chosen to march in solemn procession, as if anxious to bring back Apollo and Diana. Pausan. in Corinth.—[A town of Epirus, now Polina, on the river Aous or Lao.—Another in Macedonia, south-east of Thessalonica.—Another in the same country, north of Chalcis, now Polina.—Another in Thrace on the coast of the Euxine, afterwards called Sozopolis, now Sizoboli.—Another in Bithynia, on a lake which receives the Rhyndacus. It is now Aboullona.—Another in Assyria, on the Delas, north-east of Artemita.—Another in Cyrenaica. Under the lower empire, it took the name of Sozusa. It is now Marza-Susa, or Sosush.—&c.]

APOLLONIUS, a stoic philosopher of Chalcis sent for by Antonius Pius, to instruct his adopted son Marcus Antoninus. When he came to Rome, he refused to go to the palace, observing, that the master ought not to wait upon his pupil, but the pupil upon him. The emperor hearing this, said, laughing, "It was then easier for Apollonius to come from Chalcis to Rome, than from Rome to the palace."—A geometriician of Perga in Pamphylia. He lived about 240 years before the christian era, and composed a commentary on Euclid, whose pupils he attended at Alexandria. [He wrote a treatise on conicsections, in eight books, seven of which only remain. It is asserted that all the books were extant in Arabic. Of the seven which we have, the first four have been preserved in the original Greek, and the 5th, 6th, and 7th have been transmitted to us, in an Arabic translation. This work of Apollonius ranks among the most valuable remains of antiquity.] He first endeavoured to explain the causes of the apparent stopping and retrograde motion of the planets, by cycles and epicycles, or circles within circles.—The best edition of Apollonius is Dr. Halley's, Oxon. fol. 1710. [The first four books in Greek and Latin, the rest in Latin only, and the last restored by the editor.]—A poet of [Alexandria] in Egypt, generally called Apollonius of Rhodes, because he lived for some time there. He was pupil, when young, to Callimachus and Parnætius, and succeeded to Eratosthenes as librarian of the famous library of Alexandria, under Ptolemy Euergetes. He was ungrateful to his master Callimachus, who wrote a poem against him, in which he denominated him Ibis. Of all his works nothing remains but his poem on the expedition of the Argonauts, in four books. [He was so mortified at the censures cast upon this poem on its first publication, that he retired to Rhodes, and opened a school of rhetoric. When he had afterwards corrected and improved his work, the Rhodians were so pleased with it, that they conferred on him the freedom of the city. The best edition of Apollonius is that by Brunck, 2 vols. 8vo. the new edition, Lips. 1810, with the additional Greek scholia, curâ G. H. Schaeffer.] Quintil. 10, c. 1.—A Greek orator, surnamed Molo, was a native of Alabanda in Caria. He opened a school of rhetoric at Rhodes and Rome, and had J. Cæsar and Cicero among his pupils. He discouraged the attendance of those whom he supposed incapable of distinguishing themselves as orators, and he recommended to them pursuits more congenial to their abilities. He wrote an history, in which he did not candidly treat the people of Judæa, according to the complaint of Josephus contra Apion. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 28, 75, 126, and 130. Ad Famil. 3, ep. 16. De Invent. 1, c. 81.—Quintil. 3, c. 1, l. 2, c. 6.—Suet. in Cæs. 4.—Plut. in Cæs.—A Greek historian about the age of Augustus, who wrote upon the philosophy of Zeno and of his followers. Strab. 14.—A stoic philosopher who attended Cato of Utica in his last moments. Plut. in Cat.—Tyaneus, a Pythagorean philosopher, [and notorious impostor, born at Tyana in Cappadocia, about the commencement of the christian era.] Being one day haranguing the populace at Ephesus, he suddenly exclaimed, "Strike the tyrant, strike him: the blow is given, he is wounded, and fallen!" At that very moment the emperor Domitian had been stabbed at Rome. The magician acquired much reputation when this circumstance was known. He was courted by kings and princes, and commanded unusual attention by his numberless artifices. His friend and companion, called Damis, wrote his life. [These memoirs were communicated to the empress Julia, wife of Severus, and by her to Philostratus, with a request that he would transcribe and embellish the narrative.] In his history the biographer relates so many curious and extraordinary anecdotes of his hero, that many have justly deemed it a romance; yet for all this, Hierocles had the presumption to compare the impostures of Apollonius with the miracles of Jesus Christ. [The best edition of Philostratus is that of Olearius, Lips. 1709, fol.]—A sophist of Alexandria, distinguished for his Lexicon Græcum Iliadis et Odyssee, a book that was edited by Villoison, in 4to. 2 vols. Paris, 1773, [and by Tollius, Lugd. Bat. 1788, in 8vo.] Apollonius was one of the pupils of Didymus, and flourished in the beginning of the first century.

[ΑΠΟΜΥΣ, a name, under which Jupiter and Hercules were worshipped at the Olympian games, being supplicated to destroy or drive away the vast numbers of flies which always attended great sacrifices. The sacrifice to the Apomyus Deus on these occasions, was always the first, that he might drive away the flies from the rest.]

APONIANA, an island near Lilybæum. Hirt. Afric. 2.

M. APONIUS, a governor of Mœsia, rewarded with a triumphal statue by Otho, for defeating 9000 barbarians. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 79.

APŌNVS, now Abano, a fountain, with a village of the same name near Patavium in Italy. The waters of the fountain, which were hot, were wholesome, and were supposed to have an oracular power. [It was Livy's birth-place, according to Martial, 1, 62.] Lucan. 7, v. 194.—Suet. in Tiber. 14.

APOSTROPHIA, a surname of Venus in Bœotia, who was distinguished under these names, Venus Urania, Vulgaria, and Apostrophia. The former was the patroness of a pure and chaste love; the second of carnal and sensual desires; and the last incited men to illicit and unnatural gratifications, to incests and rapes. Venus Apostrophia was invoked by the Thebans, that they might be saved from such unlawful desires. She is the same as the Verticordia of the Romans. Paus. 9, c. 16.—Val. Max. 8, c. 15.

APOTHEŌSIS, a ceremony observed by some ancient nations, by which they raised their kings, heroes, and great men, to the rank of deities. [Neither the Egyptians nor Persians seem to have adopted this custom. The Greeks were the first who admitted it. The Romans borrowed it from them, and not only deified the most prudent and humane of their emperors, but also the most cruel and profligate. Augustus, at the age of 28 years, was declared the tutelary god of all the cities of the empire.] Herodian. 4, c. 2, has left us an account of the apotheosis of a Roman emperor. After the body of the deceased was burnt, an ivory image was laid on a couch for seven days, representing the emperor with a sickly aspect. The city was in sorrow. [For the greater part of the day, the senate sat ranged on the left side of the bed, dressed in robes of mourning, the ladies of the first rank sitting on the right side in white robes, without any ornaments. During the seven days, the physicians paid regular visits to the sick person, and always reported that he grew worse, until at length they gave out that he was dead.] When the death was announced a band of young senators and Equites carried the couch and image to the Campus Martius, where it was deposited on an edifice in the form of a pyramid, where spices and combustible materials were thrown. After this the bearers walked round the pile in solemn procession, and the images of the most illustrious Romans were drawn in state, and immediately the new emperor, with a torch, set fire to the pile, and was assisted by the surrounding multitude. Meanwhile an eagle was let fly from the middle of the pile, which was supposed to carry the soul of the deceased to heaven, where he was ranked among the gods. If the deified was a female, a peacock, and not an eagle was sent from the flames.—The Greeks observed ceremonies much of the same nature.

APPIA VIA, a celebrated road leading from the Porta Capena at Rome to Brundisium, through Capua. Appius Claudius made it as far as Capua, and it received its name from him. [It was constructed, A. U. C. 441. Capua, where it ended, was then the limit of the Roman empire. By whom it was continued to Brundisium is uncertain. Cæsar, however, is generally supposed to have been the person. Its whole length was about 342 miles. It was called Regina Viarum, and was paved with the hardest flint, so firmly, that in several places it remains entire unto this day, (above 2000 years,) and so broad that two carriages might pass each other; commonly, however, not exceeding 14 feet. Caius Gracchus placed on it the small columns called termini, which marked the miles.] vid. Via. Lucan. 3, v. 285.—Stat. 2. Syll. 2, v. 12.—Mart. 9, ep. 104.—Suet. in Tiber. 14.

APPIADES, a name given to these five deities, Venus, Pallas, Vesta, Concord, and Peace, because a temple was erected to them near the Appian way. The name was also applied to those courtizans at Rome who lived near the temple of Venus by the Appiæ Aquæ, and the forum of J. Cæsar. Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 452.

APPIANVS, a Greek historian of Alexandria, who flourished A. D. 123. His universal history, which consisted of 24 books, was a series of history of all the nations that had been conquered by the Romans in the order of time; and in the composition, the writer displayed, with a style simple and unadorned, a great knowledge of military affairs, and described his battles in a masterly manner. [Appian has been charged with many errors, and with copying without acknowledgment from Polybius, Plutarch, and others. Scaliger calls him "alienorum laborum fucum." Photius, on the other hand, considers him a very accurate and eloquent writer.] This excellent work is greatly mutilated, and there is extant now only the account of the Punic, Syrian, Parthian, Mithridatic, and Spanish wars, with those of Illyricum and the civil dissensions, with a fragment of the Celtic wars. The best editions are those of Tollius and Variorum, 2 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1670, and that of Schweighæuser, 3 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1785. He was so eloquent that the emperor Trajan highly promoted him in the state.

APPII FORUM, now Burgo Longo, a little village not far from Rome, [in the country of the Volsci,] built by the consul Appius. Horat. 1, Sat. 5.

APPIUS, the prænomen of an illustrious family at Rome.—A censor of that name, A. U. C. 442. Horat. 1, Sat. 6.

APPIUS CLAUDIUS, a decemvir who abused his power. He attempted to carry off Virginia, whom her father killed to preserve her chastity. This act of violence was the cause of a revolution in the state, and the ravisher destroyed himself when cited to appear before the tribunal of his country. Liv. 3, c. 33.—Claudius Cæcus, a Roman orator, who built the Appian way and many aqueducts in Rome. When Pyrrhus, who was come to assist the Tarentines against Rome, demanded peace of the senators, Appius, grown old in the service of the republic, caused himself to be carried to the senate house, and by his authority, dissuaded them from granting a peace which would prove dishonourable to the Roman name. Ovid. Fast.

6, v, 203.—Cic. in Brut. & Tusc. 4.—A Roman who, when he heard that he had been proscribed by the triumvirs, divided his riches among his servants, and embarked with them for Sicily; in their passage the vessel was shipwrecked, and Appius alone saved his life. Appian. 4.—Claudius Crassus, a consul, who with Sp. Naut. Rutulius, conquered the Celtiberians, and was defeated by Perses, king of Macedonia. Liv.—Claudius Pulcher, a grandson of Ap. Cl. Cæcus, consul in the age of Sylla, retired from grandeur to enjoy the pleasures of a private life.—Clausus, a general of the Sabines, who, upon being ill-treated by his countrymen, retired to Rome with 5000 of his friends, and was admitted into the senate in the early ages of the republic.
Plut. in Poplic.—Herdonius, seized the capitol with 4000 exiles, A. U. C. 292, and was soon after overthrown. Liv. 3, c.
15.—Flor. 3, c. 19.—The name of Appius was common in Rome, and particularly to many consuls whose history is not marked by any uncommon event.

APRIES and APRIUS, one of the kings of Egypt [in the year before Christ 594,] supposed to be the Pharaoh Hophra of scripture.
He took Sidon, and lived in great prosperity till his subjects revolted to Amasis, by whom he was conquered and strangled. Herodot.
2, c. 159, &c.—Diod. 1.

APSINTHII, a people of Thrace, [on the coast, east of the Hebrus.] They received their name from a river called Apsinthus, which flowed through their territory. Dionys.
Perieg.

APSINUS, an Athenian sophist in the third century, author of a work called Præceptor de Arte Rhetoricâ.

APSUS, a river of Macedonia, falling into the Ionian sea between Dyrrhachium and Apollonia. [Now the Crevasta.] Lucan. 5,
v. 46.

APTËRA, an inland town of Crete. [It lay west of Cydonia. Its port was Kisshmos.
The modern name is Atteria, or Paleocastro.]
Ptol.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

[APULEIE LEGES, proposed by L. Apuleius Saturninus, A. U. C. 653, tribune of the commons; about dividing the public lands among the veteran soldiers, settling colonies, punishing crimes against the state, furnishing corn to the poor at 10 12 of an ass, a bushel.]

APULEIUS, a learned man, who was born at Madaura in Africa, [and lived in the 2d century, under the Antonines.] He studied at Carthage, Athens, and Rome, where he married a rich widow called Pudentilla, for which he was accused by some of her relations of using magical arts to win her heart. His apology was a masterly composition. In his youth, Apuleius had been very expensive; but he was, in a maturer age, more devoted to study, and learnt Latin without a master.

[Apuleius, in consequence of the unfounded accusation above mentioned, was ranked among the professors of magic, and after his death, miracles were ascribed to him.] The most famous of his works extant is the golden ass, in eleven books, an allegorical piece. [He wrote also a philosophical work on the doctrines of Plato, a Latin translation of Aristot-le's treatise "de Mundo," &c.] The best editions of Apuleius are the Delphin, 2 vols.
4to. Paris, 1638; [that printed at Gouda in Holland, cum notis Pricei et Variorum, 8vo, 1650, which, after all, is not a very superior one; and that printed at Leyden, 1786, in 4to. with Oudendorp's notes and a preface by Ruhnken. Only one volume of this last edition however was ever published.]

APULIA, [now la Puglia, a country of Magna Græcia in Italy, lying along the Adriatic.
It would appear that all the country from the river Fronto to the Japygian promontory was called originally Japygia. Subsequently, however, the north-western part, from the Fronto to the Aufidus, was called Daunia;
after which followed Peucetia and Messapia, the latter including the country around Tarentum. The Romans, however, gave to the district of Daunia the old Ausonian appellation of Apulia, and to Messapia the name of Calabria. Its principal mountains were Garganus, and Vultur: its chief rivers, the Fronto, Aufidus, and Bradanus.] It was famous for its wools, superior to all the produce of Italy. Some suppose that it is called after Apulus, an ancient king of the country before the Trojan war. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Cic.
de Div. 1, c. 43.—Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—
Martial. in Apoph. 155.

AQUILEIA, or AQUILEGIA, a town founded by a Roman colony, called from its grandeur, Roma secunda, and situated [on the northern coast of the Sinus Tergestinus, or Gulf of Trieste.] The Romans built it chiefly to oppose the frequent incursions of the barbarians. The Roman emperors enlarged and beautified it, and often made it their residence. [It derived its name from the aquila, or legionary standard of the Romans who had long encamped here. This city was taken and sacked by Attila. Since that time a few fishermen's huts point out where it stood.] Ital.
3, v. 605.—Martial. 4, ep. 25.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

AQUILIUS NIGER, an historian mentioned by Su-ton. in Aug. 11.—Marcus, a Roman consul who had the government of Asia Minor. Justin. 36, c. 4.—Sabinus, a lawyer of Rome, surnamed the Cato of his age.
He was father to Aquilia Severa, whom Heliogabalus married.—Severus, a poet and historian in the age of Valentinian.

AAVILO, [a wind blowing, according to Vitruvius, from the north-north-east point of the horizon.] Its name is derived, according to some, from Aquila, on account of its keenness and velocity.

AQUILONIA, [a city of Apulia, on the road from Beneventum in Samnium to Venusia.]
Liv. 10, c. 38.

AQUINUM, a town of Latium, [south-west of Venafrum,] where Juvenal was born. A dye was invented there, which greatly resembled the real purple. Horat. 1, ep. 10, v. 27.—Strab.—Ital. 8, v. 404.—Juv. 3, v. 319.

AQUITANIA, a country of Gaul, [between the Garumna or Garonne and Pyrenees. The Aquitani were of Spanish origin. As Aquitania was less than either of the other two divisions of Gaul, Augustus extended it to the Ligeris or Loire, vid. Gallia.] Plin. 4, c. 17.—Strab. 4.

ARA, a constellation, consisting of seven stars, near the tail of the Scorpion. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 138.

ARA LUGDUNENSIS, an altar at the confluence of the Arar and Rhone, [consecrated to Augustus by sixty cities of Gaul, A. U. C. 742, called by the writers of the middle ages Allanacum, now the point of Annai.] Juv. 1, v. 44.

ARABIA, a large country of Asia, forming a peninsula between the Arabian and Persian gulfs. It is generally divided into three different parts, Petræa, Deserta, and Felix. It was famous for its frankincense and aromatic plants. [Its length from the cape of Babel-mandel to the extreme angle on the Euphrates is about 1800 British miles, and its mean breadth, 800.—That part of it which bordered on Judæa was called Idumæa or Edom, and was possessed by the posterity of Esau. The Arabians recognize for their ancestors Jectan or Khatan the son of Eber, and Ismael the son of Abraham.—The soil of the country is in general sandy and barren, either wholly destitute of water, or supplied only with scanty springs. Arabia Felix was famous in former days for its spices, and general fertility. Few, if any, traces of its ancient opulence remain.] Herodot. 1, 6, 3, and Diod. 1 and 2.—Plin. 12 and 14.—Strab. 16.—Xenoph.—Tibull. 2, el. 2.—Curt. 5, c. 1.—Virg. G. 1, v. 57.

ARABICUS SINUS, [that part or branch of the Mare Erythræum which interposes itself between Egypt and Arabia. It is now called the Red Sea. The meaning of this modern appellation must be looked for in the name of Idumæa, or the land of Edom, whose coasts this sea touches on the north. Edom in the Hebrew tongue signifies red, and was the name given to Esau, for selling his birth-right for a mess of red pottage. This country, which his posterity possessed, was called after his name, and so was the sea which adjoined it. The Greeks, however, not understanding the reason of the appellation, translated what is in Hebrew the Sea of Edom, into ερυθρα θάλασσα. Thence comes the Latin form Mare rubrum, and the modern name Red Sea. It is otherwise called Golfo di Mecca.]

[ARABIUS, ARABIS, or ARBIS, a river of Gedrosia, near its eastern boundary, running into the Indian Ocean, now the Araba or Il-Mend. Arrian, 6, c. 21.]

east of the Tigris, now Wasit. It has attracted the attention of the learned by reason of the affinity of its name with that of Erech, mentioned in the Old Testament among the cities constructed by Nimrod.] Tibul. 4, el. 1.

ARACHNE, a woman of Colophon, daughter to Idmon a dyer. She was so skilful in working with the needle, that she challenged Minerva, the goddess of the art to a trial of skill. She represented on her work the amours of Jupiter with Europa, Antiope, Leda, Asteria, Danaë, Alcmena, &c. but though her piece was perfect and masterly, she was defeated by Minerva, and hanged herself in despair, and was changed into a spider by the goddess. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 1, &c.—A city of Thessaly.

ARACHOSIA, [a province of Persia, west of the Indus, and north of Gedrosia. It was anciently inhabited by the Arimaspi. The ancient Arachosia is traced by Major Rennell in the modern Arokhage. Captain Wilford charges D'Anville with a mistake in placing this province south of Candahar.]

ARACHÔTÆ and ARACHÔTI, a people of India, who received their name from the river Arachotus, which flows down from mount Caucasus. [They are styled Διπχλαῖοι, from their linen attire.] Dionys. Perieg.—Curt. 9, c. 7.

[ARACHÔTUS, a city of Arachosia, built by Semiramis, on a lake of the same name, and called by her Cophes.—A river of Arachosia, rising in the hills north-east of the modern Gazni, and losing itself in a marsh about 4 miles to the south of Candahar. Its modern name is Abeh-Tarnic, or the river Tarnic.]

ARACHTHUS, or ARËTHON, one of the four capital rivers of Epirus, falling into the bay of Ambracia. [Ambracia was situate upon it. It is the now the Arta.] Strab. 7.

ARACYNTHUS, [a mountain of Ætolia, north-west of Calydon, towards the river Achelous.]

ARĀDUS, [a town in an island of the same name, on the coast of Phœnicia, built, according to Strabo, by exiles from Sidon. The island is called Arpad in the Scriptures, and its modern name is Rou-Wadde.]

ARÆ, [vid. ÆGIMURUS.]

ARÆ PHILÆNORUM, [vid. Philæni.]

ARAR, now the Saone, [a very slow smooth running river of Gaul. It rises near Mons Vogesus, and after a southern course, falls into the Rhodanus at Lugdunum.]

ARĀTUS, a Greek poet of Cicilia, about 277 B. C. He was greatly esteemed by Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia, at whose court he passed much of his time, and by whose desire he wrote a poem on astronomy, in which he gives an account of the situations, rising and setting, number and motion of the stars. Cicero represents him as unacquainted with astrology, yet capable of writing upon it in elegant and highly finished verses, which, however, from the subject, admit of little variety. Aratus wrote besides, hymns and epigrams, &c. and had among his interpreters and commentators many of the learned men of Greece, whose works are lost, besides Cicero, Claudius, and Germanicus Cæsar, who, in their youth, or moments of relaxation, translated the phenomena into Latin verse. [St. Paul quotes from it, Acts 17, c. 28. The best edition of Aratus is that of Buhle, Lips. 1793.—1801, 2 vols. 8vo.] Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 41.—Paus. 1, c. 2.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 15, v. 26.—The son of Clinias, was born at Sicyon in Achaia, [B. C. 273.] When he was but seven years of age, his father, who held the government of Sicyon, was assassinated by Abantidas, who made himself absolute. After some revolutions, the sovereignty came into the hands of Nicocles, whom Aratus murdered to restore his country to liberty. He was so jealous of tyrannical power, that he even destroyed a picture which was the representation of a tyrant. He joined the republic of Sicyon to the Achæan league, which he strengthened by making a treaty of alliance with the Corinthians, and with Ptolemy king of Egypt. He was chosen chief commander of the forces of the Achæans, and drove away the Macedonians from Athens and Corinth. He made war against the Spartans, but was conquered in a battle by their king Cleomenes. To repair the losses he had sustained, he solicited the assistance of Antigonus Dosedon, and drove away Cleomenes from Sparta, who fled to Egypt, where he killed himself. The Ætolians soon after attacked the Achæans; and Aratus, to support his character, was obliged to call to his aid Philip king of Macedonia. His friendship with this new ally did not long continue. Philip showed himself cruel and oppressive, and put to death some of the noblest of the Achæans, and even seduced the wife of the son of Aratus. Aratus, who was now advanced in years, showed his displeasure by withdrawing himself from the society and friendship of Philip. But this rupture was fatal. Philip dreaded the power and influence of Aratus, and therefore he caused him and his son to be poisoned. Some days before his death, Aratus was observed to spit blood; and when apprised of it by his friends, he replied "Such are the rewards which a connexion with kings will produce." He was buried with great pomp by his countrymen; and two solemn sacrifices were annually made to him, the first on the day that he delivered Sicyon from tyranny, and the second on the day of his birth. During those sacrifices, which were called Arateia, the priests wore a ribbon bespangled with white and purple spots, and the public school-master walked in procession at the head of his scholars, and was always accompanied by the richest and most eminent senators, adorned with garlands. Aratus died in the 62d year of his age, B. C. 213. He wrote a history of the Achæan league, much commended by Polybius. Plut. in vita.—Paus. 2, c. 8.—Cic. de Offic. 2, c. 23.—Strab. 14.—Liv. 27, c. 31.—Polyb. 2.

ARAXES, [a river of Armenia Major, issuing from Mons Abus, on the side opposite to that whence the southern arm of the Euphrates flows. It runs east until it meets the mountains which separate Armenia from northern Media, when it turns to the north, and after receiving the Cyrus, falls into the Caspian Sea. It is now the Aras.—Another in Persia, running by Persepolis, and falling into the Medus, now Bend Emir. Xenophon calls the Chaboras by the name of Araxes, (vid. Chaboras), and gives the name of Phasis to the Armenian Araxes. Xen. Anab.]

ARBÆCES, a Mede who revolted with Bellesis against Sardanapalus, and founded the empire of Media upon the ruins of the Assyrian power, 320 years before the christian era. He reigned above fifty years, and was famous for the greatness of his undertakings, as well as for his valour. Justin. 1, c. 3.—Patere. 1, c. 6.

ARBELA, (orum) now Irbil, [a city of Assyria in the province of Adiabene, east of Ninus, near the Zabata or Zab. On the opposite side of this river was fought the decisive battle of Arbela, between Alexander and Darius, Oct. 2d. B. C. 331. The field of battle was the plain of Gaugamela. The latter, however, being an obscure place, this conflict was named after Arbela.]

ARBIS, [vid. Arabius.]

ARBUSCŪLA, an actress on the Roman stage, who laughed at the hisses of the populace, while she received the applauses of the knights. Hor. 1, Sat. 10, v. 77.

ARCADIA, [a country in the centre of the Peloponnesus, and, next to Laconia, the largest of its six provinces. It was very mountainous, though, at the same time, well watered. The most fertile part was towards the south, where the country sloped off and contained many fruitful vales, and numerous streams. The Arcadians were a pastoral people. Hence their attachment to music, and hence also the worship of Pan, as the tutelary deity of the land. Agriculture was also partially attended to. The Arcadians, from their mode of life, were brave and warlike, and frequently carried on a successful warfare with their neighbours, especially the Spartans. They served also as foreign mercenaries, and may be termed in this respect, the Swiss of antiquity. The most ancient name of Arcadia was Drymotis, (the woody region,) from dryos, quercus. The Arcadians themselves carried their origin very far back, and gave their nation the name of Proseleni (before the moon.) They seem to have derived the first rudiments of civilization from the Pelasgi, and hence the tradition that a king, named Pelasgus, taught them to build huts, and clothe themselves with the skins of animals. Arcas, a descendant of this same Pelasgus, taught them the art of baking bread, and of weaving. From this second benefactor the people and their country were respectively called Arcades and Arcadia. A republican form of government arose subsequently, after the first Messenian war: Aristocrates the 2d. having been stoned to death by the Arcadians for his treachery towards the Messenians. The chief cities of Arcadia were Mantinea, Tegea, and Megalopolis. Arcadia eventually attached itself to the Achaean league, and fell under the Roman power. It is commonly believed that a colony of Arcadians settled in Italy in very early times. This, however, is a mere fable, and is contradicted by the inland nature of the country, and by the Arcadians never having been a maritime people. vid. Pelasgi, and Italy, and also Evander.—Polyb. 4, 20.—Diodor. 4, 34.—Thucyd. 7, 57.—Plin. 4, 5.—Apollodor. 2, 1.—Paus. 8, 4.]

ARCADIUS, eldest son of Theodosius the Great, succeeded his father A. D. 395, [who at his death divided the empire between his two sons, giving Arcadius the eastern, and Honorius the western division.] After this separation of the Roman empire, the two powers looked upon one another with indifference: and soon after, their indifference was changed into jealousy, and contributed to hasten their mutual ruin. In the reign of Arcadius, Alaricus attacked the western empire, and plundered Rome. Arcadius married Eudoxia, a bold, ambitious woman, and died in the 31st year of his age, after a reign of 13 years, in which he bore the character of an effeminate prince, who suffered himself to be governed by favourites, and who abandoned his subjects to the tyranny of ministers, whilst he lost himself in the pleasures of a voluptuous court.

ARCĀNUM, [an estate of Cicero's brother near Minturnæ.] Cic. 7, ep. ad Att. 10.

ARCAS, a son of Jupiter and Callisto. vid. however, Arcadia.] He nearly killed his mother, whom Juno had changed into a bear. He reigned in Arcadia, and taught his subjects agriculture, and the art of spinning wool. After his death, Jupiter made him a constellation, with his mother. As he was one day hunting, he met a wood nymph, who begged his assistance, because the tree over which she presided, and on whose preservation her life depended, was going to be carried away by the impetuous torrent of a river. Arcas changed the course of the waters, and preserved the tree, and married the nymph, by whom he had three sons, Azan, Aphidas, and Elatus, among whom he divided his kingdom. The descendants of Azan planted colonies in Phrygia. Aphidas received for his share Tegea, which on that account had been called the inheritance of Aphidas; and Elatus became master of mount Cyllene, and some time after passed into Phocis. Paus. 8, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 155 and 176.—Apollod. 3, c. 8.—Strab. 8.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 470.—One of Actæon's dogs.

[ARCE, a city of Phœnicia, east of Tripolis, where Alexander Severus was born.]

ARCESILAUS, son of Battus, king of Cyrene, was driven from his kingdom in a sedition, and died B. C. 575. The second of that name died B. C. 550. Polyæn. 8, c. 41.—Herodot. 4, c. 159.—One of Alexander's generals, who obtained Mesopotamia at the general division of the provinces after the king's death.—A chief of Catania, which he betrayed to Dionysius the elder. Diod. 14.—A philosopher of Pitane in Æolia, disciple of Polemon. He visited Sardes and Athens, and was the founder of the middle academy, as Socrates founded the ancient, and Carneades the new one. [He was accustomed to maintain, that whatever certainty there may be in the nature of things, every thing is uncertain to the human understanding.] He acquired many pupils in the character of teacher; but some of them left him for Epicurus, though no Epicurean came to him; which gave him occasion to say, that it is easy to make an eunuch of a man, but impossible to make a man of an eunuch. He was very fond of Homer, and generally divided his time among the pleasures of philosophy, love, reading, and the table. He died in his 75th year, B. C. 241, or 300, according to some. Diog. in vitâ.—Persius. 3, v. 8.—Cic. d. Finib.

ARCHÆANAX of Mitylene, was intimate with Pi istratus tyrant of Athens. He fortified Sigeum with a wall from the ruins of ancient Troy. Strab. 13.

ARCHAGĀTHUS, son of Archagathus, was slain in Africa by his soldiers, B. C. 285. He poisoned his grandfather Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse. Diod. 20.—Justin. 22, c. 5, &c. says that he was put to death by Archersilas.

ARCHEGĒTES, [a surname of Hercules, in the island of Malta, whither his worship was brought from Tyre. The same title was also given to Apollo.]

ARCHELĀUS, a name common to some kings of Cappadocia. One of them was conquered by Sylla, for assisting Mithridates.—A person of that name married Berenice, and made himself king of Egypt; a dignity he enjoyed only six months, as he was killed by the soldiers of Gabinius, B. C. 56. He had been made priest of Comana by Pompey. His grandson was made king of Cappadocia by Antony, whom he assisted at Actium, and he maintained his independence under Augustus, till Tiberus perfidiously destroyed him.—A king of Macedonia, who succeeded his father Perdiccas the second: as he was but a natural child, he killed the legitimate heirs to gain the kingdom. He proved himself to be a great monarch: he was at last killed by one of his favourites, because he had promised him his daughter in marriage and given her to another, after a reign of 3 years. He patronized the poet Euripides. *Diod. 14.—Justin. 7, c. 4.—Ælian. V. H. 2, 3, 12, 14.—A king of the Jews, [son of Herod the Great.] He married Glaphyre, daughter of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, and widow of his brother Alexander. Augustus banished him for his cruelties, to Vienna, [or Vienne, in Gaul,] where he died. Diod.—A king of Lacedæmon, son of Agesilas. He reigned 42 years with Charilaus, of the other branch of the family. *Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Paus. 3, c. 5.—A general of Antigonus the younger, appointed governor of Acrocorinthus with the philosopher Persæus. Polyæn. 6, c. 2.—A celebrated general of Mithridates against Sylla. Id. 8, c. 8.—A philosopher [born either at Miletus or Athens,] son of Apollodorus, and successor to Anaxagoras. He was preceptor to Socrates, and was called Physicus, [from the celebrity he acquired in teaching the doctrines of Anaxagoras respecting natural bodies.] He supposed that heat and cold were the principles of all things. [In ethics, his fundamental principle was that there was no essential difference between right and wrong, but that it resulted from positive institution, and consequently that all actions are indifferent until human laws declare them to be good or evil.] Cic. Tusc. 5.—Diog. invita.—Augustin. de civ. Dei. 8.—sculptor of Priene, in the age of Claudius. He made an apotheosis of Homer, a piece of sculpture highly admired, and said to have been discovered under ground A. D. 1658.

ARCHEMACHUS, a Greek writer, who published an history of Eubœa. Athen. 6.

ARCHEMORUS, or Opheltes, son of Lycurgus, king of Thrace, by Eurydice, was brought up by Hypsipyle, queen of Lemnos, who had fled to Thrace, and was employed as nurse in the king's family. Hypsipyle was met by the army of Adrastus, who was going against Thebes; and she was forced to show them a fountain where they might quench their thirst. To do this more expeditiously, she put down the child on the grass, and at her return found him killed by a serpent. The Greeks were so afflicted at this misfortune, that they instituted games in honour of Archemorus, which were called Nemæan, and king Adrastus enlisted among the combatants, and was victorious. Apollod. 2 and 3.—Paus. 3, c. 48.—Stat. Theb. 6.

ARCHEPTOLEMUS, son of Iphitus, king of Elis, went to the Trojan war, and fought against the Greeks. As he was fighting near Hector, he was killed by Ajax, son of Telamon. Homer. Il. 8, v. 128.

ARCHESTRATUS, a tragic poet, whose pieces were first acted during the Peloponnesian war. Plut. in Arist.—A follower of Epicurus, who wrote a poem in commendation of gluttony.

ARCHIAS, a Corinthian descended from Hercules. He founded Syracuse B. C. 732. Being told by an oracle to make choice of health or riches, he chose the latter. Dionys. Hal. 2.—A poet of Antioch, intimate with Lucullus, [Metellus, Catullus, Crassus, and other persons of the most distinguished rank and character at Rome, whither he came in the consulship of Marius and Catulus, B. C. 102.] He obtained the rank and name of a Roman citizen by the means of Cicero, who defended him in an elegant oration, when his enemies had disputed his privileges of citizen of Rome. He wrote a poem on the Cimbrian war, and began another concerning Cicero's consulship, both are now lost. Some of his epigrams are preserved in the Antholo-

gia. Cic. pro Arch.—A polemarch of Thebes, assassinated in the conspiracy of Pelopidas, which he could have prevented, if he had not deferred to the morrow the reading of a letter which he had received from Archias the Athenian high-priest, and which gave him information of his danger. Plut. in Pelop.—A high-priest of Athens, contemporary and intimate with the polemarch of the same name. Id. ibid.—A Theban taken in the act of adultery, and punished according to the law, and tied to a post in the public place, for which punishment he abolished the oligarchy. Aristot.

ARCHIBIÄDES, a philosopher of Athens, who affected the manners of the Spartans, and was very inimical to the views and measures of Phocion. Plut. in Phoc.—An ambassador to Byzantium, &c. Polyæn. 4, c. 44.

ARCHIBIUS, the son of the geographer Ptolemy.

ARCHIDAMIA, a priestess of Ceres, who on account of her affection for Aristomenes restored him to liberty when he had been taken prisoner by her female attendants at the celebration of their festivals. Paus. 4, c. 17.—A daughter of Cleadas, who, upon hearing that her countrymen, the Spartans, were debating whether they should send away their women to Crete against the hostile approach of Pyrrhus, seized a sword, and ran to the senate-house, exclaiming that the women were as able to fight as the men. Upon this the decree was repealed. Plut. in Pyrr.—Polyæn. 8, c. 8.

ARCHIDAMUS, king of Sparta, son of Anaxidamus, succeeded by Agasicles.—Another, grandson of Leotychidas, by his son Zeuxidamus. He succeeded his grandfather, and reigned in conjunction with Plistoanax. He conquered the Argives and Arcadians, and privately assisted the Phocians in plundering the temple of Delphi. He was called to the aid of Tarentum against the Romans, and killed there in a battle, after a reign of 23 years. Diod. 16.—Xenoph.—Another, who conquered the Helots, [who had made an insurrection after a violent earthquake.] Diod. 11.—A son of Agesilaus, who led the Spartan auxiliaries to Cleombrotus at the battle of Leuctra, [in which action he commanded the left wing and lost his life.]

ARCHIDIUM, a city of Crete, named after Archidius, son of Tegeates. Paus. 8, c. 53.

ARCHIGALLUS, the high-priest of Cybele's temple, [always chosen from one of the most distinguished families.] vid. Galli.

ARCHIGENES, a physician, born at Apamea, in Syria. He lived in the reigns of Domitian, Nerva, and Trajan, and died in the 73d year of his age. [He is highly commended by Galen, and appears to have been in high repute from the frequent and honourable mention of his name in Juvenal. He wrote on Pharmacy, on local affections, on the cure of chronic diseases, &c. Only a few fragments of his writings remain.] Juv. 6, v. 235.

ARCHILOCHUS, a poet of Paros, who wrote elegies, satires, odes, and epigrams, and was the first who introduced iambics in his verses. He had courted Neobule, the daughter of Lycambes, and had received promises of marriage; but the father gave her to another, superior to the poet in rank and fortune; upon which Archilochus wrote such a bitter satire, that Lycambes hanged himself in a fit of despair. The Spartans condemned his verses on account of their indelicacy, and banished him from their city as a petulant and dangerous citizen. Some fragments of his poetry remain, which display vigour and animation, boldness and vehemence in the highest degree, from which reason perhaps Cicero calls virulent edicts, Archilochia edicta. [The invention of iambic verse is ascribed to him, and also of Epodes. He is generally ranked among the first victors at the Pythian Games. The estimation in which he was held may be inferred from the fact that Corax of Naxos, by whom he was killed, was expelled from the temple of Apollo at Delphi, though the deed was done in open war. He is supposed to have flourished about 742 B. C.] Cic. Tusc. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 12.—Horat. art. poet. v. 79.—Athen. 1, 2, &c.—A son of Nestor, killed by Memnon in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.—A Greek historian who wrote a chronological table and other works, about the 20th or 30th Olympiad.

ARCHIMÉDES, a famous geometrician of Syracuse, [born B. C. 287,] who invented a machine of glass that faithfully represented the motion of all the heavenly bodies. When Marcellus, the Roman consul, besieged Syracuse, Archimedes constructed machines which suddenly raised up in the air the ships of the enemy from the bay before the city, and let them fall with such violence into the water that they sunk. He set them also on fire with his burning-glasses. When the town was taken, the Roman general gave strict orders to his soldiers not to hurt Archimedes, and even offered a reward to him who should bring him alive and safe into his presence. All these precautions were useless; the philosopher was so deeply engaged in solving a problem, that he was even ignorant that the enemy were in possession of the town; and a soldier, without knowing who he was, killed him, because he refused to follow him, B. C. 212. Marcellus raised a monument over him, and marked upon it a cylinder and a sphere. [In doing this he fulfilled a wish which Archimedes had expressed in his lifetime to a friend, that a sphere and a cylinder, on the discovery of the proportion between which he greatly prided himself, might be marked upon his tomb.] The place of his interment remained long unknown, till Cicero, during his quaestorship in Sicily, found it near one of the gates of Syracuse, surrounded with thorns and brambles. Some suppose that Archimedes raised the site of the towns and villages of Egypt, and began those mounds of earth by means of which communication is kept from town to town during the inundations of the Nile. [Diodorus Siculus also ascribes to him the invention of the screw-pump, which he communicated to the Egyptians.] The story of his burning-glasses had always appeared fabulous to some of the moderns, till the experiments of Buffon demonstrated it beyond contradiction. These celebrated glasses are supposed to have been reflectors made of metal, and capable of producing their effect at the distance of a bow-shot. The manner in which he discovered how much brass a goldsmith had mixed with gold in making a golden crown for the king is well known. [The ardour of his mind in the pursuit of science is fully evinced by his famous declaration to Hiero, pronounced in consequence of his accurate acquaintance with the powers of the lever, Δος μου στα και τον κοσμον κινησω, "Give me a place where I may stand, and I will move the earth."] Many of his works are extant, especially treatises de sphaerâ & cylindro, circuli dimensio, de lineis spiralibus, de quadraturâ parabolæ, de numero arenæ, &c. [The best edition of his works, is the splendid one in folio, printed at Oxford in 1792. It was prepared for the press by Joseph Torelli of Verona. A valuable appendix is added by the Rev. Abraham Robertson, of Christ-Church College, Oxford, who had the whole care of the edition.] Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 25. De Nat. D. 2, c. 34.—Liv. 24, c. 34.—Quintil. 1, c. 10.—Vitruv. 9, c. 3.—Polyb. 7.—Plut. in Marcell.—Val. Max. 8, c. 7.

ARCHIPELAGUS, a part of the sea where islands in great number are interspersed, such as that part of the Mediterranean which lies between Greece and Asia Minor, and is generally called Mare Ægeum, [Lempriere gives the term Archipelagus, as Latinized by Hoffman. It is, however, a modern Greek word, Archipelago. There is some doubt whether the original modern term be Egia Pelago or Agia Pelago; the former a corruption of the word Ægeum, the latter derived from the sanctity of the monasteries on Mount Athos and in the islands. The vulgar error of deriving it from αρχη and πελαγος, is well known.]

ARCHIPPE, a city of the Marsi, destroyed by an earthquake, and lost in the lake of Fucinus, Plin. 3, c. 19.

ARCHIPPUS, a king of Italy, from whom perhaps the town of Archippe received its name. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 752.—A philosopher of Thebes, pupil of Pythagoras.—A comic poet of Athens, of whose eight comedies only one obtained the prize.—A philosopher in the age of Trajan.

ARCHITIS, a name of Venus, worshipped on mount Libanus.

ARCHON, one of Alexander's generals, who received the province of Babylon, at the general division after the king's death. Diod. 18.

ARCHONTES, the name of the chief magistrates of Athens. They were nine in number, and none were chosen but such as were descended from ancestors who had been free citizens of the republic for three generations. They were also to be without deformity in all the parts and members of their body, and were obliged to produce testimonies of their dutiful behaviour to their parents, of the services they had rendered their country, and the competency of their fortune to support their dignity. They took a solemn oath that they would observe the laws, administer justice with impartiality, and never suffer themselves to be corrupted. If they ever received bribes, they were compelled by the laws to dedicate to the god of Delphi, a statue of gold of equal weight with their body. They all had the power of punishing malefactors with death. The chief among them was called Archon; the year took its denomination from him; he determined all causes between man and wife, and took care of legacies and wills; he provided for orphans, protected the injured, and punished drunkenness with uncommon severity. If he suffered himself to be intoxicated during the time of his office, the misdemeanor was punished with death. The second of the archons was called Basileus; it was his office to keep good order, and to remove all causes of quarrel in the families of those who were dedicated to the service of the gods. The profane and the impious were brought before his tribunal; and he offered public sacrifices for the good of the state. He assisted at the celebration of the Eleusian festivals, and other religious ceremonies. His wife was to be [a citizen of the whole blood of Athens,] and of a pure and unsullied life. He had a vote among the Areopagites, but was obliged to sit among them without his crown. The Polemarch was another archon of inferior dignity. He had the care of all foreigners, and provided a sufficient maintenance, from the public treasury, for the families of those who had lost their lives in defence of their country. [But because these three magistrates were often, by reason of their youth, not so well skilled in the laws and customs of their country as might have been wished, that they might not be left wholly to themselves, they were each accustomed to make choice of two persons of age, gravity, and reputation, to sit with them on the bench and assist them with their advice. These they called Παρόγοι or assessors, and obliged them to undergo the same probation as the other magistrates. The six other archons were called by one common name, Thesmothetæ, and received complaints against persons accused of impiety, bribery, and ill behaviour. [Indictments before the Thesmothetæ were in writing; at the tribunal of the Basileus, they were by word of mouth.] They settled all disputes between the citizens, redressed the wrongs of strangers, and forbade any laws to be enforced but such as were conducive to the safety of the state. These officers of state were chosen after the death of king Codrus; their power was originally for life, but afterwards it was limited to ten years, and at last to one year. After some time, the qualifications which were required to be an archon were not strictly observed. Adrian, before he was elected emperor of Romè, was made archon at Athens, though a foreigner; and the same honours were conferred upon Plutarch. The perpetual archons, after the death of Codrus, were Medon, whose office began B. C. 1070; Acastus, 1050; Archippus, 1014; Thersippus, 995; Phorbas, 954; Megacles, 923; Diognetus, 893; Perceles, 865; Ariphron, 846; Thespius, 826; Agamestor, 799; Æschylus, 798; Alcæon, 756; after whose death the archons were decennial, the first of whom was Charops, who began 754; Æsimeles, 744; Clidicus, 734; Hippomenes, 724; Leocrates, 714; Apsander, 704; Eryxian, 694; after whom the office became annual, and of these annual archons Creon was the first. Aristoph. in Nub. & Avib.—Plut. Sympos. 1.—Demost.—Polux.—Lysias.

ARCHÛTAS, a musician of Mitylene, who wrote a treatise on Agriculture. Diog.—The son of Hestæus of Tarentum, was a follower of the Pythagorean philosophy, and an able astronomer and geometrician. [He flourished about 400 B. C. Among his disciples were Philolaus, Eudoxus, and Plato. In such high estimation did his countrymen hold him for wisdom and valour, that he was chosen seven times general of their armies and governor of Tarentum, contrary to an express law. Aristotle is said to have borrowed from him the "Ten Categories," and many of his ethical principles and maxims. He invented the screw, crane, various hydraulic machines, a flying pigeon or a winged automaton of wood, &c. He perished in a shipwreck on the coast of Apulia. His only remaining work is a treatise on the universe, printed in Greek and Latin at Venice, 1571, in 8vo.] Horat. 1, od. 28.—Cic. 3, de Orat.—Diog. in Vit.

ARCITËNENS, an epithet applied to Apollo, from his bearing a bow, with which, as soon as born, he destroyed the serpent Python. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 75.

ARCTÏNUS, a Milesian poet, said to have been pupil to Homer. Dionys. Hal. 1.

ARCTOPHYLAX, a star near the great bear, called also Bootes. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 42.

ARCTOS, a mountain near Propontis, inhabited by giants and monsters.—Two celestial constellations near the north pole, commonly called Ursa Major and Minor, supposed to be Arcas and his mother, who were made constellations. Virg. G. 1.—Aratus.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 107.

ARCTÛRUS, a star near the tail of the great bear, whose rising and setting were generally supposed to portend great tempests. Horat. 3, od. 1. The name is derived from its situation, αρκτος ursus, ουρα cauda.

ARDALUS, a son of Vulcan, said to have been the first who invented the pipe. He gave it to the muses, who on that account have been called Ardalides and Ardalotides. Paus. 2, c. 31.

ARDAXĀNUS, a small river of Illyricum, near Lissus. Polyb.

ARDEĀ, formerly Ardua, a town of Latium [near the coast, south-east of Lavinium,] built, according to some, by a son of Ulysses and Circe. It was the capital of the Rutuli. Tarquin the Proud was pressing it with a siege when his son ravished Lucretia. A road called Ardeatina, branched from the Appian road to Ardea. [The Romans established a colony here A. U. C. 311. It is now called Ardea.] C. Nep. in Atic. 14.—Liv. 1, c. 57, l. 3, c. 71, l. 4, c. 9, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 412.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 573.—Strab. 5.

ARDĒI, a people [of Dalmatia] in Illyricum, whose capital was called Ardea. Strab. 7.

[ARDISCUS, a river of Thrace, falling into the Hebrus at Adrianopolis. Now the Arda.]

ARDUENNA, Sylva, [now Ardennes, a forest of Gaul, the longest in that country, reaching, according to Cæsar, from the Rhenus and the territories of the Treveri to those of the Nervii, upwards of 50 miles in length. Others make the extent much larger. If it covered the whole of the intervening space between the countries of the Treveri and Nervii it would greatly exceed 50 miles. The ground is now in many places cleared, and cities built upon it. It is divided into four districts. Its chief town is Mezieres.] Tacit. 8.—Ann. c. 42.—Cæs. bell. Gall. 6, c. 29.

ARDUINE, the goddess of hunting among the Gauls, represented with the same attributes as the Diana of the Romans.

ARDYS, a son of Gyges, king of Lydia, who reigned 49 years, took Priene, and made war against Miletus. Herodot. 1, c. 15.

ARELĀTUM, [a town of the Salyses on the east side of the Rhodanus at the place where it divides itself into three branches, not far from its mouth. Strabo speaks of it as a commercial emporium, and, according to Pomponius Mela, it was one of the richest cities in Gallia Narbonensis. It was called Arelas Sextanorum, from being built by the soldiers of the sixth legion, conducted thither as colonists by the father of Tiberius. It is now Arles.] Strab. 4.—Mela, 3, c. 5.

ARELLIUS, a celebrated painter of Rome in the age of Augustus. Plin. 35, c. 10.

ARENE, a city of Messenia, in Peloponnesus. [Stephanus of Byzantium mentions two cities of this name, one in Messenia, and the other in Triphylian Elis.] Homer. Il. 2.

ARENĀCUM, [a fortified place on the Rhine in the territories of the Batavi, not far from where the river separates to form the Vahalis. It is now, according to D'Anville, Aert or Aerth, but Mannert is in favour of Mannheim.] Tacit. Hist. 5, c. 20.

AREOPAGITÆ, the judges of the Areopagus, a seat of justice on a small eminence near Athens, whose name is derived from Agros Mars, the hill of Mars, because Mars was the first who was tried there, for the murder of Hallirhotius, who had offered violence to his daughter Alcippe. Some say that the place received the name of Areopagus, because the Amazons pitched their camp there, and offered sacrifices to their progenitor Mars, when they besieged Athens; and others maintain, that the name was given to the place because Mars is the god of bloodshed, war, and murder, which were generally punished by that court. The time in which this celebrated seat of justice was instituted is unknown. Some suppose that Cecrops, the founder of Athens, first established it, while others give the credit of it to Cranaus, and others to Solon. The number of judges that composed this august assembly is not known. They have been limited by some to 9, to 31, to 51, and sometimes to a greater number. The most worthy and religious of the Athenians were admitted as members, and such archons as had discharged their duty with care and faithfulness. In the latter ages of the republic, this observance was often violated, and we find some of their members of loose and debauched morals. If any of them were convicted of immorality, if they were seen sitting at a tavern, or had used any indecent language, they were immediately expelled from the assembly, and held in the greatest disgrace, though the dignity of a judge of the Areopagus always was for life. The Areopagites took cognizance of murders, impiety, and immoral behaviour, and particularly of idleness, which they deemed the cause of all vice. They watched over the laws, and they had the management of the public treasury; they had the liberty of rewarding the virtuous, and of inflicting severe punishment upon such as blasphemed against the gods, or slighted the celebration of the holy mysteries. They always sat in the open air, because they took cognizance of murder; and by their laws it was not permitted for the murderer and his accuser to be both under the same roof. This custom also might originate because the persons of the judges were sacred, and they were afraid of contracting pollution by conversing in the same house with men who had been guilty of shedding innocent blood. They always heard causes and passed sentence in the night, that they might not be prepossessed in favour of the plaintiff or of the defendant by seeing them. Whatever causes were pleaded before them, were to be divested of all oratory and fine speaking, lest eloquence should charm their ears, and corrupt their judgment. Hence arose the most just and most impartial decisions, and their sentence was deemed sacred and inviolable, and the plaintiff and defendant were equally convinced of its justice. The Areopagites generally sat on the 27th, 28th, and 29th day of every month. [But if any business happened which required despatch, they assembled in the royal portico, ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ ΣΤΟΑ.] Their authority continued in its original state, till Pericles, who was refused admittance among them, resolved to lessen their consequence, and destroy their power. From that time the morals of the Athenians were corrupted, and the Areopagites were no longer conspicuous for their virtue and justice; and when they censured the debaucheries of Demetrius, one of the family of Phalereus, he plainly told them, that if they wished to make a reform in Athens they must begin at home.

ARETHĀNAS, a countryman, whose goat suckled Æsculapius, when exposed by his mother. Paus. 2, c. 26.

ARETORĪDES, a patronymic given to the hundred-eyed Argus, as son of Arestor. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 584.

ARĒTE, the mother of Aristippus, the philosopher. Laert. 2. — A daughter of Dionysius, who married Dion. She was thrown into the sea. Plut. in Dion. — A female philosopher of Cyrene, B. C. 37.

ARĒTA, a daughter of Rhexenor, descended from Neptune, who married her uncle, Alcinous, by whom she had Nausicaa. Hom. Od. 7 and 8. — Apollod. 1.

ARETĒUS, a physician of Cappadocia. [He practised medicine at Rome, but at what period is uncertain, probably between the reigns of Vespasian and Adrian. He was a bold and decisive practitioner. His works which have come down to us imperfect, are held in high estimation. The best edition is that of Boerhaave, L. Bat. 1735. fol.]

ARETAPHĪLA, the wife of Melanippus, a priest of Cyrene. Nicocrates murdered her husband to marry her. She, however, was so attached to Melanippus, that she endeavoured to poison Nicocrates, and at last caused him to be assassinated by his brother Lysander, whom she married. Lysander proved as cruel as his brother, upon which Aretaphila ordered him to be thrown into the sea. After this she retired to a private station. Plut. de Virtut. Mulier. — Polyæn. 8, c. 38.

ARETĀLES, a Cnidian, who wrote an history of Macedonia, besides a treatise on islands. Plut.

ARETHŪSA, a nymph of Elis, and one of Diana's attendants. As she returned one day from hunting, she sat near the Alpheus, and bathed in the stream. The god of the river was enamoured of her, and he pursued her over the mountains and all the country, when Arethusa, ready to sink under fatigue, implored Diana, who changed her into a fountain. The Alpheus immediately mingled his streams with hers, and Diana opened a secret passage under the earth and under the sea, where the waters of Arethusa disappeared, and rose in the island of Ortygia, near Syracuse in Sicily. The river Alpheus followed her also under the sea, and rose also in Ortygia; so that, as mythologists relate, whatever is thrown into the Alpheus in Elis, rises again, after some time, in the fountain Arethusa near Syracuse. [Strabo takes a great deal of unnecessary trouble in proving the impossibility of this story. The most important circumstance connected with this fountain is, that it was the occasion of the isle of Ortygia becoming inhabited. Its waters were very sweet, and were protected from the overflowing of the sea. Now, however, the latter has access to them, and they have a salt taste.] Virg. Alpheus. — Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 10. — Athen. 7. — Paus. — A lake of upper Armenia, near the fountains of the Tigris. [According to Pliny, it exhaled nitrous vapours. Plin. 2, c. 103.]

[ARETINI, a people of Etruria, below the Arnus, divided into three classes, Veteres, Fidentes, and Julienses. Their towns were, Arretium Vetus, now Arrero, Arretium Fidens, now Castiglione-Aretino, and Arretium Julium, now Giovi.]

ARĒUS, a king of Sparta, preferred in the succession to Cleonymus, brother of Acrotatus, who made an alliance with Pyrrhus. He assisted Athens when Antigonus besieged it, and died at Corinth. Paus. 3, c. 6. — Plut. — A king of Sparta, who succeeded his father Acrotatus 2d, and was succeeded by his son Leonidas, son of Cleonymus. — A philosopher of Alexandria, intimate with Augustus. Sueton.

ARGĒUS, a son of Perdiccas, who succeeded his father in the kingdom of Macedonia. Justin. 7, c. 1. — [A mountain of Cappadocia, covered with perpetual snows, and so lofty, that from its summit, according to the ancient writers, both the Euxine and the Mediterranean seas might be seen. It is now called Argeh-Dag, and at its foot stood Mazaca, the capital of Cappadocia, called in the time of Tiberius, Cæsarea ad Argæum, and now Kaisarieh.] Claudian.

ARGATHŌNIUS, a king of Tartessus, who, according to Plin. 7, c. 48, lived 120 years, and 300 according to Ital. 3, v. 396.

ARGENNUM, a promontory of Ionia, [near Halonestus, — also a promontory of Sicily, on the eastern side, now Cape St. Alessio.]

ARGI, (plur. masc.) vid. Argos.

ARGĪA, daughter of Adrastus, married Polyneices, whom she loved with uncommon tenderness. When he was killed in the war, she buried his body in the night, against the positive orders of Creon, for which pious action she was punished with death. Theseus revenged her death by killing Creon. Hymn. fab. 69 and 72. — Stat. Theb. 12. vid. Antigone and Creon. — A country of Peloponnesus, called also Argolis, of which Argos was the capital.

ARGĪLUS, a town of Thrace at the mouth of the Strymon, built by a colony of Andrians. Thucyd. 4, c. 103. — Herodot. 7, c. 115.

ARGINŪSÆ, [small islands below Lesbos, and lying off the promontory of Cana, or Catoni in Æolis. They were rendered famous for the victory gained near them by the Athenian fleet under Cæon, over that of the Lacedæmonians in the 26th year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 406. Of these three islands, the largest had a town called Arginusa. They are formed of a white, argillaceous soil, and from that circumstance took their names, αργίσιος shining white, feminine αργίσιοςσα contracted αργίσιοςσα.]

ARGIPHONTES, a surname given to Mercury, because he killed the hundred-eyed Argus, by order of Jupiter. [The Argicide.]

ARGIPPEI, a nation among the Sauromatians, born bald, and with flat noses. [They lived upon the fruit of a tree called Ponticus, from which, when ripe, they made a thick black liquor called Aschy, which they drank clear, or mixed with milk. Of the husks they prepared a kind of cake.] Herodot. 4, c. 23.

ARGIVA, a surname of Juno, worshipped at Argos. She had also a temple at Sparta, consecrated to her by Eurydice, the daughter of Lacedæmon. Paus. 4, c. 13.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 547.

ARGIVI, the inhabitants of the city of Argos and the neighbouring country. The word is indiscriminately applied by the poets to all the inhabitants of Greece.

ARGUS, a steward of Galba, who privately interred the body of his master in his gardens. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 49.

ARGO, the name of the famous ship which carried Jason and his 54 companions to Colchis, when they resolved to recover the golden fleece. The derivation of the word Argo has been often disputed. Some derive it from Argos, the person who first proposed the expedition, and who built the ship. Others maintain that it was built at Argos, whence its name. Cicero, Tusc. 1, c. 20, calls it Argo, because it carried Grecians, commonly called Argives. Dioid. 4, derives the word from αργος, which signifies swift. Ptolemy says, but falsely, that Hercules built the ship, and called it Argo, after a son of Jason, who bore the same name. The ship Argo had 50 oars. [It could not however have been a very large vessel if the ancient tradition be true, according to which, the Argonauts were able to carry it on their backs from the Danube, to the Adriatic.] According to many authors, she had a beam on her prow, cut in the forest of Dodona by Minerva, which had the power of giving oracles to the Argonauts. This ship was the first that ever sailed on the sea, as some report. After the expedition was finished, Jason ordered her to be drawn aground at the isthmus of Corinth, and consecrated to the god of the sea. The poets have made her a constellation in heaven. Jason was killed by a beam which fell from the top, as he slept on the ground near it. Hygin. fab. 14, A. P. 2, c. 37.—Catull. de Nupt. Pel. & Thet.—*Val. ARGOLICUS SINUS, a bay on the coast of Argolis, [now the Gulf of Napoli.]

ARGOLIS and ARGIA, a country of Peloponnesus between Arcadia and the Ægean sea: Its chief city was called Argos. [This ancient kingdom has not unaptly been termed the cradle of the Greeks, since it first received the foreign colonies by whom they were civilized, and it became the theatre of most of the events recorded in the early annals of Greece.]

ARGONAUTÆ, a name given to those ancient heroes who went with Jason on board the ship Argo to Colchis, about 79 years before the taking of Troy, or 1263 B. C. [vid. the end of this article.] The causes of this expedition arose from the following circumstance:—Athamas, king of Thebes, had married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, whom he divorced to marry Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. As Helle was subject to certain fits of madness, Athamas repudiated her, and took a second time Ino, by whom he had soon after two sons, Learchus and Melicerta. As the children of Nephele were to succeed to their father by right of birth, Ino conceived an immortal hatred against them, and she caused the city of Thebes to be visited by a pestilence, by poisoning all the grain which had been sown in the earth. Upon this the oracle was consulted; and as it had been corrupted by means of Ino, the answer was, that Nephele's children should be immolated to the gods. Phryxus was apprised of this, and he immediately embarked with his sister Helle, and fled to the court of Æetes, king of Colchis, one of his near relations. In the voyage Helle died, and Phryxus arrived safe at Colchis, and was received with kindness by the king. The poets have embellished the flight of Phryxus, by supposing that he and Helle fled through the air on a ram which had a golden fleece and wings, and was endowed with faculties of speech. This ram, as they say, was the offspring of Neptune's amours, under the form of a ram, with the nymph Theophane. As they were going to be sacrificed, the ram took them on his back, and instantly disappeared in the air. On their way Helle was giddy, and fell into that part of the sea which from her was called the Hellespont. When Phryxus came to Colchis, he sacrificed the ram to Jupiter, or, according to others, to Mars, to whom he also dedicated the golden fleece. He soon after married Chalciopé, the daughter of Æetes; but his father-in-law envied him the possession of the golden fleece, and therefore to obtain it he murdered him. Some time after this event, when Jason, the son of Æson, demanded of his uncle Pelias the crown which he usurped, (vid. Belias, Jason, Æson.) Pelias said that he would restore it to him, provided he avenged the death of their common relation Phryxus, whom Æetes had lately murdered in Colchis. Jason, who was in the vigour of youth, and of an ambitious soul, cheerfully undertook the expedition, and embarked with all the young princes of Greece in the ship Argo. [The Argo took her departure from Aphetæ at the entrance of the Sinus Pagasius or Pelagicus. The modern name of the place is Fetio.] They stopped at the island of Lemnos, where they remained two years, and raised a new race of men from the Lemnian women, who had murdered their husbands. (vid. Hypsipyle.) After they had left Lemnos, they visited Samothrace, where they offered sacrifices to the gods, and thence passed to Troas and to Cyzicum. Here they met with a favourable reception from Cyzicus the king of the country. The night after their departure, they were driven back by a storm again on the coast of Cyzicum, and the inhabitants, supposing them to be their enemies the Pelasgi, furiously attacked them. In this nocturnal engagement the slaughter was great, and Cyzicus was killed by the hand of Jason, who, to expiate the murder he had ignorantly committed, buried him in a magnificent manner, and offered a sacrifice to the mother of the gods, to whom he built a temple on mount Dindymus. From Cyzicum they visited Bebrycia, otherwise called Bithynia, where Pollux accepted the challenge of Amycus king of the country, in the combat of the Cestus, and slew him. They were driven from Bebrycia by a storm, to Salmydessa, on the coast of Thrace, where they delivered Phineus, king of the place, from the persecution of the harpies. Phineus directed their course through the Cyanean rocks or the Symplegades, (vid. Cyanæ,) and they safely entered the Euxine sea. They visited the country of the Mariandynians, where Lycus reigned, and lost two of their companions, Idmon and Tiphys their pilot. After they had left this coast, they were driven upon the island of Arecia, where they found the children of Phryxus, whom Æetes their grandfather had sent to Greece to take possession of their father's kingdom. From this island they at last arrived safe in Æa, the capital of Colchis. Jason explained the causes of his voyage to Æetes; but the conditions on which he was to recover the golden fleece were so hard, that the Argonauts must have perished in the attempt, had not Medea, the king's daughter, fallen in love with their leader. She had a conference with Jason, and after mutual oaths of fidelity in the temple of Hecate, Medea pledged herself to deliver the Argonauts from her father's hard conditions, if Jason married her and carried her with him to Greece. He was to tame two bulls which had brazen feet and horns, and which vomited clouds of fire and smoke, and to tie them to a plough made of adamant stone, and to plough a field of two acres of ground never before cultivated. After this he was to sow in the plain the teeth of a dragon, from which an armed multitude were to rise up, and to be all destroyed by his hands. This done, he was to kill an ever-watchful dragon, which was at the bottom of the tree on which the golden fleece was suspended. All these labours were to be performed in one day; and Medea's assistance, whose knowledge of herbs, magic and potions, was unparalleled, easily extricated Jason from all danger, to the astonishment and terror of his companions, and of Æetes, and the people of Colchis, who had assembled to be spectators of this wonderful action. He tamed the bulls with ease, ploughed the field, sowed the dragon's teeth, and when the armed men sprang from the earth, he threw a stone in the midst of them, and they immediately turned their weapons one against the other, till they all perished. After this he went to the dragon, and by means of enchanted herbs and a draught which Medea had given him, he lulled the monster to sleep, and obtained the golden fleece, and immediately set sail with Medea. He was soon pursued by Absyrtus the king's son, who came up to them, and was seized and murdered by Jason and Medea. The mangled limbs of Absyrtus were strewed in the way through which Æetes was to pass, that his further pursuit might be stopped. After the murder of Absyrtus, they entered the Palus Mæotis, and by pursuing their course towards the left, according to the foolish account of poets, who were ignorant of geography, they came to the island Peucestes, and to that of Circe. [The belief for a long time prevailed, that there was a communication between the Palus Mæotis and the Oceanus, or earth-encompassing stream. This communication, the old poets made to be a narrow passage or strait, but later writers the river Tanais. The writer of the Orphic Argonauts makes the Argonauts pass up the Phasis into the Palus Mæotis, thence into the main Oceanus, and thence directing their course to the west, to come to the British isles and the Atlantic, and reach at least the columns of Hercules.] Circe informed Jason that the cause of all his calamities arose from the murder of Absyrtus, from which she refused to expiate him. Soon after they entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules, and passed the straits of Charybdis and Scylla, where they must have perished, had not Tethys, the mistress of Peleus, one of the Argonauts, delivered them. They were preserved from the Sirens by the eloquence of Orpheus, and arrived in the island of the Phæacians, where they met the enemy's fleet, which had continued their pursuit by a different course. It was therefore resolved, that Medea should be restored, if she had not been actually married to Jason; but the wife of Alcinoüs, the king of the country, being appointed umpire between the Colchians and Argonauts, had the marriage privately consummated by night, and declared that the claims of Æetes to Medea were now void. From Phæacia the Argonauts came to the bay of Ambracia, whence they were driven by a storm upon the coast of Africa, and after many disasters, at last came in sight of the promontory of Melea, in the Peloponnesus, where Jason was purified from the murder of Absyrtus, and soon after arrived safe in Thessaly. The impracticability of such a voyage is well known. Apollonius Rhodius gives another account equally improbable. He says, that they sailed from the Euxine up one of the mouths of the Danube, and that Absyrtus pursued them by entering another mouth of the river. After they had continued their voyage for some leagues, the waters decreased, and they were obliged to carry the ship Argo across the country to the Adriatic, upwards of 150 miles. Here they met with Absyrtus, who had pursued the same measures, and conveyed his ships in like manner over the land. Absyrtus was immediately put to death; and soon after the beam of Dodona (vid. Argo.) gave an oracle, that Jason should never return home if he was not previously purified of the murder. Upon this they sailed to the island of Æa, where Circe, who was the sister of Æetes, expiated him without knowing who he was. There is a third tradition which maintains, that they returned to Colchis a second time, and visited many places of Asia. This famous expedition has been celebrated in the ancient ages of the world; it has employed the pen of many writers, and among others, of Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Apollodorus, and Justin; and among the poets, of Onomacritus, more generally called Orpheus. Apollonius Rhodius, Pindar, and Valerius Flaccus, have extensively given an account of its most remarkable particulars. The number of the Argonauts is not exactly known. Apollodorus and Diodorus say that they were 54. Tzetzes admits the number of 50, but Apollodorus mentions only 45. The following list is drawn from the various authors who have made mention of the Argonautic expedition. Jason, son of Æson, as is well known, was the chief of the rest. His companions were Acastus son of Pelias, Actor son of Hippasus, Admetus son of Pheres, Æsculapius son of Apollo, Ætalides son of Mercury and Eupoleme, Almenus son of Mars, Amphiarus son of Æeleus, Amphidamus, son of Aleus, Amphion son of Hyperasius, Aneus a son of Lycurgus, and another of the same name, Areus, Argus the builder of the ship Argo, Argus son of Phryxus, Armenus, Ascalaphus son of Mars, Asterion son of Cometes, Asterius son of Neleus, Augeas son of Sol, Atalanta daughter of Sheceneus, disguised in a man's dress, Autolycus son of Mercury, Azorus, Buphagus, Butes son of Teleon, Calais son of Boreas, Canthus son of Abas, Castor son of Jupiter, Ceneus son of Elatus, Cepheus son of Aleus, Cius, Clytius, and Iphitus sons of Eurythus, Coronus, Deucalion son of Minos, Echion son of Mercury and Antianira, Ergynus son of Neptune, Euphemus son of Neptune and Macionassa, Eribotes, Euryalus son of Cisteus, Eurydamas and Eurythion sons of Iras, Eurytus son of Mercury, Glaucus, Hercules son of Jupiter, Idas son of Aphareus, Ialmenus son of Mars, Idmon son of Abas, Iolaus son of Iphiclus, Iphiclus son of Thestius, Iphiclus son of Philacus, Iphis son of Alector, Lynceus, son of Aphareus, Iritus son of Naubolus, Laertes son of Arcesius, Laocoon, Leodatus son of Bias, Leitus son of Actor, Meleager, son of Æneus, Menœtius son of Actor, Mopsus son of Amphyus, Nauplius son of Neptune, Neleus the brother of Peleus, Nestor son of Neleus, Oileus the father of Ajax, Orpheus son of Æger, Palemon son of Ætolus, Peleus and Telamon sons of Æacus, Periclimenes son of Neleus, Peneleus son of Hipalmus, Philoctetes son of Pæan, Phlias, Pollux son of Jupiter, Polyphemus son of Elates, Pœas son of Thaumacrus, Phanus son of Bacchus, Phalerus son of Alcon, Phocus and Priapus sons of Ceneus one of the Lapithæ, Talaus, Tiphys son of Aginus, Staphilus son of Bacchus, two of the name of Iphitus, Theseus son of Ægeus, with his friend Pirithous. Among these Æsculapius was physician, and Tiphys was pilot. [Bryant considers the account of the Argo, a manifest tradition from the ark of Noah. Sir Isaac Newton thinks that the Argonautic expedition was an embassy sent by the Greeks, during the intestine divisions of Egypt, in the reign of Amenophis or Memnon, to persuade the nations upon the coasts of the Mediterranean and Euxine to revolt from Egypt, and shake off the yoke imposed by Sesostris. Many consider it to have been a mere commercial enterprise. Dr. Gillies is of opinion that it was prompted merely by a wish on the part of the young chieftains of Greece to visit foreign parts and retort on their inhabitants the injuries which Greece had suffered from strangers. Be the cause, however, what it may, the beneficial effects of this expedition soon displayed themselves in a more rapid progress towards civilization.]

ARGOS, (sing. neut. & Argi, masc. plur.) an ancient city, capital of Argolis in Peloponnesus, about two miles from the sea, on the bay called Argolicus sinus. Juno was the chief deity of the place. The kingdom of Argos was founded by Inachus 1856 years before the christian era, and after it had flourished for about 550 years it was united to the crown of Mycenæ. Argos was built, according to Euripides. Iphig. in Aulid. v. 152, 534, by seven cyclops who came from Syria. These cyclops were not Vulcan's workmen. The nine first kings of Argos were called Inachides, in honour of the founder. Their names were Inachus, Phoroneus, Apis Argus, Chryasus, Phorbas, Triopas, Stelenus and Gelanor. Gelanor gave a kind reception to Danaus, who drove him from his kingdom in return for his hospitality. The descendants of Danaus were called Belides. Agamemnon was king of Argos during the Trojan war; and 80 years after the Heracleidæ seized the Peloponnesus, and deposed the monarchs. The inhabitants of Argos were called Argivi and Argolici; and this name has been often applied to all the Greeks without distinction. [The term Argos appears to have been an old Pelasgic word, signifying kingdom. Hence the name is met with in different parts of Greece originally occupied by the Pelasgi.] Plin. 7, c. 56.—Paus. 2, c. 15, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 7.—Ælian. V. According to others, it was founded by Alcæmon, and called after his brother. The adjacent country bears the name of Filoquia, at the present day.]

ARGUS, a king of Argos, who reigned 70 years.—A son of Arestor, whence he is often called Arrestorides. He married Ismene, the daughter of the Asopus. As he had an hundred eyes, of which only two were asleep at one time, Juno set him to watch Io, whom Jupiter had changed into a heifer; but Mercury, by order of Jupiter, slew him by lulling all his eyes asleep with the sound of his lyre. Juno put the eyes of Argus on the tail of the peacock, a bird sacred to her. Moschus Idyl.—*Ovid. He married Evadne the daughter of Strymon. Id. 15.—A dog of Ulysses, who knew his master after an absence of 20 years. Homer. Od. 17, v. 300.

ARGYLLA, an ancient name of Cære, in Etruria. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 652, l. 8, v. 478.

ARGYNNIS, a name of Venus, which she received from Argynnus, a favourite youth of Agamemnon who was drowned in the Cephissus. Propert. 3, el. 5, v. 52.

ARGÿRA, a nymph greatly beloved by a shepherd called Selimnus. She was changed into a fountain, and the shepherd into a river of the same name, whose waters make lovers forget the object of their affections vid. Selimnus. Paus. 7, c. 23.—A city of Troas.—Also the native place of Diodorus Siculus, in Sicily.

ARGÿRASÏDES, Macedonian soldiers who received this name from their silver bucklers. [According to Quintus Curtius they formed the second corps of Alexander's army, the phalanx being the first.] Curt. 4, c. 13.

ARGÿRE, [a country of India on the other side of the Ganges.—Also a town of India, and the metropolis of the island Jabadios or Sumatra. It is called by Ptolemy Argentæa, and its site corresponds, according to D'Anville, with the modern Ashem.]

[ARGÿRIPA, a town of Apulia, built by Diomedes after the Trojan war, and called by Polybius Argipana. vid. Arpi.]

ARÿA, a country of Asia. [It was properly a particular province, but the name was given to a country of large extent, answering to the present Khorasin, comprising several provinces, and bounded on the west by Media on the north by Hyrcania and Parthia, on the east by Bactria, and on the south by Carmania and Gedrosia. The capital was Artacoana, now Herat.] Mela, 1, c. 2, l. 2, c. 7.—The wife of Pætus Cæcinnæ, of Padua, a Roman senator who was accused of conspiracy against Claudius, and carried to Rome by sea. She accompanied him, and in the boat she stabbed herself, and presented the sword to her husband, who followed her example. Plin. 7.

ARIADNE, daughter of Minos 2d, king of Crete, by Pasiphae, fell in love with Theseus, who was shut up in the labyrinth to be devoured by the Minotaur, and gave him a clue of thread, by which he extricated himself from the difficult windings of his confinement. After he had conquered the Minotaur, he carried her away according to the promise he had made, and married her; but when he arrived at the island of Naxos he forsook her, though she was already pregnant and repaid his love with the most endearing tenderness. Ariadne was so disconsolate upon being abandoned by Theseus, that she hung herself, according to some; but Plutarch says, that she lived many years after, and had some children by Ænarus, the priest of Bacchus. According to some writers, Bacchus loved her after Theseus had forsaken her, and he gave her a crown of seven stars, which, after her death, was made a constellation. The Argives showed Ariadne's tomb, and when one of their temples was repaired, her ashes were found in an earthen urn. *Homer. ARÿEUS, an officer who succeeded to the command of the surviving army after the death of Cyrus the younger, after the battle of Cunaxa. He made peace with Artaxerxes. Xenoph.

ARIANTAS, [a king of Scythia, who, in order to ascertain the number of the Scythians, commanded each of his subjects on pain of death, to bring him the point of an arrow. The heap thus collected was left as a monument of the transaction.]

ARIAMNES, a king of Cappadocia, son of Ariarathes 3d.

ARIARATHES, a king of Cappadocia, who joined Darius Ochus in his expedition against Egypt, where he acquired much glory.—His nephew, the 2d of that name, defended his kingdom against Perdiccas, the general of Alexander, but he was defeated and hung on a cross in the 81st year of his age, 321 B. C.—His son, Ariarathes the 3d, escaped the massacre which attended his father and his followers; and after the death of Perdiccas, he recovered Cappadocia, by conquering Amyntas the Macedonian general. He was succeeded by his son Ariamnes.—Ariarathes the 4th, succeeded his father Ariamnes, and married Stratonice, daughter of Antiochus Theos. He died after a reign of twenty-eight years, B. C. 220, and was succeeded by his son Ariarathes the 5th, a prince who married Antiochia, the daughter of king Antiochus whom he assisted against the Romans. Antiochus being defeated, Ariarathes saved his kingdom from invasion by paying the Romans a large sum of money, remitted at the instance of the king of Pergamus.—His son, the 6th of that name, called Philopater, from his piety, succeeded him 166 B. C. An alliance with the Romans shielded him against the false claims that were laid to his crown by one of the favourites of Demetrius king of Syria. He was maintained on the throne by Attalus, and assisted his friends at Rome against Aristonicus the usurper of Pergamus; but he was killed in the war B. C. 130, leaving six children, five of whom were murdered by his surviving wife Laodice.—The only one who escaped, Ariarathes 7th, was proclaimed king, and soon after married Laodice, the sister of Mithridates Eupator, by whom he had two sons. He was murdered by an illegitimate brother, upon which his widow Laodice gave herself and kingdom to Nicomedes king of Bithynia. Mithridates made war against the new king, and raised his nephew to the throne. The young king, who was the 8th of the name of Ariarathes, made war against the tyrannical Mithridates, by whom he was assassinated in the presence of both armies, and the murderer's son, a child eight years old, was placed on the vacant throne. The Cappadocians revolted, and made the late monarch's brother, Ariarathes 9th, king; but Mithridates expelled him, and restored his own son. The exiled prince died of a broken heart; and Nicomedes of Bithynia, dreading the power of the tyrant, interested the Romans in the affairs of Cappadocia. The arbiters wished to make the country free; but the Cappadocians demanded a king, and received Ariobarzanes, B. C. 91. On the death of Ariobarzanes, his brother ascended the throne, under the name of Ariarathes 10th; but his title was disputed by Sisenna, the eldest son of Glaphyra, by Archelaus, priest of Comana. M. Antony, who was umpire between the contending parties, decided in favour of Sisenna; but Ariarathes recovered it for a while, though he was soon after obliged to yield in favour of Archelaus, the second son of Glaphyra, B. C. 36. Diod. 18.—Justin. 13 and 29.—Strab. 12.

ARICIA, an Athenian princess, niece to Ægeus, whom Hippolytus married after he had been raised from the dead by Æsculapius. He built a city in Italy, which he called by her name. He had a son by her, called Virbius. Orid. Met. 15, v. 41.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 762, &c.—A very ancient town of Italy, now Riccìa, built by Hippolytus, son of Theseus, after he had been raised from the dead by Æsculapius, and transported into Italy by Diana. In a grove, in the neighbourhood of Aricia, Orestes built a temple to Diana, where he established the same rites as were in the temple of that goddess in Tauris. The priest of this temple, called Rex, was always a fugitive, and the murderer of his predecessor, and went always armed with a dagger, to prevent whatever attempts might be made upon his life by one who wished to be his successor. [According to Strabo, the priest was always a runaway slave.] The Arician forest, frequently called nemorensis or memoralis sylva, was very celebrated, and no horses would ever enter it, because Hippolytus had been killed by them. Egeria, the favourite nymph, and invisible protectress of Numa, generally resided in this famous grove, which was situated on the Appian way, beyond mount Albanus. Ovid. Met. 15, Fast. 3, v.

263.—Lucan. 6, v. 74.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 761, &c.

ARICINA, a surname of Diana, from her temple near Aricia. [vid. Aricia.]—The mother of Octavius. Cic. 3, Phil. c. 6.

ARIDÆUS, a companion of Cyrus the younger. After the death of his friend, he reconciled himself to Artaxerxes, by betraying to him the surviving Greeks in their return. Diod.—An illegitimate son of Philip, who, after the death of Alexander, was made king of Macedonia, till Roxane, who was pregnant by Alexander, brought into the world a legitimate male successor. Aridæus had not the full enjoyment of his senses; and therefore Perdicas, one of Alexander's generals, declared himself his protector, and even married his sister, to strengthen their connection. He was seven years in possession of the sovereign power, and was put to death, with his wife Eurydice, by Olympias. Justin. 9, c. 8.—Diod.

ARIMĀSPI, [a people of Scythia, who, according to Herodotus, had but one eye, and waged a continual contest with the griffins who collected the gold, which, according to the same writer, was found in vast quantities in the vicinity of this people. The name is derived by him from two Scythian words, Arima, one, and Spu, an eye. It means nothing more than that these people were expert archers, closing one eye in taking aim.

ARIMĀZES, a powerful prince of Sogdiana, who treated Alexander with much insolence, and even asked whether he could fly to aspire to so extensive a dominion. He surrendered, and was exposed on a cross with his friends and relations. Curt. 7, c. 11.

ARIMĪNUM, [a city of Umbria in Italy, at the mouth of the river Ariminus, on the coast not far to the south-east of the Rubicon. It was founded by the Umbri, and afterwards inhabited partly by them and partly by the Pelasgi. It was taken by the Galli Senones. The Romans sent a colony to it A. U. C. 485. In this place Cæsar is said to have harangued his troops, after having crossed the Rubicon; and here the tribunes of the commons, who were in his interest, met him. It is now called Rimini.]

ARIMĪNUS, a river of Umbria in Italy, rising in the Apennine mountains, [and falling into the sea at Ariminum.] Plin. 3, c. 15.

ARIMPHÆI, a people of Scythia, near the Riphæan mountains, who lived chiefly upon berries in the woods, and were remarkable for their innocence and mildness. Plin. 6, c. 7.

ARIOBARZĀNES, a man made king of Cappadocia by the Romans, after the troubles, which the false Ariarathes had raised, had subsided. Mithridates drove him from his kingdom, but the Romans restored him. He followed the interest of Pompey, and fought at Pharsalia against J. Cæsar. He and his kingdom were preserved by means of Cicero. Cic. 5, ad Attic. ep. 29.—Horat. ep. 6, v. 38.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—A satrap of Phrygia, who, after the death of Mithridates, invaded the kingdom of Pontus, and kept it for twenty-six years. He was succeeded by the son of Mithridates. Diod. 17.—A general of Darius, who defended the passes of Susa with 15,000 foot against Alexander. After a bloody encounter with the Macedonians, he was killed as he attempted to seize the city of Persepolis. Diod. 17.—Curt. 4 and 5.—A Mede of elegant stature and great prudence, whom Tiberius appointed to settle the troubles of Armenia. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 4.

ARIOMARDUS, a son of Darius, in the army of Xerxes when he went against Greece. Herodot. 7, c. 78.

ARIOMÉDES, a pilot of Xerxes.

ARION, a famous lyric poet and musician, son of Cyclos, of Methymna, in the island of Lesbos. [He was accustomed to spend the most of his time with Periander king of Corinth. On a sudden however, feeling desirous of visiting Italy and Sicily, he sailed to those countries, and amassed there great riches. He set sail from Tarentum, after this, in order to return to Corinth, but the mariners formed a plot against him, when they were at sea, to throw him overboard, and seize his riches. Arion, discovering the plot, begged earnestly for his life to be spared, and gave them up all his wealth.] The mariners, however, were not to be prevailed upon; and Arion, seeing them inflexible in their resolutions, begged that he might be permitted to play some melodious tune; and as soon as he had finished it, he threw himself into the sea. A number of Dolphins had been attracted round the ship by the sweetness of his music; and it is said, that one of them carried him safe on his back to Tænarus, whence he hastened to the court of Periander, who ordered all the sailors to be crucified at their return. [Some suppose that he threw himself from the vessel before it had quite left the harbour, and hence that he easily swam to land; and that after coming to land, he immediately entered on board another vessel which had the figure of a dolphin as an ornament, and this vessel being a swift sailor, arrived at Corinth before the other ship.] Hygin. fab. 194.—Herodot. 1, c. 23 and 24.—Ælian. de Nat. An. 13, c. 45.—Ital. 11. Propert. 2, el. 26, v. 17.—Plut. in Symp.—A horse, sprung from Ceres and Neptune. Ceres, when she travelled over the world in quest of her daughter Proserpine, had taken the figure of a mare, to avoid the importuning address of Neptune. The god changed himself also into a horse, and from their union arose a daughter called Hera, and the horse Arion, which had the power of speech, the feet on the right side like those of a man, and the rest of the body like a horse. Arion was brought up by the Nereides, who often harnessed him to his father's chariot, which he drew over the sea with uncommon swiftness. Neptune gave him to Copeus, who presented him to Hercules. Adrastus, king of Argos, received him as a present from Hercules, and with this wonderful animal he won the prize at the Nemean games. Arion therefore, is often called the horse of Adrastus. Paus. 8, c. 25.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 37.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.

ARIOVISTUS, [a king of the Germans, who invaded Gaul, conquered a considerable part of the country, and subjected the inhabitants to the most cruel and oppressive treatment. Cæsar marched against him, brought him to an action, and gained so complete a victory, that very few of the army of Ariovistus, among whom was the king himself, effected their escape. His subsequent history is not known. The name is probably derived from the German words, Heer, an army, and Fürst, a leader or prince.] Cæs. 1. Bell. Gall.—Tacit. 4, Hist.

ARISBA, a town of Lesbos, destroyed by an earthquake. Plin. 5, c. 31.—A colony of the Mityleneans in Troas, destroyed by the Trojans before the coming of the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 264.—Homer. Il. 7.—The name of Priam's first wife, divorced that the monarch might marry Hecuba.

ARISTÆNETUS, [a writer who flourished in the 5th century. He was a native of Nicæa in Bithynia, and the friend of Libanius. He perished in the earthquake which destroyed Nicomedia, A. D. 358, in which city he was filling at the time an office of magistracy. He wrote Letters, which are not greatly esteemed. The major part is little else than a series of passages from Plato, Lucian, and some other writers. The best edition is that of Abresch, Zwollæ. 8vo. 1749, enriched with the emendations of Tollius, D'Orville, and Valckenaer.]

ARISLÆUM, a city of Thrace at the foot of mount Hæmus. Plin. 4, c. 11.

ARISTÆUS, son of Apollo and the nymph Cyrene, was born in the deserts of Lybia, and brought up by the Seasons, and fed upon nectar and ambrosia. His fondness for hunting procured him the surname of Nomus and Agreus. After he had travelled over the greatest part of the world, Aristæus came to settle in Greece, where he married Autonoe, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had a son called Actæon. He fell in love with Euridyce, the wife of Orpheus, and pursued her in the fields. She was stung by a serpent that lay in the grass, and died, for which the gods destroyed all the bees of Aristæus. In this calamity he applied to his mother, who directed him to seize the sea-god Proteus, and consult him how he might repair the losses he had sustained. Proteus advised him to appease the manes of Euridyce by the sacrifice of four bulls and four heifers; and as soon as he had done it, and left them in the air, swarms of bees immediately sprang from the rotten carcasses, and restored Aristæus to his former prosperity. Some authors say that Aristæus had the care of Bacchus when young, and that he was initiated in the mysteries of this god. Aristæus went to live on mount Hæmus, where he died. He was, after death, worshipped as a demi-god. Aristæus is said to have learned from the nymphs the cultivation of olives.

and the management of bees, &c. which he afterwards communicated to the rest of mankind. Virg. G. 4. v. 317.—Diod. 4.—Justin. 13, c. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 368.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 18.—Paus. 10, c. 17.—Hygin. fab. 161, 180, 247.—Apollod. 3, c. 4.—Herod. 4, c. 4, &c.—Polyæn. 1, c. 24.—A general who commanded the Corinthian forces at the siege of Potidæa. He was taken by the Athenians, and put to death.

ARISTAGÖRAS, a writer who composed an history of Egypt. Plin. 36, c. 12.—A son-in-law of Histæus, tyrant of Miletus, who revolted from Darius, and incited the Athenians against Persia, and burnt Sardis. This so exasperated the king, that every evening before supper he ordered his servants to remind him of punishing Aristagoras. He was killed in battle against the Persians, B. C. 499. Herodot. 5, c. 30, &c. l. 7, c. 8.—Polyæn. 1, c. 14.—A man of Cyzicus.—Another of Cumæ. Herodot. 4.

ARISTANDER, a celebrated soothsayer, greatly esteemed by Alexander. Plut. in Alex.—Plin. 17, c. 25.

ARISTARCHE, a matron of Ephesus, who by order of Diana sailed to the coasts of Gaul with the Phocæans, and was made priestess. Strab. 4.

ARISTARCHUS, a celebrated grammarian, [a native of Samothrace,] but residing chiefly at Alexandria, under Ptolemy Philometor, who intrusted him with the education of his son. He was famous for his critical powers, and he revised the poems of Homer with such severity, that ever after all severe critics were called Aristarchi. [He criticised also the works of Pindar, Aratus, and other poets. To him the ancient commentators on Homer ascribe the division of the Iliad and Odyssey into books, according to the order and number of the Greek letters. It was his practice, in revising Homer, to mark those verses which he thought unworthy of him with an obelisk, and those which he deemed particularly excellent with an asterisk.] He wrote above 800 commentaries on different authors, much esteemed in his age. In his old age he became dropsical, upon which he starved himself, and died in his 72d year, B. C. 157, [in the isle of Cyprus.] He left two sons, called Aristarchus and Aristagoras, both famous for their stupidity. Horat. de Art. poet. v. 499.—Ovid. 3, ex Pont. ep. 9, v. 24.—Cic. ad Fam. 3, ep. 11, ad Attic. 1, ep. 14.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—A tragic poet of Tegea in Arcadia, about 454 years B. C. He composed 70 tragedies, of which two only were rewarded with the prize. One of them, called Achilles, was translated into Latin verse by Ennius. Suidas.—[An astronomer of Samos, flourished about the middle of the 3d century before Christ. He is well known to have maintained the modern opinion with regard to the motion of the earth round the sun, and its revolution about its own centre or axis. He also taught that the annual orbit of the earth is but a point, compared with the distance of the fixed stars. He estimated the apparent diameter of the sun at the 720th part of the zodiac. He found also that the diameter of the moon bears a greater proportion to that of the earth, than that of 43 to 08, but less than that of 19 to 60, so that the diameter of the moon, according to his statement, should be somewhat less than a third part of the earth. The only one of his works now extant is a treatise on the magnitudes and distances of the sun and moon. The best edition is that of Wallis, Oxon. 1683, in 8vo.]

ARISTÆAS, a poet of Proconnesus, who, as fables report, appeared seven years after his death to his countrymen, and 540 years after to the people of Metapontum in Italy, and commanded them to raise him a statue near the temple of Apollo. He wrote an epic poem on the Arimaspi in three books, and some of his verses are quoted by Longinus. Herodot. 4, c. 13.—Strab. 14.—Max. Tyr. 22.—A geometrician, intimate with Euclid.—A poet, son of Demochares, in the age of Cræsus.—[An officer under Ptolemy Philadelphus, to whom is ascribed a Greek work still extant, entitled "A history of the interpreters of Scripture," giving an account of the manner in which the Septuagint was written. The best edition is that printed at Oxford, in 1692, in 8vo.]

ARISTËRA, an island [south-east of the peninsula of Argolis. It is well known at the present day under its modern name of Hydra.] Paus. 2, c. 34.

ARISTIDES, a celebrated Athenian, son of Lysimachus, whose great temperance and virtue procured him the surname of Justi. He was rival to Themistocles, by whose influence he was banished for ten years, B. C. 484; but before six years of his exile had elapsed, he was recalled by the Athenians. He was at the battle of Salamis, and was appointed chief commander with Pausanias against Mardonius, who was defeated at Plataea. Although he had long managed the common treasury of Greece, yet he died so poor, that the expenses of his funeral were defrayed at the public charge, and his two daughters, on account of their father's virtues, received a dowry from the public treasury when they were come to marriageable years. Poverty, however, seemed hereditary in the family of Aristides, for the grandson was seen in the public streets, getting his livelihood by explaining dreams. The Athenians became more virtuous in imitating their great leader; and from the sense of his good qualities, at the representation of one of the tragedies of Æschylus, on the mentioning of a sentence concerning moral goodness, the eyes of the audience were all at once turned from the actor to Aristides. When he sat as judge, it is said that the plaintiff, in his accusation, mentioned the injuries his opponent had done to Aristides, "mention the wrongs you have received," replied the equitable Athenian, "I sit here as judge, and the law-suit is yours, and not mine." C. Nep. & Plut. in Vita.—An historian of Miletus, fonder of stories and of anecdotes than of truth. He wrote an history of Italy, of which the 49th volume has been quoted by Plut. in Parall. —An Athlete, who obtained a prize at the Olympiad, Nemean, and Pythian games. Paus. 6, c. 16. —A painter of Thebes in Bœotia, in the age of Alexander the Great. [He is said to have been the first who painted mind, and expressed the affections and passions.] —A Greek orator who wrote 50 orations, besides other tracts. When Smyrna was destroyed by an earthquake, he wrote so pathetic a letter to M. Aurelius, that the emperor ordered the city immediately to be rebuilt. [The inhabitants honoured Aristides, as the founder of their new city, with a brazen statue in the forum.] His works consist of hymns in prose in honour of the gods, funeral orations, apologues, panegyrics, and harangues, the best edition of which is that of Jebb, 2 volumes 4to. Oxon. 1722, and that in a smaller size, in 12mo. 3 vols. of Canterus, apud P. Steph. 1604. —A philosopher of Mysia, intimate with M. Antoninus. —An Athenian, who wrote treatises on animals, trees, and agriculture.

ARISTILLUS, a philosopher of the Alexandrian school, who, about 300 years B. C. attempted with Timocharis to determine the place of the different stars in the heavens, and to trace the course of the planets.

ARISTIPPUS, the elder, a philosopher of Cyrene, disciple to Socrates, and founder of the Cyrenaic sect, [flourished about 392 B. C.] He was for some time highly esteemed by Socrates, but his fondness for effeminate and luxurious indulgence gave great offence to the philosopher, and at length produced a cessation of intercourse between them. He was the first disciple of the Socratic school who took money for teaching. He afterwards was compelled to leave Athens in consequence of the freedom of his manners, and visited, among other parts, the island of Sicily. Here he became one of the flatterers of Dionysius, and gained a large share of royal favour. He left Syracuse before the expulsion of the tyrant, but whether he ever returned to his own country, and when and how he died, are circumstances about which nothing certain is known.] Many of his sayings and maxims are recorded by Diogenes, in his life. Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 100. —His grandson, of the same name, called the younger, was a warm defender of his opinions, and supported that the principles of all things were pain and pleasure. He flourished about 363 years B. C. —A tyrant of Argos, whose life was one continued series of apprehension. He was killed by a Cretan in a battle against Aratus, B. C. 242. Diog.

M. ARISTIVS, a satirist, who wrote a poem called Cyclops.

ARISTO. vid. Ariston.

ARISTOBŪLUS, a name common to some of the high-priests and kings of Judæa, &c. Joseph. —A brother of Epicurus. —One of Alexander's attendants, who wrote the king's life, replete with adulation and untruth. —[An Alexandrian Jew, preceptor of Ptolemy

Euergetes, flourished about 145 B. C. He was an admirer of the Greek philosophy, and united the study of the Aristotelian system with that of the Mosaic law.]

ARISTŒCLES, a peripatetic philosopher of Messeniâ, who reviewed, in a treatise on philosophy, the opinions of his predecessors. He also wrote on rhetoric, and likewise nine books on morals. —This name is common to many Greeks, of whom few or no particulars are recorded.

ARISTOCĪDES, a tyrant of Orchomenus, who, because he could not win the affection of Stymphalis, killed her and her father, upon which all Arcadia took up arms and destroyed the murderer.

ARISTOCRATES, a king of Arcadia, put to death by his subjects for offering violence to the priestess of Diana. Paus. 3, c. 5. His grandson of the same name, was stoned to death for taking bribes, during the second Messenian war, and being the cause of the defeat of his Messenian allies, B. C. 682. Id. ibid.

ARISTODĒMUS, son of Aristomachus, was one of the Heraclidæ. He, with his brothers Temenus and Cresphontes, invaded Peloponnesus, conquered it, and divided the country among themselves, 1104 years before the christian era. He married Argia, by whom he had the twins Procles and Eurysthenes. He was killed by a thunderbolt at Naupactus, though some say that he died at Delphi in Phocis. Paus. 2, c. 18, l. 3, c. 1 and 16. —Herodot. 7, c. 204, l. 8, c. 131. —A king of Messenia, who maintained a famous war against Sparta. After some losses, he recovered his strength, and greatly weakened the power of the enemy. [vid. Partheniæ.] Aristodemus put his daughter to death for the good of his country; being afterwards persecuted in a dream by her manes, he killed himself, after a reign of six years and some months, in which he had obtained much military glory, B. C. 724. Paus. in Messen.

ARISTOGĒNES, a physician of Cos, who obtained great reputation by the cure of Demetrius Gonatas, king of Macedonia. —A Thasian who wrote 24 books on medicine.

ARISTOGITON and HARMODIUS, [two Athenians whose names were rendered memorable in the annals of Athens. An intimate friendship subsisted between them, which the tyrant Hipparchus endeavoured to disturb. Harmodius and Aristogiton thereupon determined to kill both Hipparchus and his brother Hippias. On the morning of the Panathenæa, on which they intended to execute their project, Hippias was seen talking to one of the conspirators. As they were afraid that their plot was discovered, they immediately killed Hipparchus, and Hippias escaped. Aristogiton was put to the torture, in order to force him to declare his accomplices. The most intimate friends of Hippias were named by him, and immediately put to death. Though Harmodius and Aristogiton perished, yet their example infused a spirit into the Athenians, which displayed itself in the banishment of Hippias, three years after this event, about 510 B. C.] They received immortal honours from the Athenians, and had statues raised to their memory. These statues were carried away by Xerxes when he took Athens. The conspiracy of Aristogiton was so secretly planned and so wisely carried into execution, that it is said a courtesan bit her tongue off not to betray the trust reposed in her. [According to the common opinion, Hipparchus possessed the tyranny when he was killed. This is contradicted by Thucydides, 6, 54, who proves that Hippias was the eldest. Plato (in Hipparch.) says that Hipparchus was the eldest. The Athenians passed a law forbidding any man from assuming the names of Aristogiton or Harmodius.] Paus. 1, c. 29.—Herodot. 5, c. 55.—Plut. de 10. Orat.—An Athenian orator, surnamed Kovv, for his impudence. He wrote orations, against Timarchus, Timotheus, Hyperides, and Thrasyllus.

ARISTOMACHE, the wife of Dionysius of Syracuse. Cic. Tus. 5, c. 20.—The wife of Dion

ARISTOMACHUS, an Athenian who wrote concerning the preparation of wine. Plin. 14, c. 9.—A man so excessively fond of bees, that he devoted 58 years of his life in raising swarms of them. Plin. 11, c. 9.—The son of Cleodæus and grandson of Hylus, whose three sons, Cresphontes, Temenus, and Aristodemus, called Heraclidæ, conquered Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 7, 1. 3, c. 15.—Herodot. 6, 7 and 8.—A man who laid aside his sovereign power at Argos, at the persuasion of Aratus. Paus. 2, c. 8.

ARISTOMENES, a commander of the fleet of Darius on the Hellespont, conquered by the Macedonians. Curt. 4, c. 1.—A famous general of Messenia, who encouraged his countrymen to shake off the Lacedæmonian yoke, under which they had laboured for above 30 years. [Thus commenced the second Messenian war, B. C. 685, which terminated, B. C. 668. In the first battle, the Messenians obtained the victory through the personal exertions of Aristomenes, and unanimously saluted him King. He refused, however, to assume the title, and chose that of general.] He acquired the surname of Just. from his equity, to which he joined the true valour, sagacity and perseverance of a general. He once, in the night-time, entered Sparta without being known, [and to intimidate the Spartans, affixed to the walls of the temple of Minerva, a buckler with an inscription, "Aristomenes has dedicated this to the goddess, from the spoils of the Lacedæmonians."] He was so dexterous in eluding the vigilance of the Lacedæmonians, who had taken him captive, that he twice escaped from them. [After the conclusion of the second Messenian war, which, like the first, ended disastrously for his country, he sent the Messenians under the conduct of his son to Sicily, where they founded Messana, while he remained in Greece himself, watching an opportunity to retaliate on the Spartans.

Such was his reputation, that when Damagetus, a person of the first rank at Rhodes, consulted the oracle at Delos whom he should marry, he was told to espouse the daughter of the most worthy of the Greeks, meaning Aristomenes. On a visit to his son-in-law Aristomenes died, and a magnificent tomb was erected for him at Rhodes.]

ARISTON, a tyrant of Methymna, who being ignorant that Chios had surrendered to the Macedonians, entered into the harbour, and was taken and put to death. Curt. 4, c. 9.—A philosopher of Chios, pupil to Zeno the stoic, and founder of a sect which continued but a little while. He supported that the nature of the divinity is unintelligible. It is said that he died by the heat of the sun, which fell too powerfully upon his bald head. In his old age he was much given to sensuality. Diog.—A lawyer in Trajan's reign, whose eulogium has been written by Phry, 22 epist. lib. 1.—A peripatetic philosopher of Alexandria, who wrote concerning the course of the Nile. Strab.—A native of Pella, in the age of Adrian, who wrote on the rebellion of the Jews.

ARISTONAUTE, [a small town of Achaia, north of Pellene, and at the bottom of a small gulph, called by Pausanias, the port of Pellene.] Paus. 2.

ARISTONICUS, son of Eumenes, by a concubine of Ephesus, 126 B. C. invaded Asia and the kingdom of Pergamus which Attalus had left by his will to the Roman people. He was conquered by the consul Perpenna, and strangled in prison. Justin. 36, c. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 20.—A grammarian of Alexandria, who wrote a commentary on Hesiod and Homer, besides a treatise on the Museum, established at Alexandria by the Ptolemies.

[ARISTÓNUS, an eminent Grecian sculptor. He made a statue of Jupiter at Olympia, whose face was turned towards the rising sun.] Plin. 34.

ARISTONYMUS, a comic poet under Philadelphus, keeper of the library of Alexandria. He died of a retention of urine, in his 77th year. Athen.

ARISTOPHĀNES, a celebrated comic poet. [The place of his birth is not known; it is generally supposed, however, that he was not a native of Athens, but that he resided there and obtained the rights of citizenship.] He wrote 54 comedies, of which only eleven have come down to us. He lived in the age of Socrates, Demosthenes, and Euripides, B. C. 434, and lashed the vices of his age with a masterly hand. The wit and excellence of his comedies are well known; but they abound sometimes too much with obscenity, and his attack upon the venerable character of Socrates has been always censured, and with justice. [vid. Mitchell's Aristophanes, Preliminary Discourse, in which an attempt is made to defend the poet from this charge.] As a reward for his mental greatness, the poet received a crown of olive in a public assembly; but if he deserved praise, he merited blame for his licentiousness, which spared not even the gods, and was so offensive to his countrymen, that Alcibiades made a law at Athens, which forbade the comic writers from mimicking or representing on the stage any living character by name. Aristophanes has been called the prince of ancient comedy, as Menander of the new. The play called Nubes is pointed against Socrates, and the philosopher is exposed to ridicule, and his precepts placed in a most ludicrous point of view, by the introduction of one of his pupils in the characters of the piece. It is said that St. Chrysostom used to keep the comedies of Aristophanes under his pillow, on account of the brilliancy of the composition. Plutarch has made a comparison between the princes of the new and old comedy, which abounds with many anecdotes concerning these original characters. [Aristophanes has found a strenuous defender in his late able translator Mr. Mitchell. It is maintained that in his satirical, and even his indecent vein, he acted upon established principles, which, however inconsistent with our notions upon such subjects, found a sanction in the very religion of the times. His audience, it is said, came to the exhibition with a previous knowledge that they were to consider what they saw merely as harmless caricature; and as these plays were acted only once, it became necessary that the impression made should be a strong one, especially as the Athenians were a seeing and hearing, not a reading people. Mr. Mitchell, however, is justly censurable for the overcolouring of which he is guilty in drawing the character of Socrates, and into which he has been led by the idea that the reputation of Aristophanes was only to be elevated by destroying in some measure that of the Athenian sage. The sketch he has given of Socrates is nothing more than a gross and clumsy caricature, outraging every notion of correctness and propriety. As regards the productions of Aristophanes, the student will find a list of them, as far as can be correctly given, in Brunck's edition of this poet, in which the number is reduced to about 35. As to the comedy of the clouds, it may not be amiss to observe that it failed on its first representation. Whether it ever came to a second exhibition is very doubtful. The play originally condemned has reached our times, together with part of an address to the audience evidently intended for the second performance. The student will find a defence of Aristophanes, besides the one mentioned above, in Porson's Review of Brunck's edition, Museum Criticum, No. 6.] The best editions of the works of Aristophanes are Kuster's, fol. Amst. 1710, and the 12mo. L. Bat. 1670, and that of Brunck, 4 vols. 8vo. Argent. 1783, which would still be more perfect, did it contain the valuable scholia. [These have subsequently appeared in the edition of Inverniz, Lips. 1794, 3 vols. 8vo.] Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Patric. 1, c. 16.—Horat. l. Sat. 4, v. 1.—A grammarian of Byzantium, keeper of the library of Alexandria under Ptolemy Euergetes. [He is said to have been the first who introduced the accentual marks into the Greek language. He is placed by Suidas in the 145th Olympiad, about 200 years B. C.]

ARISTOPHON, a painter in the age of Socrates. He drew the picture of Alcibiades softly reclining on the bosom of the courtesan Nemea, and all the people of Athens ran in crowds to be spectators of the masterly piece. He also made a painting of Mars leaning on the arm of Venus. Plut. in Alc.—Athen. 13.—Plin. 35, c. 11.—A comic poet in the age of Alexander, many of whose fragments are collected in Athenæus.

ARISTOTELEIA, [annual feasts in honour of Aristotle, celebrated by the inhabitants of Stagira, in gratitude for his having procured from Alexander, the re-building and re-peopling of that city, which had been demolished by king Philip.]

ARISTOTÈLES, a famous philosopher, son of the physician Nicomachus by Phestias, born at Stagira, 85 years after the birth of Socrates, and B. C. 384. He lost his parents in early youth, but inherited from them a large fortune. At the age of 17 he went to Athens, to hear Plato's lectures, where he soon signalized himself by the brightness of his genius. [Plato often called him the Mind of his school, and when Aristotle happened to be absent, observed "Intellect is not here," and complained that he lectured to a deaf audience. He continued to reside with Plato for 20 years, even to his master's death, alike regardless of the honours of a court, to which the rank and connections of his family might have opened to him the road in Macedonia, and indifferent to the glory of a name, which his great abilities might have attained by establishing a separate school and founding a new sect. Little credit is due to the story of a quarrel between him and Plato, and also to that of his opening a school in opposition to his master during his life. On the death of Plato he left Athens, and some time after was chosen by Philip, preceptor to his son Alexander, which office he discharged with the greatest ability during 8 years, until his pupil's accession to the throne. The letter which Philip wrote to Aristotle, when he chose him preceptor to his son, was couched in the following terms: "Be informed that I have a son, and that I am thankful to the Gods, not so much for his birth, as that he was born in the same age with you: for if you will undertake the charge of his education, I assure myself that he will become worthy of his father, and of the kingdom which he will inherit." After Aristotle had left his pupil, they carried on a friendly correspondence, in which the philosopher prevailed upon Alexander to employ his power and wealth in the service of philosophy. Alexander, accordingly, employed several thousand persons in different parts of Europe and Asia, to collect animals of various kinds, birds, beasts, and fishes, and sent them to Aristotle, who, from the information which this collection afforded him, wrote fifty volumes on the history of animated nature, only a small portion of which are now extant. A mutual alienation and jealousy, however, arose between the philosopher and his prince, after the death of Callisthenes, the nephew of the former. Upon his return to Athens, Aristotle resolved to found a new sect in opposition to the Academy. He chose for his school a grove in the suburbs of Athens, called the Lycæum; and from his walking about as he discoursed with his pupils, his followers were termed Peripatetics. His more abstruse discourses were delivered in the morning to his select disciples; this he called his morning walk. He delivered lectures to a more promiscuous auditory in the evenings, when the Lycæum was open to all young men without distinction: this he termed his evening walk. Both were much frequented. Aristotle continued his school in the Lycæum for twelve years. After the death of Alexander, having no longer the power of that prince to protect him, his adversaries instigated Eurymedon, a priest, to accuse him of holding and propagating impious tenets. In consequence of this he retired with a few of his disciples to Chalcis, where he remained until his death. He died at the age of 63. Many idle tales are related concerning the manner of his death, (vid. Euripus) but it is most likely that it was the effect of premature decay, in consequence of excessive watchfulness and application. His body was interred at Stagyræ, where his memory was honoured with an altar and a tomb. Aristotle was twice married. By his second wife he had a son named Nicomachus, to whom he addressed his "Greater Morals." His person was slender, he had small eyes and a shrill voice, and when he was young, hesitated in his speech. He endeavoured to supply the defects of his natural form by an attention to dress, and commonly appeared in a costly habit, with his beard shaven, his hair cut, and rings on his fingers. Concerning his character nothing can be more contradictory than the accounts of different writers; some making him a model of every virtue, others the most infamous of human beings. The truth appears to be, that his virtues were neither of that exalted kind which command admiration, nor his faults so highly criminal as not to admit of some apology. He is certainly entitled to the praise of deep erudition; but, on the other hand, is justly censurable for giving oftentimes a partial and unfair representation of the opinions of his predecessors. While he deserves, in point of genius and indefatigable industry, to be ranked in the first class of men, his reputation as a philosopher is, in some measure, tarnished by a too daring spirit of contradiction and innovation, and in morals, by an artful conformity to the manners of the age in which he lived. In religion he ought not certainly to be regarded as an atheist, though it must be owned that it is impossible to reconcile his notions of Deity with just conceptions of the divine nature, and attributes. His doctrine concerning fate seems to have been construed by his opponents into a denial of the necessity of prayers and sacrifices, and was consequently deemed inimical to the public institutions of religion. Most of the subjects which he discusses are in the highest degree abstruse; but the obscurity necessarily arising from the nature of these subjects is increased by the manner of the Stagyræite. He almost constantly affects close periods and a concise diction, and leaves much to be supplied by the reader himself. His transitions are frequent and abrupt, and his use of new terms in a technical sense is not unfrequent. Most of his writings have reached us. They embrace Logical, Physical, Metaphysical, Mathematical, and Moral subjects, besides treatises on Government, Rhetoric, and the Art of Poetry, the latter an excellent performance. His works and library were left by him to Theophrastus, who, at his death, bequeathed them to Neleus of Scepsis. Some of them were sold to Ptolemy, and shared the fate of the Alexandrian library. The heirs of Neleus, in order to secure the rest from being seized by the kings of Pergamum, who were collecting a library, buried them in a subterranean cavern, where they lay 130 years, and suffered much injury. They were afterwards sold to Apellicon of Teos, who had the manuscripts transcribed, and with injudicious industry, supplied from his own conjectures and those of his copyists, such passages as were become illegible. It is impossible to say how many corruptions were thus introduced into the text. After the death of Apellicon, Sylla, at the taking of Athens, B. C. 85, seized his library, and had it conveyed to Rome. Here Tyrannio, a grammarian, obtaining permission to make use of the manuscripts of Aristotle, employed ignorant amanuenses to take copies, which he suffered to pass out of his hands without correction. These errors have been increased by the officiousness of later transcribers and commentators. His treatises have been published separately, but the best edition of his entire works is that of Duval, 2 vols. folio, Paris, 1619. Tyrwhitt's edition of the Poetics, Oxon. 4to. 1794, and Wilkinson's of the Ethics, Oxon. 1715, 8vo. are both excellent. [Diog. in vita.—Plut. in Alex. and de Alex. fort. &c.—Cic. Acad. Max. 5, c. 6, &c.—There were besides seven of the same name, A magistrate of Athens.—A commentator on Homer's Iliad.—An orator of Sicily, who answered the panegyric of Isocrates.—A friend of Æschines.—A man of Cyrene who wrote on poetry.—A schoolmaster mentioned in Plato's life, written by Aristoxenus.—An obscure grammarian. Diog. de Aristot.

ARISTOXENUS, a celebrated musician, disciple of Aristotle, and born at Tarentum. He wrote 453 different treatises on philosophy, history, &c. and was disappointed in his expectations of succeeding in the school of Aristotle, for which he always spoke with ingratitude of his learned master. [This is denied by Aristocles the Peripatetic, in Eusebius, who affirms that he always spoke of Aristotle in terms of great respect.] Of all his works nothing remains but three books upon music, the most ancient on that subject extant.—A philosopher of Cyrene. Athn.—A physician whose writings are quoted by Galen.

ARISTUS, a Greek historian of Salamis, who wrote an account of Alexander's expedition. Strab. 14.—Arrian. 7.

ARIUS, [a river of Aria, on which was situate Artacoana, the capital of the country; It is now the Heri.]—A celebrated writer, the author of the Arian controversy, that denied the eternal divinity and consubstantiality of the Word. Though he was greatly persecuted for his opinions, he gained the favour of the emperor Constantine, and triumphed over his powerful antagonist Athanasius. He died the very night he was going to enter the church of Constantinople in triumph. Pressed by nature, he went aside to ease himself; but his bowels gushed out, and he expired on the spot, A. D. 336. [It is very probable that his death was occasioned by poison or some other violence. His heresy, however, did not die with him, but found a protector in Constantius, who succeeded his father in the empire of the east. It was eventually suppressed by Theodosius the Great. In their sentiments, the Arians acknowledged one God, the Father; that the Son was a created being; and that the Holy Ghost was a ray or emanation from the Deity.]

ARMENIA, a large country of Asia, divided into Upper and Lower Armenia, called also Major, [was bounded on the south by Mesopotamia; on the east by Media; on the north by Iberia and Albania; and on the west by Pontus and Armenia Minor; which last was separated from it by the Euphrates.] Lower Armenia, or Minor, is bounded by Cappadocia, Armenia Major, Syria, Cilicia, and the Euphrates. The Armenians were a long time under the dominion of the Medes and Persians, till they were conquered with the rest of Asia, by Alexander and his successors. [Armenia Major was wrested from Antiochus the Great, during his minority, by its governor, Artaxies, and made an independent kingdom. In the Mithridatic war, Tigranes was their king. Upon his overthrow by Lucullus and Pompey, the kingdom, though continued to his successors, remained in effect under the controul of the Romans, until Trajan reduced it to a province, and made the Tigris the eastern boundary of the Roman empire. It was soon after, however, governed by its own kings, and having been abandoned by the Romans, was made a Persian province by Sapor. It was subdued by the Saracens, A. D. 667, and by the Turks, A. D. 1522.—Armenia Minor, in its manners and customs, differed in no respect from Armenia Major. It was a very mountainous country, and divided by the Romans into 4 provinces. It is now also held by the Turks, who call it Genech. Armenia Major is the present Turcomania.] Herodot. 1, c. 194, l. 5, c. 49.—Curt. 4, c. 12, l. 5, c. 1.—Strab. 1 and 11.—Mela, 3, c. 5 and 8.—Plin. 6, c. 4. &c.—Lucan. 2.

ARMILUSTRIUM, a festival at Rome, on the 19th of October, [during which they sacrificed completely armed, and to the sound of trumpets. It was intended for the expiation of the armies, and the prosperity of the arms of the Roman people. It is said to have been first observed among the Athenians.] Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Liv. 27, c. 37.

ARMINIUS, a warlike general of the Germans, who supported a bloody war against Rome for some time. [His name is rendered famous by the defeat of Varus, and the slaughter of three Roman legions. (vid. Varus.) He was afterwards defeated in two successive actions by Germanicus. In attempting, after the Roman armies were withdrawn from Germany, to grasp at sovereign power, he involved his country in a civil war, and fell at last by the treachery of one of his relations. His true name seems to have been Hermann or Heeremann, i. e. General, Latinised by the Romans into Arminius.]

ARMORICA, [a name originally applied by the Romans to the entire coast of Gaul, from the Pyrenees to the Rhine; it was afterwards, upon the conquest of the country, given in particular to that part of the coast which lay between the Liger and Sequana, and at last exclusively confined to Bretagne. The term is derived from the Celtic Ar-Mor, i. e. on the sea.]

ARNE, a city of Lycia, called afterwards Xanthus.—A daughter of Æolus, who gave her name to two towns, one in Thessaly, the other in Bœotia. Strab. 1 and 2.—Paus. 9, c. 40.—Met. 6. fab. 4.

ARNOBIUS, a philosopher in Dioclesian's reign, who became a convert to christianity. He applied for ordination, but was refused by the bishops till he gave them a proof of his sincerity. Upon this he wrote his celebrated treatise, in which he exposed the absurdity of irreligion, and ridiculed the heathen gods. Opinions are various concerning the purity of his style, though all agree in praise of his extensive erudition. The book that he wrote, de Rhetoricâ Institutione, is not extant. The best edition of his treatise Adversus Gentes is the 4to. printed L. Bat. 1651. [Ex recens. Ant. Tysii]

ARNUS, a river of Etruria, [rising in the Umbrian Appenines, and falling into the Mediterranean. It is now the Arno. On its banks stood Florentia, the modern Florence, and at its mouth Pisæ, now Pisa.] Liv. 22, c. 2.

[AROMATA, or AROMATUM promontorium, the most eastern land of the continent of Africa, now Cape Guardafui.]

ARPI, a city of Apulia, built by Diomedes after the Trojan war. [It is said to have been called Argyrippe by the inhabitants, and that this was a corruption from Argos Hippion, a name given to it by Diomedes in remembrance of his native city.] Justin. 20, c. 1—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 28.

ARPINUM, a town of Latium, famous for giving birth to Cicero and Marius. [It lay south-east of Anagnia, and is now Arpino.] The words Arpine chartæ are sometimes applied to Cicero's works. Mart. 10, ep. 19—Juv. 8, v. 237.—Cic. Rull. 3.—A town of Magna Græcia.

ARRHABÆUS, the king of a nation in the neighbourhood of Macedonia, who greatly distressed Archelaus. Aristot. 5. Polit. c. 10.

ARRIĀNUS, a philosopher of Nicomedia, priest of Ceres and Proserpine, and disciple of Epictetus, called a second Xenophon from the elegance and sweetness of his diction, and distinguished for his acquaintance with military and political life. He wrote seven books on Alexander's expedition, [an "Account of the affairs of India,"] the periplus of the Euxine and Red Sea, four books on the disputations of Epictetus, [a treatise on hunting, a work on tactics, &c.] He flourished about the 140th year of Christ, and was rewarded with the consulship and government of Cappadocia, by M. Antoninus. The best edition of Arrian's Expediitio Alexandri, is the fol. Gronovii, L. Bat. 1704, [and that of Schmiæder, Lips. 1793, 8vo. Of the Historia Indica, that of Schmiæder, Hal. 1793, 8vo. Of his moral treatise on the Enchiridion, that of Upton, Lond. 1739, 4to. and of the rest of his works, that of Blanchard, Amst. 1683, 8vo. which contains also his Tactica, moral treatise, &c.]—A poet who wrote an epic poem in twenty-four books on Alexander; also another poem on Attalus, king of Pergamus. He likewise translated Virgil's Georgics into Greek verse.

ARSĀCES, a man of obscure origin, [who incited the Parthians to revolt from Antiochus Theos, and was elevated to the throne on account of his successes. He defeated and made prisoner Seleucus Callinicus, and laid the foundation of the Parthian empire, about 250 B. C.] He added the kingdom of the Hyrcani to his newly-acquired possessions, and spent his time in establishing his power, and regulating the laws. After death he was made a god of his nation, and all his successors were called, in honour of his name, Arsacide. Justin. 41, c. 5 and 6.—Strab. 11 and 12.—His son and successor bore the same name. He carried war against Antiochus the son of Seleucus, who entered the field with 100,000 foot, and 20,000 horse. He afterwards made peace with Antiochus, and died B. C. 217. Id. 41, c. 5.—The third king of Parthia, of the family of the Arsacidæ, bore the same name, and was also called Priapatrus. He reigned twelve years, and left two sons, Mithridates and Phraates. Phraates succeeded as being the elder, and at his death he left his kingdom to his brother, though he had many children; observing that a monarch ought to have in view, not the dignity of his family, but the prosperity of his subjects. Justin. 31, c. 5.—A king of Pontus and Armenia, in alliance with the Romans. He fought long with success against the Persians, till he was deceived by the snares of king Sapor, his enemy, who put out his eyes, and soon after deprived him of life. Marcellin.—The eldest son of Artabanus, appointed over Armenia by his father, after the death of king Artaxias. Tacit. Hist. 6.

ARSACIDE, a name given to some of the monarchs of Parthia, in honour of Arsaces, the founder of the empire. Their power subsisted till the 229th year of the christian era, when they were conquered by Artaxerxes king of Persia. [vid. Artabanus.] Justin. 41.

ARSAMOSĀTA, a town of Armenia Major. [in the south-western angle of the district Sophene. It is now Simsat or Shimsat.] Tacit. Hist. 6.

ARSĀNES, the son of Oechus, and father of Codomanus.

ARSĀNĀS, [a river of Armenia Major, which D'Anville and Mannert, but especially the latter, consider as another name for the southern arm of the Euphrates. vid. Euphrates.—There was another of the same name lower down, which flowed from the north-west through Sophene, and entered the Euphrates below Melitene, on which Arsamosata was situate. This is now the Arsen.]

ARSES, the youngest son of Oechus, whom the Eunuch Bagoas raised to the throne of Persia, and destroyed with his children, after a reign of three years. Diod. 17.

ARSĀ, a wood of Etruria, famous for a battle between the Romans and the Veientes. Plut. in Popl.—A small river between Illyricum and Histria, falling into the Adriatic. [The limit of Italy in that quarter, after Histria was added to Italy by Augustus.]—A river of Italy, flowing through Campania.

ARSINŌE, the sister and wife of Ptolemy Philadelphus, worshipped after death under the name of Venus Zephyritis. Dinochare began to build her a temple with loadstones, in which there stood a statue of Arsinoe suspended in the air by the power of the magnet; but the death of the architect prevented its being perfected. Plin. 34, c. 14.—A daughter of Ptolemy Lagus, who married Lysimachus, king of Macedonia. After her husband's death, Ceraunus, her own brother, married her, and ascended the throne of Macedonia. He previously murdered Lysimachus and Philip, the sons of Arsinoe by Lysimachus, in their mother's arms. Arsinoe was some time after banished to Samothrace. Justin. 17, c. 1, &c.—A younger daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, sister to Cleopatra. Antony dispatched her to gain the good graces of her sister. Hirt. Alex. 4.—Appian.—The wife of Magas king of Cyrene, who committed adultery with her son-in-law. Justin. 26, c. 3.—A daughter of Lysimachus. Paris.—A town of Egypt, situated near the lake of Mœris, on the west.

ern shore of the Nile, where the inhabitants paid the highest veneration to the crocodiles. They nourished them in a splendid manner, and embalmed them after death, and buried them in the subterraneous cells of the labyrinth. [Hence it was called Crocodilopolis. It is succeeded by the modern Faioum, built at the distance of about a league north-east of its dilapidated walls. vid. Crocodilopolis. —Another in Egypt, on the west side of the Sinus Arabicus, near its extremity, and not far from the modern Suez. From this spot Ptolemy Philadelphus cut a canal to one of the branches of the Nile.] Strab.—A town of Cilicia—of Eolia—of Syria—of Cyprus—of Lycia, &c.

[ARSISSA PALUS, a great lake in the southern part of Armenia Major, now the Lake of Van. It was on its northern side embellished with cities which were better known to the Byzantine writers than they had been before, viz. Chaliat or Athlat, Arzes or Argish, and Perkri.]

ARTABANUS, son of Hystaspes, was brother to Darius the first. He dissuaded his nephew Xerxes from making war against the Greeks, and at his return, he assassinated him with the hopes of ascending the throne. Darius, the son of Xerxes, was murdered in a similar manner; and Artaxerxes, his brother, would have shared the same fate, had he not discovered the snares of the assassin, and punished him with death. Diod. 11.—Justin. 3, c. 1, &c.—Herodot. 4, c. 38, l. 7, c. 10, &c.—A king of Parthia after the death of his nephew Phraates 2d. He undertook a war against a nation of Scythia, in which he perished. His son Mithridates succeeded him. Justin. 42, c. 2.—A king of Media, and afterwards of Parthia, after the expulsion of Vonones, whom Tiberius had made king there. He invaded Armenia, from whence he was driven away by one of the generals of Tiberius. He was expelled from his throne, which Tiridates usurped; and some time after, he was restored to his ancient power, and died A. D. 48. Tacit. Ann. 5, &c.—A king of Parthia, very inimical to the interests of Vespasian.—Another king of Parthia, who made war against the emperor Caracalla, who had attempted his life on pretence of courting his daughter. [With this Artabanus, who is styled the 4th, and who was defeated and stripped of his kingdom by Artaxerxes, the Parthian empire terminated.] Dio.—Herodian.

ARTABAZANES or ARTAMENES, the eldest son of Darius, when a private person. He attempted to succeed to the Persian throne, in preference to Xerxes. Justin.

ARTABAZUS, a son of Pharnaces, general in the army of Xerxes. He fled from Greece upon the ill success of Mardonius. Herodot. 7, 8, and 9.—A general who made war against Artaxerxes 2d, and was defeated. He was afterwards reconciled to his prince, and became the familiar friend of Darius 3d. After the death of this prince, he surrendered himself up with his sons to Alexander, who treated him with much humanity and confidence. Curt. 5, c. 9 and 12, l. 6, c. 5, l. 7, c. 3 and 5, l. 8, c. 1.

ARTABRI and ARTABRITÆ, a people of Lusitania, who received their name from Artabrum, a promontory on the coast of Spain, now called Cape Finisterre. Sil. 3, v. 362.

ARTACÆAS, an officer in the army of Xerxes, the tallest of all the troops, the king excepted.

ARTACE, a town and seaport near Cyzicus. It did not exist in the age of Pliny. There was in its neighbourhood a fountain called Artacia. Herodot. 4, c. 14.—Procep. de Bell. Pers. 1, c. 25.—Strab. 13.—Plin. 5, c. 32.—A city of Phrygia.—A fortified place of Bithynia.

ARTACÈNE, a country of Assyria, near Arbela, where Alexander conquered Darius. Strab. 16.

[ARTACOËNA, the capital of Aria, now Herat, situate on the river Arius, now the Heri.]

ARTAGERAS [or ARTAGICERTA, a town of Armenia Major, north-east of Amida, where Caius Cæsar, a nephew of Augustus, was dangerously wounded by one Addrucus. It is now probably Ardis. Vell. Paterc. 2, 103.] Strab.

ARTAGERSES, a general in the army of Artaxerxes, killed by Cyrus the younger. Plut. in Artax.

ARTANES, a king of the southern parts of Armenia. Strab. 11.—A river of Thrace flowing into the Ister. Herodot. 4, c. 49.—[A river of Bithynia.]

ARTAPHERNES, a general whom Darius sent into Greece with Datis. He was conquered at the battle of Marathon, by Miltiades. vid. Datis. C. Nep. in Mill.—Herodot. 6.

ARTAVASDES, a son of Tigranes, king of Armenia Major, who wrote tragedies, and shone as an elegant orator and faithful historian. He lived in alliance with the Romans, but Crassus was defeated partly on account of his delay. He betrayed M. Antony in his expedition against Parthia, for which Antony reduced his kingdom, and carried him to Egypt, where he adorned the triumph of the conqueror led in golden chains. He was some time after murdered. Strab. 11.—The crown of Armenia was given by Tiberius to a person of the same name, who was expelled.—Augustus had also raised to the throne of Armenia a person of the same name. Tacit. Ann. 2.

ARTAXA and ARTAXIAS, a general of Antiochus the Great, who erected the province of Armenia into a kingdom, by his reliance on the friendship of the Romans. King Tigranes was one of his successors. Strab. 11.

ARTAXĀTA, (orum) now Ardesch, a strongly fortified town of Upper Armenia, the capital of the empire, where the kings generally resided.] It was built upon a plain which Hannibal recommended as a proper site for the capital to king Artaxes. Near it ran the Araxes.] It was burnt by Corbulo.

and rebuilt by Tiridates, who called it Neronea, in honour of Nero. Strab. 11.

ARTAXERXES 1st, succeeded to the kingdom of Persia after his father Xerxes. [Herodotus informs us that the name Artaxerxes signified in Persian, "a great warrior." In modern Persian the name, it is thought, would be, Ardezir Xa, or Ardshir Scha, i. e. according to Reland, Magnus Leo, Rex. Hence the name Xerxes alone will signify "a warrior," or "a lion."] He destroyed Artabanus, who had murdered Xerxes, and attempted to destroy the royal family to raise himself to the throne. He made war against the Bactrians, and re-conquered Egypt, that had revolted with the assistance of the Athenians, and was remarkable for his equity and moderation. [He was called Μακροχρησ (Longimanus), from the extraordinary length of his arms, according to Strabo, which, on his standing straight, could reach his knees; but, according to Plutarch, because his right hand was longer than his left.] He reigned 29 years, and died B. C. 425. C. Nep. in Reg.—Plut. in Artax.—The second of that name, king of Persia, was surnamed Mnemon, on account of his extensive memory. He was son of Darius the second, by Parysatis the daughter of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and had three brothers, Cyrus, Ostanes, and Oxathres. His name was Arsaces, which he changed into Artaxerxes when he ascended the throne. His brother Cyrus was of such an ambitious disposition, that he resolved to make himself king, in opposition to Artaxerxes. Parysatis always favoured Cyrus; and when he had attempted the life of Artaxerxes, she obtained his pardon by her entreaties and influence. [Artaxerxes was born before his father's accession to the throne, but Cyrus was born the son of a king, hence his mother favoured his claim. On a similar ground, Xerxes had been preferred by Darius Hystaspes, to his elder brother Artabazanes.] Cyrus, who had been appointed over Lydia and the sea-coasts, assembled a large army under various pretences, and at last marched against his brother at the head of 100,000 barbarians and 13,000 Greeks. He was opposed by Artaxerxes with 900,000 men, and a bloody battle was fought at Cunaxa, in which Cyrus was killed. [though in fact victorious, for he had routed with his body-guard, the guards of the king, while the Greeks were in full pursuit of that part of the king's army which had been opposed to them. The loss of the battle was owing partly to the rash impetuosity of Cyrus, in charging the royal guards, and partly to the circumstance of the Greeks having pursued too far the barbarians opposed to them.] It has been reported, that Cyrus was killed by Artaxerxes, who was so desirous of the honour, that he put to death two men for saying that they had killed him. The Greeks who had assisted Cyrus against his brother, though at the distance of above 600 leagues from their country, made their way through the territories of the enemy; and nothing is more famous in the Grecian history, than the retreat of the ten thousand. [vid. Xenophon.] After he was delivered from the attacks of his brother, Artaxerxes stirred up a war among the Greeks against Sparta, and exerted all his influence to weaken the power of the Greeks. He married two of his own daughters, called Atossa and Amestris, and named his eldest son Darius to be successor. Darius however conspired against his father, and was put to death; and Ochus, one of the younger sons, called also Artaxerxes, made his way to the throne by causing his elder brothers Ariaspes and Arsames to be assassinated. It is said that Artaxerxes died of a broken heart in consequence of his son's unnatural behaviour, in the 94th year of his age, after a reign of 46 years, B. C. 359. Artaxerxes had 150 children by his 350 concubines, and only four legitimate sons. Plut. in vita.—C. Nep. in Reg.—Justin. 10, c. 1, &c.—Diod. 13, &c.—The 3d, surnamed Ochus, succeeded his father Artaxerxes 2d, and established himself on his throne by murdering about 80 of his nearest relations. He punished with death one of his officers who conspired against him; and recovered Egypt which had revolted, destroyed Sidon, and ravaged all Syria. He made war against the Cadusii, and greatly rewarded a private man called Codomanus for his uncommon valour. But his behaviour in Egypt, and his cruelty towards the inhabitants, offended his subjects, and Bagoas at last obliged his physician to poison him, B. C. 337, and afterwards gave his flesh to be devoured by cats, and made handles for swords with his bones. Codomanus, on account of his virtues, was soon after made king by the people; and that he might seem to possess as much dignity as the house of Artaxerxes, he reigned under the name of Darius the third. Justin. 10, c. 3.—Diod. 17.—Ælian. V. H. 6, c. 8.

ARTAXERXES OF ARTAXÄRES 1st, a common soldier of Persia, [who killed Artabanus, the last of the Arsacidæ, and founded a new dynasty, called the Sassanidæ, from his father's name Sassan, A. D. 226. As soon as his authority was well established, he attempted to recover the provinces invaded by the Romans. Alexander Severus opposed him with three numerous armies. One of these was destroyed by the superior force of his opponent, another perished by famine and fatigue, and the third, commanded by the Emperor himself, retired ingloriously to Antioch, greatly diminished by disease. Artaxerxes, however, weakened even by his victories, was compelled to abandon his project.] Herodian. 5.—One of his successors, son of Sapor [the 2d,] bore his name, and reigned eleven years, during which he distinguished himself by his cruelties.

ARTAXIAS, a son of Artavasdes, king of Armenia, was proclaimed king by his father's troops. He opposed Antony, by whom he was defeated, and became so odious that the Romans, at the request of the Armenians, raised Tigranes to the throne.—Another, son of Polemon, whose original name was Zeno. After the expulsion of Vonones from Armenia, he was made king by Germanicus. Tacit. 6, Ann. c. 31.—A general of Antiochus. vid. Artaxa.

ARTAXCES, a Persian appointed governor of Sestos by Xerxes. He was hung on a cross by the Athenians for his cruelties, [after his son had been stoned to death in his presence.] Herod. 7 and 9.

ARTEMIDORUS, a native of Ephesus, who wrote an history and description of the earth, in eleven books. He flourished about 104 years B. C.—A physician in the age of Adrian.—A man in the reign of [Antoninus Pius] who wrote a learned work on the interpretation of dreams, still extant; the best edition of which is that of Rigaltius, Paris, 4to. 1604, to which is annexed Achmetis Oneirocritica. [An edition of the Oneirocritica of Artemidorus was published in 1305, at Leipzig, in 2 vols, 8vo. with the commentaries of Rigaltius and Reiske, by J. G. Reiff.]—A man of Cnidus, son to the historian Theopompus. He had a school at Rome, and he wrote a book on illustrious men, not extant. [In teaching eloquence he became acquainted with some of Brutus's friends, and procured intelligence of the conspiracy against Cæsar. He wrote down an account of it, and gave it to the dictator from among the crowd as he was going to the senate, but Cæsar put it with other papers which he held in his hand, thinking it to be of no material consequence.] Plut. in Cæs.

ARTEMIS, the Greek name of Diana. Her festivals, called Artemisia, were celebrated in several parts of Greece, particularly at Delphi, where they offered to the goddess a mullet, which, as was supposed, bore some affinity to the goddess of hunting, because it is said to hunt and kill the sea-hare. There was a solemnity of the same name at Syracuse; it lasted three days, which were spent in banqueting and diversions. Athen. 7.

ARTEMISIA, a daughter of Lygdamis of Halicarnassus, reigned over Halicarnassus and the neighbouring country. She assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Greece with a fleet, and her valour was so great that the monarch observed that all his men fought like women, and all his women like men. The Athenians were so ashamed of fighting against a woman, that they offered a reward of 10,000 drachms for her head. It is said that she was fond of a youth of Abydos, called Dardanus, and that, to punish his disdain, she put out his eyes while he was asleep, and afterwards leaped down the promontory of Leucas. Herodot. 7, c. 99, l. 8, c. 68, &c.—Justin. 2, c. 12.—There was also another queen of Caria of that name, often confounded with the daughter of Lygdamis. She was daughter of Hecatomnus king of Caria, or Halicarnassus, and was married to her own brother Mausolus, famous for his personal beauty. She was so fond of her husband, that at his death she drank in her liquor his ashes after his body had been burned, and erected to his memory a monument, which for its grandeur and magnificence, was called one of the seven wonders of the world. This monument she called Mausoleum, a name which has been given from that time to all monuments of unusual splendour. She invited all the literary men of her age, and proposed rewards to him who composed the best elegiac panegyric upon her husband. The prize was adjudged to Theopompus. She was so inconsolable for the death of her husband, that she died through grief two years after. Vitruv.—Strab. 14.—Plin. 25, c. 7, l. 36, c. 5.

ARTEMISIUM, a promontory of Eubœa, [on the north-western side of the island. It had a temple sacred to Artemis (Diana,) whence its name. Off this coast, which was called Artemisium litus, the Greeks obtained their first victory over the fleet of Xerxes on the same day with the action at Thermopylæ.] Herodot. 7, c. 175, &c.—A lake near the grove Aricia, with a temple sacred to Artemis, whence the name.

ARTEMITA, a city, [according to Strabo, 500 stadia east of Seleucia in Assyria.—Another in Armenia Major, near its southern boundary, now Van. It lay at the south-eastern extremity of the Arsissa Palus, now Lake of Van.]—An island opposite the mouth of the Achelous. Strab.

ARTEMON, an historian of Pergamus.—A native of Clazomenæ, who was with Pericles at the siege of Samos, where it is said he invented the battering-ram, the testudo, and other equally valuable military engines.—A native of Magnesia, who wrote the history of illustrious women.—A Syrian whose features resembled, in the strongest manner, those of Antiochus [Theos.] The queen, after the king's murder, made use of Artemon to represent her husband in a lingering state, that, by his seeming to die a natural death, she might conceal her guilt and effect her wicked purpose. vid. Antiochus.

ARTIMPASA, a name of Venus among the Scythians. Herodot. 4, c. 59.

ARTOBAZANES, a son of Darius, [and brother of Xerxes. The name is more commonly, however, written Artabazanes, which see.] Herodot. 7, c. 2 and 3.

ARTORIUS, a physician of Augustus, who, on the night previous to the battle of Philippi, saw Minerva in a dream, who told him to assure Augustus of the victory. Val. Max. 1, c. 7.

ARVÆLES OR AMBARVÆLES, a name given to twelve priests who celebrated the festivals called Ambarvalia. [This order of priests is said to have been instituted by Romulus in honour of his nurse Acca Laurentia, who had 12 sons, and when one of them died, Romulus, to console her, offered to supply his place, and called himself and the rest of her sons, Frates Arvales. Their office was for life, and continued even in captivity and exile. They wore a crown made of the ears of corn, and a white woollen wreath around their temples. (vid. Ambarvalia.) The hymn sung by these priests was discovered in 1778, in opening the foundations of the sacristy of St. Peters, inscribed on a stone.] Varro de L. L. 4

ARVERIS, a god of the Egyptians, son of Isis and Osiris.

ARVERNI, a powerful people of Gaul [whose territories lay between the sources of the Elaver, or Allier, and Duranium, or Dordogne, branches of the Liger and Garumna. The district is now Auvergne. Their capital was Augustunometum, now Clermont. They were a powerful nation, and were only conquered after great slaughter.] Cæs. Bell. Gal. 7.—Strab. 14.

ARVISIUM and ARVISUS, a promontory of Chios, famous for its wine. [The true orthography is Ariusius. This wine was esteemed the best of all the Greek wines.] Virg. Ecl. 5.

ARUNS, an Etrurian soothsayer in the age of Marius. Lucan. 1, v. 586.—A brother of Tarquin the Proud. He married Tullia, who murdered him to espouse Tarquin, who had assassinated his wife.—A son of Tarquin the Proud, who, in the battle that was fought between the partizans of his father and the Romans, attacked Brutus the Roman consul. [The combatants slew each other.] Liv. 2, c. 6.—A son of Porsena king of Etruria, sent by his father to take Aricia. Liv. 2, c. 14.

ARUNTIVS, a Roman who ridiculed the rites of Bacchus, for which the god inebriated him to such a degree that he offered violence to his daughter Medullina, who murdered him when she found that he acted so dishonourably to her virtue. Plut. in Par. Gall.—A man who wrote an account of the Punic wars in the style of Sallust, in the reign of Augustus. Tacit. Ann. 1.—Senec. ep. 14.—Paterculus, a man who gave Æmylius Censorinus, tyrant of Ægesta, a brazen horse to torment criminals. The tyrant made the first experiment upon the body of the donor. Plut. in Par. Gall.—Stella, a poet descended of a consular family in the age of Domitian.

ARUSPEX. vid. Haruspex.

ARKĀTA, a [town of Armenia Major, situated on the Araxes east of Artaxata, towards the confines of Media.] Strab. 11.

ARYANDES, a Persian, appointed governor of Egypt by Cambyses. He was put to death [by Darius, for issuing a silver coinage in his own name.] Herodot. 4, c. 166.

ARYPTÆVS, a prince of the Molossi, who privately encouraged the Greeks against Macedonia, and afterwards embraced the party of the Macedonians.

ASANDER, a man who separated by a wall. Chersonesus Taurica from the continent. Strab. 7.

ASEBTE or ABYSTE, a people of Libya above Cyrene. [Herodotus says that they were remarkable beyond all the Lybians for their use of chariots drawn by four horses. The custom of harnessing four horses to a chariot, was confessedly borrowed from the Africans by the Greeks.] Herodot. 4, c. 170.—Plut. 4, c. 3.

ASCALĀPHUS, a son of Mars and Astyoche, who was among the Argonauts, and went to the Trojan war at the head of the Orchomenians, with his brother Ialmenus. He was killed by Deiphobus. Homer. Il. 2, v. 13, l. 9, v. 32, l. 13, v. 518.—A son of Acheron by Gorgyra or Orphne, stationed by Pluto to watch over Proserpine in the Elysian fields. When Ceres had obtained from Jupiter her laughter's freedom and return upon earth, provided she had eaten nothing in the kingdom of Pluto, Ascalaphus discovered that she had eaten seven pomegranate seeds; upon which Proserpine was ordered by Jupiter to remain six months with Pluto, and the rest of the year with her mother. Proserpine was so displeased with Ascalaphus, that she sprinkled water on his head, and immediately turned him into an owl. Apollod. 1, c. 5, l. 2, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 5, tab. 8.

ASCĀLON, [a maritime town of Palestine, 320 furlongs from Jerusalem, been Azotus to the north, and Gaza to the south. Venus Urania was worshipped in this city. Her temple was pillaged, according to Herodotus, by the Scythians, B. C. 630. Here also was worshipped the goddess Derceto. In this city Herod the Great was born, hence called Ascalonites. The port was at some distance from the city. Ascalon is now a small village, called Scalona.] Joseph. de Bell. Jud. 3, c. 2.—Theophrast. Il. Pl. 7, c. 4.

ASCANIA, an island of the Ægean sea.—A city of Troas, built by Ascanius.

ASCANIUS, son of Æneas by Creusa, was saved from the flames of Troy by his father, whom he accompanied in his voyage to Italy. He was afterwards called Iulus. He behaved with great valour in the war which his father carried on against the Latins, and succeeded Æneas in the kingdom of Latinus, and built Alba, to which he transferred the seat of his empire from Lavinium, which latter city he resigned to Lavinia and her son Sylvius. The descendants of Ascanius reigned in Alba for above 420 years, under 14 kings, till the age of Numitor. Ascanius reigned 38 years; 30 at Lavinium, and eight at Alba; and was succeeded by Sylvius Posthumus, son of Æneas by Lavinia. Iulus, the son of Ascanius, disputed the crown with him; but the Latins gave it in favour of Sylvius, as he was descended from the family of Latinus, and Iulus was invested with the office of high-priest, which remained a long while in his family. [Neither Æneas nor any of his race ever set foot in Italy. vid. Italia, end of the article.] Liv. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—According to Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 15, &c. the son of Æneas by Lavinia was also called Ascanius.—A river of Bithynia, [by which the lake Ascanius discharged its waters into the sea. On the banks of the lake stood Nicæa, now Ismick.] Virg. G. 3, v. 270.

ASCĀ. [This is a general term used in geography; applied to the inhabitants of the torrid zone, because the sun is twice a year vertical to them, and they have then no shadow. The word comes from α privative, and σκια, a shadow.]

ASCLEPIA, festivals in honour of Asclepius, or Æsculapius, celebrated all over Greece, when prizes for poetical and musical compositions were honourably distributed. [The people of Epidaurus celebrated them with peculiar solemnity.]

ASCLEPIADES, a rhetorician in the age of Eumenes, who wrote an historical account of Alexander. Arrian.—A disciple of Plato.—A philosopher, disciple to Stilpo, and very intimate with Menedemus. The two friends lived together, and that they might not be separated when they married, Asclepiades married the daughter, and Menedemus, though much the younger, the mother. When the wife of Asclepiades was dead, Menedemus gave his wife to his friend, and married another. He was blind in his old age, and died in Eretria. Plut.—A physician of Bithynia, B. C. 90, who acquired great reputation at Rome, and was the founder of a sect in physic. He relied so much on his skill, that he laid a wager he should never be sick, and won it, as he died of a fall, in a very advanced age. Nothing of his medical treatises is now extant.—An Egyptian, who wrote hymns on the gods of his country, and also a treatise on the coincidence of all religions.—A native of Alexandria, who gave an history of the Athenian archons.—The writer of a treatise on Demetrius Phalereus.—A disciple of Isocrates, who wrote six books on those events which had been the subject of tragedies.—A physician [and friend of Cæsar Octavianus, (Augustus), by whose advice the latter left his camp the evening before the battle of Philippi, and thereby probably saved his life, as that part of the army was cut to pieces by Brutus. Asclepiades perished in a shipwreck, and a magnificent tomb was erected to him at Smyrna by the emperor]—A tragic poet.—Another physician of Bithynia, under Trajan. He lived 70 years, and was a great favourite at the emperor's court.

ASCLEPIODORUS, a painter in the age of Apelles, 12 of whose pictures of the gods were sold for 300 minæ each, to an African prince. Plin. 35.

ASCLEPIUS, vid. Æsculapius.

ASCLETARION, an astrologer in the age of Domitian, who said that he should be torn by dogs. The emperor ordered him to be put to death, and his body carefully secured; but as soon as he was set on the burning pile, a sudden storm arose which put out the flames, and the dogs came and tore to pieces the astrologer's body. Sueton. in Domit. 15.

ASCOLIA, a festival in honour of Bacchus, celebrated about December, by the Athenian husbandmen, who generally sacrificed a goat to the god, because that animal is a great enemy to the vine. They made a bottle with the skin of the victim, which they filled with oil and wine, and afterwards leaped upon it with one foot. He who could first fix himself upon it was victorious, and received the bottle as a reward. This was called ασκολιζειν, παρα το επι τον ασκον αλλεουαι, leaping upon the bottle, whence the name of the festival is derived. It was also introduced in Italy, where the people besmeared their faces with the dregs of wine, and sang hymns to the god. They always hanged some small images of the god on the tallest trees in their vineyard, and these images they called Oscilla. [What the Oscilla were has never been clearly ascertained. Some commentators think that they were bunches of flowers, others that it was the custom at the feasts of Bacchus, to swing on ropes, like children. Heyne thinks that they were small images of bark, hung up from a belief on the part of the rustics, that in whatever direction they turned, under the impulse of the wind, they brought fertility.] Virg. G. 2, v. 384.—Polux. 9, c. 7

ASCONIUS PEDIANUS, [a Roman grammarian born at Patavium, and lived in the time of Augustus. He was the friend of Virgil and the acquaintance of Quintilian and Livy. His notes on Cicero's orations are judicious, and still exist, though in a mutilated state. Some additional fragments have been recently discovered by Mai, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan.]

ASCRA, a town of Bœotia, [at the foot of mount Helicon. At this place Hesiod was brought up, being carried thither at a very early age from Cumæ in Æolia. Hence it is frequently styled his country, and he is often called the Ascrean bard.] The town received its name from Ascrea, a nymph, mother of Cœclus by Neptune.—Strab. 9.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Paterc. 4.

ASCULUM, now Ascoli. a town of Picenum.—[Another in Apulia, north-west of Venusia, where the Romans first obtained success against Pyrrhus. Historians, however, differ in their accounts. Plutarch makes Pyrrhus to have been victorious, but Eutropius affirms that he was totally defeated. Dionysius of Halicarnassus states that both sides claimed the victory.]

ASDRUBAL, a Carthaginian, son-in-law of Hamilcar. He distinguished himself in the Numidian war, and was appointed chief general on the death of his father-in-law, and for eight years presided with much prudence and valour over Spain, which submitted to his arms with cheerfulness. Here he laid the foundation of new Carthage, and saw it complete. To stop his progress towards the east, the Romans, in a treaty with Carthage, forbade him to pass the Iberus, which was faithfully observed by the general. He was killed in the midst of his soldiers, B. C. 230, by a slave whose master he had murdered. The slave was caught and put to death in the greatest torments, which he bore with patience, and even ridicule. Some say that he was killed in hunting. Ital. 1, v. 165.—Appian. Iberin.—Polyb. 2.—Liv. 21, c. 2, &c.—A son of Hamilcar, who came from Spain with a large reinforcement for his brother Annibal. He crossed the Alps and entered Italy; but some of his letters to Annibal having fallen into the hands of the Romans, the consuls M. Livius Salinator and Claudius Nero, attacked him suddenly near the Metaurus, [in Umbria,] and defeated him, B. C. 207. He was killed in the battle, and 56,000 of his men shared his fate, and 5400 were taken prisoners; about 8000 Romans were killed. The head of Asdrubal was cut off, and some days after thrown into the camp of Annibal, who, in the moment that he was in the greatest expectations for a promised supply, exclaimed at the sight, "I recognise the fortune of Carthage," and then retired, B. C. 203, into the extremity of Italy. Liv. 21, 23, 27, &c.—Polyb.—Horat. 4, od. 4.—A Carthaginian general, surnamed Calvus, appointed governor of Sardinia, and taken prisoner by the Romans. Liv.—Another, son of Giscon, appointed general of the Carthaginian forces in Spain, in the time of the great Annibal. He made head against the Romans in Africa, with the assistance of Syphax, but he was soon after defeated by Scipio. He died B. C. 206. [He was the father of Sophonisba.] Liv.—[Another, who defended Carthage in its last siege by Scipio the younger, and, foreseeing its fate, surrendered himself to the Romans.] Scipio showed him to the Carthaginians, upon which his wife, with a thousand imprecations, threw herself and her two children into the flames of the temple of Æsculapius, which she and others had set on fire. Liv. 51.—A Carthaginian general conquered by L. Cæcilius Metellus in Sicily, in a battle in which he lost 130 elephants. These animals were led in triumph all over Italy by the conquerors.

ASELLIO (Sempronius,) an historian and military tribune, who wrote an account of the actions in which he was present [at Numantia and elsewhere]. Dionys. Hal.

ASIA, one of the three parts of the ancient world, [separated from Europe by the Ægean, the Euxine, the Palus Mæotis, the Tanais or Don, and the Dwna; from Africa by the Red Sea and Isthmus of Suez.] It received its name from Asia, the daughter of Oceanus. [The conjecture of Bochart, who derives this name from a Hebrew or Phœnician word signifying the middle, has no foundation in history. The name of Asia was applied by Homer, Herodotus, and Euripides, to a district of Lydia, watered by the Cayster, and in which the geographers of a later age distinguished a tribe called Asiones, and a city called Asia. It appears probable that the Greeks, in proportion as their knowledge was enlarged, extended this name by little and little, from the district to which it was applied, until it embraced the whole of Asia Minor, and ultimately the other extensive countries of the east. In a similar manner Africa and Italy seem to have obtained their respective names.] This part of the globe has given birth to many of the greatest monarchies of the universe; and to the inhabitants of Asia we are indebted for most of the arts and sciences. The soil is fruitful, and abounds with all the necessaries as well as luxuries of life. Asia was divided into many different empires, provinces, and states, of which the most conspicuous were the Assyrian and Persian monarchies. The Assyrian monarchy, according to Eusebius, lasted 1240 years, and according to Justin, 1300 years, down to the year of the world 4380. The empire of Persia existed 228 years, till the death of Darius the 3d, whom Alexander the Great conquered. The empire of the Medes lasted 259 years, according to Eusebius, or less, according to others, till the reign of Astyages, who was conquered by Cyrus the Great, who destroyed the power of the Medes, and founded the Persian monarchy. It was in Asia that the military valour of the Macedonians and the bold retreat of the 10,000 Greeks were so conspicuously displayed. It is in that part of the world that we are to look for the more visible progress of luxury, despotism, sedition, effeminacy, and dissipation. Asia was generally divided into Major and Minor. Asia Major was the most extensive, and comprehended all the eastern parts; and Asia Minor was a large country in the form of a peninsula, whose boundaries may be known by drawing a line from the bay of Issus, in a northern direction, to the eastern part of the Euxine Sea. Asia Minor has been subject to many revolutions. It was tributary to the Scythians for upwards of 1500 years, and was a long time in the power of the Lydians, Medes, &c. The western parts of Asia Minor were the receptacle of all the ancient emigrations from Greece, and was filled with Grecian colonies. [The term Asia Minor was not in use among the ancients. The general name for Upper and Lower Asia, was simply Asia. Lower Asia is now called Anatolia, or rather Anadoli, from ανατολη, oriens. It comprised the provinces between the Euxine and Mediterranean Seas.] Strab.—Mela.—Justin.—Plin.—Tacit., &c.—One of the Oceanides, who married Japetus, and gave her name to one of the three quarters of the ancient globe. Apollod. 1, c. 2.—One of the Nereides. Hygin.—A mountain of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 24.

ASIA PALUS, [a marsh in Lydia, through which the Cayster flowed. vid. beginning of the preceding article.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 701.

ASIATICUS, a Gaul, in the age of Vitellius. Tacit. Hist. 2.—The surname of one of the Scipios and others, for their conquests or campaigns in Asia.

ASINARIA, a festival in Sicily, in commemoration of the victory obtained over Demosthenes and Nicias, at the river Asinarius.

ASINARIUS, a river of Sicily where the Athenian generals, Demosthenes and Nicias, were taken prisoners, [now the Falunera.]

ASINE, [a town of Argolis, north-west of Hermione, on the Sinus Argolicus, or Gulf of Nauplia.—Another in Messenia, south-west of Messene, founded by the inhabitants of the former place, when driven from their city by the Argives. — Another in Cyprus. — Another in Cilicia.]

ASINIUS GALLUS, son of Asinius Pollio the orator, married Vipsania after she had been divorced by Tiberius. This marriage gave rise to a secret enmity between the emperor and Asinius, who starved himself to death, either voluntarily, or by order of his imperial enemy. He had six sons by his wife. He wrote a comparison between his father and Cicero, in which he gave a decided superiority to the former. Tacit. 1 and 5. Ann.—Dio. 58.—Plin. 7, ep. 4.—Pollio, an excellent orator, poet, and historian, intimate with Augustus. He triumphed over the Dalmatians, and wrote an account of the wars of Cæsar and Pompey, in 17 books, besides poems. He refused to answer some verses against him by Augustus, "because," said he, "you have the power to proscribe me, should my answer prove offensive." He died in the 30th year of his age, A. D. 4. He was consul with Cn. Domitius Calvinus, A. U. C. 714. It is to him that the fourth of Virgil's Bucolics is inscribed. Quintil.—Sueton. in Cæs. 30 and 55.—Dio. 27, 49, 55.—Senec. de Tranq. Ani. & ep. 10.—Plin. 7, c. 30.—Tacit. 6.—Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Cæs.

ASÍUS, a poet of Samos, who wrote about the genealogy of ancient heroes and heroines. Paus. 7, c. 14.

ASŌPIÁDES, a patronymic of Æacus, son of Ægina, the daughter of Asopus. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 484.

ASŌPIS, the daughter of the Asopus.

ASŌPUS, a river of Thessaly, [rising in Mount Oeta and falling into the Sinus Maliacus.] Strab. 8.—A river of Bœotia, [rising in Mount Cithæron near Platæa, and flowing into the Euripus. The plain along its northern bank was called Parasopias.] Paus. 9, c. 4.—A river of Asia, flowing into the Lycus near Laodicea. —A river of Peloponnesus, [rising on the frontiers of Arcadia, near Mount Cyllene, and falling into the Sinus Corinthiacus or Gulf of Lepanto, east of Sicyon.] —A son of Neptune, who gave his name to a river of Peloponnesus. Three of his daughters are particularly celebrated, Ægina, Salamis, and Ismene. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2, c. 12.

ASPA [or ASPADĀNA], a town of Parthia, now Isphan.

ASPAMITHRES, a favourite eunuch of Xerxes, who conspired with Artabanus to destroy the king and the royal family, &c. Ctesias.

ASPARAGIUM, [a town of Macedonia, on the southern bank of the Apsus or Crevasta, about 34 miles south from Dyrrachium.]

ASPASĪA, a daughter of Hermitimus of Phocæa, famous for her personal charms and elegance. She was priestess of the sun, mistress to Cyrus, and afterwards to his brother Artaxerxes. [Plutarch and Justin relate that when Darius, the son of Artaxerxes, was declared his successor, and, according to the customary privilege allowed him, asked Aspasia from his father, this female, being allowed to make her election, preferred the son, upon which Artaxerxes made her a priestess of Diana, in order to keep her from his son, who thereupon rebelled. But this story is not generally credited.] She was called Milto, (i. e. Vermilion,) on account of the beauty of her complexion. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 1.—Plut. in Artax.—Another woman, daughter of Axiochus, born at Miletus. She came to Athens, where she taught eloquence, and Socrates was proud to be among her scholars. She so captivated Pericles by her mental and personal accomplishments, that he became her pupil, and at last took her for his mistress and wife. He was so fond of her, that he made war against Samos at her instigation. The behaviour of Pericles towards Aspasia greatly corrupted the morals of the Athenians, and introduced dissipation and lasciviousness into the state. She, however, possessed the merit of superior excellence in mind as well as person, and her instructions helped to form the greatest and most eloquent orators of Greece. Some have confounded the mistress of Pericles with Aspasia the daughter of Hermitimus. Plut. in Periel.—Quintil. 11.—The wife of Xenophon was also called Aspasia, if we follow the improper interpretation given by some to Cic. de Inv. 1, c. 31.

ASPASIUS, a peripatetic philosopher in the 2d century, whose commentaries on different subjects were highly valued. —A sophist, who wrote a panegyric on Adrian.

ASPASTES, a satrap of Carmania, suspected of infidelity to his trust while Alexander was in the east. Curt. 7, c. 20.

ASPATHINES, one of the seven noblemen of Persia who conspired against the usurper Smerdis, Herodot. 3, c. 70, &c.—A son of Prexaspes. Id. 7.

ASPENDUS, a town of Pamphylia, near the mouth of the river Eurymedon. Cic. in Verr. 1, c. 20. The inhabitants sacrificed swine to Venus.

ASPHALTĪTES, a lake. vid. Mare Mortuum.

ASPIS, [a town of Hispania Tarraconensis, north-west of Ilicis, which lay above Carthago-Nova on the coast. It is now Aspe. —An island on the coast of Ionia, opposite Lebedus, now Psili-bourum.]

ASPLĒDON, a son of Neptune by the nymph Midon. He gave his name to a city of Bœotia, [north-east of Orchomenus,] whose inhabitants went to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 18.—Paus. 9, c. 38.

ASFORĒNUS, a [district] of Asia Minor, near Pergamus, where the mother of the gods was worshipped, and called Asporena. Strab. 13.

ASSA: a town [in the island of Cephalenia.] ASSARĀCUS, a Trojan prince, son of Tros by Callirhoe. He was father to Capys, the father of Anchises. The Trojans were frequently called the descendants of Assaracus, Gens Assaraci.—Homer. Il. 20.—Virg. Æn.

1.—Two friends of Æneas in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 124.

ASSŌRĪS, a town of Sicily, [north-east of Enna.—A town of Macedonia, in Mygdonia.]

ASSOS, a town [of Mysia, on the coast, west of Adramyttium. It is now Asso.]

ASSYRIA, [a country originally of small extent, but afterwards greatly enlarged. It was bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the north by part of Armenia, and Mount Niphates; on the west by the Tigris; on the south by Susiana; and on the east by part of Media, and the mountains Choatra and Zagros. The country within these limits is called by some of the ancients Adiabene, and by others Aturia or Atyria. Assyria is now called Kurdistan, from the descendants of the ancient Carduchi, who occupied the northern parts.] The Assyrian empire is the most ancient in the world. It was founded by Ninus or Belus, B. C. 2059, according to some authors, and lasted till the reign of Sardanapalus, the 31st sovereign since Ninus, B. C. 320. According to Eusebius, it flourished for 1240 years: according to Justin, 1300 years; but Herodotus says that its duration was not above 5 or 600 years. Among the different monarchs of the Assyrian empire, Semiramis greatly distinguished herself, and extended the boundaries of her dominions as far as Æthiopia and Libya. In ancient authors, the Assyrians are often called Syrians, and the Syrians Assyrians. The Assyrians assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and sent him Memnon with an army. The king of Assyria generally styled himself king of kings, as a demonstration of his power and greatness. vid. Syria. Strab. 16.—Herodot. 1 and 2.—Justin. 1.—Plin. 6, c. 13 and 26.—Ptol. 1, c. 2.—Diod. 2.—Mela, 1, c. 2.

[ASTABŌRAS, a river of Æthiopia, falling into the Nile. It is now called the Tacazzé.]

ASTACUS, a town of Bithynia, [on the Sinus Astacenus,] built by Astacus, son of Neptune and Olbia, or rather by a colony from Megara and Athens. Lysimachus destroyed it, and carried the inhabitants to the town of Nicomedia, which was then lately built. Paus. 5, c. 12.—Arrian.—Strab. 17.—A city of Acarnania. Plin. 5.

ASTĀPA, a town of Hispania Bætica, [east of Hispalis, famed for its vigorous defence against the Romans A. U. C. 546. It is now Estepa La Vieja.] Liv. 38, c. 20.

ASTĀPUS, a river of Æthiopia, falling into the Nile. [Now the Abawi. It flows through Nubia, rising in a place called Coloe Palus, or Bahr Dembea. This is the river which Mr. Bruce mistook for the Nile.]

ASTARTE, a powerful divinity of Syria. She had a famous temple at Hierapolis in Syria, which was served by 300 priests, who were always employed in offering sacrifices. [Cicero and Suidas suppose her to be one of the four Venuses whom the former enumerates. According to Lucian, she was the moon. The Sidonians represented her under the figure of a hen covering her young with her wings. The Astarte mentioned by Cicero, was exhibited in Phœnicia with a quiver and arrows. Among the Assyrians she was sometimes termed a goddess, and sometimes a god, on account of the ambiguity of gender in the oriental languages.] Lucian de Deâ Syriâ.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

ASTER, a dexterous archer of [Methone,] who offered his service to Philip king of Macedonia. Upon being slighted, he retired into the city, and aimed an arrow at Philip, who pressed it with a siege. The arrow, on which was written [Ἀστὴρ Φιλίππου βασιμον πεμπει βέλους,] struck the king's eye, and put it out; and Philip, to return the pleasantry, threw back the same arrow, with [a message appended to it, that if Philip took the town he would hang Aster. The conqueror kept his word.]

ASTERĪA, a daughter of Ceus, one of the Titans, by Phœbe, daughter of Cœlus and Terra. She married Perses, son of Crius, by whom she had the celebrated Hecate. She enjoyed for a long time the favours of Jupiter, under the form of an eagle; but falling under his displeasure, she was changed into a quail, called Ortyx by the Greeks; whence the name of Ortygia, given to that island in the Archipelago where she retired. [vid. Delos.] Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.—Hygin. fab. 58.—Apollod. 1, c. 2, &c.—A town of Greece, whose inhabitants went to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 782.—One of the daughters of Danaus, who married Chætus, son of Egyptus. Apollod. 2.—One of the daughters of Atlas, mother of Cœnomaus, king of Pisa. Hygin. fab. 250.

ASTERĪON and ASTERĪUS, a river of Peloponnesus, which flowed through the country of Argolis. This river had three daughters, Eubœa, Prosymna, and Acræa, who nursed the goddess Juno. Paus. 2, c. 17.—A statuary, son of Æschylus. Paus.—A son of Minos 2d, king of Crete, by Pasiphae. He was killed by Theseus, though he was thought the strongest of his age. Apollodorus supposes him to be the same as the famous Minotaur. According to some, Asterion was son of Teutamus, one of the descendants of Æolus, and they say that he was surnamed Jupiter because he had carried away Europa, by whom he had Minos the 1st. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 31.

ASTERŌPE and ASTERŌPEĀ, one of the Pleiades, who were beloved by the gods and most illustrious heroes, and made constellations after death.—A daughter of Pelias, king of Iolchos, who assisted her sisters to kill her father, whom Medea promised to restore to life. Her grave, [and those of her sisters,] were seen in Arcadia in the time of Pausanias, 8, c. 11.

ASTERŪSIUS, a mountain at the south of Crete.—A town of Arabia Felix.

ASTIŌCHUS, a general of Lacedæmon, who conquered the Athenians near Cnidus, and took Phocæa and Cumæ, B. C. 411.

ASTRÆA, a daughter of Astræus, king of Arcadia, or, according to others, of Titan.

Saturn's brother, by Aurora. Some make her daughter of Jupiter and Themis, and others consider her the same as Rhea, wife of Saturn. She was called Justice, of which virtue she was the goddess. She lived upon the earth, as the poets mention, during the golden age, which is often called the age of Astræa; but the wickedness and impiety of mankind drove her to heaven in the brazen and iron ages, and she was placed among the constellations of the zodiac, under the name of Virgo. She is represented as a virgin, with a stern but majestic countenance, holding a pair of scales in one hand, and a sword in the other. Senec. in Octav.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 149.—Arat. 1. Phenom. v. 93.—Hesiod.—Theog.

ASTRÆUS, [a river of Macedonia, passing by Berea, and falling into the Erigon above Pella. It is now the Vistriza.]

ASTU, a Greek word which signifies city, generally applied, by way of distinction, to Athens, which was the most capital city of Greece. The word urbs is applied with the same meaning of superiority to Rome, and polis to Alexandria, the capital of Egypt, as also to Troy.

ASTŪRA, a small river and village of Latium, [near the coast, below Antium. In the neighbourhood was a villa of Cicero, to which he retired from the proscription of Antony, and whence he proposed to transport himself out of the reach of his enemies. vid. Cicero.]

ASTŪRES, a people of Hispania Tarracensis, [lying west and south-west of the Cantabri. They occupied the eastern half of modern Asturias, the greater part of the kingdom of Leon, and the northern half of Palencia. Their capital was Asturica Augusta, now Astorga.]

ASTYÆGE, a daughter of Hypseus, who married Periphas, by whom she had some children, among whom was Antion, the father of Ixion.

ASTYÆGES, son of Cyaxares, was the last king of Media. He was father to Mandane, whom he gave in marriage to Cambyses, an ignoble person of Persia, because he was told by a dream that his daughter's son would dispossess him of his crown. From such a marriage he hoped that none but mean and ignorant children could be raised; but he was disappointed, and though he had exposed his daughter's son by the effects of a second dream, he was deprived of his crown by his grandson, after a reign of 35 years. Astyages was very cruel and oppressive; and Harpagus, one of his officers, whose son he had wantonly murdered, encouraged Mandane's son, who was called Cyrus, to take up arms against his grandfather, and he conquered him and took him prisoner, 559 B. C. Xenophon, in his Cyropædia, relates a different story, and asserts that Cyrus and Astyages lived in the most undisturbed friendship together. [But Xenophon's work is a mere historical romance, containing far more of fiction than true narrative.] Justin. 1, c. 4, &c.—Herodot. 1. c.

74, 75, &c.—A grammarian who wrote a commentary on Callimachus.

ASTYANAX, a son of Hector and Andromache. He was very young when the Greeks besieged Troy; and when the city was taken his mother saved him in her arms from the flames. Ulysses, who was afraid lest the young prince should inherit the virtues of his father, and one day avenge the ruin of his country upon the Greeks, seized him, and threw him down from the walls of Troy. According to Euripides, he was killed by Menelaus; and Seneca says, that Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, put him to death. Hector had given him the name of Scamandrius; but the Trojans, [out of gratitude to the father, their chief defender, and as a compliment to his valour, called the son Astyanax, or the prince of the city.] Homer. Il. 6, v. 400, l. 22, v. 500.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 457, l. 3, v. 489.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 415.—A writer in the age of Gallienus.

ASTYDĀMAS, an Athenian, pupil to Isocrates. He wrote 240 tragedies, of which only 15 obtained the poetical prize.—A Milesian, three times victorious at Olympia. He was famous for his strength, as well as for his voracious appetite. He was once invited to a feast by king Ariobarzanes, and he ate what had been prepared for nine persons. Athen. 10.—Two tragic writers bore the same name, one of whom was disciple to Socrates.—A comic poet of Athens.

ASTYDĀMĪA, or ASTYADAMĪA, daughter of Amyntor, king of Orchomenos in Bœotia, married Acastus son of Pelias, who was king of Iolchos. She became enamoured of Peleus, son of Æacus, who had visited her husband's court; and because he refused to gratify her passion, she accused him of attempting her virtue. Acastus readily believed his wife's accusation; but as he would not violate the laws of hospitality by punishing his guest with instant death, he waited for a favourable opportunity, and dissembled his resentment. At last they went in a hunting party to mount Pelion, where Peleus was tied to a tree, by order of Acastus, that he might be devoured by wild beasts. Jupiter was moved at the innocence of Peleus, and sent Vulcan to deliver him. When Peleus was set at liberty, he marched with an army against Acastus, whom he dethroned, and punished with death the cruel and false Astydamia. She is called by some Hippolyte, and by others Cretheis. Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Pinder. Mem. 4.—A daughter of Ormenus, carried away by Hercules, by whom she had Tlepolemus. Ovid. Heroid. 9, v. 50.

ASTŪLUS, one of the centaurs, who had the knowledge of futurity. He advised his brothers not to make war against the Lapithæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 338.

ASTYPALÆA, [one of the Cyclades, south-east of the island of Cos. According to Cicero, divine honours were rendered here to Achilles. It was called Pyrrha when the Carians possessed it, and afterwards Pylæa. Its name Astypalæa is said to have been derived from that of a sister of Europa. It was also called Theôn-trapeza, or, the table of the Gods, because its soil was fertile, and almost enamelled with flowers. It is now Stenpolia.] Paus. 7, c. 4.—Strab. 14.

[ASTÿRA or ASTÿRON, a village of Troas, near mount Ida, near which was a grove sacred to Diana Astryamé.—A town of Æolis.—Another in Phœnicia.]

ASÿCHIS, a king of Egypt, who succeeded Mycernius, and made a law, that whoever borrowed money must deposit his father's body in the hands of his creditors, as a pledge of his promise of payment. He built a magnificent pyramid. Herodot. 2, c. 136.

ATANÛLUS, [a wind which was frequent in Apulia, and very destructive to the productions of the earth, which it scorched or withered up. It is the same with the modern Sirocco.] Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 78.

ATABÿRIS, a mountain in Rhodes, where Jupiter had a temple, whence he was surnamed Atabyrius. [Ancient fables speak of brazen oxen at this place, which by their bellows announced approaching calamity. The meaning of the fable is said to have been, that the priests of this temple pretended to be possessed of the spirit of prophecy.] Strab. 14.

[ATACINI, a people of Gallia Narbonensis, south and south-east of the Volsæ Tectosages. They inhabited the banks of the Atax or Aude, whence their name. Their capital was Narbo, now Narbonne.]

ATALANTA, a daughter of Schœneus king of Scyros. According to some, she was the daughter of Iasus or Iasius, by Clymene; but others say that Menalion was her father. This uncertainty of not rightly knowing the name of her father has led the mythologists into error, and some have maintained that there were two persons of that name, though their supposition is groundless. Atalanta was born in Arcadia, and, according to Ovid, she determined to live in perpetual celibacy; but her beauty gained her many admirers, and to free herself from their importunities, she proposed to run a race with them. They were to run without arms, and she was to carry a dart in her hand. Her lovers were to start first, and whoever arrived at the goal before her, would be made her husband; but all those whom she overtook, were to be killed by the dart with which she had armed herself. As she was almost invincible in running, many of her suitors perished in the attempt, till Hippomenes the son of Macareus proposed himself as her admirer. Venus had presented him with three golden apples from the garden of the Hesperides, or, according to others, from an orchard in Cyprus; and as soon as he had started in the course, he artfully threw down the apples at some distance one from the other. While Atalanta, charmed at the sight, stopped to gather the apples, Hippomenes hastened on his course, arrived first at the goal, and obtained Atalanta in marriage. These two fond lovers, in the impatience of consummating their nuptials, entered the temple of Cybele; and the goddess was so offended at their impiety, and at the profanation of her house, that she changed them into two lions. Apollodorus says that Atalanta's father was desirous of raising male issue, and that therefore she was exposed to wild beasts as soon as born. She was, however, suckled by a she-bear, and preserved by shepherds. She dedicated her time to hunting, and resolved to live in celibacy. She killed two centaurs, Hyleus and Rhæcus, who attempted her virtue. She was present at the hunting of the Calydonian boar, which she first wounded, and she received the head as a present from Meleager, who was enamoured of her. She was also at the games instituted in honour of Pelias, where she conquered Peleus; and when her father, to whom she had been restored, wished her to marry, she consented to give herself to him who could overcome her in running, as has been said above. She had a son called Parthenopæus, by Hippomenes. Hyginus says that that son was the fruit of her love with Meleager: and Apollodorus says, she had him by Milanion, or, according to others, by the god Mars. [vid. Meleager.] Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 9, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 36, 45, &c.—Hygin. fab. 99, 174, 195, 270.—Ælian. V. H. 13.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 4, l. 10, fab. 11.—Euripid. in Phœnias.—An island near Eubœa and Loeris. Paus.

ATARANTES, a people of Africa, ten days' journey from the Garamantes. There was in their country a hill of salt with a fountain of sweet water upon it. [Some editions read Allantes, among others that of Schweighæuser; Valckenaer and Larcher, however, are of opinion, that Herodotus speaks of a nation distinct from the Atlantes.] Herodot. 4, c. 134.

ATARBÛCHIS, [a city of Egypt, sacred to Venus, in one of the small islands of the Delta called Prosopitis.]

ATARGËTIS, or [ATERGËTIS, called also Dereeto, a goddess of the Syrians, supposed to be the mother of Semiramis. She was represented with the face and breasts of a woman, but the rest of her body resembled a fish. She is supposed to be the same with Astarte. Some maintain that she was the same not only with Astarte, but with Venus, Juno, Minerva, and the celestial Venus of the Assyrians.]

ATARNA, [a town of Mysia, on the coast opposite to Lesbos. It was a village in Pliny's time: D'Anville calls it Atarneus.]

ATAS and ATHAS, a youth of wonderful velocity, who is said to have run 75 miles between noon and the evening. Martial. 4, ep. 19.—Plin. 7.

ATAX, now Aude, a river of Gallia Narbonensis, rising in the Pyrenean mountains, and falling into the Mediterranean sea. Mela. 2.

ATE, the goddess of all evil, and daughter of Jupiter. She raised such jealousy and sedition in heaven among the gods, that Jupiter dragged her away by the hair, and banished her for ever from heaven, and sent her to dwell on earth, where she incited mankind to wickedness, and sowed commotions among them. Homer. Il. 19. She is the same as the Discord of the Latins.

ATELLA, a town of Campania, [south-west of Capua,] famous for a splendid amphitheatre, where interludes were first exhibited, and thence called Atellanæ Fabulæ. [These were a kind of Latin farces. They became in time so licentious and impudent, that the senate was obliged to suppress them. vid. Osci.] Juv. 6.

ATHAMĀNES, an ancient people of Epirus, who existed long before the Trojan war, and still preserved their name and customs in the age of Alexander. [Athamania is placed by D'Anville between Pindus on the east and a parallel chain on the west.] Ovid. Met. 15, v. 311.—Strab. 7.—Plin. 2, c. 103.—Mela, 2, c. 3.

ATHĀMAS, a king of Thebes in Bœotia, was son of Æolus. He married Themisto, whom some call Nephele, and Pindar, Demotice, and by her he had Phryxus and Helle. Some time after, on pretence that Nephele was subject to fits of madness, he married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had two sons, Learchus and Melicerta. Ino became jealous of the children of Nephele, because they were to ascend their father's throne in preference to her own, therefore she resolved to destroy them; but they escaped from her fury to Colchis, on a golden ram. (vid. Phryxus and Argonautæ.) According to the Greek scholiast on Lycophron, v. 22, Ino attempted to destroy the corn of the country; and, as if it were the consequence of divine vengeance, the soothsayer, at her instigation, told Athamas, that before the earth would yield her usual increase, he must sacrifice one of the children of Nephele to the gods. The credulous father led Phryxus to the altar, where he was saved by Nephele. The prosperity of Ino was displeasing to Juno, and more particularly because she was descended from Venus. The goddess, therefore, sent Tisiphone, one of the furies, to the house of Athamas, who became inflamed with such sudden fury, that he took Ino to be a lioness, and her two children to be whelps. In this fit of madness he snatched Learchus from her, and killed him against a wall; upon which Ino fled with Melicerta, and with him in her arms, she threw herself into the sea from a high rock, and was changed into a sea deity. After this, Athamas recovered the use of his senses; and as he was without children, he adopted Coronus and Aliartus, the sons of Thersander his nephew. Hygin. fab. 1, 2, 5, 239.—Apollod. 1, c. 7 and 9.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 467, &c. Fast. 6, v. 489.—Paus. 9, c. 34.

ATHAMANTIĀDES, a patronymic of Melicerta, Phryxus, or Helle, children of Athamas. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 319. Fast. 4, v. 903.

ATHANASIUS, a bishop of Alexandria, celebrated for his sufferings, and the determined opposition he maintained against Arius and his doctrine. His writings, which were numerous, and some of which have perished, contain a defence of the mystery of the Trinity, the divinity of the Word and of the Holy Ghost, and an apology to Constantine: The creed which bears his name, is supposed by some not to be his composition. [It is now generally allowed not to have been his. Dr. Waterland supposes it was made by Hilary, bishop of Arles. It was first printed in Greek in 1540, and several times afterwards, to 1671. It has been questioned whether this creed was ever received by the Greek and Oriental churches: in America the Episcopal church has rejected it. As to its matter, it is given as a summary of the true orthodox faith: unhappily, however, it has proved a fruitful source of unprofitable controversy.] Athanasius died 2d May, 373 A. D. after filling the archiepiscopal chair 47 years, and leading alternately a life of exile and of triumph. The latest [and best] edition of his works is that of the benedictines, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1698. [This is the edition of the learned Montfaucon.]

ATHĒNE, the name of Minerva among the Greeks; and also among the Egyptians, before Cecrops had introduced the worship of the goddess into Greece. Paus. 1, c. 2.

ATHĒNÆ, a celebrated city of Attica, founded about 1556 years before the christian era by Cecrops and an Egyptian colony. It was called Cecropia from its founder, and afterwards Athēnæ in honour of Minerva, who had obtained the right of giving it a name in preference to Neptune. [It was first called Athens in the reign of Erechthonius. The town was first erected on the summit of a high rock, probably as a protection against attacks from the sea. Afterwards, when the number of inhabitants was increased, the whole plain was filled with buildings, which were called from their situation, ἡ κατὰ πόλιν, or, the lower city; and Cecropia was then named ἡ ἀνω πόλις, or, Ἀκροπόλις, the upper city.] It was governed by 17 kings, in the following order:—after a reign of 50 years, Cecrops was succeeded by Cranaus, who began to reign 1506 B. C.; Amphictyon, 1497; Erichthonius, 1487; Pandion, 1437; Erichtheus, 1397; Cecrops 2d, 1347; Pandion 2d, 1307; Ægeus, 1283; Theseus, 1235; Menestheus, 1205; Demophoon, 1182; Oxyntes, 1149; Aphidas, 1137; Thymoetes, 1136; Melanthus, 1128; and Codrus, 1091, who was killed after a reign of 21 years. The history of the twelve first of these monarchs is mostly fabulous. After the death of Codrus, the monarchical power was abolished, and the state was governed by 13 perpetual, and, 317 years after, by 7 decennial, and lastly, B. C. 684, after an anarchy of 3 years, by annual magistrates, called archons. [vid. Archontes.] Under this democracy, the Athenians signalized themselves by their valour in the field, their munificence, and the cultivation of the fine arts. They were deemed so powerful by the Persians, that Xerxes, when he invaded Greece, chiefly directed his arms against Athens, which he took and burnt. Their military character was chiefly displayed in the battles of Marathon, of Salamis, of Plataea, and of Mycale. After these immortal vicories, they rose in consequence and dignity, and they demanded the superiority in the affairs of Greece. The town was rebuilt and embellished by Themistocles, and a new and magnificent harbour erected. [vid. Piræus.] Their success made them arrogant, and they raised contentions among the neighbouring states, that they might aggrandize themselves by their fall. The luxury and intemperance, which had been long excluded from the city by the salutary laws of their countrymen Draco and Solon, crept by degrees among all ranks of people, and soon after all Greece united to destroy that city which claimed a sovereign power over all the rest. The Peloponnesian war, though at first a private quarrel, was soon fomented into an universal war; and the arms of all the states of Peloponnesus, (vid. Peloponnesiacum Bellum.) were directed against Athens, which, after 23 years of misfortune and bloodshed, was taken the 24th April, 404 years before the Christian era, by Lysander. After this, the Athenians were oppressed by 30 tyrants, and for a while laboured under the weight of their own calamities. [vid. Thrasybulus.] They recovered something of their usual spirit in the age of Philip, and boldly opposed his ambitious views; but their short-lived efforts were not of great service to the interests of Greece, and they fell into the hands of the Romans, B. C. 36. The Athenians have been admired in all ages for their love of liberty, and for the great men that were born among them; but favour here was attended with danger; and there are very few instances in the history of Athens, that can prove that the jealousy and frenzy of the people did not prosecute and disturb the peace of the man who had fought their battles, and exposed his life in the defence of his country. Perhaps, not one single city in the world can boast in such a short space of time, of such a number of truly illustrious citizens, equally celebrated for their humanity, their learning, and their military abilities. The Romans, in the more polished ages of their republic, sent their youths to finish their education at Athens, and respected the learning, while they despised the military character of the inhabitants. The reputation the Athenian schools had acquired under Socrates and Plato, was maintained by their degenerate and less learned successors; and they flourished with diminished lustre, till an edict of the emperor Justinian suppressed, with the Roman consulship, the philosophical meetings of the academy. It has been said by Plutarch, that the good men whom Athens produced were the most just and equitable in the world; but that its bad citizens could not be surpassed in any age or country, for their impiety, perfidiousness, or cruelties. Their criminals were always put to death by drinking the juice of hemlock. The ancients, to distinguish Athens in a more peculiar manner, called it Astu, one of the eyes of Greece, the learned city, the school of the world, the common patroness of Greece. The Athenians thought themselves the most ancient nation of Greece, and supposed themselves the original inhabitants of Attica, for which reason they were called αυτοχθονες produced from the same earth which they inhabited, γνησιους sons of the earth, and πτερυγες grasshoppers. They sometimes wore golden grasshoppers in their hair as badges of honour, to distinguish them from other people of later origin and less noble extraction, because those insects are supposed to be sprung from the ground. [The Athenians appear to have called themselves Autochthones, from the fact of their country having never, with the exception of the Pelasgi, been held for any length of time by a foreign tribe.] The number of men able to bear arms at Athens in the reign of Cecrops was computed at 20,000, and there appeared no considerable augmentation in the more civilized age of Pericles; but in the time of Demetrius Phalereus there were found 21,000 citizens, 10,000 foreigners, and 40,000 slaves. Among the numerous temples and public edifices none was more celebrated than that of Minerva, which, after being burnt by the Persians, was rebuilt by Pericles, with the finest marble, and still exists a venerable monument of the hero's patriotism, and of the abilities of the architect. *Cic. ad Attic. in Verr. &c.—Thucyd. 1, &c.—Justin. 2, &c.—Diod. 13, &c.—Ælian. ATHENÆA, festivals celebrated at Athens in honour of Minerva. One of them was called Panathenæa, and the other Chalcea; for an account of which see those words.

ATHENÆUM, a place at Athens, sacred to Minerva, [or, more properly, set apart for the exercises over which she presided,] where the poets, philosophers, and rhetoricians generally declaimed and repeated their compositions. It was public to all the professors of the liberal arts. The same thing was adopted at Rome by Adrian, who made a public building for the same laudable purposes. [The ancient Athenæa were in the form of amphitheatres.]

ATHENÆUS, a Greek cosmographer.—A peripatetic philosopher of Cilicia in the time of Augustus. Strab.—A Spartan sent by his countrymen to Athens, to settle the peace during the Peloponnesian war.—A grammarian of Naucratis, who composed an elegant and miscellaneous work, called Deipnosophistæ, replete with very curious and interesting remarks and anecdotes of the manners of the ancients, and likewise valuable for the scattered pieces of ancient poetry it preserves. [The fable of the work is as follows: A great number of learned men, among whom we find the celebrated Galen, assembled at the table of Larensius, a liberal and wealthy Roman, where they bestow as large a portion of erudition upon every part of the entertainment as the memory or commonplace book of the author could supply. The number of theatrical pieces alone which Athenæus appears to have consulted in compiling his work, was probably not less than 2000: the middle Comedy furnished him with 800 of these. Athenæus declares himself a little posterior to the poet Oppian, which fixes the time when he flourished at about the beginning of the 3d century of the christian era. His work has been the prey of successive compilers, furnishing abundant materials to Ælian; the idea and form of his Saturnalia to Macrobius; and much of his learning to Eustathius. A single manuscript is all that remains, exclusive of an abridgment of the work, whose age is uncertain. This manuscript was brought from Greece by Cardinal Bessarion. After his death it passed to St. Mark's library at Venice, and from thence, during the successes of the French, was carried to Paris. There are many copies of it in Europe. It wants the first two books, the beginning of the 3d, a few leaves of the 11th, and part of 2 leaves of the 15th book. This deficiency has been in part supplied by the abridgment: but the text, especially the poetical part, still remain in a very unsettled state, owing to the want of more manuscripts.] Athenæus wrote, besides, an history of Syria and other works, now lost. He died A. D. 194. The best editions of his works are that of Causaubon, fol. 2 vols. Lugd. 1612, by far superior to the editions of 1595 and 1657, [and that of Schweighæuser, Argentorati, 1801-7, in 14 vols. 8vo.] — A brother of king Eumenes 2d, famous for his paternal affection. — [A mathematician, who flourished B. C. 200; his country is not known. He wrote a treatise on machines of war, which is preserved in the collection of Ancient Mathematicians, published at Paris in 1693, in fol.] — A physician of Cilicia, in the age of Pliny, who made heat, cold, wet, dry, and air, the elements, instead of the four commonly received.

ATHENAGÓRAS, a christian philosopher, [a native of Athens, and flourished towards the close of the second century,] who wrote a treatise on the resurrection, and an apology for the christians, still extant. He died A. D. 177. The best edition of his works is that of Dechair, 8vo. Oxon. 1706. — The romance of Theagenes and Charis is falsely ascribed to him. [This romance was the production of a Frenchman named Martin Fumée. It was published in 1599 and 1612 in French, and purported to be a translation from a Greek manuscript brought from the east. No such manuscript ever existed.]

ATHENION, a peripatetic philosopher, 108 B. C. — [A Greek historical painter, who flourished B. C. 300.]

ATHENODÓRUS, a philosopher intimate with Augustus, [born at Cana near Tarsus in Cilicia.] The emperor often profited by his lessons, and was advised by him always to repeat the 24 letters of the Greek alphabet before he gave way to the impulse of anger. [Zosimus attributes the mild plan of government adopted by Augustus to the influence of the counsels of Athenodorus.] Athenodorus died in his 82d year, much lamented by his countrymen, [for whom he had obtained many favours from Augustus, especially relief from some of the taxes by which they were oppressed.] Suet. — A poet who wrote comedy, tragedy, and elegy, in the age of Alexander. Plut. in Alex. — [A stoic philosopher of Tarsus, a native, as is thought, of Pergamus. He was keeper of the library at Pergamus, and the intimate friend of Cato of Utica, by whom he was prevailed upon to take an active part in the war which the latter had undertaken for the restoration of Roman freedom. He died with Cato, according to Strabo.]

ATHËSIS, now Adige, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, [rising in the Rætian Alps, and falling into the Adriatic, north of the Po.] Virg. Æn. 9, v. 680.

ATHOS, [a mountain in the district Chalcidice of Macedonia. It is situate on a peninsula between the Sinus Strymonicus or Gulf of Contessa, and the Sinus Singiticus or Gulf of Monte Santo. It is so high that according to Plutarch and Pliny, it projected its shadow, at the summer solstice on the market-place of Myrina, the capital city of the island of Lemnos, though at the distance of 87 miles. On this account a brazen cow was erected at the termination of the shadow, with this inscription,

Αθως καλυπτει πλευρα Λημνιας βοως.]

When Xerxes invaded Greece, he made a trench of a mile and a half in length at the foot of the mountain, into which he brought the sea-water, and conveyed his fleet over it, so that two ships could pass one another, thus desirous either to avoid the danger of sailing round the promontory, or to show his vanity and the extent of his power. [This trench is said to have been cut in the vicinity of the cities Acanthus and Sana. Traces of it were to be seen for a long time after. The neck of land through which it was cut was seven stadia in breadth; according to Herodotus, twelve. The fleet of Mardonius had previously met with a severe loss in doubling this same promontory.] A sculptor, called Dinocrates, offered Alexander to cut mount Athos, and to make with it a statue of the king holding a town in his left hand, and in the right a spacious basin, to receive all the waters which flowed from it. Alexander greatly admired the plan but objected to the place; and he observed that the neighbouring country was not sufficiently fruitful to produce corn and provisions for the inhabitants which were to dwell in the city in the hand of the statue. Athos is now called Monte Santo, famous for monasteries said to contain some ancient and valuable manuscripts. [Dr. Clarke brought away several of these, and among the rest, a manuscript of Plato, which has not, however, answered the expectations that had been formed of it.] Herodot. 6, c. 44, l. 7, c. 21, &c. — Lucan. 2, v. 672. — Ælian. de Anim. 13, c. 20, &c. — Plin. 4, c. 10. — Æschin. contra Ctesiph.

ATHYMBRA, a city of Caria, afterwards called Nyssa. Strab. 14.

ATIA, a law enacted A. U. C. 690, by T. Atius Labienus, the tribune of the people. It abolished the Cornelian law, and put in full force the Lex Domitia, by transferring the right of electing priests from the college of priests to the people.—The mother of Augustus. vid. Accia.

ATILIA LEX, gave the prætor and a majority of the tribunes, power of appointing guardians to those minors who were not previously provided for by their parents. It was enacted about A. U. C. 443.—Another, A. U. C. 443, which gave the people power of electing 16 tribunes of the soldiers in four legions. Liv. 9, c. 30.

ATILIUS, a freed man, who exhibited combats of gladiators at Fidenæ. The amphitheatre, which contained the spectators, fell during the exhibition, and about 50,000 persons were killed or mutilated. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 62.

ATILLA, the mother of the poet Lucan. She was accused of conspiracy by her son, who expected to clear himself of the charge. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 56.

ATINIA LEX, was enacted by the tribune Atinius, [A. U. C. 623.] It gave a tribune of the commons the privilege of a senator and the right of sitting in the senate.

ATLANTES, a people of Africa in the neighbourhood of mount Atlas, who lived on nothing that had life, and were said not to have their sleep at all disturbed by dreams. They daily cursed the sun at his rising and at his setting, because his excessive heat scorched and tormented them. Herodot.

ATLANTIDES or ATLANTËI, a people of Africa, near mount Atlas. They boasted of being in possession of the country in which all the gods of antiquity received their birth. Uranus was their first king, whom, on account of his knowledge of astronomy, they enrolled in the number of their gods. Diod. 3. [This people, of whom Diodorus speaks, if they ever existed, must have been distinct from the Atlantes of Herodotus.]—The daughters of Atlas, seven in number, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Asterope, Merope, Aleyone, and Celæno. They married some of the gods and most illustrious heroes, and their children were founders of many nations and cities. The Atlantes were called nymphs, and even goddesses, on account of their great intelligence and knowledge. The name of Hesperides was also given them, on account of their mother Hesperis. They were made constellations after death. vid. Pleiades.

ATLANTIS, a celebrated island mentioned by the ancients. Its situation is unknown, and even its existence doubted by some writers. [Plato gives an account of this island in his Timæus and Critias. According to him, it was a large island in the western ocean, opposite the straits of Gades or Gibraltar. He speaks of it as having been in a high degree fertile and productive. It sunk at last under water, and for a long time afterwards, the sea in that quarter was full of shoals. Admitting that Atlantis was situate in the ocean which at present bears its name, the most probable opinion seems to be that it extended from the Canaries to the Azores, and that these islands are the remains of it not swallowed up by the sea. A diligent examination, however, of ancient authorities, seems strongly to countenance the opinion that Atlantis was a powerful and flourishing region, suddenly engulfed by some sub-aqueous convulsion of nature, and not an actual island. Was it the ancient land of Lectonia, which at present lies buried beneath the waters of the Mediterranean? (vid. Lectonia.) or was it a highly civilized and populous region in the vicinity of the Caspian, and inundated by it? The central plain of Asia seems to have been the cradle of our race, and there, if any where, ought we to look for the first powerful and flourishing communities. May not the Atlantic Sea of which the Egyptians made mention to Plato have been the vast sea which once covered so much of Asia?]

ATLAS, one of the Titans, son of Japetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Epimetheus, Prometheus, and Menætius. His mother's name, according to Apollodorus, was Asia. He married Pleione, daughter of Oceanus, or Hesperis, according to others, by whom he had seven daughters, called Atlantides. (vid. Atlantides.) He was king of Mauritania, and master of a thousand flocks of every kind, as also of beautiful gardens, abounding in every species of fruit, which he had intrusted to the care of a dragon. Perseus, after the conquest of the Gorgons, passed by the palace of Atlas, and demanded hospitality. The king, who was informed by an oracle of Themis that he should be dethroned by one of the descendants of Jupiter, refused to receive him, and even offered him violence. Perseus, who was unequal in strength, showed him Medusa's head, and Atlas was instantly changed into a large mountain. This mountain, which runs across the deserts of Africa, east and west, is so high that the ancients have imagined that the heavens rested on its top, and that Atlas supported the world on his shoulders. [The chain of Atlas is highest and broadest in the kingdom of Morocco, where it rises in some places to the height of 13,000 feet above the level of the sea.] Hyginus says that Atlas assisted the giants in their wars against the gods, for which Jupiter compelled him to bear the heavens on his shoulders. The fable that Atlas supported the heavens on his back, arises from his fondness for astronomy, and his often frequenting elevated places and mountains, whence he might observe the heavenly bodies. [It is doubted whether the true Atlas may not have been Mount Altai in Independent Tartary, and the fables relating to it, together with its name, have been in process of time transferred to the African mountain.] The daughters of Atlas were carried away by Busiris king of Egypt, but redeemed by Hercules, who received as a reward from the father the knowledge of astronomy, and a celestial globe. This knowledge Hercules communicated to the Greeks; whence the fable has further said, that he eased for some time the labour of Atlas, by taking up on his shoulders the weight of the heavens. According to some authors, there were two other persons of that name, a king of Italy, father of Electra, and a king of Arcadia, father of Maia, the mother of Mercury. *Virg. ATOSSA, a daughter of Cyrus, who was one of the wives of Cambyses, Smerdis, and afterwards of Darius, by whom she had Xerxes. She was cured of a dangerous cancer by Democedes. She is supposed by some to be the Vashti of Scripture. Herodot. 3, c. 68, &c.

ATRACES, a people of Ætolia, who received their names from Atrax, son of Ætolus. Their country was called Atracia.

ATRAK, a son of Ætolus, or, according to others, of the river Peneus. He was king of Thessaly, and built a town which he called Atrax or Atracia. This town became so famous, that the word Atracius has been applied to any inhabitant of Thessaly. He was father to Hippodamia, who married Pirithous, and whom we must not confound with the wife of Pelops, who bore the same name. Propert. 1, el. 3, v. 25. — Stat. 1, Theb. v. 106. — Ovid. Met. 12, v. 209. — A city of Thessaly, whence the epithet of Atracius. — A river of Ætolia, which falls into the Ionian sea.

AREBATES, a people of Britain [south-west of the Trinobantes. They occupied what is now Berkshire, and part of Oxfordshire. Their principal town was Callera, probably Silchester.]

ATREBATES, now Artois, a people of Gaul, who, together with the Nervii, opposed J. Cæsar with 15,000 men. They were conquered, and Comius, a friend of the general, was set over them as king. They were reinstated in their former liberty and independence, on account of the services of Comius. [Their chief city was Nemetacum or Nemetocenna, afterwards Atrebatæ, now Arras, or, as the Flemings call it, Atrecht.] Cæs. Bell. Gall. 2, &c.

ATREUS, son of Pelops by Hippodamia, daughter of Cœnomaus king of Pisa, was king of Mycænæ, and brother to Pittheus, Trœzen, Thyestes, and Chrysippus. As Chrysippus was an illegitimate son, and at the same time a favourite of his father, Hippodamia resolved to remove him. She persuaded her sons Thyestes and Atreus to murder him; but their refusal exasperated her more, and she executed it herself. This murder was grievous to Pelops; he suspected his two sons, who fled away from his presence. Atreus retired to the court of Eurysthenes king of Argos, his nephew, and upon his death he succeeded him on the throne. He married, as some report, Ærope his predecessor's daughter, by whom he had Plisthenes, Menelaus, and Agamemnon. Others affirm that Ærope was the wife of Plisthenes, by whom she had Agamemnon and Menelaus, who are the reputed sons of Atreus, because that prince took care of their education, and brought them up as his own. (vid. Plisthenes.) Thyestes had followed his brother to Argos, where he lived with him, and debauched his wife, by whom he had two, or, according to some, three children. This incestuous commerce offended Atreus, and Thyestes was banished from his court. He was, however, soon after recalled by his brother, who determined cruelly to revenge the violence offered to his bed. To effect this purpose, he invited his brother to a sumptuous feast, where Thyestes was served up with the flesh of the children he had had by his sister-in-law the queen. After the repast was finished, the arms and heads of the murdered children were produced, to convince Thyestes of what he had feasted upon. This action appeared so cruel and impious, that the sun is said to have shrunk back in his course at the bloody sight. Thyestes immediately fled to the court of Thesprotus, and thence to Sicyon, where he ravished his own daughter Pelopea, in a grove sacred to Minerva, without knowing who she was. This incest he committed intentionally, as some report, to revenge himself on his brother Atreus, according to the word of the oracle, which promised him satisfaction for the cruelties he had suffered, only from the hand of a son who should be borne of himself and his own daughter. Pelopea brought forth a son, whom she called Ægisthus, and soon after she married Atreus, who had lost his wife. Atreus adopted Ægisthus, and sent him to murder Thyestes, who had been seized at Delphi, and imprisoned. Thyestes knew his son, and made himself known to him; he made him espouse his cause, and instead of becoming his father's murderer, he rather avenged his wrongs, and returned to Atreus, whom he assassinated. vid. Thyestes, Ægisthus Pelopea, Agamemnon, and Menelaus. — Hygin. fab. 83, 86, 87, 88, and 258. — *Euripid. in Orest. in Iphig. ATRIDÆ, a patronymic given by Homer to Agamemnon and Menelaus, as being the sons of Atreus. This is false, upon the authority of Hesiod, Lactantius, Dictys of Crete, &c. who maintain that these princes were not the sons of Atreus, but of Plisthenes, and that they were brought up in the house and under the eye of their grandfather. vid. Plisthenes.

ATROPATÈNE or ATROPATIA, [a name given to the north-western part of Media, between Mount Taurus and the Caspian Sea. It received this name from Atropates, a satrap of this province, who, after the death of Alexander, rendered himself independent, and took the title of king which his successors enjoyed for many ages. It was a cold, barren, and inhospitable country, and on that account, allotted by Shalmanezar for the residence of many captive Israelites, after the conquest of their kingdom. It is now called Aderbigian, from the Persian term Ader signifying fire; according to the tradition that Zerdust or Zoroaster lighted a pyre, or, temple of fire, in a city, named Urmiah, of this his native country. Its metropolis was Gaza, now Tebritz, or, as it is more commonly pronounced, Tauris.] Strab.

ATRŌPUS, one of the Parcæ, daughters of Nox and Erebus. According to the derivation of her name (α non, ῥετρα verba), she is inexorable and inflexible, and her duty among the three sisters, is to cut the thread of life, without any regard to sex, age, or quality. She was represented by the ancients in a black veil, with a pair of scissors in her hand. vid. Parcæ.

T. Q. ATTA, a writer of merit in the Augustan age, who seems to have received this name from some deformity in his legs or feet. His compositions, dramatical as well as satirical, were held in universal admiration, though Horace thinks of them with indifference. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 79.

ATTĀLIA, a city of Pamphylia, [south-west of Perga,] built by king Attalus. [The site of this city is called Palæa Antalia, while the modern city of Antalia, or, as it is commonly called, Satalia, answers to the ancient Olbia.] Strab.

ATTALICUS. vid. Attalus 3d.

ATTĀLUS 1st, king of Pergamus, succeeded Eumenes 1st. He defeated the Gauls who had invaded his dominions, and extended his conquests to mount Taurus. [He formed an alliance with the Romans, whom he vigorously assisted in their two wars against Philip of Macedon. In conjunction with the Athenians he invaded Macedonia, and recalled Philip from his enterprise undertaken against Athens; on which account the Athenians gave his name to one of their tribes.] He died at Pergamus, after a reign of 44 years, B. C. 197. Liv. 26, 27, 28, &c.—Polyb. 5.—Strab. 13.—The 2d of that name, was sent on an embassy to Rome by his brother Eumenes the 2d, and at his return was appointed guardian to his nephew Attalus the 3d, who was then an infant. Prusias made successful war against him, and seized his capital; but the conquest was stopped by the interference of the Romans, who restored Attalus to his throne. Attalus, who has received the name of Philadelphus, from his fraternal love, was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of several cities. He was poisoned by his nephew in the 82d year of his age, B. C. 138. He had governed the nation with great prudence and moderation for 20 years. Strab. 13.—Polyb. 5.—The 3d, succeeded to the kingdom of Pergamus by the murder of Attalus the 2d, and made himself odious by his cruelty to his relations and his wanton exercise of power. He was son to Eumenes 2d, and surnamed Philopator. He left the cares of government to cultivate his garden, and to make experiments on the melting of metals. He lived in great amity with the Romans; and as he died without issue by his wife Berenice, he left in his will the words P. R. meorion hæres esto, which the Romans interpreted as themselves, and therefore took possession of his kingdom, B. C. 123, and made of it a Roman province, which they governed by a proconsul. From this circumstance, whatever was a valuable acquisition, or an ample fortune, was always called by the epithet of Attalicus. Attalus, as well as his predecessors, made themselves celebrated for the valuable libraries which they collected at Pergamus, and for the patronage which merit and virtue always found at their court. Liv. 24, &c.—Plin. 7, 8, 33, &c.—Justin. 39.—Horat. 1, od 1.—A philosopher, preceptor to Seneca. Senec. ep. 108.—An astronomer of Rhodes.

ATTEIUS CAPITO, a consul in the age of Augustus, who wrote treatises on sacerdotal laws, public courts of justice, and the duty of a senator. vid. Atteius.

ATTHIS, a daughter of Cranaus the 2d, king of Athens, who gave her name to Attica, according to Apollod. 3, c. 14.

ATTICA, [a country of Greece, without the Peloponnesus, forming a kind of triangular peninsula, and bounded on the north by Bœotia and the Euripus; on the west by Megaris; on the south by the Sæus Saronicus; and on the east by part of the Ægean sea; extending from north-west to south-east about 80 miles, with decreasing breadth, but at an average about 40 miles. It received its name from Atthis the daughter of Cranaus, according to some. The better derivation of the name, however, is from Acte, the Greek term for shore, the country being of a peninsular shape.] It was originally called Ionia, from the Ionians, [vid. Iones,] and Cecropia, from Cecrops, the first of its kings, who led an Egyptian colony into this country B. C. 1556. The most famous of its cities is called Athens, whose inhabitants sometimes bear the name of Attici. [The face of the country was partly level and partly mountainous, and the sterility of the soil so great as to require assiduous industry to produce the common necessaries of life. Attica thus presented little temptation to plundering or conquering invaders, while at the same time its physical deficiencies operated directly to invigorate the intellectual and moral energies of the people.] vid. Athenæ.

ATTICUS, (T. Pomponius) a celebrated Roman knight to whom Cicero wrote a great number of letters, which contained the general history of the age. They are now extant, and divided into 17 books. In the time of Marius and Sylla, Atticus retired to Athens, where he so endeared himself to the citizens, that after his departure, they created statues to him in commemoration of his munificence and liberality. He was such a perfect master of the Greek writers, and spoke their language so fluently, that he was surnamed Atticus: and, as a proof of his learning, he favoured the world with some of his compositions. He behaved in such a disinterested manner, that he offended neither of the inimical parties of Rome, and both were equally anxious of courting his approbation. He lived in the greatest intimacy with the illustrious men of his age, as he was such a lover of truth, that he not only abstained from falsehood even in a joke, but treated with the greatest contempt and indignation a lying tongue. It is said that he refused to take alms when unable to get the better of a [painful disorder of the intestines,] and died in his 77th year, B. C. 32, after bearing the amiable character of peace-maker among his friends. Cornelius Nepos, one of his intimate friends, has written a minute account of his life. Cic. ad. Attic. &c.—Herodes, an Athenian in the age of the Antonines, descended from Miltiades, and celebrated for his munificence. His son of the same name, was honoured with the consulship, and he generously erected an aqueduct at Troas, of which he had been made governor by the emperor Adrian, and raised in other parts of the empire several public buildings as useful as they were magnificent.—Philostrat. in. vit. 2, p. 548.—A. Gell. noct. Att.

ATTILA, a celebrated king of the Huns, a nation in the southern parts of Scythia, who invaded the Roman empire in the reign of Valentinian, with an army of 500,000 men, and laid waste the provinces. He took the town of Aquileia, and marched against Rome; but his retreat and peace were purchased with a large sum of money by the feeble emperor. Attila, surnamed the scourge of God, died A. D. 453, of an uncommon effusion of blood the first night of his nuptials. [His body was secretly buried, enclosed in three coffins, the first of gold, the second of silver, and the third of iron. Those who had been employed about his grave were put to death, lest they should reveal the place of his interment. vid. Bayle Dict. art. Attila, for other particulars respecting this savage conqueror.] He had expressed his wish to extend his conquests over the whole world; and he often feasted his barbarity by dragging captive kings in his train. Jornand. de Reb. Get.

ATILIUS, a Roman consul in the first Punic war. vid. Regulus.—Calatinus, a Roman consul who fought the Carthaginian fleet.—Marcus, a poet who translated the Flectra of Sophocles into Latin verse, and wrote comedies, whose unintelligible language procured him the appellation of Ferreus.—Regulus, a Roman censor who built a temple to the goddess of Concord. Liv. 23, c. 23, &c.—The name of Attilius was common among the Romans, and many of the public magistrates are called Attilii; their lives, however, are not famous for any illustrious event.

ATŪRUS, a river of Gaul, now the Adour, which runs at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains into the Bay of Biscay. Lucan. 1, v. 420.

ATYĀDĒ, the descendants of Atys the Lydian.

ATYS, an ancient king of Lydia, who sent away his son Tyrrhenus with a colony of Lydians, who settled in Italy. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—A son of Cræsus king of Lydia. He was forbidden the use of all weapons by his father, who had dreamt that he had been killed. Some time after this, Atys prevailed on his father to permit him to go to hunt a wild boar which laid waste the country of Mysia, and he was killed in the hunt by Adrastus whom Cræsus had appointed guardian over his son, and thus the apprehensions of the monarch were realized. Herodot. 1, c. 34, &c.—vid. Adrastus.—A Trojan, who came to Italy with Æneas, and is supposed to be the progenitor of the family of the Attii at Rome. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 568.—A son of Limniace, the daughter of the river Ganges, who assisted Cepheus in preventing the marriage of Andromeda, and was killed by Perseus with a burning log of wood. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 47.—A celebrated shepherd of Phrygia, of whom the mother of the gods, generally called Cybele, became enamoured. She intrusted him with the care of her temple, and made him promise he always would live in celibacy. He violated his vow by an amour with the nymph Sangaris, for which the goddess made him so insane and delirious, that he castrated himself with a sharp stone. This was afterwards intentionally made by his sacerdotal successors in the service of Cybele, to prevent their breaking their vows of perpetual chastity. This account is the most general and most approved. Others say that the goddess became fond of Atys, because he had introduced her festivals in the greatest part of Asia Minor, and that she herself mutilated him. Pausanias relates, in Achaia, c. 17, that Atys was the son of the daughter of Sangar, who became pregnant by putting the bow of an almond tree in her bosom. Jupiter, as the passage mentions, once had an amorous dream, and some of the impurity of the god fell upon the earth, which soon after produced a monster of a human form, with the characteristics of the two sexes. This monster was called Agdistis, and was deprived by the gods of those parts which distinguished the male sex. From the mutilated parts, which were thrown upon the ground, rose an almond tree, one of whose branches a nymph of the Sangar gathered and placed in her bosom as mentioned above. Atys, as soon as born, was exposed in a wood, but preserved by a she-goat. The genius Agdistis saw him in the wood, and was captivated with his beauty. As Atys was going to celebrate his nuptials with the daughter of the king of Pessinus, Agdistis, who was jealous of his rival, inspired by his enchantments the king and his future son-in-law with such an uncommon fury, that they both attacked and mutilated one another in the struggle. Ovid says, Met. 10, fab. 2, &c. that Cybele changed Atys into a pine-tree as he was going to lay violent hands upon himself, and ever after that tree was sacred to the mother of the gods. After his death, Atys received divine honours, and temples were raised to his memory, particularly at Dindyma. Catull. de Atty. & Berec.—Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 3, Fast. 4, v. 223, &c.—Lucan. in Deâ Syriâ.—Sylvus, son of Albius Sylvius, was king of Alba. Liv. 1, c. 3.

AVARICUM, [a strong and fortified town of Gaul, the capital of the Bituriges, now Bourges. It received its former appellation from the river Avara or Eure, one of the southern branches of the Liger. It was taken by Cæsar during the Gallic wars, and its inhabitants massacred.] Cæs. Bell. Gall. 7.

AVENTINUS, a son of Hercules, by Rhea, who assisted Turnus against Æneas, and distinguished himself by his valour. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 657.—A king of the Alba, buried upon mount Aventine. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 51.—One of the seven hills on which part of the city of Rome was built. It was [18 stadia] in circumference, and was given to the people to build houses upon by king Ancus Martius. It was not reckoned within the precincts of the city till the reign of the emperor Claudius, because the soothsayers looked upon it as a place of ill omen, as Remus had been buried there, whose blood had been criminally shed. The word is derived, according to some, ab avis, because birds were fond of the place. Others suppose that it receives its name because Aventinus, one of the Alban kings, was buried upon it, [and others from Avens, the river which watered the district, whose inhabitants were transplanted thither. It was also called Murcius, from Murcia, the goddess of sleep, who had a temple here; and Collis Dianæ, from the temple of Diana on it, as well as Remurium from Remus, who wished the city to be founded here.] Juno, the Moon, Bona Dea, Hercules, and the goddess of Victory and Liberty, had also magnificent temples built upon it. Varro de L. L. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 235.—Liv. 1, c. 33.

AVERNUS, and AVERNA orum, a lake of Campania, near Baixæ, [called by the modern Italians Lago di Tripertogata,] whose waters were so unwholesome and putrid that no birds could fly over it, but dropped down dead; hence its original name was avog, [from a privative, and ogus a bird.] The ancients made it the entrance of hell. [It is situate in the country of Lavora in the kingdom of Naples, near Pozzuoli, and is said to be about 600 yards in diameter, and in some places 188 feet deep. Some writers have supposed that its sulphureous effluvia not being of sufficient consistence to support the birds, they dropped by their own weight. The lake was surrounded with thick woods, which, preventing the access of any free current of air, tended materially to increase the unwholesomeness of the spot. Here, according to the ancient mythology, dwelt the Cimmerians, in deep caverns, into which no ray of the sun ever penetrated, whence the fable of Cimmerian darkness. They worked mines, served as priests of an oracle, and were under the government of a king. All these fables, however, met with their overthrow, when Agrippa, in order to render so remarkable a spot easier of access to the numerous strangers whom curiosity attracted thither, cut down the woods and cleared the adjacent country. Two roads were cut for this same purpose, one through a mountain which separated the lake from Cumæ, and another through a second mountain between Puteoli and Naples. Remains of each are to be seen at the present day, the one being termed the Grotto of Pausilipo, the other the Grotto of the Sibyl. vid. Lacus Lucrinus and Julius Portus.] The waters of the Avernus were indispensably necessary in all enchantments and magical processes. It may be observed, that all lakes, whose stagnated waters were putrid and offensive to the smell, were indiscriminately called Averna. [These are said to be very frequent in Hungary on account of the abundance of mines there.] Virg. Æn. 4, v. 5—12, &c. l. 6, v. 201, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Diod. 4.—Aristot. de Adm.

AUFÆIA AQUA, called afterwards Marcia, was the sweetest and most wholesome water in Rome, and it was first conveyed into the city by Ancus Martius.

AUFIDENA, now Alfidena, [a city of Samnium, and the capital of the Caraceni, situate on the Sagrus or Sangro.] Liv. 10, c. 12.

AUFIDIA LEX, was enacted by the tribune Aufidius Lurco, A. U. C. 692. It ordained, that if any candidate, in canvassing for an office, promised money to [a tribe] and failed in the performance, he should be excused; but if he actually paid it, he should be compelled to pay every [tribe a yearly fine of 3000 sesterces as long as he lived.]

AUFIDIUS Bassus, a famous historian in the age of Quintilian who wrote an account of Germany, and of the civil wars.

AUFIDUS, a rapid river of Apulia falling into the Adriatic sea, and now called Ofanto, or rather, Uffente. Strabo calls it the Aufidus, but the Latin writers give it the name of Ufens.] It was on its banks that the Romans were defeated by Hannibal at Cannæ. The spot is still shown by the inhabitants, and bears the name of the field of blood. Horat. 3, od. 30, l. 4, od. 9.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 405.

AUGA and AUGE and AUGEA, daughter of Aleus king of Tegea, by Neæra, was ravished by Hercules, and brought forth a son, whom she exposed in the woods to conceal her amours from her father. The child was preserved, and called Telephus. Aleus was informed of his daughter's shame, and gave her to Nauplius to be put to death. Nauplius refused to perform the cruel office, and gave Auga to Teuthras, king of Mysia, who, being without issue, adopted her as his daughter. Some time after, the dominions of Teuthras were invaded by an enemy, and the king promised his crown and daughter to him who could deliver him from the impending calamity. Telephus, who had been directed by the oracle to go to the court of Teuthras, if he wished to find his parents, offered his services to the king, and they were accepted. As he was going to unite himself to Auge, in consequence of the victory he had obtained, Auge rushed from him with secret horror, and the gods sent a serpent to separate them. Auge implored the aid of Hercules, who made her son known to her, and she returned with him to Tegea. Pausanias says that Auge was confined in a coffer with her infant son, and thrown into the sea, where, after being preserved and protected by Minerva, she was found by king Peuthras. Apollod. 2 and 3.—Paus. 8, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 99 and 100.

AUGÆÆ, a town of Laconia, [supposed to be the same with Ægia, near the coast, north-west of Gythium.] Paus. 3, c. 21.

AUGIAS an. AUGIAS, son of Eleus, or Elius, was one of the Argonauts, and afterwards ascended the throne of Elis. He had an immense number of oxen and goats, and the stables in which they were kept had never been cleaned, so that the task seemed an impossibility to any man. Hercules undertook it on a promise of receiving for a reward the tenth part of the herds of Augias, or something equivalent. The hero changed the course of the Peneus, which immediately carried away the dung and filth from the stables. Augias refused the promised recompense, on pretence that Hercules had made use of artifice, and had not experienced any labour or trouble, and he further drove his own son Phyleus from his kingdom, because he supported the claims of the hero. The refusal was a declaration of war. Hercules conquered Elis, put to death Augias, and gave his crown to Phyleus. Pausanias says, 5, c. 2 and 3, that Hercules spared the life of Augias for the sake of his son, and that Phyleus went to settle in Dulichium; and that at the death of Augias, his other son, Agasthenes, succeeded to the throne. Augias received, after his death, the honours which were generally paid to a hero. Augias has been called the son of Sol, because Elius signifies the sun. The proverb of Agean stable is now applied to [any very laborious undertaking, approaching almost to an impossibility.] Hygin. fab. 14, 30, 157.—Plin. 17, c. 9.—Strab. 8.—Apollod. 2.

AUGILÆ, [now Augela, one of the Oases of the great African desert, with a town of the same name. This was one of the stations for the caravans which carried on the inland trade of Africa. It is at present also a caravan station.]

AUGÛRES, certain officers at Rome who foretold future events, whence their name, ab avium garritu. They were first created by Romulus, to the number of three. Servius Tullius added a fourth, and the tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 454, increased the number to nine; and Sylla added six more during his dictatorship. They had a particular college, and the chief amongst them was called magister collegii. Their office was honourable; and if any one of them was convicted of any crime he could not be deprived of his privileges, an indulgence granted to no other sacerdotal body at Rome. [The augur made his observations on the heavens usually in the dead of night, or about twilight. He took his station on an elevated place, where the view was open on all sides, and to make it so buildings were sometimes pulled down. Having first offered up sacrifices, and uttered a solemn prayer, he sat down with his head covered, and with his face turned to the east, so that he had the south on his right and the north on his left. Then he determined with his lituus the regions of the heavens from east to west, and marked in his mind some object straight forward, at as great a distance as his eyes could reach, within which boundaries he should make his observations.] There were generally five things from which the augurs drew omens: the first consisted in observing the phenomena of the heavens, such as thunder, lightning, comets, &c. The second kind of omen was drawn from the chirping or flying of birds. The third was from the sacred chickens, whose eagerness or indifference in eating the bread which was thrown to them was looked upon as lucky or unlucky. The fourth was from quadrupeds, from their crossing or appearing in some unaccustomed place. The fifth was from different casualties, which were called Diræ, such as spilling salt on a table, or wine upon one's clothes, hearing strange noises, stumbling or sneezing, meeting a wolf, hare, fox, or pregnant bitch. From such superstitious notions did the Romans draw their prophecies. The sight of birds on the left hand was always deemed a lucky object; [objects on the left were deemed, on the contrary, of evil omen among the Greeks, because their augur faced the north, and had the east, the lucky quarter, on his right Sinister and lævus, therefore, properly signify lucky among the Romans, and when they are used as terms of ill luck, it is in conformity merely with Greecian usage.] Cic. de Div.—Liv. 1, &c.—Dionys. Hal.—Ovid. Fast.

AUGUSTA, a name given [singly, or in conjunction with some epithet,] to seventy cities in the Roman provinces in honour of Augustus Cæsar.

AUGUSTĀLIA, a festival at Rome, in commemoration of the day on which Augustus returned to Rome after he had established peace over the different parts of the empire. [It was celebrated on the 27th September.]

AUGUSTĪNUS, bishop of Hippo, in Africa, distinguished himself by his writings as well as by the austerity of his life. [He was born at Tagestum, A. D. 354, and embraced christianity A. D. 387, having been before a Manichean.] In his works, which are numerous, he displayed the powers of a great genius, and an extensive acquaintance with the philosophy of Plato. He died in the 76th year of his age, A. D. 430. The best edition of his works is that of the Benedict. fol. Ant. 1700 to 1703, 12 vols.

AUGUSTODINUM, now Autun, a town of Gaul, the capital of the ancient Ædui. [It was called Bibracte in Cæsar's time.]

AUGUSTŪLUS, the last Roman emperor of the west, A. D. 475, conquered by Odoacer, king of the Heruli.

AUGUSTUS OCTAVIĀNUS CÆSAR, second emperor of Rome, was son of Octavius, a senator, and Accia, daughter of Julius and sister to Julius Cæsar. He was adopted by his uncle Cæsar, and inherited the greatest part of his fortune. He lost his father at the age of four; and though only eighteen when his uncle was murdered, he hastened to Rome, where his ingratiated himself with the senate and people, and received the honours of the consulship two years after as the reward of his hypocrisy. Though his youth and his inexperience were ridiculed by his enemies, who branded him with the appellation of boy, yet he rose in consequence by his prudence and valour, and made war against his opponents, on pretence of avenging the death of his murdered uncle. But when he perceived that by making him fight against Antony the senate wished to debilitate both antagonists, he changed his views, and uniting himself with his enemy, soon formed the second triumvirate, in which his cruel proscriptions shed the innocent blood of 300 senators and 200 knights, and did not even spare the life of his friend Cicero. By the divisions which were made among the triumvirs, Augustus retained for himself the more important provinces of the west, and banished, as it were, his colleagues, Lepidus and Antony, to more distant territories. But as long as the murderers of Cæsar were alive, the reigning tyrants had reasons for apprehension, and therefore the forces of the triumvirate were directed against the partizans of Brutus and the senate. The affair was decided at Philippi, where it is said that the valour and conduct of Antony alone preserved the combined armies, and effected the defeat of the republican forces. The head of the unfortunate Brutus was carried to Rome, and in insolent revenge thrown at the feet of Cæsar's statue. On his return to Italy, Augustus rewarded his soldiers with the lands of those that had been proscribed; but among the sufferers were many who had never injured the conqueror, especially Virgil, whose modest application, [seconded by the powerful intercession of Mæcenas,] procured the restitution of his property. The friendship which subsisted between Augustus and Antony was broken as soon as the fears of a third rival vanished away, and the aspiring heir of Cæsar was easily induced to take up arms by the little jealousies and resentment of Fulvia. Her death, however, retarded hostilities; the two rivals were reconciled; their united forces were successfully directed against the younger Pompey; and, to strengthen their friendship, Antony agreed to marry Octavia, the sister of Augustus. But as this step was political, and not dictated by affection, Octavia was slighted, and Antony resigned himself to the pleasures and company of the beautiful Cleopatra. Augustus was incensed, and immediately took up arms to avenge the wrongs of his sister, and perhaps more eagerly to remove a man whose power and existence kept him in continual alarms, and made him dependent. Both parties met at Actium, B. C. 31, to decide the fate of Rome. Antony was supported by all the power of the east, and Augustus by Italy. Cleopatra fled from the battle with 50 ships, and her flight ruined the interest of Antony who followed her into Egypt. The conqueror soon after passed into Egypt, besieged Alexandria, and honoured, with a magnificent funeral, the unfortunate Roman and the celebrated queen, whom the fear of being led in the victor's triumph at Rome had driven to commit suicide. After he had established peace all over the world, Augustus shut up the gates of the temple of Janus the year our Saviour was born. [This temple was thrice closed during the reign of Augustus, and remained closed the last time for about 12 years.] It is said he twice resolved to lay down the supreme power, immediately after the victory obtained over Antony; and afterwards on account of his ill health; but his friend Mæcenas dissuaded him, and observed, that he would leave it to be the prey of the most powerful, and expose himself to ingratitude and to danger. He died at Nola, in the 76th year of his age, A. D. 14, after he had held the sovereign power during 44 years, [reckoning from the battle of Actium.] Augustus was an active emperor, and consulted the good of the Romans with the most anxious care. He visited all the provinces except Africa and Sardinia, and his consummate prudence and experience gave rise to many salutary laws; but it may be said, that he finished with a good grace what he began with cruelty. While making himself absolute, he took care to leave his countrymen the shadow of liberty; and if under the character and office of perpetual tribune, of priest and imperator, he was invested with all the power of sovereignty, he guarded against offending the jealous Romans by not assuming the regal title. His refusal to read the letters he found after Pompey's defeat arose more from fear than honour, and he dreaded the discovery of names which would have perhaps united to sacrifice his ambition. His good qualities, and many virtues he perhaps never possessed, have been transmitted to posterity by the pen of adulation or gratitude, in the poems of Virgil, Horace, and Ovid. To distinguish himself from the obscurity of the Octavii, and if possible, to suppress the remembrance of his uncle's violent fate, he aspired after a new title; and the submissive senate yielded to his ambition, by giving him the honourable appellation of Augustus. He has been accused of licentiousness and adultery by his biographer; but the goodness of his heart, and the fidelity of his friendship, which in some instances he possessed, made some amends for his natural foibles. He was ambitious of being thought handsome; and as he was publicly reported to be the son of Apollo, according to his mother's declaration, he wished his flatterers to represent him with the figure and attributes of that god. Like Apollo, his eyes were clear, and he affected to have it thought that they possessed some divine irradiation; and was well pleased, if, when he fixed his looks upon any body, they held down their eyes as if overcome by the glaring brightness of the sun. He distinguished himself by his learning; he was a perfect master of the Greek language, and wrote some tragedies, besides memoirs of his life and other works, all now lost. He was married three times; to Claudia, to Scribonia, and to Livia; but he was unhappy in his matrimonial connexions, and his only daughter, Julia, by Scribonia, disgraced herself and her father by the debauchery and licentiousness of her manners. He recommended, at his death, his adopted son Tiberius as his successor. He left his fortune partly to Tiberius and to Drusus, and made donations to the army and Roman people. Virgil wrote his heroic poem at the desire of Augustus, whom he represented under the character of Æneas. Sueton. in vitâ.—Horat.—Virgil.—Paus.—Tacit.—Patercul.—Dio.—Cass.—Ovid.—The name of Augustus was afterwards given to the successors of Octavianus in the Roman empire as a personal, and the name of Cæsar as a family distinction. In a more distant period of the empire, the title of Augustus was given only to the emperor, while that of Cæsar was bestowed on the second person in the state, who was considered as presumptive heir.

AVIDIUS CASSIUS, a man saluted emperor A. D. 175. He reigned only three months, and was assassinated by a centurion. He was called a second Catiline, from his excessive love of bloodshed. Diod.

RUFUS FESTUS AVIENUS, a poet in the age of Theodosius, who translated the phenomena of Aratus, [the Periegesis of Dionysius, the History of Livy, and Æsop's Fables into verse; and wrote also a poetical "Description of the maritime coasts," and some other pieces. His geographical poems, and a few others, have been edited by Wernsdoff, in the Poeta Latini Minores. The best edition of the Fables is that of Cannegieter, Amst. 1731, in 8vo. He, however, assigns them to Flavius Avianus, whom he makes to have lived in the age of the Antonines.]

AVITUS ALCIMUS, [a bishop of Vienna in France, nephew to Marcus Mæcilius Avitus, emperor of the west, and flourished at the beginning of the 6th century. He was the friend of Clovis, the first christian king of France, and contributed to his conversion. He wrote letters on various subjects, chiefly controversial, sermons, and a poem on the Mosaic history. His works are published by Simond, in 8vo. 1643. His poems have been printed separately, at Frankfort in 1507, at Paris in 1509, and at Lyons in 1536.]

AULERICI. [Under this name are reckoned three nations of Gaul. The Aulerici Brannonices, contiguous to the Ædui, and subject to them, answering to what is now Morienne.—The Aulerici Cenomani, situate between the Sarta or Sarle, and the Lædus, two of the northern branches of the Liger. Their country is now Mans.—The Aulerici Eburones, on the left bank of the Sequana or Seine, below Lutetia or Paris, answering now to the diocese of Evreux.]

AULÊTES, the surname of one of the Ptolemaean kings, father to Cleopatra.

AULIS, a town of Bœotia opposite to Chalcis on the sea-coast, where all the Greeks conspired against Troy. They were detained there by contrary winds, by the anger of Diana, whose favourite stag had been killed by Agamemnon. To appease the resentment of the goddess, Agamemnon was obliged to sacrifice his own daughter Iphigenia, whom, however, Diana spared, by substituting a ram. [No traces of Aulis remain at the present day, but there are two harbours still to be found here, called Megalo and Mikro Bathy.] Virg. Æn. 4, v. 426.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 9, &c.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 303.

AULON, [a hill of Italy near Tarentum, whose wine equalled the Falernian. Horat. 2, od. 6, v. 18.—A valley of Palestine, extending along the banks of Jordan, called also Magnus Campus.—Another in Syria, between the ridges of Libanus and Anti-Libanus.] Paus.

AULUS, a prænomen common among the Romans.—Gellius. vid. Gellius.

AURELIA LEX, was enacted [A. U. C. 683, and ordained that judices or jurymen should be chosen from the Senators, Equites, and Tribuni Ærarii].—Another, A. U. C. 678. It abrogated a clause of the Lex Cornelia, and permitted the tribunes to hold other offices after the expiration of the tribuneship.

AURELIANUS, emperor of Rome after Flavius Claudius, was austere, and even cruel in the execution of the laws, and punished his soldiers with unusual severity. He rendered himself famous for his military character; and his expedition against Zenobia, the celebrated queen of Palmyra, gained him great honour. He beautified Rome, was charitable to the poor, and the author of many salutary laws. He was naturally brave; and in all the battles he fought, it is said he killed no less than 300 men with his own hand. In his triumph he exhibited to the Romans people of 15 different nations, all of which he had conquered. He was the first emperor who wore a diadem. After a glorious reign of six years, as he marched against the northern barbarians, he was assassinated A. D. 275, 29th January. [A conspiracy had been formed against his life by one of his secretaries who was accused of extortion. Dreading the effects of the emperor's displeasure, this person counterfeited his master's hand, and shewed to the principal officers a long list containing their names marked down for death. Without suspecting or examining the fraud, they immediately resolved to save their own lives by taking that of the emperor. They effected their purpose on a march between Byzantium and Hæcælea.]

[AURELIANI. vid. Genabum.]

AURELIUS, emperor of Rome. vid. Antonius Bassianus.—Victor, an historian in the age of Julian, two of whose compositions are extant, an account of illustrious men, and a biography of all the Cæsars to Julian. [He was born in Africa of obscure parents. He came to Rome in search of employment, and was raised by his merit to the most important offices in the state. He was consul with Valentinian, A. D. 369.] The best editions of Aurelius are the 4to. of Artzenius, Amst. 1733, and the 8vo. of Pitiscus, Utr. 1696.—Antonius, an emperor. vid. Antoninus.

AUREOLUS, a general who assumed the purple in the age of Gallienus.

AURORA, a goddess, daughter of Hyperion and Thia or Thea, or, according to others, of Titan and Terra. Some say that Pallas, son of Crius, and brother to Perses, was her father; hence her surname of Pallantias. She married Astræus, by whom she had the winds, the stars, &c. Her amours with Tithonus and Cephalus are also famous; by the former she had Memnon and Æmation, and Phaëton by the latter. (vid. Cephalus and Tithonus.) She had also an intrigue with Orion, whom she carried to the island of Delos, where he was killed by Diana's arrows. Aurora is generally represented by the poets drawn in a rose-coloured chariot, and opening with her rosy fingers the gates of the east, pouring the dew upon the earth, and making the flowers grow. Her chariot is generally drawn by white horses, and she is covered with a veil. Nox and Somnus fly before her, and the constellations of heaven disappear at her approach. She always sets out before the sun, and is the forerunner of his rising. The Greeks call her Eôs. Homer. Il. 3, Od. 10, Hymn. in Vener.—Ovid. Met. 3, 9, 15.—Apollod. 1, 3.—*Virg. AURUNCI, [a people of Latium, on the coast towards Campania, south-east of the Volsci.]

AUSCI, a people of [Gallia Aquitania. Their capital was Ausci, now Auch, on the Ger, one of the southern branches of the Garumna or Garonne.]

AUSER, AUSËRIS, and ANSER, a river of Etruria, which [falls into the sea about 6 miles north of the mouth of the Arnus. It is now the Serchio.]

AUSON, a son of Ulysses and Calypso, from whom the Ausones, a people of Italy, are descended. [vid. Ausonia.]

AUSONIA, one of the ancient names of Italy, which it received from Auson, the son of Ulysses. If Virgil makes Æneas speak of Ausonia, it is by anticipation. [Ausonia was a name properly applied to the whole southern part of Italy, through which the Ausones, one of the ancient races of Italy, had spread themselves. Its derivation from Auson is a mere fable. The sea on the south-east coast was for a long time called from them Mare Ausonium. The Opici and Samnites were branches of the Ausones, especially the former.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 171.

DECIM. MAGNUS AUSONIUS, a poet, born at Bordeaux in Gaul, in the 4th century. He was preceptor to Gratian, son of the emperor Valentinian, and made consul by means of his pupil. The thanks he returned the emperor Gratian is one of the best of his poems, which were too often hurried for publication, and consequently not perfect. He wrote the consular fasti of Rome, an useful performance, now lost. His style is occasionally obscene. [The best editions of Ausonius are, that of Tollius. Amst. 1761, in 8vo. and the Delphini of 1730.]

AUSPICES, a sacerdotal order at Rome, nearly the same as the augurs. vid. Augures.

AUSTER, the wind blowing from the south, whose breath was pernicious to flowers as well as to health. He was parent of rain. Virg. Ecl. 2, v. 58. Virg. Venti.

AUTOCHTHONES, [an appellation assumed by some nations, and in particular by the Athenians, importing that they sprang from the soil which they inhabited. The Athenians wore, as emblematic of this, golden grasshoppers in their hair; this insect being supposed to have the same origin. The name is derived from αυτος ipse, and χθων terra. The Athenians took this name because no foreign tribe had ever dispossessed them of their country.]

AUTOLÖLÆ, a people of Mauritania, descended from the Gætuli. [They spread themselves over the Atlantic coast of Mauritania Tingitana.]

AUTOLÛCUS, a son of Mercury by Chione, a daughter of Dædalion. He was one of the Argonauts. His craft as a thief has been greatly celebrated. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and mingled them with his own after he had changed their marks. He did the same to Sisyphus son of Æolus; but Sisyphus was as crafty as Autolycus, and he knew his own oxen by a mark which he had made under their feet. Autolycus was so pleased with the artifice of Sisyphus, that he immediately formed an intimacy with him, and even permitted him freely to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, who became pregnant of Ulysses, and was soon after married to Laertes. vid. Sisyphus, Laertes. Hygin. fab. 200, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 8.—Apollod. 1.—Homer. Od. 14.

AUTOMËDON, a son of Dioreus, who went to the Trojan war with ten ships. He was the charioteer of Achilles, after whose death he served Pyrrhus in the same capacity. Homer. Il. 9, 16, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 477.

AUTOMËNES, one of the Heraclidæ, king of Corinth. At his death, B. C. 779, annual magistrates, called prytanes, were chosen at Corinth, and their power continued 90 years, till Cypselus and his son Periander made themselves absolute.

AUTONÖE, a daughter of Cadmus, who married Aristæus, by whom she had Actæon, often called Autoneius heros. The death of her son (vid. Actæon) was so painful to her, that she retired from Bœotia to Megara, where she soon after died. Paus. 1, c. 44.—Hygin. fab. 179.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 720.

[AUTRIGONES, a people of Hispania Tarraconensis, among the Cantabri. They occupied what is now the eastern half of La Montana, the western quarter of Biscay and Alava, and the north-eastern part of Burgos. Their capital was Flaviobriga, now Porto Gallele, near Bilboa. Mannert, however, makes it to be Santander.]

AUTŪRA, the Eure, a river of Gaul which falls into the Seine.

AUXESIA and DAMIA, two virgins who came from Crete to Trœzene, where the inhabitants stoned them to death in a sedition. The Epidaurians raised them statues by order of the oracle, when their country was become barren. They were held in great veneration at Trœzene. Herodot. 5, c. 32.—Paus. 2, c. 30.

AXENUS, the ancient name of the Euxine sea. The word signifies inhospitable, which was highly applicable to the manners of the ancient inhabitants of the coast. [It took the name of Euxinus after the coast was settled by Grecian colonies.] Ovid. 4. Trist. 4, v. 56.

AXIŌCHUS, a philosopher, to whom Plato dedicated a treatise concerning death.

AXION brother of Alpheſibœa, murdered Alcœmon, his sister's husband, because he wished to recover from her a golden necklace. vid. Alcœmon and Alpheſibœa.

AXIOTHĒA, a woman who regularly went in a man's dress to hear the lectures of Plato.

AXIUS, [the largest river in Macedonia, rising in the chain of Mount Scardius, and, after a course of 80 miles, forming an extensive lake near its mouth. It falls into the Sinus Thermaicus, and is now the Vardari.]

AXŌNA, a river of Belgic Gaul, which falls into the Seine below Paris; [now the Aisne.]

AXUR, a surname of Jupiter. [vid. Anxur.]

AZAN, a son of Arcas, king of Arcadia, by Erato, one of the Dryades. He divided his father's kingdom with his brothers Aphidas and Elatus, and called his share Azania. There was in Azania a fountain called Chitorius, whose waters gave a dislike for wine to those who drank them. Vitruv. 8, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 322.—Paus. 8, c. 4.—[A part of the coast of Ethiopia, on the Mare Erythræum: now the coast of Ajan.]

AZĪRIS, a place of Libya, surrounded on both sides by delightful hills covered with trees, and watered by a river, where Battus built a town, [previous to founding Cyrene.] Herodot. 4, c. 157.

AZŌTUS, [a celebrated sea-port of Phœnicia, north-east of Ascalon. It was fortified by the Egyptians as a barrier against the Assyrians, and, according to Herodotus, stood a siege of 29 years, about B. C. 631. It is now Ashdod.]

BABILUS, an astrologer in Nero's age, who told the emperor to avert the danger which seemed to hang upon his head from the appearance of an hairy comet, by putting all the leading men of Rome to death. His advice was faithfully followed. Sueton. in Ner. c. 36.

BABŪLON, a celebrated city, the capital of the Assyrian empire, on the banks of the Euphrates. It had 100 brazen gates; and its walls, which were cemented with bitumen, and greatly enlarged and embellished by the activity of Semiramis. [were in compass 60 miles or 480 stadia, in thickness 37 feet, in height 350 feet. They were built of bricks, and surrounded on the outside with a vast ditch. The whole number of streets was 50, the city being laid out in the form of a square, and from the 25 gates on each side of it, as many streets cutting each other at right angles. There were also four half streets, round the four sides of the city, next the walls, each of them 200 feet wide, the rest being about 150 feet. Each side of the square which formed the city was 15 miles. Babylon, however, was greater in appearance than reality, nearly one half of the city being taken up with gardens and cultivated grounds. It was founded, as some say, by Semiramis, and according to others, by Belus, who is thought by many to have been the same with Nimrod.] It was taken by Cyrus B. C.

538, after he had drained the waters of the Euphrates into a new channel, and marched his troops by night into the town through the dried bed; and it is said that the fate of the extensive capital was unknown to the inhabitants of the distant suburbs till late in the evening. [It is memorable for the death of Alexander the Great, April 21, B. C. 323.] Its greatness was so reduced in succeeding ages, according to Pliny's observations, that in his time it was but a desolate wilderness, and at present the place where it stood is unknown to travellers. The inhabitants were early acquainted with astrology. [A few vestiges of this famous city remain at a town called Hillah, or Elugo, about 47 miles south of Bagdad. The causes of the decline of Babylon may be seen under Seleucia.] Plin. 6, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, 2, 3.—Justin. 1, &c.—Diod. 2.—Xenoph. Cyrop. 7, &c.—Propert. 3, el. 11, v. 21.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 2.—Martial. 9, ep. 77.—There was also a city of the same name in Egypt, [north of Memphis, supposed to have been founded by the Persians during this invasion of Cambyses. A quarter, retaining the name of Baboul or Babilon, in the town of Old Cairo, marks its position.]

BABYLŌNĪA, a large province of Assyria, of which Babylon was the capital. The inhabitants shook off the Assyrian yoke, and afterwards became very powerful.—The surname of Seleucia, which rose from the ruins of Babylon, under the successors of Alexander. Plin. 6, c. 26.

BABYRSA, a fortified castle near Artaxata, [where were kept the treasures of Tigranes and Artabanus.] Strab. 11.

ΒΑΧΧÆ, the priestesses of Bacchus. Paus. 2, c. 7.

BACCHANALIA, festivals in honour of Bacchus at Rome, the same as the Dionysia of the Greeks. vid. Dionysia

BACCHANTES, priestesses of Bacchus, who are represented at the celebration of the orgies almost naked, with garlands of ivy, with a thyrsus and dishevelled hair. Their looks are wild, and they utter dreadful sounds, and clash different musical instruments together. They are also called Thyades and Mænades. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 592.—Horat. 3, od. 25.—Propert. 3, el. 21.—Lucan. 1, v. 674.

BACCHIADÆ, a Corinthian family descended from Bacchia, daughter of Dionysius. In their nocturnal orgies, they, as some report, tore to pieces Actæon, son of Melissus, which so enraged the father, that before the altar he entreated the Corinthians to revenge the death of his son, and immediately threw himself into the sea. Upon this the Bacchiadæ were banished, and went to settle in Sicily, between Pachynum and Pelorus. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 407.—Strab. 8.

BACCHIS or BALUS, king of Corinth, succeeded his father Prumnides. His successors were always called Bacchidæ, in remembrance of the equity and moderation of his reign. The Bacchidæ increased so much, that they chose one of their number to preside among them with regal authority, and it is said that the sovereign power continued in their hands near 200 years. Cypselus overturned this institution by making himself absolute. Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 4.—Herodot. 5, c. 92.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 407.

BACCHIUM, a small island in the Ægean sea, opposite [Phocæa, and near the entrance of the Smyrnæus Sinus.] Plin. 5, c. 3.

BACCHIUS and BITHUS, two celebrated gladiators of equal age and strength; [who, after conquering many competitors, engaged with each other and died of mutual wounds;] whence the proverb to express equality, Bithus contra Bacchium. Sueton. in Aug.—Horat. 1, Sat. 7, v. 20.

BACCHUS, was son of Jupiter and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. [vid. the end of this article.] After she had enjoyed the company of Jupiter, Semele was deceived, and perished by the artifice of Juno. This goddess, always jealous of her husband's amours, assumed the shape of Beroe, Semele's nurse, and persuaded Semele that the lover whom she entertained was not Jupiter, but a false lover, and that to prove his divinity she ought to beg of him, if he really were Jupiter, to come to her bed with the same majesty as he courted the embraces of Juno. The artifice succeeded, and when Jupiter promised his mistress whatever she asked, Semele required him to visit her with all the divinity of a god. Jupiter was unable to violate his oath, and Semele unwilling to retract it; therefore, as she was a mortal, and unable to bear the majesty of Jupiter, she was consumed and reduced to ashes. The child, of which she had been pregnant for seven months, was with difficulty saved from the flames, and put in his father's thigh, where he remained the full time he naturally was to have been in his mother's womb. From this circumstance Bacchus has been called Bimater. According to some, Dirce, a nymph of the Achelous, saved him from the flames. There are different traditions concerning the manner of his education. Ovid says, that after his birth, he was brought up by his aunt Ino, and afterwards intrusted to the care of the nymphs of Nysa. Lucian supposes that Mercury carried him, as soon as born, to the nymphs of Nysa; and Apollonius says, that he was carried by Mercury to a nymph in the island of Eubœa, whence he was driven by the power of Juno, who was the chief deity of the place. Some suppose, that Naxos can boast of the place of his education, under the nymphs Philia, Coronis, and Clyda. Pausanias relates a tradition which prevailed in the town of Brasia in Peloponnesus; and accordingly mentions, that Cadmus, as soon as he heard of his daughter's amours, shut her up, with her child lately born, in a coffer, and exposed them on the sea. The coffer was carried safe by the waves to the coast of Brasia; but Semele was found dead, and the child alive. Semele was honoured with a magnificent funeral, and Bacchus properly educated. This diversity of opinions shows that there were many of the same name. Diodorus speaks of three, and Cicero of a greater number; but among them all, the son of Jupiter and Semele seems to have obtained the merit of the rest. Bacchus is the Osiris of the Egyptians, and his history is drawn from the Egyptian traditions concerning that ancient king. Bacchus assisted the gods in their wars against the giants, and was cut to pieces; but the son of Semele was not then born; this tradition therefore is taken from the history of Osiris, who was killed by his brother Typhon, and the worship of Osiris has been introduced by Orpheus into Greece, under the name of Bacchus. In his youth he was taken asleep in the island of Naxos, and carried away by some mariners whom he changed into dolphins, except the pilot, who had expressed some concern at his misfortune. His expedition into the east is most celebrated. He marched at the head of an army, composed of men as well as of women, all inspired with divine fury, and armed with thyrsuses, cymbals, and other musical instruments. The leader was drawn in a chariot by a lion and a tiger, and was accompanied by Pan and Silenus, and all the satyrs. His conquests were easy and without bloodshed; the people easily submitted, and gratefully elevated, to the rank of a god the hero who taught them the use of the vine, the cultivation of the earth, and the manner of making honey. Amidst his benevolence to mankind, he was relentless in punishing all want of respect to his divinity; and the punishment he inflicted on Pentheus. Agave, Lycurgus, &c. is well known. He has received the names of Liber, Bromius, Lyæus, Evan, Thyonæus, Psilas, &c. which are partly derived from the places where he received adoration, or from the ceremonies observed in his festivals. As he was the god of vintage, of wine, and of drinkers, he is generally represented crowned with vine and ivy leaves, with a thyrsus in his hand. His figure is that of an effeminate young man, to denote the joys which commonly prevail at feasts; and sometimes that of an old man, to teach us that wine taken immoderately will enervate us, consume our health, render us loquacious and childish like old men, and unable to keep secrets. The panther is sacred to him, because he went in his expedition covered with the skin of that beast. The magpye is also his favourite bird, because in triumphs people were permitted to speak with boldness and liberty. Bacchus is sometimes represented like an infant, holding a thyrsus and clusters of grapes with a horn. He often appears naked, and riding upon the shoulders of Pan, or in the arms of Silenus, who was his foster-father. He also sits upon a celestial globe, bespangled with stars, and is then the same as the sun, or Osiris of Egypt. The festivals of Bacchus, generally called Orgies, Bacchanalia, or Dionysia, were introduced into Greece from Egypt by Danaus and his daughters. The infamous debaucheries which arose from the celebration of these festivals are well known. vid. Dionysia. The amours of Bacchus are not numerous. He married Ariadne, after she had been forsaken by Theseus in the island of Naxos; and by her he had many children, among whom were Cæranus, Thoas, Enopion, Tauropolis, &c. According to some, he was the father of Hymenæus, whom the Athenians made the god of marriage. The Egyptians sacrificed pigs to him before the doors of their houses. The fir-tree, the yew-tree, the fig-tree, the ivy, and the vine, were sacred to him; and the goat was generally sacrificed to him on account of the great propensity of that animal to destroy the vine. According to Pliny, he was the first who ever wore a crown. His beauty is compared to that of Apollo, and, like him, he is represented with fine hair loosely flowing down his shoulders, and he is said to possess eternal youth. Sometimes he has horns, either because he taught the cultivation of the earth with oxen, or because Jupiter, his father, appeared to him in the deserts of Libya under the shape of a ram, and supplied his thirsty army with water. Bacchus went down to hell to recover his mother, whom Jupiter willingly made a goddess, under the name of Thyone. The three persons of the name of Bacchus, which Diodorus mentions, are, the one who conquered the Indies, and is surnamed the bearded Bacchus; a son of Jupiter and Proserpine, who was represented with horns; and the son of Jupiter and Semele, called the Bacchus of Thebes. Those mentioned by Cicero are, a son of Proserpine: a son of Nisus, who built Nysa; a son of Caprius, who reigned in the Indies; a son of Jupiter and the moon; and a son of Thyone and Nisus. [The worship of Bacchus came originally from India. The very name Διονυσος, which the Greeks commonly give to this Deity, clearly proves the fact. Διονυσος means the god (Δις) from mount Nysa in India. Wine was selected as the symbol of this worship, inasmuch as the feelings of exhilaration produced by it were supposed to be a type of those pure and rapturous feelings which would be experienced by the faithful after death. The fable of the birth of Bacchus points also to an Eastern origin. Bacchus is the son of Jupiter (the Dis of the Eastern nations) and of Semele, daughter of Cadmus, (i. e. the Oriental.) When the Greeks fabled that Bacchus went on an expedition to Asia, they merely reversed the true order of events, making Bacchus one of their own pretended deities. *Philostratus in Vit. Apollon. BACCHYLIDES, a lyric poet of Cos, nephew to Simonides, who, like Pindar, wrote the praises of Hiero. Some of his verses have been preserved. [He is reckoned the last of the nine lyric poets of Greece. Horace is said to have imitated him in some of his pieces, particularly in the 15th Ode of the 1st Book. He flourished B. C. 452.]

BACĒNIS, a wood in Germany, [generally supposed to be a part of the Hercynia Silva, and to have been situate in the vicinity of the Fulda or Vol, which flows into the Visurgis.] Cæs. Bell. Gall. 6, c. 10.

BACIS, a famous soothsayer of Bœotia. Cic. 1, de Div. c. 34.

BACTRA (orum.) now Balk, the capital of Bactriana, on the river Bactrus in Asia. [It was called likewise Zariaspa, a name which Strabo also applies to the river on which it was situate.] Virg. G. 2, v. 138.—Strab. 2.

BACTRIA or BACTRIANA, [a country of Asia, bounded by Aria on the west, the mountains of Paropamisus on the south; the Emodi montes on the east; and Sogdiana on the north. It derived its name from the river Bactrus. The Bactrians were reckoned good soldiers, and were always at war either among themselves or their neighbours. They were enemies to every kind of luxury. Their old people they exposed after a certain age, to fierce mastiffs, which they kept for that purpose, and called sepulchral dogs.] They were conquered by Alexander the Great. Curt. 4, c. 6, &c. Plin. 6, c. 23.—Herodot. 1 and 3.

BACTRUS, [a river of Bactria, whence the country received its ancient name. It flowed by the capital, and is supposed to be the Dehash.] Lucan. 3, v. 267.

BACUNTIUS, a river of Pannonia, which falls into the Save, [in the immediate vicinity of Sirmium. It is now the Bosut.]

BADUHENNÆ, [Lucus.] a place in the country of the Frisii, where 900 Romans were killed. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 73.

BÆBIA LEX was enacted for the election of 4 prætors every other year. Liv. 40.—Another law by M. Bæbius a tribune of the people, which forbade the division of the lands, whilst it substituted a yearly tax to be paid by the possessors, and to be divided among the people. Appian. 1.

[BÆTICA, vid. Hispania.]

BÆTIS, a river of Spain, from which a part of the country has received the name of Bætica. [Its sources were surrounded by the chain of Mons Orospea. At its mouth was the island of Tartessus, the name of which was anciently also applied to the river, previous to that of Bætis. The inhabitants of the country called this river Cirtium and Certis, and the Arabians Ciritus, derived, as is supposed, from the oriental term Kiriath, a town, and denoting the river of towns, from the great number of those which it watered. Its modern name, Guadalquivir, is a corruption from the Moorish Wadi-al-Kibir, or the Great River.]

[BAGISTANA, a town of Media, south-west of Ecbatana, at the foot of the mountains where the Gyndes rises. Here was an ancient monument supposed to be that of Semiramis.]

BAGŌAS and BAGŌSAS, an Egyptian eunuch in the court of Artaxerxes Ochus, so powerful that nothing could be done without his consent. He led some troops against the Jews, and profaned their temple. He poisoned Ochus, gave his flesh to cats, and made knife-handles with his bones, because he had killed the god Apis. He placed on the throne Arses, the youngest of the slaughtered prince's children, and afterwards put him to death. He was at last killed, B. C. 335, by Darius [Codomanus,] whom, after raising to the crown, he had attempted to poison. Diod. 16 and 17.—Another, greatly esteemed by Alexander. Curt. 10, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex.

—The name of Bagoas occurs very frequently in the Persian history: and it seems that most of the eunuchs of the monarchs of Persia were generally known by that appellation.

BAGRĀDA, now Megerda, a river of Africa

[flowing between Utica and Carthago, in former days, though, at present, their situation as regards it is materially altered. It makes encroachments on the sea like the Nile, and hence its ancient mouth is now circumscribed by mud, and become a large navigable pond. vid. Carthago and Utica.] Plin. 8, c. 14.

BAIÆ, [a city of Campania, on a small bay west of Neapolis, and opposite Puteoli. It was originally a village, but the numerous advantages of its situation soon rendered it much frequented and famous. Its foundation is ascribed in mythology to Baius, one of the companions of Ulysses. The cause of the rapid increase of Baiæ lay in the fruitfulness of the surrounding country, in the beauty of its own situation, in the rich supply of shell and other fish which the adjacent waters afforded; and above all, in the hot mineral-springs which flowed from the neighbouring mountains and formed a chief source of attraction to invalids. Baiæ was first called Aquæ Cumanæ. Numerous villas graced the surrounding country, and many were likewise built on artificial moles extending a great distance into the sea. It is now, owing to earthquakes and inundations of the sea, a mere waste compared with what it once was. The modern name is Baia. Many remains of ancient villas may be seen under the water.] Martial. 14, ep. 81.—Horat. 1, ep. 1.—Strab. 5.

BALANEA, [a town of Syria, north of Aradus, now Belnias.] Plin. 5, c. 20.

C. BALBILLUS, a learned and benevolent man, governor of Egypt, of which he wrote the history, under Nero. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 22.

BALBINUS, a Roman, who, after governing provinces with credit and honour, assassinated the Gordians, and seized the purple. He was some time after murdered by his soldiers, A. D. 238.

BALBUS, a mountain of Africa, [between the town of Clupea and the sea,] famous for the retreat of Masinissa, after he had fought a battle against Syphax.

BALÆARES, [a name applied anciently to the islands of Majorca and Minorca, off the coast of Spain.] The word is derived from βαλεειν to throw, because the inhabitants were expert archers and slingers. We are told by Florus, that the mothers never gave their children breakfast until they had struck with an arrow a certain mark in a tree. [The Greeks called them Gymnesiæ, either because, according to Diodorus, the inhabitants were γυμνοί, naked, in summer, or because, according to Hesychius, they went to battle armed only with a sling. They were reduced by Metellus, hence surnamed Balearicus, A. U. C. 631. By many, Ebusus, now Ivica, is ranked with the Balears, according to the authority of Vitruvius. The larger of these islands was called Balearis Major, hence Majorca, and the smaller, Balearis Minor, hence Minorca. In the former was Palma, which still retains the name. In the latter was Portus Magonis, so called by the Carthaginians from Mago, one of their generals, now slightly corrupted into Port Mahon.] Strab. 14. — Flor. 3, c. 8. — Diod. 5.

BALNEÆ (balns;) were very numerous at Rome, private as well as public. In the ancient times simplicity was observed, but in the age of the emperors they became expensive; they were used after walking, exercise, or labour, and were deemed more necessary than luxurious. Under the emperors it became so fashionable to bathe, that without this the meanest of the people seemed to be deprived of one of the necessaries of life. There were certain hours of the day appointed for bathing, and a small piece of money admitted the poorest as well as the most opulent. In the baths there were separate apartments for the people to dress and to undress; and after they had bathed, they commonly covered themselves, and the hair was plucked out of the skin, and the body rubbed over with a pumice stone, and perfumed to render it smooth and fair. The Roman emperors generally built baths, and all endeavoured to eclipse each other in the magnificence of the building. It is said, that Dioclesian employed 40,000 [christian slaves] in building his baths, and when they were finished, destroyed the workmen. Alexander Severus first permitted the people to use them in the night, and he himself often bathed with the common people. For some time both sexes bathed promiscuously and without shame, and the edicts of the emperors proved abortive for a while in abolishing that indecent custom, which gradually destroyed the morals of the people. They generally read in bathing, and we find many compositions written in the midst of this luxurious enjoyment.

BANTIA, now St. Marie de Vanse, a town of Apulia, [south-east of Venusia.] Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 15.

BAPTE, the priests of Cotytto, the goddess of lasciviousness and debauchery at Athens. Her festivals were celebrated in the night with great obscenity. The name is derived from βαπτω to wash, because the priests bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner. Juv. 2, v. 91. — A comedy of Eupolis, in which women are introduced dancing on the stage, with all the indecent gestures of common prostitutes.

BARATHRUM, a deep and noisome pit at Athens, where criminals were thrown. [It had sharp spikes at the top to prevent escape, and others at the bottom to pierce and lacerate the offender.] — The word is applied to the infernal regions by Val. Flacc. 2, v. 86 and 192. [By the Greek writers it is also used to signify perdition, endless or hopeless misery, and likewise a wicked wretch who merits the punishment of the barathrum.]

BARBARI, a name originally applied to those who spoke inelegantly, or with harshness and difficulty. The Greeks generally called all nations, except their own, [and the Egyptians,] by the name of barbarians. [The term is derived by Damm from βαζυρ, but with the g inserted, and the initial consonant repeated, in order to express to the ear the harsh pronunciation of a foreigner. Others derive it from the harsh sound βας βας. We are informed by Drusius, that the Syriac bar means, without, extra. The word signified in general with the Greeks no more than foreigner, and did not carry that odium with it which it does now.]

BARBĀRIA, [the name given in the Periplus of the Erythræan Sea, to a part of the coast of Africa; now Ajan. It was otherwise called Azania.]

BARBOSTHĒNES, a mountain of Peloponnesus, 19 miles from Sparta. Liv. 35, c. 27.

BARCÆI, or BARCITÆ, a warlike nation of Africa, near Carthage. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 43.

BARCE, the nurse of Sichæus. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 652. — [A city of Cyrene in Africa. Its true position is involved in a great deal of doubt. According to Strabo and Pliny, it stood on the spot where Ptolemais was afterwards built, but Scylax and Ptolemy are of a different opinion. D'Anville places it south of Ptolemais. The city probably stood inland, and had a port on the coast. D'Anville makes it to be the modern Barca. According to Herodotus, it was founded by the brothers of Arcesilaus 3d, king of Cyrene. The name however shows it to be of Phœnician origin.]

BARCHA, a surname of a noble family at Carthage, of which Annibal and Hamilcar were descended. By means of their bribes and influence, they excited a great faction, which is celebrated in the annals of Carthage by the name of the Barchinian faction, and at last raised themselves to power, and to the independent disposal of all the offices of trust or emolument in the state. Liv. 21, c. 2 and 9.

BARDI, a celebrated sacerdotal order among the ancient Gauls, who praised their heroes, and published their fame in their verses or on musical instruments. They were so esteemed and respected by the people, that, at their sight, two armies who were engaged in battle laid down their arms, and submitted to their orders. They censured as well as commended the behaviour of the people. Lucan. 1, v. 447. — Strab. 4. — Marcell. 15, c. 24.

BARGUSII, a people of Spain, [towards the Pyrenees, above the Iberus.] Liv. 21, c. 19.

BARIUM, a town of Apulia, on the Adriatic, [in the district of Peucetia.] now called Bari, and remarkable for its fine fish. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 97.

BARSIENE and BARSĒNE, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander, by whom she had a son called Hercules. Cassander ordered her and her child to be put to death. Justin. 13, c. 2, l. 15, c. 2. — Arrian.

BASILIA, [an island famous for its amber, in the northern ocean. It is supposed by Mannert to have been the southern extremity of Sweden, mistaken by the ancients for an island, on account of their ignorance of the country to the north. vid. Abalus.—A city on the Rhenus, in the territory of the Rauraci, now Basle. It appears to have been originally an insignificant fortress, and to have increased in the course of time to a large city. By the writers of the middle ages it is called Basula.]

BASILIDÆ, European Sarmatians, descended from Hercules and Echidna. Mela, 2, c. 1.

BASILIDES, the father of Herodotus, who with others, attempted to destroy Strattes, tyrant of Chios. Herodot. 8, c. 132.—A family who held an oligarchical power at Erythræ. Strab. 14.—A priest of mount Carmel, who foretold many momentous events to Vespasian, when he offered sacrifices. Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 87.—Sueton. in Vesp. 7.

BASILIPŌTĀMOS, the ancient name of the Eurotas, [signifying, the king of rivers. The Eurotas is now called the Vasilipotamo.] Strab. 6.

BASILIS, a city of Arcadia, built by Cypselus, near the river Alpheus. Paus. 8, c. 29.

BASILIUS, a celebrated bishop of Africa, [born in Cappadocia in Asia Minor,] very animated against the Arians, whose tenets and doctrines he refuted with warmth, but great ability. He was eloquent as well as ingenious, and possessed of all those qualities which constitute the persuasive orator and the elegant writer. Erasmus has placed him in the number of the greatest orators of antiquity. He died in his 51st year, A. D. 379. The latest edition of his works is that of the Benedictines, [3 vols. folio, Paris, 1721-30.—Another, a bishop of Ancyra, ranked by Epiphanius among the chief of the Semi-Arians. He died at the end of Iovian's reign.]

BASSAREUS, a surname of Bacchus, from the dress or long robe, called Bassaris, which his priests wore. Horat. 1, od. 18.

BASSARIDES, a name given to the votaries of Bacchus, and to Agave by Persius, which seems derived from Bassara, a town of Libya sacred to the god, or from a particular dress worn by his priestesses, and so called by the Thracians. Persius. 1, v. 101.

BASSUS AUFIDIUS, an historian in the age of Augustus, who wrote on the Germanic war. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Cæsius, a lyric poet in Nero's age, to whom Persius addressed his 6th satire. Some of his verses are extant.—Julius, an orator in the reign of Augustus, some of whose orations have been preserved by Seneca.

BASTARNÆ, [a people who first inhabited that part of European Sarmatia, which corresponds with a part of Poland and Prussia, and who afterwards established themselves in the south, to the left and right of the Tyras. They are supposed to have been the ancestors of the Russians.]

BATĀVI, a people of Germany, who inhabited that part of the continent known under the modern name of [the United Provinces, or Holland from its being the largest of them. But the modern is considerably larger than the ancient country.] It was called by the ancients Batavorum insula. Liv. 4, c. 15.—Lucan. 1, v. 431.

BATHOS, [a town of Arcadia, near the Alpheus.]

BATHYCLES, a celebrated artist of Magnesia. Paus. 3, c. 19.

BATHYLLUS, a youth of Samos. Horat. ep. 14, v. 9.—The poet who claimed as his own, Virgil's distich, Nocte phuit totâ, &c. bore also the same name.—A fountain of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 31.

BATON, of Sinope, wrote commentaries on the Persian affairs. Strab. 12.

BATRACHOMYOMACHIA, a poem describing a fight between frogs and mice, written by Homer, which has been printed sometimes separately from the Iliad and Odyssey. [Whether Homer wrote this poem, or not, is far from being a settled point among modern critics. The best editions of it are that by Ernesti, in the works of Homer, 5 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1759, reprinted at Glasgow, 1814; and that of Matthiæ, Lips. 1805, in 8vo. There is also the edition of Maittaire, 8vo. Lond. 1721.]

BATTIADÆS, a patronymic of Callimachus, from his father Battus. Ovid. in Ibin. v. 53, —A name given to the people of Cyrene from king Battus. Ital. 3, v. 253.

BATTUS 1st, a Lacedæmonian who built the town of Cyrene B. C. 630, with a colony from the island of Thera. He was son of Polymæstus and Phronime, and reigned in the town he had founded, and after death received divine honours. The difficulty with which he spoke first procured him the name of Battus, Herodot. 4, c. 155, &c.—Paus. 10, c. 15.—The 2d of that name was grandson to Battus 1st, by Arcesilaus. He succeeded his father on the throne of Cyrene, and was surnamed Felix, and died 554 B. C. Herodot. 4, c. 159, &c.—A shepherd of Pylus, who promised Mercury that he would not discover his having stolen the flocks of Admetus which Apollo tended. He violated his promise and was turned into a pumice stone. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 702.

BAUBO, a woman who received Ceres when she sought her daughter all over the world, and gave her some water to quench her thirst. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 7.

BAUCIS, an old woman of Phrygia, who with her husband Philemon, lived in a small cottage, in a peaurious manner, when Jupiter and Mercury travelled in disguise over Asia. The gods came to the cottage, where they received the best things it afforded; and Jupiter was so pleased with their hospitality, that he metamorphosed their dwelling into a magnificent temple of which Baucis and her husband were made priests. After they had lived happy to an extreme old age, they died both at the same hour, according to their request to Jupiter, that one might not have the sorrow of following the other to the grave. Their bodies were changed into trees before the doors of the temple. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 631, &c.

BAVIUS and MÆVIUS, two stupid and malevolent poets in the age of Augustus, who attacked the superior talents of the contemporary writers. Virg. Ecl. 3.

BEBRÛCE, a daughter of Danaus, who is said to have spared her husband. Most authors, however, attribute that character of humanity to Hypermnestra. vid. Danaides.

BEBRÛCES and BEBRÛCII, a nation of Asia, near Pontus, of Thracian origin, and according to Arrian, descended from BebrÛce. [The origin of this people is very uncertain. Silius Italicus, (3, v. 420,) mentions a nation of this name who dwelt in Gallia Narbonensis, near the Pyrenees.] They were expert in the battle of the Cestus. The Argonauts touched on their coast in their expedition to Colchis. Apollod. 1.—Strab. 7 and 12.

BEBRÛCIA, an ancient name of Bithynia, from [the BebrÛces who settled there, after passing from Europe.] Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 373.

[BEDRIACUM, a small town of Italy, between Mantua and Cremona; according to Cluvier, the modern Caneto, a large village on the left of the Oglio. D'Anville, however, makes it to correspond with the modern Cividalà, on the right side of that river. Maunert places it about a mile west of the modern town of Bozzolo. This place was famous for two battles fought within a month of each other. In the first Otho was defeated by the generals of Vitellius, and in the second, Vitellius by Vespasian, A. D. 69. Tacitus and Suetonius call the name of this place Betriacum. But Pliny, Juvenal, and later writers, Bebriacum.]

BELËNUS, a divinity of the Gauls, the same as the Apollo of the Greeks, and the Orus of the Egyptians.

BELËPHANTES, a Chaldean, who, from his knowledge of astronomy, told Alexander that his entering Babylon would be attended with fatal consequences to him. Diod. 17.

BELËSIS, a priest of Babylon, who told Arbaces, governor of Media, that he should reign one day in the place of Sardanapalus. His prophecy was verified, and he was rewarded by the new king with the government of Babylon B. C. 326. Diod. 2.

BELGÆ, a warlike people of ancient Gaul, separated from the Celtæ by the rivers Matrona and Sequana [In the new division of Gallia made by Augustus, whose object was to render the provinces more equal in extent, the countries of the Helvetii and Sequani, which till that time were included in Gallia Celtica, were added to Gallia Belgica. The Belgæ were of German extraction, and according to Cæsar, the most warlike of the Gauls.] Cæs. de Bell. Gall. 1 and 2.

BELGICA, one of the provinces of Gaul near the Rhine. [vid. Gallia.]

BELGIUM, [a canton of Gallia Belgica, from which it is distinguished by Cæsar, (B. G. 5, c. 24.) as a part from the whole, and to which he assigns the Bellovaci, to whom Hirtius adds the Atrebatæ. As the Ambiani were situated between the other two, they must also be included. These three tribes were the genuine Belgæ.] Cæs. Bell. Gall. 5, c. 2.

BELIDES, a name applied to Palamedes, as descended from Belus. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 82.

BELISARIUS, a celebrated general, who, in a degenerate and an effeminate age, in the reign of Justinian emperor of Constantinople, renewed all the glorious victories, battles, and triumphs, which had rendered the first Romans so distinguished in the time of their republic. He died, after a life of military glory, and the trial of royal ingratitude, in the 565th year of the christian era. [The story of his begging charity, with dare obolum Belisario is a mere fable, taking its rise from some verses of Tzetzes.]

BELLEROPHON, son of Glaucus king of Ephyræ, by Eurymede, was at first called Hipponus. The murder of his brother, whom some call Alcimenus and others Beller, procured him the name of Bellerophon or murderer of Beller. After this murder, Bellerophon fled to the court of Prætus king of Argos. As he was of a handsome appearance, the king's wife, called Antæa or Stenobœa, fell in love with him; and as he slighted her passion, she accused him before her husband of attempts upon her virtue. Prætus, unwilling to violate the laws of hospitality, by punishing Bellerophon, sent him away to his father-in-law Jobates king of Lycia, and gave him a letter, in which he begged the king to punish with death a man who had so dishonourably treated his daughter. [vid. Pelasgi.] From that circumstance, all letters which are of an unfavourable tendency to the bearer have been called letters of Bellerophon. Jobates, to satisfy his son-in-law, sent Bellerophon to conquer a horrible monster called Chimæra, in which dangerous expedition he hoped, and was even assured, he must perish. (vid. Chimæra.) But the providence of Minerva supported him, and, with the aid of the winged horse Pegasus, he conquered the monster and returned victorious. After this Jobates sent him against the Solymi, in hopes of seeing him destroyed; but he obtained another victory, and conquered afterwards the Amazons, by the king's orders. At his return from this third expedition, he was attacked by a party sent against him by Jobates; but he destroyed all his assassins, and convinced the king that innocence is always protected by the gods. Upon this, Jobates no longer sought to destroy his life; but he gave him his daughter in marriage, and made him his successor on the throne of Lycia, as he was without male issue. Some authors have supported that he attempted to fly to heaven upon the horse Pegasus, but that Jupiter sent an insect, which stung the horse, and threw down the rider, who wandered upon the earth in the greatest melancholy and dejection till the day of his death, one generation before the Trojan war. Bellerophon had two sons, Isander, who was killed in his war against the Solymi, and Hippolochus, who succeeded to the throne after his death, besides one daughter called Hippodamia, who had Sarpedon by Jupiter. The wife of Bellerophon is called Philonoe by Apollodorus, and Achemone by Homer. Homer. Il. 6, 156, &c.—Juv. 10.—Apollod. 2, c. 3, l. 3, c. 1.—Hygin. fab 157 and 243. P. A, 2, c. 18.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 325.—Horat. 4, od. 11, v. 26.—Paus. 9, c. 31.

BELLERUS and BELLER, a brother of Hipponus. vid. Bellerophon.

BELLŌNA, the goddess of war, daughter to Phorcys and Ceto, was called by the Greeks Enyo, and often confounded with Minerva. She was anciently called Duellona, and was the sister of Mars, or, according to others, his daughter or his wife. She prepared the chariot of Mars when he was going to war; and she appeared in battles armed with a whip, to animate the combatants, with dishevelled hair, and a torch in her hand. The Romans paid great adoration to her; but she was held in the greatest veneration by the Cappadocians, and chiefly at Comana, where she had above 3000 priests. Her temple at Rome was [without the city,] near the Porta Carmentalis. In it the senators gave audience to foreign ambassadors, and to generals returned from war. The priests of this goddess consecrated themselves by great incisions in their body, and particularly in the thigh, of which they received the blood in their hands to offer as a sacrifice to the goddess. In their wild enthusiasm they often predicted bloodshed and wars, the defeat of enemies, or the besieging of towns. Juv. 4, v. 124.—Varro. de L. L. 5.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 270.—Paus. 4, c. 30.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 703.—Stat. Theb. 2, v. 718, l. 7, v. 73.—Ital. 5, v. 221.

BELLŌNARI, the priests of Bellona.

BELLOVĀCI, a people of Gaul conquered by J. Cæsar. They inhabited the modern Beauvais. Cæs. Bell. 2, c. 4.

BELLOVĒSUS, a prince of the Celtæ, who, in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, was sent at the head of a colony to Italy by his uncle Ambigatus. Liv. 5, c. 34.

BELON, a city of Hispania Bætica, [the usual place of embarkation for Tingis in Africa. The modern name Balonia marks the spot, though now uninhabited. The name is sometimes written Bælon.] Strab. 3.

BELUS, one of the most ancient kings of Babylon, about 1800 years before the age of Semiramis, was made a god after death, and worshipped with much ceremony by the Assyrians and Babylonians. He was supposed to be the son of the Osiris of the Egyptians. The temple of Belus was the most ancient and most magnificent in the world. It was originally the tower of Babel, which was converted into a temple. It had lofty towers, and it was enriched by all the succeeding monarchs till the age of Xerxes, who, after his unfortunate expedition against Greece, plundered and demolished it. Among the riches it contained were many statues of massy gold, one of which was 40 feet high. In the highest of the towers was a magnificent bed, where the priests daily conducted a woman, who, as they said, was honoured with the company of the god. Joseph. Ant. Jud. 10.—Herodot. 1, c. 181, &c.—Strab. 16.—Arrian. 7.—Diod. 1, &c.—A king of Egypt, son of Epaphus and Lybia, and father of Agenor.—Another son of Phœnix the son of Agenor, who reigned in Phœnicia.—A river of Syria, where glass was first invented. Plin. 5, c. 19.

BENĀCUS, a lake of Italy, now Lago di Garda, from which the Wincius flows into the Po. [It is about 30 miles in length by 8 in breadth. The modern name is derived from the small city of Garda, on the north-east shore of the lake.] Virg. G. 2, v. 160. Æn. 10, v. 205.

BENDIS, a name of Diana among the Thracians and their northern neighbours. Strab. 9.—Her festivals, called Bendidia, were introduced from Thrace into Athens.

BENEVENTUM, a town of the Hirpini, built by Diomedes, 28 miles from Capua. Its original name was Maleventum, changed into the more auspicious word Beneventum, when the Romans sent a colony to it after the conquest of Samnium. [The Samnites had given it the name of Maleventum on account of its unhealthy atmosphere. The situation of this city was a very important one, since here the main roads intersected each other, from Latium into southern Italy, and from Samnium into Campania. Augustus sent new colonists to this quarter, and the whole colony took the name of Julia Concordia. Under the Lombards, Beneventum became the capital of a powerful dukedom. It abounds in remains of ancient sculpture above any other town in Italy. The most beautiful relic of former days at this place is the arch of Trajan, which forms one of the entrances into the city. Near Beneventum, Pyrrhus was defeated by Curius Dentatus, A. U. C. 479. It is now Benevento.] Plin. 3, c. 11.

BERĒA. [vid. Berœa.]

BERECYNTHIA, a surname of Cybele, from mount Bercynthia in Phrygia, where she was particularly worshipped. She has been celebrated in a poem by Catullus. Diod. 5.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 782.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 82.

BERENICE and BERONICE, a woman famous for her beauty, mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus by Lagus. Æthan. V. H. 14, c. 43.—Theocrit.—Paus. 1, c. 7.—A daughter of Philadelphus, who married Antiochus king of Syria, after he had divorced Laodice, his former wife. After the death of Philadelphus, Laodice was recalled, and mindful of the treatment she had received, she poisoned her husband, placed her son on the vacant throne, and murdered Berenice and her child at Antioch, where she had fled, B. C. 248.—

A daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who usurped her father's throne for some time, strangled her husband Seleucus, and married Archelaus a priest of Bellona. Her father regained his power, and put her to death, B. C. 35.—The wife of Mithridates, who, when conquered by Lucullus, ordered all his wives to destroy themselves, for fear the conqueror should offer violence to them. She accordingly drank poison, but this not operating soon enough, she was strangled by an eunuch.—The mother of Agrippa, who shines in the history of the Jews as daughter-in-law of Herod the Great.—A daughter of Agrippa who married her uncle Herod, and afterwards Polemon king of Cilicia. She was suspected of committing incest with her brother Agrippa, [to which Juvenal alludes, 6, v. 155.] It is said that she was passionately loved by Titus, who would have made her empress but for fear of the people.—A wife of king Attalus.—Another, daughter of Philadelphus and Arsinoë, who married her own brother Evergetes, whom she loved with much tenderness. When he went on a dangerous expedition she vowed all the hair of her head to the goddess Venus if he returned. Some time after his victorious return, the locks which [had been consecrated in the temple which Ptolemy had built in honour of Arsinoë, under the name of the Zephyrian Venus, on the promontory of Zephyrium in Cyprus, were lost through the carelessness of the priests,] and Conon, an astronomer, to make his court to the queen, publicly reported that Jupiter had carried them away, and had made them a constellation, [still called Coma Berenices,] She was put to death by her son, B. C. 221. Catull. 67.—Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 24.—Justin. 6, c. 3. This name is common to many of the queens and princesses in the Ptolemean family in Egypt.—A city of Libya. Strab.—Mela, 3, c. 8.—Two towns of Arabia. Strab. 16.—One in Egypt, on the Red Sea, where the ships from India generally landed their cargoes, [and from which a road was made across the intervening desert to Coptos on the Nile, by Ptolemy Philadelphus, 258 miles in length.] Plin. 6, c. 23.—Another in Cyrenaica, near the mouth of the river Lathorn, where it empties into the greater Syrtis. [It was anciently called Hesperis, and near it the ancients located the gardens of the Hesperides. It is now Ben-gazl or Bernic.] Id. 17.

BERGION and ALBION, two giants, sons of Neptune, who opposed Hercules as he attempted to cross the Rhone, and were killed with stones from heaven. Mela, 2, c. 5.

BERŒE, an old woman of Epidaurus, nurse to Semele. Juno assumed her shape when she persuaded Semele not to grant her favours to Jupiter, if he did not appear in the majesty of a god. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 278.—The wife of Doryclus, whose form was assumed by Iris at the instigation of Juno, when she advised the Trojan women to burn the fleet of Æneas in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 620.

BERŒA or BERRHŒA, [a large and populous city of Macedonia, south of Ædessa. The inhabitants are commended by St. Paul for their docility and ingenuous dispositions. (Acts 17, v. 10.)—A town of Syria, south-east of Antiochia. Its Syriac name was Chalep, changed by the Macedonians to Bercea. It is supposed to be the same with the modern Aleppo.]

BERŒSUS, a native of Babylon, priest to Belus. He passed into Greece, and remained a long time at Athens. He composed an history of Chaldea, and signalized himself by his astronomical predictions, and was rewarded for his learning with a statue in the gymnasium at Athens. The age in which he lived is not precisely known, though some fix it in the reign of Alexander, or 268 years B. C. Some fragments of his Chaldean history are preserved by Josephus, contra Appian. & in Antiq. Jud. 105. The book that is now extant under his name, and speaks of kings that never existed, is a superstitious fabrication.

BERÝTUS, an ancient town of Phœnicia, on the coast of the Mediterranean, [about 24 miles south of Byblus, famous in the age of Justinian for the study of law, and styled by the emperor, "the mother and nurse of the laws." The civil law was taught there in Greek, as it was at Rome in Latin. The modern name is Bairout.] Plin. 5, c. 20.

BESIPPO, a town of Hispania Bætica, [east of Junonis Promontorium,] where Mela was born. [It is now Bejer.] Mela, 2, c. 6.

BESSI, a people of Thrace, [occupying a district called Bessica, between Mons Rhodope and the northern part of the Hebrus. They were the most savage and inhuman of all the Thracians.] Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 1, v. 67.—Herodot. 7, c. 111.

BESSUS, a governor of Bactriana, who, after the battle of Arbela, seized Darius his sovereign, and put him to death. After this murder, he assumed the title of king, and was some time after brought before Alexander, who gave him to Oxartes, the brother of Darius. The prince ordered his hands and ears to be cut off, and his body exposed on a cross, and shot at by the soldiers. Justin. 12, c. 5.—Curt. 6 and 7.—[Plutarch states that Alexander himself punished the offender in the following manner: he caused two straight trees to be bent, and one of his legs to be made fast to each; then suffering the trees to return to their former posture, his body was torn asunder by the violence of the recoil.—Arrian makes Alexander to have caused his nostrils to be slit, the tips of his ears to be cut off, and the offender after this to have been sent to Ecbatana and put to death in the sight of all the inhabitants of the capital of Media. Plut. in Vit. Alex.—Arrian. Exp. Alex. 4, 7.]—A parricide, who discovered the murder he had committed, upon destroying a nest of swallows which, as he observed, reproached him of his crime. Plut.

BIÂNOR, a son of Tiberius and Manto the daughter of Tiresias, who received the surname of Ocnus, and reigned over Etruria. He built a town which he called Mantua, after his mother's name. His tomb was seen in the age of Virgil on the road between Mantua and Andes. Virg. Ecl. 9, v. 60.

BIAS, son of Amythaon and Idomeneus, was king of Argos, and brother to the famous soothsayer Melampus. He fell in love with Perone, daughter of Neleus king of Pylos; but the father refused to give his daughter in marriage before he received the oxen of Iphiclus. Melampus, at his brother's request, went to seize the oxen, but was caught in the fact. He, however, one year after received his liberty from Iphiclus, who presented him with his oxen as a reward for his great services. Bias received the oxen from his brother, and obliged Neleus to give him his daughter in marriage. Homer. Od. 11.—Paus. 2, c. 6 and 18, l. 4, c. 34.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—One of the seven wise men of Greece, son to Teutamidas, born at Priene, which he long saved from ruin. He flourished B. C. 566, and died in the arms of his grandson [as he was pleading a cause in behalf of a friend.] Diog. 1.—Plut. in Symp.—Val. Max. 7, c. 2.—Paus. 10, c. 24.

BIBACULUS, (M. Furius) a Latin poet in the age of Cicero. He composed annals in iambic verse, and wrote epigrams full of wit and humour, and other poems now lost. Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 41.—Quintil. 10.—A preceptor, &c. Val. Max. 1, c. 1.

BIBLIS, a woman who became enamoured of her brother Caunus, and was changed into a fountain near Miletus. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 662.

BIBRACTE, a large town of the Ædui in Gaul, [upon the Arroux, one of the branches of the Ligeris or Loire. It was afterwards called Augustodunum, and is now Autun.] Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 55, &c.

BIBULUS, a son of M. Calpurnius Bibulus by Portia, Cato's daughter. He was Cæsar's colleague in the consulship, but of no consequence in the state, according to this distich mentioned by Seuton. in Jul. c. 20.

Non Bibulo quicquam nuper, sed Cæsare factum est :

Nam Bibulo fieri consule nil memini.—One of the friends of Horace bore that name. 1 Sat. 10, v. 86.

BICORNIGER, a name of Bacchus, [who is sometimes represented with horns, as symbols of the rays of the sun, or of the virtue which he imparts to wine.]

BICORNIS, the name of Alexander among the Arabians, [either expressive of his having added the eastern to the western empire, or in allusion to his medals, on which he is sometimes represented with horns, under the pretence that he was the son of Ammon.]

BIFORMIS, (two forms), a surname of Bacchus, who received it because he changed himself into an old woman to fly from the persecution of Juno, or perhaps because he was represented sometimes as a young and sometimes as an old man.

BIFRONS, a surname of Janus, because he was represented with two faces among the Romans, as acquainted with the past and future. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 180.

BILBILIS, a town of Celtiberia, where Martialis was born. [Now Bambola.] Mart. 1, ep. 50.—A river of Spain, [whose waters were famous for tempering iron; now the Salò or Xalon. The town of Bilbilis was situated upon it. It flowed into the Iberus.] Justin. 44, c. 3.

BIMĀTER, a surname of Bacchus, which signifies that he had two mothers, because when he was taken from his mother's womb he was placed in the thigh of his father Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 12.

BINGIUM, a town [of Gaul, in Germania Prima, west of Moguntiacum. It lay upon the Rhine, and is now Bingen.] Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 70.

BION, a philosopher and sophist of Borysthenes in Scythia, who rendered himself famous for his knowledge of poetry, music, and philosophy. He made every body the object of his satire, and rendered his compositions distinguished for clearness of expression, for facetiousness, wit, and pleasantry. He died 241 B. C. Diog. in vita.—A Greek poet of Smyrna, who wrote pastorals in an elegant style. Moschus, his friend and disciple, mentions in an elegiac poem, that he died by poison, about 300 years B. C. His Idyllia are written with elegance and simplicity, purity, and ease, and they abound with correct images, such as the view of the country may inspire. There are many good editions of this poet's works, generally printed with those of Moschus, [the best of which is that of Valckenaer, L. Bat. 1810, 8vo. printed at Oxford in 1816, with additional notes by Gaisford, in the Poetae Minores Græci.—A native of Borysthenes, who flourished in the reign of Antigonus Gonatas. He was of mean extraction, and when young, sold as a slave to an orator, who afterwards freed him and gave him large possessions. He studied philosophy at Athens under Crates, but maintained and followed the opinions of Theodorus, called the Atheist. He was skilled in geometry and music, and also in poetry and rhetoric, and was famous for his repartees. Hence Bionis sermones in Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 60.]

BISALTÆ, a people of [Macedonia, above Amphipolis and the coast of the Sinus Strymonicus.]

BISALTIS, a patronymic of Theophane, by whom Neptune, under the form of a ram, had the golden ram. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 117.—Hyg. fab. 188.

BISANTHE, a town on the [Propontis, north-west of Perinthus. It was called also Rædestus, and is now Rodosto.]—Herodot. 7, c. 137.

BISTON, son of Mars and Callirhoe, built Bistoria in Thrace, whence the Thracians are often called Bistones. Herodot. 7, c. 110.—Plin. 4, c. 14.—Lucan. 7, v. 569.

BISTŌNIS, a lake of Thrace, north-east of Abdera. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

BITHUS. vid. Bacchus.

BITHŪNIA, a country of Asia Minor, formerly called Bebrycia. It was bounded by the Euxine on the north, on the south by Phrygia and Galatia, on the west by the Propontis and Mysia, and on the east by Paphlagonia. [It was a well watered and very fruitful country, and was anciently inhabited by various nations, differing in manners, customs, and language. The Bithyni, from Thrace, gave it the name of Bithynia.] Strab. 12.—Herodot. 7, c. 75.—Mela, 1 and 2.

BITON. vid. Cleobis.

BITÜRIGES, a people of Gaul, divided from the Ædui by the Ligeris. [Their capital was Avaricum.] Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 21.

BIZIA, [a town on the Euxine, above Halmydessus, the residence of Tereus, the husband of Procne. It was shunned, say the ancient poets, by swallows, on account of the crimes of Tereus. vid. Tereus.]

BLANDUSIA, a fountain on the borders of the country of the Sabines near Mandela, Horace's country-seat; [rather in the vicinity of Venusia in Apulia.] Horat. 3, Od. 13.

BLEMMYES, a people of Africa, who, as is fabulously reported, had no heads, but had the eyes and mouth placed in the breast. [This fable is supposed to owe its origin to a custom prevailing among this people, of depressing their heads between their shoulders which they forced upwards, so that their necks became very short, and their heads were concealed partly by their shoulders, and partly by their long and thick hair.] Mela, 1, c. 4.

BLUCIUM, a castle where king Deiotarus kept his treasures in Bithynia. Strab. 12.

BOAGRIVUS, a river of [the Locri Epicnemidii, watering the town of Thronium.] Strab. 9.

BOGALIAS, a river in the island of Salamis.

BOCCHORIS, a wise king and legislator of Egypt. Diod. 1.

Bocchus, a king of Mauritania, who perfidiously delivered Jugurtha to Sylla, the quæstor of Marius. [Many of the old editions of Sallust read Jugurthæ filia Boccho nupserrat, (Jug. Bell. c. 80,) instead of Bocchi, &c. thereby making Bocchus to have been Jugurtha's son-in-law. The Abbe Brotier, relying upon this reading and some of Sylla's medals, proposes to substitute in Plutarch's life of Marius, where mention is made of Bocchus, the term son-in-law for father-in-law: but M. Vauvilliers more judiciously contends, from six MSS. of Sallust, and in conformity with Florus, 3, 1, for the expression "father-in-law" of Jugurtha. Bocchus obtained as the reward of his treachery the western part of Numidia, which was afterwards, in the reign of Claudius, named Mauretania Cæsariensis, now Fez.] Sallust. Jug.—Paterc. 2, c. 12.

BODUNI, a people of Britain, who surrendered to Claudius Cæsar. Dio. Cass. 60.

BOEDROMIA, an Athenian festival instituted in commemoration of the assistance which the people of Athens received in the reign of Erechtheus from Ion son of Xuthus, when their country was invaded by Eumolpus son of Neptune. The word is derived απο του βοηθησασιν, from coming to help. Plutarch in Thes. mentions it as in commemoration of the victory which Theseus obtained over the Amazons in a month called at Athens Boëdromion.

BOEOTIA, a country of Greece, north of Attica. It was called Bœotia, from Bœotus son of Neptune; or, according to others, from a cow, by which Cadmus was led into the country where he built Thebes. The inhabitants were reckoned rude and illiterate, fonder of bodily strength than of mental excellence; yet their country produced many illustrious men, such as Pindar, Hesiod, Epaminondas, Plutarch, &c. The mountains of Bœotia, particularly Helicon, were frequented by the muses, to whom also many of their fountains and rivers were consecrated. [It had several other names; Ogygia, from Ogyges: Cadmeis, from Cadmus; Aonia, from Aon the son of Neptune; and Hyanthis, from Hyas the son of Atlas. It is now called Livadia, a name which properly belongs to what was once the ancient Lebadea, now the chief city of the country. Bœotia was next to Thessaly the most fertile province of Greece. From its situation upon two seas it was well adapted for commerce, which, however, was scarcely attended to. The original inhabitants were Ionians, who were subsequently dispossessed by tribes of Hellenic descent.] Herodot. 2, c. 49, l. 5, c. 57.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 10.—Paus. 9, c. 1, &c.—C. Nep. 7, c. 11.—Strab. 9.—Justin. 1, c. 6, l. 8, c. 4.—Horat. 2, ep. 3, v. 244.—Diod. 19.—Liv. 27, c. 30, &c.

BOETHIUS, a celebrated Roman, [born A. D. 470. After enjoying the highest civil honours, and the favour of Theodoric the Gothic king of Italy, he became suspected by that monarch of being hostile to his government, and having been condemned upon false testimony, was committed to the tower of Pavia, and there at last put to death.] It was during his imprisonment that he wrote his celebrated treatise de consolatione philosophiæ, in five books. [He wrote also a treatise on music, and two works on arithmetic and geometry.] The best edition of his works is that of Hagenau, 4to. 1491, or that of L. Bat. 1671, with the notis variorum.

BOII, a people of Celtic Gaul, [who inhabited the country watered by the river Sigmagus, Signatus, or Igmanus, now the Sollac. From Gaul they passed into Germany, and settled in the present Bohemia, (Boierheim, i. e. the residence of the Boii,) until they were expelled by the Marcomanni. Abandoning this quarter, they carried their name with them into Boiaria, Bayaria, or Bavaria. Some suppose that the Boii were a Celtic tribe who inhabited Thrace and Illyria, a part of whom afterwards migrated to Bohemia.] Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 28, l. 7, c. 17.—Sil. 4, v. 158.

BOLA, a town of the Æqui in Italy. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 775.

BOLBE, a marsh near Mygdonia. Thucyd. 1, c. 58.

BOLBITINUM, one of the mouths of the Nile, with a town of the same name. Naucratis was built near it. Herodot. 1, c. 17.

BOLINA, a virgin of Achaia, who rejected the addresses of Apollo, and threw herself into the sea to avoid his importunities. The god made her immortal. There is a city which bears her name in Achaia. Paus. 7, c. 23.

BOLISSUS, a town and island near Chios. Thucyd. 8, c. 24.

BOMIENSES, a people of Ætolia. Thucyd. 3, c. 96.

BOMILCAR, a Carthaginian general, son of Amilcar. He was suspected of a conspiracy with Agathocles, and hung in the forum where he had received all his dignity. Diod. 26.—Justin. 22, c. 7.—An African, for some time the instrument of all Jugurtha's cruelties. He conspired against Jugurtha who put him to death. Sallust. Jug.

BOMONICÆ, [a name applied to the youths who were whipt at the altar of Diana Orthia at Sparta, in honour of that goddess. The festival was called Διαμαστιγασίς, and was so named απο του μαστιγου, i. e. from whipping. These boys were, at first, free-born Spartans, but afterwards of meaner birth, being frequently the offspring of slaves. They were called Bomonicæ (βωμονικαι) from the exercises they underwent at the altar, and which were very severe and cruel; and lest the officer should out of compassion remit any of their rigour, Diana's priestess stood by all the time holding in her hand the goddess's image, which, say the ancients, was light and easy to be borne, but if the boys were spared, became so ponderous that the priestess was scarcely able to support its weight. The parents of the boys were also present, and exhorted their sons to bear their sufferings with patience and firmness. He who showed the most firmness was highly honoured. Some of the boys even died under the lash; these they buried by a public funeral, with garlands on their heads in token of joy and victory. The origin of this cruel custom is variously accounted for by the ancient writers. Some ascribe it to a wish on the part of Lycurgus to inure the Lacedæmonian youth to labour and fatigue, and to render them insensible to pain or wounds. Others maintain that it was a mitigation of an oracle, which ordered that human blood should be shed on Diana's altar. Another tradition mentions that Pausanias, at the battle of Plataea, being disturbed during the preparatory sacrifices by a party of Lydians, and his attendants having repelled them with staves and stones, the only weapons they had at the moment, instituted this custom subsequently in commemoration of the event.] Paus. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Lyc.

BONA DEA, a name given to Ops, Vesta, Cybele, Rhea, by the Greeks; and by the Latins, to Fauna, or Fatua. This goddess was so chaste, that no man but her husband saw her after her marriage; from which reason, her festivals were celebrated only in the night by the Roman matrons in the houses of the highest officers of the state, and all the statues of the men were carefully covered with a veil where the ceremonies were observed. In the latter ages of the republic, however, the sanctity of these mysteries was profaned by the intrusion of men, [vid. Claudius,] and by the introduction of lasciviousness and debauchery. Juv. 6, v. 313.—Propert. 4, el. 10, v. 25.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 637.

BONONIA, [a city of Pannonia, on the Danube, north of Sirmium. Its site corresponds with the modern Illock.—A city of Italy. vid. Felsina.—A city of Gaul, vid. Gesoriacum.] Val. Max. 8, c. 1.—Ital. 8, v. 599.

BONOSIUS, an officer of Probus, who assumed the imperial purple in Gaul.

BONUS EVENTUS, a Roman deity, whose worship was first introduced by the peasants. He was represented holding a cup in his right hand, and in his left, ears of corn. Varro de R. R. 1.—Plin. 34, c. 8.

BOOSŪRA, (bovis cauda) a promontory of Cyprus, where Venus had an ancient temple. [Mannert makes it the same with the promontory Drepanon, or the modern Cape Blanco.] Strab.

BOŪTES, a modern constellation near the Ursa Major, also called Bubulcus and Arctophylax. Some suppose it to be Icarus, the father of Erigone, who was killed by shepherds for inebriating them. Others maintain that it is Arcas, whom Jupiter placed in heaven. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 405.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 42.

BOŪTUS and BĒOTUS, a son of Neptune and Melanippe, exposed by his mother but preserved by shepherds. Hygin. fab. 186.

BORĒADES, the descendants of Boreas, who long possessed the supreme power and the priesthood in the island of the Hyperboreans. Diod. 1 and 2.

BORĒAS, the name of the [north-east] wind blowing from the Hyperborean mountains. According to the poets he was son of Astræus and Aurora, but others make him son of the Strymon. He was passionately fond of Hyacinthus, [vid. Hyacinthus] and carried away Orithyia, who refused to receive his addresses, and by her he had Zethes and Calais, Cleopatra and Chione. He was worshipped as a deity, and represented with wings and white hair. The Athenians dedicated altars to him, and to the winds, when Xerxes invaded Europe. Boreas changed himself into a horse, to unite himself with the mares of Dardanus, by which he had twelve mares so swift that they ran, or rather flew over the sea without scarce wetting their feet. Hom. Il. 10, v. 222.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 379.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Herodot. 7, c. 139.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 700.

BORĒASMI, a festival at Athens in honour of Boreas, who, as the Athenians supposed, was related to them on account of his marriage with the daughter of one of their kings. [vid. Orithyia.] They attributed the overthrow of the enemy's fleet to the respect which he paid to his wife's native country. There were also sacrifices at Megalopolis in honour of Boreas. Paus. Attic. & Arcad.

BORYSTHÈNES, a large river of Scythia, falling into the Euxine sea, now called the Dnieper. [Herodotus considers it the greatest of the Scythian rivers after the Ister, and as surpassing all others except the Nile. He does not appear, however, to have known much about its course, and seems not to have been apprised of the famous cataracts of this river, which occur at the height of 200 miles above its mouth, and are said to extend 40 miles, being 13 in number. vid. Danaparis.] There was a city of the same name on the borders of the river, built by a colony of Milesians 655 years before the christian era. It was also called Olba Salvia. Mela, 2, c. 1 and 7.—A horse with which the emperor Adrian used to hunt. At his death he was honoured with a monument. Diod.

BOSPÓRUS, [a long and narrow sea, which it is supposed an ox, βους, may swim over. In a more general sense a long narrow sea intervening between two seas, or separating two continents, and by which two seas or a gulf and a sea, are made to communicate with each other. The name, however, is chiefly confined to two straits, the Thracian and the Cimmerian Bosphorus; the former now known by the name of the Straits or Channel of Constantinople, the latter the Straits of Caffa or Theodosia, or, according to a later denomination, the straits of Zabache. By the Russians, however, it is commonly called the Bosphorus. Various reasons have been assigned for the name. It is supposed to have been first given to the Thracian strait, and afterwards, from its similarity, to the Cimmerian. Nymphius tells us, on the authority of Acarion, that the Phrygians, desiring to pass the Thracian strait, built a vessel on whose prow was the figure of an ox, and that the vessel was hence named the ox, (βους) and the strait over which she carried them, βους πορος, Bosphorus, or the ox's passage. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Valerius Flaccus, and others of the ancient writers, refer the name to the history of Ino, who, when transformed into a cow (βους) by Juno, swam across this strait, to avoid her tormentor. Arrian says that the Phrygians were directed by an oracle to follow the route which an ox would point out to them, and that one being roused by them for this purpose, it swam across the strait. The strait of the Thracian Bosphorus properly extended from the Cyanean rocks to the harbour of Byzantium or Constantinople. It is said to be 16 miles in length, including the windings of its course, and its ordinary breadth about 1½ miles. In several places, however, it is very narrow; and the ancients relate that a person might hear birds sing on the opposite side, and that two persons might converse across with one another. Herodotus, Polybius, and Arrian make its length 120 stadia, from the Cyanean rocks to Byzantium. The new castles of Europe and Asia are erected on either coast, on the site of the ancient temples of Serapis, and Jupiter. The old ones, raised by the Greek emperors, command the narrowest part of the strait, where it is not more than 500 paces across. Here Darius is said to have crossed, on his expedition against the Scythians.—A city in the Chersonesus Taurica, vid. Panticapæum.] Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 6, c. 1.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 4, v. 49.—Mela, 1, c. 1.—Strab. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 85.

BOTTIA, a colony of Macedonians in Thrace. The people were called Bottiaei. Plin. 4, c. 1.—Herodot. 7, c. 185, &c.—Thucyd. 2, c. 99.

BOTTIÆIS, a country at the north of Macedonia, on the bay of Therma. Herodot. 7, c. 123, &c.

BOUDICÆA, a queen [of the Brigantes] in Britain, who rebelled upon being insulted by the Romans. She poisoned herself when conquered, A. D. 61. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 31. [vid. Brigantes.]

BOVIANUM, an ancient colony of the Samnites, at the foot of the Apennines not far from Beneventum. Liv. 9, c. 28.

BOVILLÆ, a town of Latium near Rome. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 607.—Another in Campania.

BRACHMĀNES, Indian philosophers, who derive their name from Brahma, one of the three beings whom God, according to their theology, created, and with whose assistance he formed the world. They devoted themselves totally to the worship of the gods, and were accustomed from their youth to endure labours, and to live with frugality and abstinence. They never ate flesh, and abstained from the use of wine and all carnal enjoyments. [The ancient Brachmans are supposed to have been a tribe or numerous family, descended from one common ancestor, who existed at some remote period, and was different from the progenitors of the people among whom they lived. Many have supposed the progenitor of the Brachmans to have been the patriarch Abraham. The Greeks usually give them the name of Gymnosophists. Pythagoras is said to have studied their doctrine and manners, and to have borrowed from them the doctrine of the Metempsychosis. The modern Brahmins derive their name, and pretend to derive their doctrine and practice also, from the ancient Brachmans. The resemblance is striking in some respects, but they are inferior to their ancestors, both as philosophers and men of learning.]

BRANCHIÆLES, a surname of Apollo.

BRANCHIDÆ, a people of Asia near the river Oxus, put to the sword by Alexander. [They were descended from the Branchidæ, a family who held the priesthood of the temple of Apollo Didymæus at Didyma near Miletus. The Persians under Xerxes plundered and burnt the temple, and the Branchidæ, who had betrayed it into their hands, became, on the defeat of Xerxes, the voluntary companions of his flight, in order to avoid the justice of their countrymen. They settled on the Oxus, and grew up into a small state. Alexander's motive in the cruel massacre of this people was retaliation for the sacrilege of their ancestors.] Strab. 11.—Curt. 7, c. 5.

BRANCHUS, a youth of Miletus, son of Smircrus, beloved by Apollo, who gave him the power of prophecy. He gave oracles at Didyma, which became inferior to none of the Grecian oracles, except Delphi, and which exchanged the name of Didymeon for that of Branchidæ. The temple, according to Strabo, was set on fire by Xerxes, who took possession of the riches it contained, and transported the priests into Sogdiana, where they [settled, and grew up into a small city,] which was afterwards destroyed by Alexander. Strab. 15.—Stat. Theb. 3, v. 479.—Lucian. de Domo.

BRASIDAS, a famous general of Lacedæmon, son of Tellus, who, after many great victories over Athens and other Grecian states, died of a wound at Amphipolis, which Cleon, the Athenian, had besieged, B. C. 442. A superb monument was raised to his memory. Paus. 3, c. 24.—Thucyd. 4 and 5.—Diod. 5.

BRASIDÆA, festivals at Lacedæmon, in honour of Brasidas. None but free born Spartans were permitted to enter the lists, and such as were absent were fined.

BRAURON, a town of Attica, where Diana had a temple. The goddess had three festivals called Brauronia, celebrated once every fifth year by ten men, who were called sego-prois. They sacrificed a goat to the goddess, and it was usual to sing one of the books of Homer's Iliad. The most remarkable that attended were young virgins in yellow gowns, consecrated to Diana. They were about ten years of age, and not under five, and therefore their consecration was called δεκατην, from δεκα, decem; and sometimes αγρευσις, as the virgins themselves bore the name of αγροις bears, from this circumstance. There was a bear in one of the villages of Attica, so tame, that he ate with the inhabitants, and played harmlessly with them. This familiarity lasted long, till a young virgin treated the animal too roughly, and was killed by it. The virgin's brothers killed the bear, and the country was soon after visited by a pestilence. The oracle was consulted, and the plague removed by consecrating virgins to the service of Diana. This was so faithfully observed, that no woman in Athens was ever married before a previous consecration to the goddess. The statue of Diana of Tauris, which had been brought into Greece by Iphigenia, was preserved in the town of Brauron. Xerxes carried it away when he invaded Greece. Paus. 8, c. 46.—Strab. 9.

BRENNI, a people of [Italy, dwelling north of the Lacus Larius, among the Lepontine Alps, near the sources of the Ticinus. They, together with the Genauæ, were subdued by Drusus, whose victory Horace celebrated. Strabo calls them Brenci and Genauai, others term the former Breuni.] Horat. 4, od. 14.

BRENNUS, a general of the Galli Senones, who invaded Italy, defeated the Romans at the river Allia, and entered their city without opposition. The Romans fled into the capitol, and left the whole city in possession of the enemy. The Gauls climbed the Tarpeian rock in the night, and the capitol would have been taken had not the Romans been awakened by the noise of some sacred geese which were kept in the temple of Juno. [vid. Maenius.] Camillus, who was in banishment, marched to the relief of his country, and so totally defeated the Gauls that not one remained to carry the news of their destruction. [There is great reason to question the truth of the latter part of this story. According to Polybius, the Gauls received gold from the Romans, and returned in safety to their country; and this is confirmed by Justin, Suetonius, Diodorus Siculus, and partly even by Livy himself, 10, c. 16.] Liv. 5, c. 36, &c.—Plut. in Camill.—Another Gaul, who made an irruption into Greece, with 150,000 men and 15,000 horse, and endeavoured to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphi. He was destroyed with all his troops, by the god, or more properly, he killed himself in a fit of intoxication, B. C. 278, after being defeated by the Delphians. Prus. 10, c. 22 and 23.—Justin. 24, c. 6, &c.

BRIAREUS, a famous giant, son of Cælus and Terra, who had 100 hands and 50 heads, and was called by men Ægeon, and only by the gods Briareus. When Juno, Neptune, and Minerva conspired to dethrone Jupiter, Briareus ascended the heavens, and seated himself next to him, and so terrified the conspirators by his fierce and threatening looks, that they desisted. He assisted the giants in their war against the gods, and was thrown under mount Ætna, according to some accounts. Hesiod. Theog. v. 148.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 403.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 287, l. 10, v. 565.—A cyclops, made judge between Apollo and Neptune, in their dispute about the isthmus and promontory of Corinth. He gave the former to Neptune and the latter to Apollo. Paus. 2, c. 1.

BRIGANTES, a people in the northern parts of Britain. [The greatest, most powerful, and most ancient of the British tribes. They possessed the country from sea to sea, comprising the counties of York, Durham, Lancaster, Westmoreland, and Cumberland. Their capital was Eboracum, York.] Juv. 14, v. 196.—Paus. 8, c. 43.

BRIGANTINUS, a lake of Rhoetia between the Alps, now the lake of Constance. The town on its eastern bank is now Bregentz in Tyrol, anciently called Brigantia. Plin. 9, c. 17.

BRISÆIS, a woman of Lyrnessus, called also Hippodamia. When her country was taken by the Greeks, and her husband Mines and brother killed in the fight, she fell to the share of Achilles in the division of the spoils. Agamemnon took her away some time after from Achilles, who made a vow to absent himself from the field of battle. Briseis was very faithful to Achilles; and when Agamemnon restored her to him, he swore he had never offended her chastity. Homer. Il. 1, 2, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 3, de. Art. Am. 2 and 3.

—Propert. 2, el. 3, 20 and 22.—Paus. 5, c. 21.—Horat. 2, od. 4.

BRISÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, from his nurse Brisa, or his temple at Brisa, a promontory at Lesbos. Persius, 1, v. 76.

BRITANNI, the inhabitants of Britain. [vid. Britannia.]—A nation in Gallia Belgica. Plin. 4, c. 17.

BRITANNIA, [called also Albion, an island in the Atlantic Ocean, and the largest in Europe. The Phenicians appear to have been early acquainted with it, and to have carried on here a traffic for tin. (vid. Cassiterides.) Commercial jealousy, however, induced them to keep their discoveries a profound secret. The Carthaginians succeeded to the Phenicians, but were equally mysterious. Avianus, in his small poem entitled Ora Maritima, v. 412, makes mention of the voyages of a certain Himilco in this quarter, and professes to draw his information from the long concealed Punic Annals. Little was known of Britain until Cæsar's time, who invaded and endeavoured, although ineffectually, to conquer the island. After a long interval, Ostorius, in the reign of Claudius, reduced the southern part of the island, and Agricola, subsequently, in the reign of Domitian, extended the Roman dominion to the Frith of Forth and the Clyde. The whole force of the empire, although exerted to the utmost under Severus, could not, however, reduce to subjection the hardy natives of the highlands. Britain continued a Roman province until A. D. 426, when the troops were in a great measure withdrawn, to assist Valentinian the 3d against the Huns, and never returned. The Britons had become so enervated under the Roman yoke as to be unable to repel the incursions of the inhabitants of the north. They invoked therefore the aid of the Saxons, by whom they were themselves subjugated, and at length obliged to take refuge in the mountains of Wales. The name of Britain was unknown to the Romans before the time of Cæsar. Bochart derives the name from the Phœnician or Hebrew term Baratanac, the land of tin. Britain was famous for the Roman walls built in it, of which traces remain at the present day. The first was built by Agricola A. D. 79, nearly in the situation of the rampart of Adrian, and wall of Severus mentioned below. In A. D. 81, Agricola built a line of very strong forts from the Frith of Forth to the Frith of Clyde. This, however, was insufficient to check the barbarians after his departure. In A. D. 120, therefore, Adrian erected a famous wall from Boulness on Solway Frith, to a spot a little beyond Newcastle upon Tyne. It was 68 English or 74 Roman miles long. Twenty years after this, Lollius Urbicus, under the emperor Antoninus, restored the second wall of Agricola, which is commonly called the Valium Antonini. But the greatest of all was that of Severus, begun A. D. 209, and finished the next year, and which was only a few yards north of Adrian's wall. It was garrisoned by 10,000 men.] Cæs. Bell. G. 4.—Diod. 5.—

Paus. 1, c. 33.—Tacit. in Agric. 10.—Plin. 34, c. 17.

BRITANNICUS, son of Claudius Cæsar by Messalina. Nero was raised to the throne in preference to him, by means of Agrippina, and caused him to be poisoned. His corpse was buried in the night; but it is said that a shower of rain washed away the white paint which the murderer had put over his face, so that it appeared quite black, and discovered the effects of poison. Tacit. Ann.—Sueton. in Ner. c. 33.

BRITOMARTIS, a beautiful nymph of Crete, daughter of Jupiter and Charme, who devoted herself to hunting, and became a great favourite of Diana. She was loved by Minos, who pursued her so closely, that to avoid his importunities, she threw herself into the sea. Paus. 2, c. 30, l. 3, c. 14.—A surname of Diana.

BRIXELLUM, [a town of Italy, in Gallia Cispadana, north-east of Parma, where Otho slew himself when defeated. It is now Brescello.] Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 32.

BRIXIA, a town of Italy beyond the Po, at the north-east of Cremona, now Brescia, Justin. 20, c. 5.

BROMIUS, a surname of Bacchus, from βρομῶν, fremdere, alluding to the groans which Semele uttered when consumed by Jupiter's fire. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 11.

BRONGUS, a river falling into the Ister. Herodot. 4, c. 49.

BROTHEUS, a son of Vulcan and Minerva, who burned himself to avoid the ridicule to which his deformity subjected him. Ovid. in Ib. v. 517.

BRUCTERI, a people of Germany, inhabiting the country at the east of Holland, [between the Arhisia or Erus, and the Lacus Flevus, or Zuyder Zee.] Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 51.

BRUMALIA, festivals celebrated at Rome in honour of Bacchus, about the month of December. They were first instituted by Romulus.

BRUNDISIUM, now Brindisi, a city of Calabria, on the Adriatic sea, where the Appian road was terminated. It was founded by Diomedes after the Trojan war, or, according to Strabo, by a Cretan colony. [Probably it owed its origin to the Illyrians, the earliest navigators in this quarter.] The Romans generally embarked at Brundisium for Greece. [Dyrrachium was the usual landing place.] It is famous for the birth of the poet Pacuvius, and the death of Virgil, and likewise for its harbour, which was capacious and sheltered by the land, and by a small island at the entrance, against the fury of the winds and waves. Little remains of the ancient city, and even its harbour has now been choked up by the negligence of the inhabitants. Justin. 3, c. 4, l. 12, c. 2.—Strab. 5.—Cæs. Bell. Civ. 1, c. 24.—Cic. ad Attic. 4, ep. 1.

BRUTTI, a people in the farthest parts of Italy, who were originally shepherds of the Lucanians, but revolted, and went in quest of a settlement. They received the name of Bruttii from their stupidity and cowardice in submitting without opposition to Annibal in the second Punic war. They were ever after held in the greatest disgrace, and employed in every servile work. [It is better to derive their name, which was otherwise written Brettii, from the circumstance of their having revolted from the Lucanians. Βρεττιους γαρ κελουσι αποστατας, says Strabo (Lib. 6.) speaking of the Lucanians. Justin gives a third derivation, (23, 1.) from a female named Brutia.] Justin. 33, c. 9.—Strab. 6.—Diod. 16.

BRUTUS, L. JUNIUS, son of M. Junius, and Tarquinia second daughter of Tarquin Priscus. The father, with his eldest son, were murdered by Tarquin the Proud, and Lucius, unable to revenge their death, pretended to be insane. The artifice saved his life; he was called Brutus for his stupidity, which he however, soon after showed to be feigned. When Lucretia killed herself B. C. 509, in consequence of the brutality of Tarquin, Brutus snatched the dagger from the wound, and swore upon the reeking blade immortal hatred to the royal family. His example animated the Romans, the Tarquins were proscribed by a decree of the senate, and the royal authority vested in the hands of consuls chosen from patrician families. Brutus, in his consular office, made the people swear they never would again submit to kingly authority; but the first who violated their oath were in his own family. His sons conspired with the Tuscan ambassador to restore the Tarquins; and when discovered, they were tried and condemned before their father, who himself attended at their execution. Some time after, in a combat that was fought between the Romans and Tarquins, Brutus engaged with Aruns, and so fierce was the attack that they pierced one another at the same time. The dead body was brought to Rome, and received as in triumph; a funeral oration was spoken over it, and the Roman matrons showed their grief by mourning a year for the father of the republic. Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 56, l. 2, c. 1, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 4 & 5.—C. Nep. in Attic. 8.—Eutrop. de Tarq.—Verg. Æn. 6, v. 818.—Plut. in Brut. & Cæs.—Marcus Junius, father of Cæsar's murderer, wrote three books on civil law. He followed the party of Marius, and was conquered by Pompey. After the death of Sylla he was besieged in Mutina by Pompey, to whom he surrendered, and by whose orders he was put to death. He had married Servilia, Cato's sister, by whom he had a son and two daughters. Cic. de Orat. c. 55.—Plut. in Brut.—His son of the same name, by Servilia, was lineally descended from J. Brutus who expelled the Tarquins from Rome. He seemed to inherit the republican principles of his great progenitor, and in the civil wars joined himself to the side of Pompey, though he was his father's murderer, only because he looked upon him as more just and patriotic in his claims. At the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar not only spared the life of Brutus, but he made him one of his most faithful friends. He however forgot the favour, because Cæsar aspired to tyranny. He conspired with many of the most illustrious citizens of Rome against the tyrant, and stabbed him in Pompey's Basilica. The tumult which this murder occasioned was great; the conspirators fled to the capitol, and by proclaiming freedom and liberty to the populace, they re-established tranquillity in the city. Antony, whom Brutus, contrary to the opinion of his associates, refused to seize, gained ground in behalf of his friend Cæsar, and the murderers were soon obliged to leave Rome. Brutus retired into Greece, where he gained himself many friends by his arms, as well as by persuasion, and he was soon after pursued thither by Antony, whom young Octavius accompanied. A battle was fought at Philippi. Brutus, who commanded the right wing of the republican army, defeated that opposed to him under the command of Octavius; but Cassius, who had the care of the left, was overpowered by Antony; and as he knew not the situation of his friend, and grew desperate, he ordered one of his freed-men to run him through. Brutus deeply deplored his fall, and in the fulness of his grief called him the last of the Romans. In another battle, the wing which Brutus commanded obtained a victory over that of Octavius; but the other, commanded by the lieutenant of Cassius, was defeated by Antony, who in place of pursuing the fugitives, turned round on the rear of Brutus, and entirely broke and dispersed his troops. Brutus escaped with a few friends, and soon after fell upon his sword, B. C. 42, [in the 43d year of his age according to Cicero, but in the 37th according to Velleius Paterculus.] Antony honoured him with a magnificent funeral. Brutus is not less celebrated for his literary talents than his valour in the field. When he was in the camp, the greatest part of his time was employed in reading and writing; and the day which preceded one of his most bloody battles, while the rest of his army was under continual apprehensions, Brutus calmly spent his hours till the evening in writing an epitome of Polybius. He was fond of imitating the austere virtues of Cato; and in reading the histories of nations he imbibed those principles of freedom which were so eminently displayed in his political career. He was intimate with Cicero, to whom he would have communicated his conspiracy, had he not been apprehensive of his great timidity. He severely reprimanded him in his letters for joining the side of Octavius, who meditated the ruin of the republic. Plutarch mentions, that Cæsar's ghost made its appearance to Brutus in his tent, and told him that he would meet him at Philippi. Brutus married Portia, the daughter of Cato, who killed herself, by swallowing burning coals, when she heard the fate of her husband. C. Nep. in Attic.—Paterc. 2, c. 48.—Plut. in Brut. &c. Cæs. 1.—Flor. 4.—D. Jun. Albinus, one of Cæsar's murderers, who, after the battle of Mutina, was deserted by the legions with which he wished to march against Antony. He was put to death by Antony's orders, though consular elect.

BRYGES, a people of Thrace, afterwards called Phryges. Strab. 7. [vid. Phryges.]

BUBARIS, a Persian, who married the daughter of Amyntas, against whom he had been sent with an army. Justin. 7, c. 13.

BUBASTIS, a city of Egypt, in the eastern parts of the Delta, where cats were held in great veneration, because Bubastis, [the same with the Grecian Diaua,] who was the chief deity of the place, is said to have transformed herself into a cat when the gods fled into Egypt. [This city is called in Scripture Phi-Beseth, which is now altered into Basta. It was situated on a canal leading from the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile to the canal of Trajan. The Pelusiac branch was sometimes called, from this city, the Bubastic. Bubastus was remarkable also as being the place where great numbers assembled to celebrate the festival of the goddess Bubastis. More than 70,000 persons were accustomed to meet here on these occasions. The custom had ceased, however, in the time of Herodotus. This was the place, also, where the sacred cats were interred.] Herodot. 2, c. 59, 137 and 154.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 690.

BUBASUS, a country of Caria, whence Bubasides applied to the natives. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 643.

BUCEPHALA, a city of India, on the Hydaspes, built by Alexander in honour of his favourite horse Bucephalus. [It is supposed to have been situated somewhere on the road between Attock and Lahaur.] Curt. 9, c. 3.—Justin. 12, c. 8.—Diod. 7.

BUCEPHALUS, [a horse of Alexander's, so called either because his head resembled that of an ox. (βουος κεφαλη), or because he had the mark of an ox's head impressed upon his flank; or, according to another account, because he had a black mark upon his head resembling that of an ox, the rest of his body being white. Arrian. Exp. Al. 5, 19.—Plin. 8, c. 42.] Alexander was the only one who could mount on his back, and he always knelt down to take up his master. He was present in an engagement in Asia, where he received a heavy wound, and hastened immediately out of the battle, and dropped down dead as soon as he had set down the king in a safe place. He was 30 years old when he died, and Alexander built a city in honour of him [on the banks of the Hydaspes, on the site of his camp before his engagement with Porus. According to Arrian, however, he died of the heat of the climate, and of age, being about 30 years old. Arrian. 5, c. 19.]—Plut. in Alex. Curt.—Arrian. 5, c. 3.—Plin. 8, c. 42.

BUCOLICA, a sort of poem which treats of the care of the flocks, and of the pleasures and occupations of the rural life, with simplicity and elegance. The most famous pastoral writers of antiquity are Moschus, Bion, Theocritus, and Virgil. The invention of bucolics, or pastoral poetry, is attributed to a shepherd of Sicily. [vid. Tiraboschi Storia della Letteratura Italiana, vol. 1, p. 75—77.]

BUCOLICUM, one of the mouths of the Nile, situate between the Sebennytic and Mendesian mouths. [It is supposed to be the same with the Phatnetic.] Herodot. 2, c. 17.

BULIS, a town of Phocis, built by a colony from Doris, [on the shore of the Sinus Corinthiacus, south-east of Anticyra.] Paus. 10, c. 37.—A Spartan, who, [along with his countryman Sperthies,] offered himself up to Xerxes, to atone for the offence his countrymen had committed in putting the king's messengers to death. [The king refused to retaliate.] Herodot. 7, c. 134, &c.

BUNUS, a son of Mercury and Alcideama, who obtained the government of Corinth when Æetes went to Colchis. He built a temple to Juno. Paus. 2, c. 3 and 4.

BUPHAGUS, a son of Japetus and Thornax, killed by Diana, whose virtue he had attempted. A river of Arcadia bears his name. Paus. 8, c. 24.—A surname of Hercules, given him on account of his gluttony.

BUPHONIA, a festival in honour of Jupiter at Athens, where an ox was immolated. Paus. 1, c. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 3.

BUPRASIMUM, a city, district, and river of Elis. Homer.

BURA, a daughter of Jupiter, or, according to others, of Ion and Helice, from whom Bura or Buris, once a flourishing city in the bay of Corinth, received its name. This city was destroyed by the sea. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 293.—Paus. 7, c. 25.—Strab. 1 and 8.—Diod. 15.

BURAIUS, an epithet applied to Hercules, from his temple near Bura.—A river of Achaia. Paus. 7, c. 25.

BURRHUS AFRANIUS, a chief of the prætorian guards, put to death by Nero.—A brother-in-law of the emperor Commodus.

BUSIRIS, a king of Egypt, son of Neptune and Lybia, or Lysianassa, who sacrificed all foreigners to Jupiter with the greatest cruelty. When Hercules visited Egypt, Busiris carried him to the altar bound hand and foot. The hero soon disentangled himself, and offered the tyrant, his son Amphidamas, and the ministers of his cruelty, on the altar. [The barbarity of Busiris is a mere fable, as Diodorus Siculus himself confesses, and was grounded on a custom practised in Egypt of sacrificing all the red-haired people they met with, (most of whom were strangers, as the hair of the natives was seldom of this colour,) to the manes of Osiris. Bou in the Egyptian language signified a tomb, whence Busiris means the tomb of Osiris. There was a city of this name in the middle of the Delta, where was a very large temple of Isis. Sicard has described the ruins of this temple, and gives us a grand idea of what it once was. (Memoires des Missions du Levant.) The situation assigned to this place by Herodotus agrees with the modern village of Busir.] Herodot. 2, c. 59 and 61.—Strab. 17.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 132.—Heroid. 9, v. 69.—Plut. in Thest.—Virg. G. 3, v. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.

BUTES, one of the descendants of Amycus, king of the Bebryces, very expert in the combat of the cestus. He came to Sicily, where he was received by Lycaste, a beautiful harlot, by whom he had a son called Eryx. Lycaste, on account of her beauty, was called Venus; hence Eryx is often called the son of Venus. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 372

BUTHRŌTUM, now Butrinto, a sea-port town of Epirus, opposite Corcyra, visited by Æneas in his way to Italy from Troy. [It was originally a small village, but was subsequently fortified by the Romans, in order to keep in subjection the inhabitants of the interior, and became a place of great consequence. Virgil makes Helenus to have reigned here. Stephanus Byzantinus derives the name from an ox (βουρ) having broke loose at this place when about being sacrificed.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 293.—Plin. 4, c. 1.

BUTHRŌTUS, a river in Italy, [in the country of the Bruttii, near the Locri Epizephyrii.]

BUTHYRĒUS, a noble statuary, disciple to Myron. Plin. 34, c. 8.

ΒΥΤΘΑ, an island in the Mediterranean, below the eastern part of Crete.] Plin. 4, c. 12.

BUTORIDES, an historian who wrote concerning the pyramids. Plin. 36, c. 12.

BUTOS, a town of Egypt, [at the Sebennytic mouth of the Nile,] where there was a temple of Apollo and Diana, and an oracle of Latona. [The shrine of the goddess, according to Herodotus, was of one solid stone, having equal sides, each side 40 cubits long. It was brought from a quarry in the isle of Philæ near the cataracts, on rafts, for the space of 200 leagues, to its destined station, and seems to have been the heaviest weight ever moved by human power. It employed many thousand men for three years in its transportation.] Herodot. 2, c. 59 and 63.

BUZŶGES, an Athenian, who first ploughed with harnessed oxen. Demophoon gave him the Palladium with which Diomedes had intrusted him to be carried to Athens. Polyæm. 1, c. 5.

BYBLIS, a daughter of Miletus and Cyanea. She fell in love with her brother Caunus, and when he refused to gratify her passion, she destroyed herself. Some say that Caunus became enamoured of her, and fled from his country to avoid incest; and others report that he fled from his sister's importunities, who sought him all over Lycia and Caria, and at last sat down all bathed in tears, and was changed into a fountain of the same name. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 284. Met. 9, v. 451.—Hygin. fab. 243.—Paus. 7, c. 5.

BYBLUS, [a maritime town of Phœnicia, nearly midway between Tripolis and Berytus. Here Adonis was worshipped, and in its neighbourhood ran the small river Adonis, called at the present day, Nahr Ibrahim. The waters of this stream, at the anniversary of the death of Adonis, which was in the rainy season, were tinged red with the ochrous particles from the mountains of Libanus, and hence were fabled to flow with the blood of Adonis.]

BYRSA, a citadel in the middle of Carthage, on which was the temple of Æsculapius. Asdrubal's wife burnt it when the city was taken. When Dido came to Africa, she bought of the inhabitants as much land as could be encompassed by a bull's hide. After the agreement, she cut the hide in small thongs, and enclosed a large piece of territory, on which she built a citadel which she called Byrsa, (βυρσα, a hide.) [This is a mere fable of the Greeks. The name is derived, by a slight transposition of letters, from the Punic term Byrsa, a citadel, according to Scalliger.] Virg. Æn. 1, v. 371.—Strab. 17.—Justin. 18, c. 5.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Liv. 34, c. 62.

BYZACIUM, [a district of Africa Propria, lying above the Syrtis Minor. The Carthaginians were the possessors of it, and for a long time allowed no Roman vessels to navigate the coast below the Hermean promontory, fearful lest their enemies might be tempted to seize what formed the granary of Carthage. This district was originally distinct from what was termed Emporiæ, which lay below it. Afterwards, however, they became united into one, and the territory of Byzacium was extended upwards as far as the river Bagradas, thus forming the Byzacena Provincia.]

BYZANTIUM, a town situate on the Thracian Bosphorus, founded by a colony from Argos and Megara, under the conduct of Byzas, 658 years before the christian era. Paternus says it was founded by the Milesians, and by Pausanias, king of the Lacedæmonians according to Justin, and according to Ammianus by the Athenians. [Justin is altogether wrong. Pausanias probably rebuilt and fortified it while commanding in the Hellespont.] The pleasantness and convenience of its situation was observed by Constantine the Great, who made it the capital of the eastern Roman empire, A. D. 326, and called it Constantinopolis. [Constantine wished it to imitate the capital of the west in size, and therefore extended the walls of the ancient Byzantium from sea to sea. The new city was solemnly dedicated by him to the God of Martyrs, according to Eusebius, on the 11th May, A. D. 330, and in the 25th of his reign, and from that period was styled after the emperor's name, Constantinopolis, or the city of Constantine. It was taken by Mahomet 2d on the 29th May, A. D. 1453. The Turks call it Stamboul or Istambol, a Turkish corruption of the modern Greek phrase εἰς τὴν πᾶν. That part of the city which was the ancient Byzantium is now occupied principally by the buildings and gardens of the seraglio.] A number of Greek writers, who have deserved or usurped the name of Byzantine historians, flourished at Byzantium after the seat of the empire had been translated thither from Rome. Their works, which more particularly relate to the time in which they flourished, and are seldom read but by those who wish to form an acquaintance with the revolutions of the lower empire, were published in one large collection, in 36 vols. folio, 1648, &c. at Paris, and recommended themselves by the notes and supplements of Du Fresnois and Du Cange. They were likewise printed at Venice, 1729, in 8 vols, though perhaps this edition is not so valuable as that of the French. Strab. 1.—Pat. c. 2, c. 15.—C. Nep. in Paus. Alcib. &

Timoth.—Justin. 9, c. 1.—Tacit. 12. Ann. c. 62 and 63.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Marcel. 22, c. 8.

BYZAS, a son of Neptune, from whom it is said Byzantium received its name. [His being styled a son of Neptune, means that he was a famous navigator.] Diod. 4.

BYZIA, [vid. Bizya.]

CA

CAANTHUS, a son of Oceanus and Tethys. He was ordered by his father to seek his sister Maia, whom Apollo had carried away, and he burnt in revenge the ravisher's temple near the Isthmus. He was killed for this impiety by the god, and a monument raised to his memory. Paus. 9, c. 10.

CABALLA, [vid. Solymi.]

[CABALLĀCA, a town of Albania, now Kablas-var.]

CABALINUS, a clear fountain on mount Helicon, sacred to the muses, and called also Hippocrene, as raised from the ground by the foot of Pegasus. Pers.

CABALLINUM, a town of the Ædui, now Chalons, [sur-Saone.] Cæs. 7, Bell. G. c. 42.

CABIRA, [a town of Pontus, south-east of Amasia, upon the river Iris, memorable for the defeat of Mithridates by Lucullus in its vicinity.]

CABIRI, certain deities held in the greatest veneration at Thebes, Lemnos, Macedonia, and Phrygia, but more particularly in the islands of Samothrace and Imbros. The number of these deities is uncertain. Some say they were only two, Jupiter and Bacchus; others mention three, and some four, Aschieiros, Achiochersa, Achiochersus, and Camillus. It is unknown where their worship was first established; yet Phœnicia seems to be the place according to the authority of Sanchoniathon, and from thence it was introduced into Greece by the Pelasgi. The festivals or mysteries of the Cabiri, were celebrated with the greatest solemnity at Samothrace, where all the ancient heroes and princes were generally initiated, as their power seemed to be great in protecting persons from shipwreck and storms. The obscenities which prevailed in the celebration have obliged the authors of every country to pass over them in silence, and say that it was unlawful to reveal them. These deities are often confounded with the Corybantes, Anaces, Dioscuri, &c. and, according to Herodotus, Vulcan was their father. This author mentions the sacrilege which Cambyses committed in entering their temple, and turning to ridicule their sacred mysteries. They were supposed to preside over metals. [*vid. CA

CABIRIA, a surname of Ceres.—The festivals of the Cabiri. vid. Cabiri.

CACA, a goddess among the Romans, sister to Cacus, who is said to have discovered to Hercules where her brother had concealed his oxen. The vestals offered sacrifices in her temple. Lactant. 1, c. 20.

CACUS, a famous robber, son of Vulcan and Medus, represented as a three-headed monster, and as vomiting flames. He resided in Italy, and the avenues of his cave were covered with human bones. He plundered the neighbouring country; and when Hercules returned from the conquest of Geryon, Cacus stole some of his cows, and dragged them backwards into his cave to prevent discovery. Hercules departed without perceiving the theft; but his oxen having lowed, were answered by the cows in the cave of Cacus, and the hero became acquainted with the loss he had sustained. He ran to the place, attacked Cacus, squeezed and strangled him in his arms, though vomiting fire and smoke. Hercules erected an altar to Jupiter Servator in commemoration of his victory; and an annual festival was instituted by the inhabitants in honour of the hero who had delivered them from such a public calamity. Ovid 1, Fast. v. 551.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 194.—Propert. 3, el. 10.—Juv. 5, v. 125.—Liv. 1, c. 7.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 9.

CACŪTHIS, a river of India flowing into the Ganges; [according to Mannert, the Gumty, which falls into the Ganges, to the north of Benares.] Arrian. Indic.

CADMĒA, the citadel of Thebes, built by Cadmus. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 601.—Paus. 2, c. 5.

CADMĒIS, an ancient name of Bœotia.

CADMUS, son of Agenor king of Phœnicia, by Telephassa or Agriope, was ordered by his father to go in quest of his sister Europa whom Jupiter had carried away, and he was never to return to Phœnicia if he did not bring her back. As his search proved fruitless, he consulted the oracle of Apollo, and was ordered to build a city where he should see a young heifer stop in the grass, and to call the country Bœotia. He found the heifer according to the directions of the oracle; and as he wished to thank the god by a sacrifice, he sent his companions to fetch water from a neighbouring grove. The waters were sacred to Mars, and guarded by a dragon, which devoured all the Phœnician's attendants. Cadmus, tired of their seeming delay, went to the place, and saw the monster still feeding on their flesh. He attacked the dragon, and overcame it by the assistance of Minerva, and sowed the teeth in a plain, upon which armed men suddenly rose up from the ground. He threw a stone in the midst of them, and they instantly turned their arms one against the other, till all perished except five, who assisted him in building his city. Soon after he married Hermione the daughter of Venus, with whom he lived in the greatest cordiality, and by whom he had a son, Polydorus, and four daughters, Ino, Agave, Autonoe, and Semele. Juno persecuted those children; and their well-known misfortunes so distracted Cadmus and Hermione, that they retired to Illyricum, loaded with grief and infirm with age. They entreated the gods to remove them from the misfortunes of life, and they were immediately changed into serpents. Some explain the dragon's fable, by supposing that it was a king of the country whom Cadmus conquered by war; and the armed men rising from the field is no more than men armed with brass, according to the ambiguous signification of a Phœnician word. Cadmus was the first who introduced the use of letters into Greece; but some maintain that the alphabet which he brought from Phœnicia was only different from that which was used by the ancient inhabitants of Greece. [vid. Pelasgi.] This alphabet consisted only of 16 letters, [to which Simonides of Ceos added four, θ, ζ, ρ, χ, and Epicharmus the Sicilian, the same number, ξ, υ, ψ, ω. The Ionians first adopted all the 24 letters, and from them the Samians, from whom they were received by the Athenians; but it was not until after the Peloponnesian war, under the archonship of Euclides (ol. 94, 2, B. C. 403,) that they were used by them in public acts.] The worship of many of the Egyptian and Phœnician deities was also introduced by Cadmus, who is supposed to have come into Greece 1493 years before the christian era, and to have died 61 years after. According to those who believe that Thebes was built at the sound of Amphion's lyre, Cadmus built only a small citadel, which he called Cadmea, and laid the foundations of a city which was finished by one of his successors. Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 1, 2, &c.—Herodot. 2, c. 49, l. 4, c. 147.—Hygin. fab. 6, 76, 155, &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—Paus. 9, c. 5, &c.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 937, &c.—A son of Pandion of Miletus, celebrated as an historian in the age of Cæsus, and as the writer of an account of some cities of Ionia, in 4 books. He is called the ancient, in contradistinction from another of the same name and place, son of Archelaus, who wrote an history of Attica in 16 books, and a treatise on love in 14 books. Diod. 1.—Dionys. Hal. 2.—Clement. Alexand. 3.—Strab. 1.—Plin. 5, c. 29.

CADUCEUS, a rod entwined at one end by two serpents, in the form of two equal semi-circles. It was the attribute of Mercury and the emblem of power, and it had been given him by Apollo in return for the lyre. Various interpretations have been put upon the two serpents round it. Some suppose them to be a symbol of Jupiter's amours with Rhea, when these two deities transformed themselves into snakes. Others say that it originates from Mercury's having appeased the fury of two serpents that were fighting by touching them with his rod. Prudence is generally supposed to be represented by these two serpents, and the wings are the symbol of diligence; both necessary in the pursuit of business and commerce, which Mercury patronized. With it Mercury conducted to the infernal regions the souls of the dead, and could lull to sleep, and even raise to life a dead person. [Mercury was a Phœnician deity, and his oriental name appears to have been Casmilus. The caduceus was originally nothing more than a rod adorned with green leaves, and with a skilfully-tied knot as the symbol of traffic. In a later age these decorations were changed by the poets to wings and serpents.] Virg. Æn. 4, v. 242.—Horat. 1, od. 10.

CADURCI, a people of Gaul, at the east of the Garonne. [Their capital was Divona, afterwards called from their own name, Cadurci, now Cahors.] Cæs.

CADY'TIS, a town of Syria. [It is supposed by Reland to have been the same with Gath. D'Anville, and Rennell, on the contrary, conjecture it to have been Jerusalem, and the latter is of opinion that Cadytis is synonymous with Al-Kads, which means the holy.] Herodot. 2, c. 159.

CÆCIAS, a wind blowing from the [east-north-east.]

CÆCILIA CATIA, or Tanaquil. vid. Tanaquil.

CÆCILIA LEX, was proposed A. U. C. 693, by Cæcil. Metellus Nepos, [to exempt the city and Italy from taxes.]—Another, called also Didia, A. U. C. 656, by the consuls Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and T. Didius. [That laws should be promulgated for 3 market-days, (17 days,) and that several distinct things should not be included in the same law.]

CÆCILIANUS, a Latin writer before the age of Cicero.

CÆCILII, a Plebeian family at Rome, descended from Cæcus, one of the companions of Æneas, or from Cæculus the son of Vulcan, who built Præneste. This family gave birth to many illustrious generals and patriots.

CÆCILIUS CLAUDIUS ISIDORUS, a man who left in his will to his heirs, 4116 slaves, 3600 yokes of oxen, 257,000 small cattle, 600,000 pounds of silver. Plin. 33, c. 10.—Epirus, a freedman of Atticus, who opened a school at Rome, and is said to have first taught reading to Virgil, and some other growing poets.—A Sicilian orator, in the age of Augustus, who wrote on the servile wars, a comparison between Demosthenes and Cicero, and an account of the orations of Demosthenes.—Metellus. vid. Metellus.—Statius, a comic poet, deservedly commended by Cicero and Quintilian, though the orator.

ad Attic. calls him Mabim Latinitatis avtor-rem. Above 30 of his comedies are mentioned by ancient historians, among which are his Nauclerus, Phocius, Epiclerus, Syracusæ. Fœnerator, Fallacia, Pausimachus, &c. He was a native of Gaul, and died at Rome 168 B. C. and was buried on the Janiculum. Horat. 2, ep. 1.

CÆCINA TUSCUS, a son of Nero's nurse, made governor of Egypt. Suet. in Ner.—A Roman who wrote some physical treatises.—A citizen of Volaterra, defended by Cicero.

[CÆCÛBUS AGER, a district in the vicinity of Formiæ and Caieta in Latium, famous for its wines. Pliny (N. H. 14, 6,) informs us that before his time the Cæcuban wine which came from the poplar marshes of Amyclæ was most esteemed, but that at the period when he wrote, it had lost its repute through the negligence of the growers, and partly from the limited extent of the vineyards, which had been nearly destroyed by the navigable canal begun by Nero from the Lake Avernus to Ostia. Galen (Athenæus 1, 21.) describes the Cæcuban as a generous and durable wine, but apt to affect the head, and ripening only after many years. When new it probably belonged to the class of rough sweet wines. It was Horace's favourite, and scarce after the breaking up of the principal vineyards. The best, and at the same time the oldest vintage was the Opimian. L. Opimius Nepos was consul A. U. 633, in which year the excessive heat of the summer caused all the productions of the earth to attain an uncommon degree of perfection. vid. Falernum and Massicus.] Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 20, l. 2, od. 14, &c.

CÆCÛLUS, a son of Vulcan, conceived, as some say, by his mother, when a spark of fire fell into her bosom. He was called Cælus because his eyes were small. After a life spent in plundering and rapine, he built Præneste; but being unable to find inhabitants, he implored Vulcano to show whether he really was his father. Upon this a flame suddenly shone upon a multitude who were assembled to see some spectacle, and they were immediately persuaded to become the subjects of Cæculus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 680, says, that he was found in fire by shepherds, and on that account called son of Vulcan, who is the god of fire.

CÆLIA LEX, [vid. Cœlia Lex.]

CÆLIUS, an orator, disciple to Cicero. He died very young. Cicero defended him when he was accused by Claudius of being accessory to Catiline's conspiracy, and of having murdered some ambassadors from Alexandria, and carried on an illicit amour with Clodia, the wife of Metellus. Orat. pro M. Cal.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Aurelianus, a writer about 300 years after Christ, the best edition of whose works is that of Almeloveen, Amst. 1722 and 1755.—L. Antipater, wrote an history of Rome, which M. Brutus epitomized, and which Adrian preferred to the histories of Sallust. Cælius flourished 120 years B. C.

It received its name from [Cœles Vibenna, a Tuscan leader, who came to the assistance of the Romans against the Sabines, and obtained this hill for himself and his followers to dwell on]

[CÆNE or CÆNOPOLIS, vid. Tænarus.]

[CÆNE or CÆNOPÓLIS, a town of Egypt, in the Panopolitan nome, supposed to be the present Ghenné or Kenné.]

CÆNIDES, a patronymic of Eetion, as descended from Cæneus. Herodot. 5, c. 92.

CÆNINA, a town of Latium near Rome, [placed by Cluverius on the banks of the Anio.] The inhabitants, called Cæninenses, made war against the Romans when their virgins had been stolen away. [Their king was slain, their army defeated, their city razed to the ground, and themselves removed to Rome. vid. Opima Spolia, and Romulus.] Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 135.—Propert. 4, el. 11, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

CÆNIS, a promontory of Italy, [in the country of the Bruttii, north of Rhegium, and opposite Messana on the straits of Sicily,] a distance of about one mile and a half.

CÆNIS, a Thessalian woman, daughter of Elatus, who, being forcibly ravished by Nepertune, obtained from the god the power to change her sex, and to become invulnerable. She also changed her name, and was called Cæneus. In the wars of the Lapithæ against the Centauri she offended Jupiter, and was overwhelmed with a huge pile of wood, and changed into a bird.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 72 and 479.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 448, says that she returned again to her pristine form.

CÆRE, or CÆRES, anciently ARGYLLA, now Cer-veteri, a city of Etruria, once the capital of the whole country. It was in being in the age of Strabo. When Æneas came to Italy, Mezentius was king over the inhabitants called Cæretes or Cærites; but they banished their prince, and assisted the Trojans. The people of Cære received with all possible hospitality the Romans who fled with the fire of Vesta, when the city was besieged by the Gauls, and for this humanity they were made citizens of Rome, but without the privilege of voting; [whence the phrases, in Cæritum tabulas referre aliquem, to deprive one of his right of voting, and Cærite cera digni; to denote worthless persons. This last phrase however does not often occur.] Virg. Æn. 8 and 10.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Strab. 5.

CÆSAR, a surname given to the Julian family at Rome. [Various etymologies have been assigned to it. Pliny (N. H. 7, 9,) informs us that the first who bore the name was so called, quod caso mortuæ matris utero natus fuerit. Festus derives it from cæsaries. eum quæ matris ventre prodierit. Others, because the first of the name slew an elephant, which is called cæsa in Punic, as Servius informs us, (ad Æn. 1, 290.) The derivation of Pliny is the best.] This name, after it had been dignified in the person of Julius Cæsar and of his successors, was given to the apparent heir of the empire in the age of the Roman emperors. The twelve first Roman emperors were distinguished by the surname of Cæsar. They reigned in the following order: Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian. In Domitian, or rather in Nero, the family of Julius Cæsar was extinguished. But after such a lapse of time, the appellation of Cæsar seemed inseparable from the imperial dignity, and therefore it was assumed by the successors of the Julian family. Suetonius has written an account of these twelve characters, in an extensive and in partial manner.—C. Julius Cæsar, the first emperor of Rome, was son of L. Cæsar, and Aurelia the daughter of Cotta. He was descended, according to some accounts, from Julius the son of Æneas. When he reached his 15th year he lost his father, and the year after he was made priest of Jupiter. Sylla was aware of his ambition and endeavoured to remove him; but Cæsar understood his intentions, and to avoid discovery, changed every day his lodgings. He was received into Sylla's friendship some time after; and the dictator told those who solicited the advancement of young Cæsar, that they were warm in the interest of a man who would prove, some day or other, the ruin of their country and of their liberty. When Cæsar went to finish his studies at Rhodes under Apollonius Molo, he was seized by pirates, who offered him his liberty for 30 talents. He gave them 40, and threatened to revenge their insults; and he no sooner was out of their power, than he armed a ship, pursued them, and crucified them all. His eloquence procured him friends at Rome; and the generous manner in which he lived equally served to promote his interest. He obtained the office of high-priest at the death of Metellus; and after he had passed through the inferior employments of the state, he was appointed over Spain, where he signalized himself by his valour and intrigues. At his return to Rome he was made consul, and soon after he effected a reconciliation between Crassus and Pompey. He was appointed for the space of five years over the Gauls, by the interest of Pompey, to whom he had given his daughter Julia in marriage. Here he enlarged the boundaries of the Roman empire by conquest, and invaded Britain, which was then unknown to the Roman people. He checked the Germans, and soon after had his government over Gaul prolonged for five other years, by means of his friends at Rome. The death of Julia and of Crassus, the corrupted state of the Roman senate, and the ambition of Cæsar and Pompey, soon became the causes of a civil war. Neither of these celebrated Romans would suffer a superior, and the smallest matters were sufficient ground for unsheathing the sword. Cæsar's petitions were received with coldness or indifference by the Roman senate; and by the influence of Pompey, a decree was passed to strip him of his power. Antony, who opposed it as tribune, fled to Cæsar's camp with the news; and the ambitious general no sooner heard this than he made it a plea of resistance. On pretence of avenging the violence which had been offered to the sacred office of tribune in the person of Antony, he crossed the Rubicon, which was the boundary of his province. [No Roman commander was allowed to pass the Rubicon with an armed force, as they entered then upon the immediate jurisdiction of the senate and people.] The passage of the Rubicon was in fact, therefore, a declaration of war, and Cæsar entered Italy sword in hand. Upon this Pompey, with all the friends of liberty, left Rome, and retired to Dyrrachium; and Cæsar, after he had subdued all Italy, in 60 days, entered Rome, and provided himself with money from the public treasury. He went to Spain, where he conquered the partizans of Pompey under Petreius, Afranius, and Varro; and, at his return to Rome, was declared dictator, and soon after consul. When he left Rome he went in quest of Pompey, observing that he was marching against a general without troops after having defeated troops without a general in Spain. In the plains of Pharsalia [in Thessaly.] B. C. 48, the two hostile generals engaged; Pompey was conquered, and fled into Egypt where he was murdered. Cæsar, after he had made a noble use of victory, pursued his adversary into Egypt, where he for some time forgot his fame and character in the arms of Cleopatra, by whom he had a son. His danger was great while at Alexandria; but he extricated himself with wonderful success, and made Egypt tributary to his power. After several conquests in Africa, the defeat of Cato, Scipio, and Juba [at Thapsus,] and that of Pompey's sons in Spain, [at unda,] he entered Rome, and triumphed over five different nations, Gaul, Alexandria, Pontus, Africa, and Spain, and was created perpetual dictator. But now his glory was at an end; his uncommon success created him enemies, and the chief of the senators, among whom was Brutus his most intimate friend, conspired against him, and stabbed him in the senate-house on the ides of March. He died, pierced with 23 wounds, the 15th of March, B. C. 44, in the 56th year of his age. Casca gave him the first blow, and immediately he attempted to make some resistance; but when he saw Brutus among the conspirators, he submitted to his fate, and fell down at their feet, muffling up his mantle, and exclaiming, Tu quoque Brute! Cæsar might have escaped the sword of the conspirators if he had listened to the advice of his wife, whose dreams, on the night previous to the day of his murder, were alarming. He also received, as he went to the senate-house, a paper from Artemidorus, which discovered the whole conspiracy to him; but he neglected the reading of what might have saved his life. When he was in his first campaign in Spain, he was observed to gaze at a statue of Alexander, and even shed tears at the recollection that that hero had conquered the world at an age in which he himself had done nothing. The learning of Cæsar deserves commendation as well as his military character. He reformed the calendar. He wrote his commentaries on the Gallic wars on the spot where he fought his battles; and the composition has been admired for the elegance as well as the correctness of its style. This valuable book was nearly lost; and when Cæsar saved his life in the bay of Alexandria, he was obliged to swim from his ship with his arms in one hand and his commentaries in the other. The history of the war in Alexandria and Spain is attributed to him by some, and by others to Hirtius. [It has been affirmed that Cæsar did not write the three books of the civil war, and even that Suetonius was the author of the seven books on the Gallic war. But Vossius has vindicated Cæsar's title to the authorship of the Commentaries as they stand in the editions, though he does not vouch for his accuracy or veracity on all occasions. The opinion that the extant commentaries are not Cæsar's may possibly have arisen from a confusion of circumstances between two works. It is believed that he wrote Ephemerides, containing a journal of his life; but they are lost. Servius quotes them, as does also Plutarch. Frontinus likewise seems to refer to them, since he relates many of Cæsar's stratagems not mentioned in the commentaries, and must in all probability have read them in the journal. The question, when Cæsar wrote his commentaries, has been frequently agitated. Guischart, (Mem. Crit. p. 539,) is in favour of the common opinion, viz. that they were written shortly after the events themselves, 1. Because Cicero, in his Brutus, a work written before the civil war, speaks of the commentaries of Cæsar. 2. Because if Cæsar had written his commentaries after the civil war was ended, there would not have been a lacuna after the 6th Book, to be supplied by Hirtius. 3. Because Cæsar had little leisure at his disposal after the civil war. Cæsar wrote other books, especially one on the analogies of the Latin tongue. A few fragments remain, which do not impress us with a very high opinion of this performance.] Cæsar has been blamed for his debaucheries and expenses; and the first year he had a public office his debts were rated at 330 talents, which his friends discharged; yet, in his public character, he must be reckoned one of the few heroes that rarely make their appearance among mankind. His qualities were such that in every battle he could not but be conqueror, and in every republic, master; and to his sense of his superiority over the rest of the world, or to his ambition, we are to attribute his saying, that he wished rather to be first in a village than second at Rome. It was after his conquest over Pharnaces [the son of Mithridates, at Zele in Pontus,] in one day, that he made use of these remarkable words to express the celerity of his operations: Veni, vidi, vici. Conscious of the services of a man who, in the intervals of peace, beautified and enriched the capital of his country with public buildings, libraries, and porticoes, the senate permitted the dictator to wear a laurel crown on his bald head; and it is said, that, to reward his benevolence, they were going to give him the title or authority of king all over the Roman empire, except Italy, when he was murdered. In his private character, Cæsar has been accused of seducing one of the vestal virgins, and suspected of being privy to Catiline's conspiracy. It is said that he conquered 300 nations, took 800 cities, and defeated three millions of men, one of which fell in the field of battle. Plin. 7, c. 25, says that he could employ at the same time, his ears to listen, his eyes to read, his hand to write, and his mind to dictate. His death was preceded, as many authors mention, by uncommon prodigies; and immediately after his death a large comet made its appearance. The best editions of Cæsar's commentaries, are the magnificent one by Dr. Clarke, fol. Lond. 1712; that of Cambridge, with a Greek translation, to 1727; that of Oudendorp, 2 volumes 4to. L. Bat. 1737; and that of Elzevir, 8vo. L. Bat. 1635; [to which may be added that of Oberlinus, Lips. 1819, 8vo.] Sueton. & Plut. in vita.—Dio.—Appian.—Orisius.—Diod. 16 and ecl. 31 and 37.—*Virg. CAICĪNUS, [a river of Italy in Bruttium, near the Epizephyrian Locri. It was in the vicinity of this river that the Athenians invaded the territory of the Locrians. Thucyd. 3, c. 103.]

CAICUS, a river of Mysia, falling into the Ægean sea, opposite Lesbos; [on its banks stood the city of Pergamus, and at its mouth the port of Elæa. It is supposed by some to be the present Girmasti. According to Manert, its modern name is the Mandragoræi. vid. Mysius.] Virg. G. 4, v. 370.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 243.

CAIĒTA, a town and harbour of [Latium, south-east of the promontory of Circæii,] which received its name from Caieta, the nurse of Æneas, who was buried there. [This is a mere fable: Æneas never was in Italy. Equally objectionable is the etymology of Aurelius Victor, who derives the name from καίειν, to burn, because the fleet of Æneas was burnt here: as if the Trojans spoke Greek! Strabo furnishes the best explanation. It comes, according to him from a Laconian term, denoting a hollow or cavity; in allusion perhaps to a receding of the shore. It is now Gaeta.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 1.

CAIUS and CAIA, a prænomen very common at Rome to both sexes. [In this word, and also in Cnerus, the C must be pronounced like G. Quintil. 1, 7.] C, in its natural position, denoted the man's name, and when reversed it implied Caia. [Female prænomena, which were marked with an inverted capital, were early disused among the Romans. The custom after this was, in case there was only one daughter, to name her after the gens. If there were two, to distinguish them by major and minor added to their names; if there were more than two, they were distinguished by their number, Primo, Secundo, &c. Thus, in the first case, Tullia the daughter of Cicero, Julia the daughter of Cæsar; and in the second, Cornelia Major, Cornelia Minor, &c.] Quintil. 1, c. 7.

Q. CALĀBER, called also Smyrnæus, wrote a Greek poem in 14 books, as a continuation of Homer's Iliad, about the beginning of the third century. The best editions of this elegant and well written book are that of Rhodoman, 12mo. Hanover, 1604, with the notes of Dausqueius, and that of Pauw, 8vo. L. Bat. 1734.

CALABRĪA, a country of Italy in Magna Græcia. [Its name is supposed to have been derived from the oriental "Kalab" or pitch, on account of the resin obtained from the pines of this country. It was also called Mes-sapia, and Japygia.] The poet Ennius was born there at Rudia. The country was fertile, and produced a variety of fruits, much cattle, and excellent honey. *Virg. CALĀNUS, a celebrated Indian philosopher, one of the gymnosophists. He followed Alexander in his Indian expedition, and being sick, in his 83d year, he ordered a pile to be raised, upon which he mounted, decked with flowers and garlands, to the astonishment of the king and of the army. When the pile was fired, Alexander asked him whether he had any thing to say: "No," said he, "I shall meet you again in a very short time." CALCHAS, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Thestor. He accompanied the Greeks to Troy in the office of high-priest; and he informed them that that city could not be taken without the aid of Achilles, that their fleet could not sail from Aulis before Iphigenia was sacrificed to Diana, and that the plague could not be stopped in the Grecian army before the restoration of Chryseis to her father. He told them also that Troy could not be taken before ten years siege. He had received the power of divination from Apollo. Calchas was informed that as soon as he found a man more skilled than himself in divination, he must perish; and this happened near Colophon, after the Trojan war. He was unable to tell how many figs were in the branches of a certain fig-tree; and when Mopsus mentioned the exact number Calchas died through grief. *vid. Mopsus. Homer. CALĒNUS, a famous soothsayer of Etruria, in the age of Tarquin. *Plin. 28, c. 2.—*A lieutenant of Cæsar's army. After Cæsar's murder, he concealed some that had been proscribed by the triumvirs, and behaved with great honour to them. Plut. in Cæs.

CALES, vid. Cale.

CALĒTE, a people of Belgic Gaul, now Pays de Caux, in Normandy. Cæs. Bell. G. 2, c. 4. [Their capital was Julibona, now Lillebonne.]

[CALDIUS, L. Julius, a man remarkable for his riches, the excellency of his character, his learning and poetical abilities. He was proscribed by Volumnius, but delivered by Atticus. C. Nep. in Attic. 12.

C. CALIGŪLA, the emperor, received this surname from his wearing in the camp, the Caliga, [a kind of shoe or covering for the feet, used chiefly by the common soldiers.] He was son of Germanicus by Agrippina, and grandson to Tiberius, [born A. U. C. 765. A. D. 12.] During the first eight months of his reign, Rome expected universal prosperity, the exiles were recalled, taxes were remitted, and profligates dismissed; but Caligula soon became proud, wanton, and cruel.

He built a temple to himself, and ordered his head to be placed on the images of the gods, while he wished to imitate the thunders and power of Jupiter. The statues of all great men were removed, as if Rome would sooner forget her virtues in their absence; and the emperor appeared in public places in the most indecent manner, encouraged roguery, committed incest with his three sisters, and established public places of prostitution. He often amused himself with putting innocent people to death; he attempted to famish Rome by a monopoly of corn; and as he was well pleased with the greatest disasters which befel his subjects, he often wished the Romans had but one head, that he might have the gratification to strike it off. Wild beasts were constantly fed in his palace with human victims, and a favourite horse, [named Incitatus, had a palace erected for him, domestics assigned, and a marble stable and ivory rack made; while gilt barley was given to him and wine out of a golden cup. Caligula is even said to have intended him for the consulship. In imitation of Xerxes, he built a bridge of boats across the bay from Baia to Puteoli,] and would perhaps have shown himself more tyrannical, had not Chæreas, [a tribune of a prætorian cohort,] formed a conspiracy against his life, with others equally tired with the cruelties and the insults that were offered with impunity to the persons and feelings of the Romans. In consequence of this, the tyrant was murdered January 24th, in his 29th year, after a reign of three years and ten months, A. D. 41. It has been said that Caligula wrote a treatise on rhetoric; but his love of learning is better understood from his attempts to destroy the writings of Homer, Virgil, and Livy. *Dio.—Sueton. in vitâ.—Tacit. CALLAICI [or CALLÆCI, a people of Spain, in the north-western part of the country, They inhabited what is now Gallicia, together with the Portuguese provinces of Entre-Douro-y-Minho and Tras-los-Montes.] Ovid. 6, Fast. v. 461.

CALLE, a sea-port town of [the Callaici, at the mouth of the Dourius. It is now Oporto. From Portus Calles comes by corruption the name of modern Portugal.]

CALLIAS, an Athenian, appointed to make peace between Artaxerxes and his country. *Diod. 12.—*A Greek poet, son of Lysimachus. His compositions are lost. He was surnamed Schœnion from his twisting ropes (σχοινοῦς) through poverty. *Athen. 10.—*A partial historian of Syracuse. He wrote an account of the Sicilian wars, and was well rewarded by Agathocles, because he had shown him in a favourable view. Athen. 12.—Dionys.—A rich Athenian, who liberated Cimon from prison on condition of marrying Elpinice his sister and wife. [Cimon consented, but with great reluctance. He was afterwards charged with having violated the terms of his agreement with Callias, which was looked upon by the Athenians as adultery on his part, Elpinice having become the property of another. This custom of marrying sisters at Athens extended, according to Philo Judæus, only to sisters by the same father, and was forbidden in the case of sisters by the same mother. Elpinice was taken in marriage by Cimon, because, in consequence of his extreme poverty, he was unable to provide a suitable match for her. The Lacedæmonians were forbidden to marry any of their kindred, whether in the direct degrees of ascent or descent; but in the case of a collateral it was allowed. Several of the barbarous nations seem to have been less scrupulous on this head; the Persians especially were remarkable for such unnatural unions.] C. Nep. and Plut. in Cim.—An historian, who wrote an explanation of the poems of Alcæus and Sappho.

CALLICÆRUS, a Greek poet, some of whose epigrams are preserved in the Anthologia.

CALLICHŌRUS, a place of Phocis, where the orgies of Bacchus were yearly celebrated.

CALLICLES, an Athenian, whose house was not searched, on account of his recent marriage, when an inquiry was made after the money given by Harpalus, &c. [Ulpian (Pandect. 2.) states that a newly-married man was not liable also to be summoned into court.] Plut. in Demosth.

CALLICOLŌNE, [a rocky hill near the Simois, about 60 stadia, as is supposed by geographers, from the mouth of the Scamander. Strabo speaks of it as a hill of 5 stadia, but whether he means by this to express its circumference at the base, or its diameter, is not evident. Thus much, however, is certain that the rocky hill which Chevalier found near Bounabarchi, is very applicable to Callicolone as described by Strabo.]

CALLICRATES, an Athenian, who seized upon the sovereignty of Syracuse, by imposing upon Dion when he had lost his popularity. He was expelled by the sons of Dionysius after reigning thirteen months. He is called Callippus by some authors. C. Nep. in Dion.—An officer intrusted with the care of the treasures of Susa by Alexander. Curt. 5, c. 2.—An artist, who made, with ivory, ants and other insects so small that they could scarcely be seen. It is said that he engraved some of Homer's verses upon a grain of millet. Plin. 7, c. 21.—Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 17.—A Syrian, who wrote an account of Aurelian's life.

CALLICRATIDAS, a Spartan, who succeeded Lysander in the command of the fleet. He took Methymna, and routed the Athenian fleet under Conon. He was defeated and killed near the Arginusæ, in a naval battle, B. C. 406. Diod. 13.—Xenoph. Hist. G.—One of the four ambassadors sent by the Lacedæmonians to Darius, upon the rupture of their alliance with Alexander. Curt. 3, c. 13.—A Pythagorean writer.

CALLIDIUS, a celebrated Roman orator, contemporary with Cicero, who speaks of his abilities with commendation. Cic. in Brut. 274.—Patere. 2, c. 36.

CALLIDRŌMUS, a place near Thermopylæ. Thucyd. 8, c. 6.

CALLIMACHUS, an historian and poet of Cyrene, son of Battus and Mesatma, and pupil to Hecrates the grammarian. He had, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, kept a school at Alexandria, and had Apollonius of Rhodes among his pupils, whose ingratitude obliged Callimachus to lash him severely in a satirical poem, under the name of Ibis. (vid. Apollonius.) The Ibis of Ovid is an imitation of this piece. He wrote a work in 120 books on famous men, besides treatises on birds; but of all his numerous compositions only 31 epigrams, an elegy, and some hymns on the gods, are extant; the best editions of which are that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1761, and that of [Blomfield, Lond. 1815, 8vo.] Propertius styled himself the Roman Callimachus. The precise time of his death, as well as of his birth, is unknown. Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 65.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 84.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 109.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—An Athenian [polemarch,] killed in the battle of Marathon. His body was found in an erect posture, all covered with wounds. Plut.—A Colophonian, who wrote the life of Homer. Plut.

CALLINUS, an orator, who is said to have first invented elegiac poetry, B. C. 776. Some of his verses are to be found in Stobæus. Athen.—Strab. 13.

CALLIŌPE, one of the muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, who presided over eloquence and heroic poetry. [She received her name from her beautiful voice, απο της καλης οπης.] She is said to have been the mother of Orpheus by Apollo, and Horace supposes her able to play on any musical instrument. She was represented with a trumpet in her right hand, and with books in the other, which signified that her office was to take notice of the famous actions of heroes, as Clio was employed in celebrating them; and she held the three most famous epic poems of antiquity, and appeared generally crowned with laurels. She settled the dispute between Venus and Proserpine concerning Adonis, whose company these two goddesses wished both perpetually to enjoy. [vid. Musæ.] Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Horat. Od.

CALLIPATIRA, a daughter of Diagoras, and wife of Callianax the athlete, went disguised in man's clothes, with her son Pisidorus, to the Olympic games. When Pisidorus was declared victor, she betrayed her sex through excess of joy, and was arrested, as women were not permitted to appear there on pain of death. The victory of her son obtained her release; and a law was instantly made, which forbade any wrestlers to appear but naked. Paus. 5, c. 6, l. 6, c. 7.

CALLIPHON, a painter of Samos, famous for his historical pieces. Plin. 10, c. 6.—A philosopher who made the summum bonum consist in pleasure joined to the love of honesty. This system was opposed by Cicero. Quæst. Acad. 4, c. 131 and 139. de Offic. 3, c. 119.

CALLIPHON, a celebrated dancing-master, who had Epaminondas among his pupils. C. Nep. in Epam.

CALLIPOLIS, a city of Thrace on the Hellespont, [opposite Lampsaacus. It is now Gallipoli.] Sil. 14, v. 250.—A town of Sicily, [north of Catania, now Gallipoli also.]—A city of Calabria, on the coast of Tarentum, on a rocky island, joined by a bridge to the continent. It is now called Gallipoli, and contains 6000 inhabitants who trade in oil and cotton.

CALLIPUS, or CALIPPUS, an Athenian, disciple to Plato. vid. Callicrates. C. Nep. in Dion.—A Corinthian, who wrote an history of Orchomenos. Paus. 6, c. 29.—A general of the Athenians when the Gauls invaded Greece by Thermopylæ. Paus. 1, c. 3.

CALLIRHŒ, a daughter of the Scamander, who married Tros, by whom she had Ius, Ganymede, and Assaracus.—A fountain of Attica where Callirhoe killed herself. vid. Coresus. Paus. 7, c. 21.—Stat. 12, Theb. v. 629.—A daughter of Lycus tyrant of Libya, who kindly received Diomedes at his return from Troy. He abandoned her, upon which she killed herself.—A daughter of the Achelous who married Alcmaeon. vid. Alcmaeon. Paus. 8, c. 24.—A daughter of Phocus the Bœotian, whose beauty procured her many admirers. Her father behaved with such coldness to her lovers that they murdered him. Callirhoe avenged his death with the assistance of the Bœotians. Plut. Amat. Narr.

CALLISTE, an island of the Ægean sea, called afterwards Thera, [and now Santorin. vid. Thera.] Plin. 4, c. 12.—Paus. 3, c. 1.

CALLISTEIA, [Beauty's rewards,] a festival at Lesbos, during which all the women presented themselves in the temple of Juno, and the fairest was rewarded in a public manner. There was also an institution of the same kind among the Parrhasians, first made by Cypselus, whose wife was honoured with the first prize. The Eleans had one also, in which the fairest man received as a prize a complete suit of armour, which he dedicated to Minerva.

CALLISTHÈNES, a Greek who wrote an history of his own country in 10 books, beginning from the peace between Artaxerxes and Greece, down to the plundering of the temple of Delphi by Philomelus. Diod. 14.—A philosopher of Ælynthus, intimate with Alexander, whom he accompanied in his oriental expedition in the capacity of a preceptor, and to whom he had been recommended by his friend and master Aristotle. He refused to pay divine honours to the king, for which he was accused of conspiracy, mutilated and exposed to wild beasts, dragged about in chains, till Lysimachus gave him poison which ended together his tortures and his life, B. C. 328. None of his compositions are extant. Curt. 8, c. 6.—Plut. in Alex.—Arrian. 4.—Justin. 12, c. 6 and 7.—A writer of Sybaris.—A freedman of Lucullus. It is said that he gave poison to his master. Plut. in Lucull.

CALLISTO and CALISTO, called also Helice, was daughter of Lycaon king of Arcadia, and one of Diana's attendants. Jupiter saw her, and seduced her after he had assumed the shape of Diana. Her pregnancy was discovered as she bathed with Diana; and the fruit of her amour with Jupiter, called Arcas, was hid in the woods and preserved. Juno, who was jealous of Jupiter, changed Calisto into a bear; but the god, apprehensive of her being hurt by the huntsmen, made her a constellation of heaven, with her son Arcas, under the name of the bear. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 4, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 8.—Hygin. fab. 176 and 177.—Paus. 8, c. 3.

CALLISTONICUS, a celebrated statuary at Thebes. Paus. 9, c. 16.

CALLISTRATUS, an Athenian, appointed general with Timotheus and Chabrias against Lacedæmon. Diod. 15.—An orator of Aphidna, in the time of Epaminondas, the most eloquent of his age.—An Athenian orator, with whom Demosthenes made an intimate acquaintance after he had heard him plead. Xenoph.—A Greek historian praised by Dionys. Hal.—A comic poet, rival of Aristophanes.

CALOR, now Calore, a river in Italy [which rose in the mountains of the Hirpini, passed Beneventum, and joined the Volturnus.] Liv. 14, c. 14.

CALPE, a lofty mountain in the most southern parts of Spain, opposite to mount Abyla, on the African coast. These two mountains were called the pillars of Hercules. Calpe is now called Gibraltar, [from the Arabic Gibel Tarik, or mountain of Tarik, a Moorish general, who first led the Moors into Spain, A. D. 710.—The modern name of Abyla is Ceuta. Calpe is styled by Strabo a famous Spanish sea-port, while other ancient geographers call it a mountain. Probably there was a town of the same name at the foot of the mountain.]

CALPURNIUS BESTIA, a noble Roman bribed by Jugurtha. Sall. B. Jug.—Crassus, a patrician, who went with Regulus against the Massyli. He was seized by the enemy as he attempted to plunder one of their towns, and he was ordered to be sacrificed to Neptune. Bisaltia, the king's daughter, fell in love with him, and gave him an opportunity of escaping and conquering her father. Calpurnius returned victorious, and Bisaltia destroyed herself.—Piso, condemned for using seditious words against Tiberius. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 21.—Titus, a Latin poet, born in Sicily in the age of Dioclesian, seven of whose eclogues are extant, and generally found with the works of the poets who have written on hunting. Though abounding in many beautiful lines, they are however greatly inferior to the elegance and simplicity of Virgil. The best editions are that of Kempher, 4to. L. Bat. 1723, [and that of Beck, Lips. 1803, 8vo.]

rived from Calpus son of Numa. It branched into the families of the Pisones, Bibuli, Cæsennini, Asprenates, &c. Plin. in Num.

CALPURNIA LEX, enacted A. U. C. 601, to punish such as were found guilty of using bribes, &c.

CALPURNIA, the daughter of Calpurnius Piso and wife of Julius Cæsar. Plutarch relates that on the night before Cæsar's murder, as the Roman was sleeping in his chamber, the doors and windows of the room suddenly flew open. Cæsar, disturbed both by the noise and light, observed by the moonshine Calpurnia in a deep sleep, uttering broken words and inarticulate groans. She dreamed that she was weeping over him, as she held him murdered in her arms. Others say, adds the biographer, that she dreamt the pinnacle of the house had fallen, which the senate, by way of ornament and distinction, had ordered to be erected on Cæsar's house, and that it was this which occasioned her sobbing and tears. The next morning she conjured Cæsar not to go out that day if he could possibly avoid it, but to adjourn the senate. Cæsar, alarmed by this sudden weakness in Calpurnia, was at first inclined to accede to her request, [but Decimus Brutus, who was himself implicated in the conspiracy, prevailed on him to go to the senate-house.] —A favourite of the emperor Claudius, &c. Tacit. Ann.

CALUSIDIUS, a soldier in the army of Germanicus. When this general wished to stab himself with his own sword [in order to work upon the better feelings of the Roman soldiery, while quelling a sedition among them,] Calusidius offered him his own, observing that his was sharper. Tacit. 1, Ann. c. 35.

CALVUS CORN. LICINIUS, a famous orator, equally known for writing iambics. As he was both facetious and satirical, he did not fail to excite attention by his animadversions upon Cæsar and Pompey, and, from his eloquence, to dispute the palm of oratory with Cicero. Cic. ep.—Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 19.

CALYCADNUS, [a river of Cilicia Trachea, which flowed into the sea between the two promontories of Zephyrium and Sarpedon. It is now the Yersak.]

CAIÏCE, a daughter of Æolus, son of Hellenus and Enaretta daughter of Deimachus. She had Endymion, king of Elis, by Æthlius the son of Jupiter. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 1.—A Grecian girl, who fell in love with a youth called Evathlus. As she was unable to gain the object of her love, she threw herself from the precipice of Leucate. This tragical story was made into a song by Stesichorus, and was still extant in the age of Athenæus, 14.

CALYDNA, [a single island, according to Steph. Byzant. but a groupe of islands according to Homer. Some suppose that the poet means the Sporades. Strabo maintains that he means the two islands of Calymna and Leros, north of Cos. D'Anville supposes that they are two rocks, which are still found, one before, and the other to the right of the port of Tenedos.]

CALYDON, a city of Ætolia, where Cæneus, the father of Meleager, reigned, [situate on the river Evenus which flows through it,] and it receives its name from Calydon the son of Ætolus. During the reign of Cæneus, Diana sent a wild boar to ravage the country, on account of the neglect which had been shown to her divinity by the king. All the princes of the age assembled to hunt this boar, which is greatly celebrated by the poets, under the name of the chase of Calydon, or the Calydonian boar. Meleager killed the animal with his own hand, and gave the head to Atalanta, of whom he was enamoured. The skin of the boar was preserved, and was still seen in the age of Pausanias in the temple of Minerva Alea. The tusks were also preserved by the Arcadians in Tegea, and Augustus carried them away to Rome because the people of Tegea had followed the party of Antony. These tusks were shown for a long time at Rome. One of them was about half an ell long, and the other was broken. vid. Meleager and Atalanta. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 8, c. 45.—Strab. 8.—Homer. Il. 9, v. 577.—Hygin. fab. 174.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 4, &c.—A son of Ætolus and Pronoe daughter of Phorbas. He gave his name to a town of Ætolia.

CALYMNE, [an island of the Ægean, north-west of Cos, now Calmine. Strabo praises the flavour of its honey. It was one of the Sporades.] Art. Am. 2, v. 81.

CALYNDA, a town of Caria. Ptol. 5, c. 3.

CALYPSO, one of the Oceanides, or one of the daughters of Atlas according to some, was goddess of silence, and reigned in the island of Ogygia, whose situation and even existence is doubted. [Some make Calypso's island to be Ogygia in the Ionian sea, off the Lacinian promontory; others are for Aea; and a third class contend for a small island opposite Puteoli. The truth is, Homer knew very little north of Sicily, and the most rational conclusion appears to be, that Calypso's island, placed by him in the "navel of the sea," is a mere creation of the poet's fancy. Mannert's Anc. Geogr. Vol. 4, p. 23.] When Ulysses was shipwrecked on her coasts, she received him with great hospitality, and offered him immortality if he would remain with her as a husband. The hero refused, and after seven years' delay, he was permitted to depart from the island by order of Mercury, the messenger of Jupiter. During his stay, Ulysses had two sons by Calypso, Nausithous and Nausinous. Calypso was inconsolable at the departure of Ulysses. Homer. Od. 7 and 15.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 360.—Ovid. de Pont. 4, ep. 18. Amor. 2, el. 17.—Propert. 1, el. 15.

CAMALODUNUM, a Roman colony in Britain, [the first which was established in the island under Claudius. Its situation agrees with that of Colchester.]

[CAMARACUM, a town of Belgic Gaul, now Cambray.]

CAMARINA, a lake of Sicily, with a town of the same name, built B. C. 552. It was destroyed by the Syracusans, and rebuilt by a certain Hipponous. [The lake in time of drought yielded a stench which produced a pestilence, and the inhabitants consulted an oracle whether they should drain it. Although the oracle dissuaded them, they drained it, and opened a way to their enemies to come and plunder their city. Hence arose the proverb, from the words of the oracle, Μη κινῆς Καμαρίναν, "ne moveas Camarinum," applied to those who by removing one evil will bring on a greater. Nothing now remains of this city but some ruins, and the name Camariana, given by the natives to a tower and a neighbouring marsh.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 791.—Strab. 6.—Herodot. 7, c. 134.

CAMBRE, a place near Puteoli. Juv. 7, v. 154.

CAMBUVII, mountains of Macedonia, [below the sources of the Aliacmon, and separating Elymiotis from Pelagonia.] Liv. 42, c. 53.

CAMBÏSES, king of Persia, was son of Cyrus the Great. He conquered Egypt, and was so offended at the superstition of the Egyptians, that he killed their god Apis and plundered their temples. When he wished to take Pelusium, he placed at the head of his army a number of cats and dogs; and the Egyptians refusing, in an attempt to defend themselves, to kill animals which they revered as divinities, became an easy prey to the enemy. [Cambyses afterwards sent an army of 50,000 men from Thebes in upper Egypt to destroy the temple of Jupiter Ammon; but, in their passage through the desert, they were overwhelmed by the sands. He himself advanced with his main army against the Ethiopians, but was compelled to return through want of provisions. To make amends for these failures, he plundered and destroyed the famous city of Thebes.] He killed his brother Smerdis from mere suspicion, and flayed alive a partial judge, whose skin he nailed to the judgment-seat, and appointed his son to succeed him, telling him to remember where he sat. He died of a small wound he had given himself with his sword as he mounted on horseback, [when hastening home to punish Smerdis, one of the Magi, who had seized the throne under a pretence of being that Smerdis whom Cambyses had ordered to be put to death. An oracle, it is said, had predicted that he should die at Ecbatana, which Cambyses always thought meant the capital of Media; but it seems that the small place in Syria, near which he received the wound in his thigh, was also named Ecbatana.] His death happened 521 years before Christ. He left no issue to succeed him. Herodot. 2, 3, &c.—Justin. 1, c. 9.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—A person of obscure origin, to whom king Astyages gave his daughter Mandane in marriage. The king, who had been terrified with dreams which threatened the loss of his crown by the hand of his daughter's son, had taken this step in hopes that the children of so ignoble a bed would ever remain in obscurity. He was disappointed. Cyrus, Mandane's son, dethroned him when grown to manhood. Herodot. 1, c. 46, 107, &c.—Justin. 1, c. 4.—A river of Asia which flows from Mount Caucasus into the Cyrus. Mela. 3, c. 5.

CAMERINUM and CAMERTIUM, a town of Umbria, very faithful to Rome. The inhabitants were called Camertes. Liv. 9, c. 36.

CAMÉRINUS, a Latin poet, who wrote a poem on the taking of Troy by Hercules. Onid. 4, ex Pont. el. 16, v. 19.—Some of the family of the Camerini were distinguished for their zeal as citizens, as well as for their abilities as scholars, among whom was Sulpicius, commissioned by the Roman senate to go to Athens to collect the best of Solon's laws. Juv. 7, v. 90.

CAMILLA, queen of the Volsci, was daughter of Metabus and Casmilla. She was educated in the woods, inured to the labours of hunting, and fed upon the milk of mares. Her father devoted her, when young, to the service of Diana. When she was declared queen, she marched at the head of an army, and accompanied by three youthful females of equal courage with herself, to assist Turnus against Æneas, were she signalized herself by the numbers that perished by her hand. She was so swift that she could run, or rather fly over a field of corn without bending the blades, and make her way over the sea without wetting her feet. She died by a wound she had received from Aruns. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 803, l. 11, v. 435.

CAMILLI and CAMILLÆ, [boys and girls, of free parents, who ministered in the sacrifices of the Gods, especially those of Jupiter. The word was borrowed from the old Etrurian language, where it was written casmitlus, and signified minister.]

CAMILLUS, (L. Furius,) a celebrated Roman, called a second Romulus, from his services to his country. [He was accused of having embezzled some of the spoils taken at Veii, and, being well aware how the matter would terminate, he prevented the disgrace of a formal condemnation by a voluntary exile. During his exile, Rome, with the exception of the Capitol, was taken by the Gauls under Brennus. Camillus, though an exile, was invited by the fugitive Romans at Veii to take command of them, but refused to act until the wishes of the Romans besieged in the Capitol were known. These unanimously revoked the sentence of exile, and elected him dictator. The noble-minded Roman forgot their previous ingratitude, and marched to the relief of his country, which he delivered, after it had been for some time in the possession of the enemy.] He died in the 80th year of his age, B. C. 365, after he had been five times dictator, once censor, three times interrex, twice a military tribune, and obtained four triumphs. He conquered the Hernici, Volsci, Latini, and Etrurians, and dissuaded his countrymen from their intentions of leaving Rome to reside at Veii. When he besieged Falisci, he rejected, with proper indignation, the offers of a schoolmaster, who had betrayed into his hands the sons of the most worthy citizens. Plut. in vitâ.—Liv. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 13.—Diod. 14.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825.—A name of Mercury

CAMIRO and CLYTIA, two daughters of Pandarus of Crete. When their parents were dead they were left to the care of Venus, who, with the other goddesses, brought them up with tenderness, and asked Jupiter to grant them kind husbands. Jupiter, to punish upon them the crime of their father, who was accessory to the impiety of Tantalus, ordered the harpies to carry them away and deliver them to the furies. Paus. 10, c. 30.—Homer. Od. 26, v. 66.

CAMIRUS and CAMIRA, a town of Rhodes, [on the western coast,] which received its name from Camirus, a son of Hercules and Jole. [There is now a Greek village on its site, called Camiro. vid. Rhodus.] Homer. Il. 2, v. 163.

CAMŒNE, a name given to the muses from the sweetness and melody of their songs, a cantu amano, or, according to Varro, carmen. [According to Varro and Festus, the old orthography was Casmene.] Varro de L. L. 5, c. 7.

CAMPANIA, a country of Italy, [south-east of Latium, sometimes styled from its beauty and fertility, Regio Felix. Capua was the chief town. The modern name is Campagna.] Strab. 5.—Cic. de Leg. Ag. c. 35.—Justin. 20, c. 1, l. 22, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 16.

CAMPE, kept the 100 handed monsters confined in Tartarus. Jupiter killed her, because she refused to give them their liberty to come to his assistance against the Titans. Hesiod. Theog. 500.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.

CAMPASPE, a beautiful concubine of Alexander, whom the king gave to Apelles, who had fallen in love with her as he drew her picture. It is said that from this beauty the painter copied the thousand charms of his Venus Anadyomene. Plin. 35, c. 10.

CAMPI DIOMĒDIS, a plain situate in Apulia. Mart. 13, ep. 93.

CAMPUS MARTIUS, a large plain at Rome, without the walls of the city, where the Roman youths performed their exercises, and learnt to wrestle and box, to throw the discus, hurl the javelin, ride a horse, drive a chariot, &c. The public assemblies were [often] held there, and the officers of state chosen and audience given to foreign ambassadors. It was adorned with statues, columns, arches, and porticoes, and its pleasant situation made it much frequented. It was called Martius because dedicated to Mars. It was sometimes called Tiberinus, from its closeness to the Tiber. It was given to the Roman people by a vestal virgin; but they were deprived of it by Tarquin the Proud, who made it a private field, and sowed corn in it. When Tarquin was driven from Rome, the people recovered it, and threw away into the Tiber, the corn which had grown there, deeming it unlawful for any man to eat of the produce of that land. The sheaves which were thrown into the river stopped in a shallow ford, and by the accumulated collection of mud became firm ground, and formed an island, which was called the Holy Island, or the Island of Æsculapius. Dead carcases were generally burnt in the Campus Martius. [The Campus Martius is the principal situation of modern Rome. The writers of the middle ages use this term for any large plain or open place near a great city.] Strab. 5.—Liv. 2, c. 5, l. 6, c. 20.

CAMŪLUS, a surname of Mars among the Sabines and Etrurians.

CANA, a city and promontory of Æolia, [opposite the south-eastern extremity of Lesbos. Off from it lie the Arginuse insulæ. It is now Cape Colonna.] Mela, 1, c. 18.

[CANARIĀ, the largest of the cluster of islands called by the ancients Beatæ and Fortunatæ insulæ, and now Canary Islands. Some suppose the name of Canaria derived from Canis, a dog, on account of the number of large dogs that were found in the island, two of which were presented to Juba, king of Mauretania; while others deduce the original name from the Canaanites or Phœnicians, who are said to have often sailed from the continent to Carne, supposed to be a contraction of Canaria. vid. Fortunatæ Insulæ.] Plin. 5, c. 1.

CANĀTHUS, a fountain of Nauplia, where Juno yearly washed herself to receive her infant purity. Paus. 2, c. 38.

CANDACE, a queen of Æthiopia, in the age of Augustus, so prudent and meritorious that her successors always bore her name. [Candace is said by the ancient writers to have been always a title for the queens of Æthiopia, and to have implied their sovereign authority. So Pharaoh among the Egyptians.] Plin. 6, c. 22.—Dio. 54.—Strab. 17.

CANDĀVĪA, [a district of Macedonia, bounded on the east by the Candavian mountains, supposed to be the same with the Cambuvii Montes of Livy, and the "Canalvii Montes" of Ptolemy. Lucan. 6, v. 331.]

CANDAULES, or Myrsilus, son of Myrsus, was the last of the Heraclidæ who sat on the throne of Lydia. He showed his wife naked to Gyges, one of his ministers; and the queen was so incensed, that she ordered Gyges to murder her husband, 718 years before the christian era. After this murder, Gyges married the queen and ascended the throne. Justin 1, c. 7.—Herodot. 1, c. 7, &c.—Plut. Symp.

CANENS, a nymph, called also Venilia, daughter of Janus and wife of Picus king of the Laurentes. When Circe had changed her husband into a bird, she lamented so much that she pined away and was changed into a voice. She was reckoned as a deity by the inhabitants. Ovid. Met. 14, fab 9.

CANEPHŌRIA, festivals at Athens in honour of Bacchus, or, according to others, of Diana, in which all marriageable women offered small baskets to the deity, and received the name of Canephoræ, whence statues representing women in that attitude were called by the same appellation. Cic. in Verr. 4.

CANICULARES DIES. [certain days in the summer, preceding and ensuing the heliacal rising of Canicula or the dog-star in the morning. The ancients believed that this star, rising with the sun, and joining his influence to the fire of that luminary, was the cause of the extraordinary heat which usually prevailed in that season; and accordingly they gave the name of dog-days to about 6 or 8 weeks of the hottest part of summer. This idea originated with the Egyptians, and was borrowed from them by the Greeks. The Romans sacrificed a brown dog every year to Canicula, at its rising, to appease its rage.] Manilius.

CANIDIUS, a tribune, who proposed a law to empower Pompey to go only with two licitors, to reconcile Ptolemy and the Alexandrians. Plut. in Pomp.

CANINEFATES, [a people of Germania Superior, of common origin with the Batavi, and inhabiting the western part of the insula Batavorum.] Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 15.

C. CANINIUS REBILUS, a consul with J. Cæsar, after the death of Trebonius. He was consul only for seven hours, because his predecessor died the last day of the year, and he was chosen only for the remaining part of the day; whence Cicero observed, that Rome was greatly indebted to him for his vigilance, as he had not slept during the whole time of his consulship. Cic. 7, ad Fam. ep. 33.—Plut. in Cæs.

CANIUS, a poet of Gades, contemporary withartial. Marl. 1, ep. 62.

CANNÆ a small village of Apulia near the Aufidus, where Annibal conquered the Roman consuls P. Æmilius and Terentius Varro on the 21st of May, B. C. 216. The spot where this famous battle was fought is now shown by the natives, and denominated the field of blood. [The Greek writers, especially Polybius, make the name singular, Καννα. There is an exception to this, however, in the 15th Book, c. 7 and 11, where the plural form is used by Polybius. This decisive victory was owing to three combined causes, the excellent arrangements of Annibal, the superiority of the Numidian horse, and the skilful manœuvre of Asdrubal in opposing only the light armed cavalry against that of the Romans, while he employed the heavy horse, divided into small parties, in repeated attacks on different parts of the Roman rear. The Roman army contained 30,000 infantry and 6000 cavalry, the Carthaginians 40,000 infantry and 10,000 cavalry. Annibal drew up his forces in the form of a convex crescent, having his centre thrown forward before the wings. He commanded in the centre in person, and here he had purposely stationed his worst troops, the best were posted at the extremities of each wing, which would enable them to act with decisive advantage as bodies of reserve, they being in fact in the rear of the other forces. Asdrubal commanded the left wing, Hanno

the right. On the Roman side, want of union among the two consuls, and want of spirit among the men, afforded a sure omen of the fortune of the day. Æmilius commanded the right, Varro the left wing; the proconsuls Regulus and Servius, who had been consuls the preceding year, had charge of the centre. What Annibal foresaw took place. The charge of the Romans, and their immense superiority in numbers, at length broke his centre, which giving way inwards, his army now assumed the shape of a convex crescent. The Romans in the ardour of pursuit were carried so far as to be completely surrounded. Both flanks were assailed by the veterans of Annibal, who were armed in the Roman manner; at the same time the cavalry of the Carthaginians attacked their rear, and the broken centre rallying, attacked them in front. The consequence was that they were nearly all cut to pieces. The two proconsuls, together with Æmilius the consul, were slain. Varro escaped with 70 horse to Venusia. The Romans lost on the field of battle 70,000 men: and 10,000 who had not been present in the fight were made prisoners. The Carthaginian loss amounted to 5,500 infantry and 200 cavalry. Such is the account of Polybius, whose statement of the fight is much clearer and more satisfactory than that of Livy. Annibal has been censured for not marching immediately to Rome after the battle, in which city all was consternation. But a defence of his conduct may be found under the article Annibal, which see. Polyb. 3, c. 113 et seq.—Liv. 22, c. 44.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Plut. in Annib.

CANŌPĪCUM OSTIUM, one of the mouths of the Nile, twelve miles from Alexandria. [Near its termination is the lake Madie or Maadié, denoting in Arabic, passage, which is the remains of this branch. This lake has no communication with the Nile except at the time of its greatest increase. It is merely a salt-water lagoon.] Paus. 5, c. 21.

CANŌPUS, a city of Egypt, twelve miles from Alexandria, celebrated for the temple of Serapis. It was founded by the Spartans, and received its name from Canopus, the pilot of the vessel of Menelaus, who was buried in this place. The inhabitants were dissolute in their manners. Virgil bestows upon it the epithet of Pellæus, [in allusion to the Macedonian conquest of the country. Near the ruins of Canopus is built the modern Aboukir, called by Mariners Bekier] *Ital. 11, v. 433.—Mela, 1, c. 9.—Strab. 17.—Plin. 5, c. 31.—Virg. CANTĀBRI, a ferocious and warlike people of Spain who long resisted the Roman power. Their country answers to Biscay and part of Asturias. Augustus marched in person against them, anticipating an easy victory. The desperate resistance of the Cantabrians, however, induced him to retire to Tarraco, and leave the management of the war to his generals. They were finally reduced, but rebelling soon after, were decreed to be sold as slaves. Most of them, however, preferred falling by their own hands.] Liv. 3, v. 329.—Horat. 2, od. 5 and 11.

CANTABRIÆ LAGUS, a lake among the Cantabri in Spain where a thunderbolt fell, in which twelve axes were found. Suet. in Galb. 8.

CANTHĀRUS, a famous sculptor of Sicily. Paus. 6, c. 17.

CANTIUM, a country in the [south-eastern extremity] of Britain, now called Kent. [The name is derived from the British word cant, signifying an angle or corner.] Cæs. Bell. G. 5.

CANULEIA, one of the first vestals chosen by Numa. Plut.—A law. vid. Canuleius.

C. CANULEIUS, a tribune of the people of Rome, A. U. C. 310, who made a law to render it constitutional for the patricians and plebeians to intermarry. It ordained also that one of the consuls should be yearly chosen from the plebeians. Liv. 4, c. 3, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 17.

CANUSIUM, now Canosa, a town of Apulia, [on the Aufidus,] whither the Romans fled after the battle of Cannæ. It was built by Diomedes, and its inhabitants have been called bilingues because they retained the language of their founder, and likewise adopted that of their neighbours. [That Diomedes built this city is a mere fable, that it was of Greek origin, however, is attested by the epithet the Romans applied to it. It appears to have been originally a place of great trade, and Strabo informs us that the compass of the old walls even in his time plainly shewed that the city had once been a very large one.] Horace complained of the grittiness of their bread. The wools and the cloths of the place were in high estimation. [It was a very splendid city in the reign of Trajan, and afterwards, in consequence of its wealth, suffered severely from the attacks of the barbarians. The present town stands on the foundation of the old citadel, and contains only about 300 houses.] Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 30.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Plin. 8, c. 11.

CANUTIUS TIBERINUS, a tribune of the people, who, like Cicero, furiously attacked Antony when declared an enemy to the state. His satire cost him his life. Patercul. 2, c. 64.

CAPANEUS, a noble Argive, son of Hipponus and Astinome, husband to Evadne. He was so impious, that when he went to the Theban war, he declared that he would take Thebes even in spite of Jupiter. Some contempt provoked the god, who struck him dead with a thunderbolt. His body was burnt separately from the others, and his wife threw herself on the burning pile to mingle her ashes with his. It is said that Æsculapius restored him to life. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 404.—Stat. Theb. 3, &c.—Hygin fab. 68 and 70.—Euripid. in Phœniss. & Supp.—Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.

CAPELLA, an elegiac poet in the age of J. Cæsar. Ovid. de Pont. 4, el. 16, v. 36.—Martianus, a Carthaginian, A. D. 490, who wrote a poem on the marriage of Mercury and Philology, and in praise of the liberal arts. [The best editions are, that of Grotius, L. Bat. 1599, 8vo. and that of Goetz, Norimb. 1794, 8vo.]

CAPĒNA, a gate of ancient Rome, [now the gate of St. Sebastian, south-east of modern Rome.] Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 192.

CAPENI, a people of Etruria, in whose territory Feronia had a grove and a temple. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 697.—Liv. 5, 22, &c.

CAPĒTUS, a king of Alba, who reigned 26 years. Dionys.

CAPHĀREUS, a lofty mountain and promontory [in the south-eastern part] of Eubœa, where Nauplius, king of the country, to revenge the death of his son Palamedes, slain by Ulysses, set a burning torch in the darkness of night, which caused the Greeks to be shipwrecked on the coast. [It is now called Capo d'Oro, and, in the infancy of navigation, was reckoned very dangerous on account of the rocks and whirlpools on the coast.] Virg. Æn. 11, v. 260.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 481.—Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 115.

CAPITO, the uncle of Paterculus, who joined Agrippa against Crassus. Patercul. 2, c. 69.—An historian of Lycia, who wrote an account of Isauria in eight books.—A poet who wrote on illustrious men.

CAPITOLINI LUDI, games yearly celebrated at Rome in honour of Jupiter, who preserved the capital from the Gauls.

CAPITOLINUS, a surname of Jupiter, from his temple on mount Capitolinus.—A surname of M. Manlius, who, for his ambition, was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock which he had so nobly defended.—A mountain at Rome, called also Mons Tarpeius and Mons Saturni. The capitol was built upon it.—Julius, an author in Dioclesian's reign, who wrote an account of the life of Verus, Antoninus Pius, the Gordians, &c. most of which are now lost.

CAPITOLIUM, a celebrated temple and citadel at Rome, on the Mons Capitolinus. [The foundations were laid by Tarquinius Priscus, A. U. C. 139, B. C. 615. The walls were raised by his successor Servius Tullius, and Tarquinius Superbus finished it, A. U. C. 231, B. C. 533. It was not, however, consecrated until the 3d year after the expulsion of the kings. This ceremony was performed by the consul Horatius. It covered 8 acres, was 200 feet broad and about 215 long. It consisted of three parts, a nave sacred to Jupiter, and two wings or ailes, the right to Minerva and the left to Juno.] The ascent to it from the forum was by a hundred steps. The magnificence and richness of this temple are almost incredible. All the consuls successively made donations to the capitol, and Augustus bestowed upon it at one time 2,000 pounds weight of gold. [The gilding of the whole arch of the temple of Jupiter, which was undertaken after the destruction of Carthage, cost, according to Plutarch, 21,000 talents. The gates of the temple were of brass, covered with large plates of gold. The inside of the temple was all of marble. It was adorned with vessels and shields of solid silver, with golden chariots. &c It was burnt in the time of Sylla. A. U. C. 670, B. C. 84, through the negligence of those who kept it, and Sylla rebuilt it, but died before the dedication, which was performed by Q. Catulus, A. U. C. 675.] It was again destroyed in the troubles under Vitellius, [19th December, A. D. 69;] and Vespasian, who endeavoured to repair it, saw it again in ruins at his death. Domitian raised it again, for the last time, and made it more grand and magnificent than any of his predecessors. [A very few traces of it remain. On a part of the ancient site stands the modern Capitol, where the courts of justice are now held. The Italians have corrupted the name to Campidoglio.] When they first dug for the foundations, they found a man's head called Tolius, sound and entire in the ground, and from thence drew an omen of the future greatness of the Roman empire. The hill was from that circumstance called Capitoli-nus, a capite Toli. The consuls and magistrates offered sacrifices there when they first entered upon their offices, and the procession in triumphs was always conducted to the capitol. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 136, l. 8, v. 347.—Tacit. 3. Hist. c. 72.—Plut. in Poplic.—Liv. 1, 10, &c.—Plin. 33, &c.—Sueton. in Aug. c. 40.

CAPPADOCIA, a country of Asia Minor, [bounded on the north by Galatia and Pontus; west by Phrygia; east by the Euphrates; and south by Cilicia. Its eastern part was called Armenia Minor.] It receives its name from the river Cappadox, which separates it from Galatia, [or, according to Herodian, from Cappadocus the founder of this kingdom.] The inhabitants were called Syrians and Leuco-Syrians by the Greeks. They were of a dull and submissive disposition, and addicted to every vice, according to the ancients, who wrote this virulent epigram against them.

When they were offered their freedom and independence by the Romans, they refused it, and begged of them a king, and they received Ariobarzanes. [They come in also for a share of the old proverb of the three K's, "τρία κάρτα κικίστα," viz. Cappadocians, Cretans, and Cilicians.] It was some time after governed by a Roman proconsul. Though the ancients have ridiculed this country for the unfruitfulness of its soil and the manners of its inhabitants, yet it can boast of the birth of the geographer Strabo, St. Basil, and Gregory Nazianzen, among other illustrious characters. The horses of this country were in the highest esteem for their shape and swiftness, and with these they paid their tributes to the king of Persia, while under his power, for want of money. The kings of Cappadocia mostly bore the name of Ariarathes. Horat. 1. ep. 6, v. 39.—Plin. 6, c. 3.—Curt. 3 and 4.—Strab. 11 and 16.—Herodot. 1, c. 73, l. 5, c. 49.—Mela, 1, c. 2, l. 3, c. 8.

CAPPADOX, a river of Cappadocia, [bounding it on the side of Galatia and falling into the Halys.] Plin. 6, c. 3.

CAPRARIA, now Cabrera, a mountain island on the coast of Spain, [south of Balearis Major, or Majorca,] famous for its goats. Plin. 3, c. 6.—[One of the Insule Fortunatæ, or Canaries, now Gomera.]

CAPRÆE, now Capri, an island on the coast of Campania, abounding in quails, and famous for the residence and debaucheries of the emperor Tiberius during the seven last years of his life. The island, in which now several medals are dug up expressive of the licentious morals of the emperor, was about 40 miles in circumference, and surrounded by steep rocks. [It abounds so much with various birds of passage, but especially with quails, that the greatest part of the bishop's income arises from this source. Hence it has been called the "Bishopric of Quails." In bad years the number caught is about 12,000, in good years it exceeds 60,000. The island is surrounded by steep rocks, which render the approach to it very dangerous. In the centre the mountains recede from each other, and a vale intervenes remarkable for its beauty and fertility. The climate of the island is a delightful one; the lofty rocks on the coast keep off the cold winds of winter, and the sea-breeze tempers the heat of summer.] Ovid. Met. 15, v. 709.—Suet. in Tib.—Stat. Sylv. 3, v. 5.

CAPRÆE PALUS, a place near Rome, where Romulus disappeared. Plut. in Rom.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 491.

CAPRICORNUS, a sign of the Zodiac, in which appear 28 stars in the form of a goat, supposed by the ancients to be the goat Amalthæa which fed Jupiter with her milk. Some maintain that it is Pan, who changed himself into a goat when frightened at the approach of Typhon. When the sun enters this sign it is the winter solstice, or the longest night in the year. [The stars, however, having advanced a whole sign to the east, Capricorn is now rather the eleventh sign; and it is at the sun's entrance into Sagittarius that the solstice happens: though the ancient manner of speaking is still retained.] Manil. 2 and 4.—Horat. 2, od. 17, v. 19.—Hygin. fab. 196, P. A. 2, c. 28.

CAPRIFICIALIS, a daysacred to Vulcan, on which the Athenians offered him money. Plin. 11, c. 15.

CAPRIFÈDES, a surname of Pan, the Fauni, and the Satyrs, from their having goat's feet.

CAPROTINA, a festival celebrated at Rome in July in honour of Juno, at which women only officiated. (vid. Philotis.) Varro de L. L. 5.

CAPSA, town of Libya, [in the district of Byzacium, north of the Palus Tritonis, surrounded by vast deserts. Here Jugurtha kept his treasures. It was surprised by Marius, and destroyed in the war of Cæsar and Metellus Scipio. It was afterwards rebuilt, and is now Giffa.] Flor. 3, c. 1.—Sall. Bell. Jug.

CAPUA, [a rich and flourishing city, the capital of Campania until ruined by the Romans. Its original name was Vulturinus, which was changed by the Tyrrheni, after they became masters of the place, to Capua. This latter name was derived from that of their leader Capys, who, according to Festus, received this appellation from his feet being deformed and turned inwards. The name is not of Latin but Tuscan origin. The Latins, however, pretended notwithstanding, to ascribe the foundation of the city to Romulus, who named it, as they stated, after one of his ancestors. Capua was the chief city of the southern Tyrrheni; and even after it fell under the Roman dominion, continued to be a powerful and flourishing place. Before Capua passed into the hands of the Romans a dreadful massacre of its Tyrrhenian inhabitants by the Samnites put the city into the hands of this latter people. Livy appears to have confounded this event with the origin of the place, when he makes it to have changed its name from Vulturinus to Capua, after the Samnite leader Capys. It is very remarkable that retaliation should have followed in a later age from the hands of the Romans, themselves in part of Tyrrhenian, that is, Pelasgian descent. Capua deeply offended them by opening its gates to Anibal after the victory of Cannæ. The vengeance inflicted by the Romans was of a most fearful nature, when five years after the city again fell under their dominion. Most of the senators and principal inhabitants were put to death, the greater part of the remaining citizens were sold into slavery, and by a decree of the senate the Campani ceased to exist as a people. The city and territory, however, did not become thereupon deserted. A few inhabitants were allowed to remain in the former, and the latter was in a great measure sold by the Romans to the neighbouring communities. Julius Cæsar sent a powerful colony to Capua, and under the emperors it again flourished. But it suffered greatly from the barbarians in a later age; so much so in fact, that the Bishop Landulfus and the Lombard Count Lando transferred the inhabitants to Casilinum, on the Vulturinus, 19 stadia distant. This is the site of modern Capua.] Virg. Æn. 10, v. 145.—Liv. 4, 7, 8, &c.—Patere. 1, c. 7, 1, 2, c. 44.—Flor. 1, c. 16.—Cic. in Philip. 12, c. 3.—Plut. in Ann.

CAPYS, a Trojan who came with Æneas into Italy, and founded Capua. [But see preceding article.] He was one of those who, against the advice of Thymoetes, wished to destroy the wooden horse which proved the destruction of Troy. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 145.—A son of Assaracus by a daughter of the Simois. He was father of Anchises by Thémis. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 33.

CAPYS SYLVIUS, a king of Alba who reigned twenty-eight years. Dionys. Hal.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 768.

CAR, a son of Manes, who married Callihoe, daughter of the Mæander. Caria received its name from him. Herodot. 1, c. 171.

CARACALLA. vid. Antoninus.

CARACÆTES, a people of [Germania Prima, in Belgic Gaul. Their country answers now to the diocese of Maience.]

CARACTÆCUS, a king of the Britons, conquered by [Ostorius Scapula,] an officer of Claudius Cæsar, A. D. 47, [and brought to Rome. He was pardoned by Claudius, who was struck with admiration of his manly endurance of misfortune.] Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 33 and 37.

CARĀLIS, (or es, ium), the chief city of Sardinia; [now Cagliari.] Paus. 10, c. 17.

CARAMBIS, now Karempi, a promontory of Paphlagonia. Meta, 1, c. 19.

CARĀNUS, one of the Heraclidæ, the first who laid the foundation of the Macedonian empire, B. C. 814. He took Ædessa, and reigned twenty-eight years, which he spent in establishing and strengthening the government of his newly founded kingdom. He was succeeded by Perdiccas. Justin. 7, c. 1.—Patere. 1, c. 6.

CARAUSIUS, a tyrant of Britain for seven years, A. D. 293.

CARBO, a Roman who embraced the party of Marius, and after the death of Cinna succeeded to the government. He was killed in Spain, in his third consulship, by order of Pompey. Val. Max. 9, c. 13.

CARCHÆDON, the Greek name of Carthage.

CARCINUS, a tragic poet of Agrigentum in the age of Philip of Macedon. He wrote on the rape of Proserpine. Diod. 5.

CARCINUS, a constellation, the same as Cancer. Lucan. 9, v. 536.

CARDIA, a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, [at the top of the Sinus Melanis. It was destroyed by Lysimachus when he founded Lysimachia a little south of it. It derived its name from being built in the form of a heart. It was also called Hexamilium, because the isthmus is here about 6 miles across. It was afterwards rebuilt, and is now Hexamili.] Plin. 4, c. 11.

CARDUCHI, a warlike nation [in the northern parts of Assyria, inhabiting the mountains. They were of Scythian origin, and the progenitors, as is supposed, of the modern Curds. vid. Assyria.] Diod. 14.

CARES, a nation which inhabited Caria, and thought themselves the original possessors of that country. They became so powerful that their country was not sufficiently extensive to contain them all; upon which they seized the neighbouring islands of the Ægean sea. These islands were conquered by Minos, king of Crete, [and the Cretans dislodged, according to Thucydides; but Herodotus states that they were allowed to remain in possession on condition of furnishing his fleet with a certain number of vessels.]

Nileus, son of Codrus, invaded their country, and slaughtered many of the inhabitants, [and many other colonies of Greeks came in succession, who drove the original inhabitants to the mountains.] In this calamity, the Carians, surrounded on every side by enemies, [and reduced to poverty, constructed vessels,] and soon after made themselves terrible by sea. They were anciently called Leleges. Herodot. 1, c. 146 and 171.—Paus. 1, c. 40.—Strab. 13.—Curt. 6, c. 3.—Justin. 13, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 725.

CARIA, [a country of Asia Minor, south of Lydia. It was for some time called Phœnicia, because the Phœnicians had considerable establishments in it; and afterwards took the name of Caria from Car, one of its ancient kings. It comprehended the small district of Doris, to the south-west, while in the south, the Rhodians possessed a part called Perœa. vid. Cares.]

CARIATE, a town of Bactriana, where Alexander imprisoned Callisthenes. [It was destroyed by Alexander.]

CARILLA, a town of the Piceni, destroyed by Annibal for its great attachment to Rome. Sil. Ital. 8.

CARINÆ, [a street of Rome, where Cicero, Pompey, and others of the principal Romans dwelt. It was curved at the top like the keel of a ship, whence the name. According to others, the roofs resembled the hulls of ships inverted. The Romans applied the name of Carina to all buildings in the form of a ship's keel, as the moderns give the name nave to the middle or principal vault of Gothic churches, because it has that figure.] Virg. Æn. 8, v. 361.—Horat. 1, ep. 7.

CARINUS, (M. Aurelius), a Roman who succeeded his father Carus as emperor. [He was infamous for his debaucheries and cruelties. Dioclesian, elected emperor of the Roman army assembled at Chalcedon, encouraged him near the Danube. The conflict however would probably have terminated in favour of Carinus, had he not in the heat of battle been stabbed by one of his own tribunes, whose wife he had seduced.]

CARISIACUM, a town of ancient Gaul, now Cressy.

CARMANIA, [a country of Asia, between Persia and India, now Kerman. Its capital was Carmania or Kerman, south-east of Persepolis.] Arrian.—Plin. 6, c. 23.

CARMELUS, [a god of the Syrians who dwelt near Mount Carmel. He had an altar, but no temple. According to Tacitus, a priest of this deity predicted to Vespasian that he would be emperor.] Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 78.—Sueton. Vesp. 5.

CARMENTA and CARMENTIS, a propheticess of Arcadia, mother of Evander, with whom she came to Italy, and was received by king Faunus, about 60 years before the Trojan war. [Hyginus, (fab. ult.) says that she was the first who introduced into Italy the old 16 Greek letters. vid. Evander.] Her name was Nicostrata, and she received that of Carmentis from the wildness of her looks when giving oracles, as if carens mentis. She was the oracle of the people of Italy during her life, and after death she received divine honours. She had a temple at Rome, and the Greeks offered her sacrifices under the name of Themis. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 467, l. 6, v. 530.—Plut. in Romul.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 339—Liv. 5, c. 47.

CARMENTALES, festivals at Rome in honour of Carmenta, celebrated the 11th of January near the Porta Carmentalis, below the capitol. This goddess was entreated to render the Roman matrons prolific and their labours easy. Liv. 1, c. 7.

CARMENTALIS PORTE, one of the gates of Rome in the neighbourhood of the capitol. It was afterwards called Scelerata, because the Fabii passed through it in going to that fatal expedition where they perished. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 338.

CARNA and CARDINEA, a goddess at Rome who presided over hinges, as also over the entrails and secret parts of the human body. She was originally a nymph called Grane, whom Janus ravished, and for the injury, he gave her the power of presiding over the exterior of houses, and of removing all noxious birds from the doors. The Romans offered her beans, bacon, and vegetables, to represent the simplicity of their ancestors. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 101, &c.

CARNEADES, a philosopher of Cyrene in Africa, founder of a sect called the third or New Academy. The Athenians sent him with Diogenes the stoic, and Critolaus the peripatetic, as ambassadors to Rome, B. C. 155. [Carneades excelled in the vehement and rapid, Critolaus in the correct and elegant, and Diogenes in the simple and modest kind of eloquence. Carneades in particular attracted the attention of his new auditory by the subtlety of his reasoning and the fluency of his language. Before Galba, and Cato the Censor, he harangued with great variety of thought and copiousness of diction in praise of justice. The next day, to establish his doctrine of the uncertainty of human knowledge, he undertook to refute all his former arguments. Many were captivated by his eloquence; but Cato, apprehensive lest the Roman youth should lose their military character in the pursuit of Grecian learning, persuaded the senate to send back these philosophers, without delay, to their own schools. Carneades obtained such high reputation at home, that other philosophers, when they had dismissed their scholars, frequently came to hear him. It was the doctrine of the New Academy, that the senses, the understanding, and the imagination, frequently deceive us, and therefore cannot be infallible judges of truth; but that, from the impressions which we perceive to be produced on the mind by means of the senses, we infer appearances of truth or probabilities. He maintained that they do not always correspond to the real nature of things, and that there is no infallible method of determining when they are true or false, and consequently that they afford no certain criterion of truth. Nevertheless, with respect to the conduct of life, Carneades held that probable appearances are a sufficient guide, because it is unreasonable that some degree of credit should not be allowed to those witnesses who commonly give a true report. He maintained that all the knowledge the human mind is capable of attaining is not science, but opinion.] Cic. ad Attic. 12, ep. 23. de Orat. 1 and 2.—Plin. 7, c. 30.—Lactantius 5, c. 14.—Val. Max. 8, c. 8.

CARNEIA, a festival observed in most of the Grecian cities, but more particularly at Sparta, where it was instituted about 675 B. C. in honour of Apollo surnamed Carneus. It lasted nine days, and was an imitation of the manner of living in camps among the ancients.

CARNUTES, a people of Gaul, [south-west of the Parisii. Their capital was Autricum, afterwards called Carnutes, and now Chartres.] Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 4.

[CARPATES, a long chain of mountains in the northern parts of Dacia, called also Alpes Bastarnicæ, now Mount Krapack.]

CARPATHUS, an island in the Mediterranean, between Rhodes and Crete, now called Scarpanto. It has given its name to a part of the neighbouring sea, thence called the Carpathian sea, between Rhodes and Crete. Carpathus was at first inhabited by some Cretan soldiers at Minos. It was 20 miles in circumference, and was sometimes called Tetrapolis, from its four capital cities. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Herodot. 3, c. 45.—Diod. 5.—Strab. 10.

CARPOPHORA, a name of Ceres and Proserpine in Tegea. Paus. 3, c. 53.

CARRÆ and CARRHÆ, a town of Mesopotamia, near which Crassus was killed. [It lay to the south-east of Edessa, and was a very ancient city. It is supposed to be the Charran of Scripture, whence Abraham departed for the land of Canaan.] Lucan. 1, v. 105.—Plin. 5, c. 14.

CARRINATES SECUNDUS, a poor but ingenious rhetorician, who came from Athens to Rome, where the boldness of his expressions, especially against tyrannical power, exposed him to Caligula's resentment, who banished him. Juv. 7, v. 205.

CARSEOLI, a town of the Æqui, at the west of the lake Fucinus. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 683.

CARTEIA, a town of Spain, supposed to be the same as Calpe. [Its position has given rise to much dispute. It does not appear however to have been the same with Calpe. D'Anville locates it at the extremity of a gulf which the mountain of Calpe covers on the east; but Mannert, more correctly, at the very extremity of the strait below Algesiras.]

CARTENA, a town of Mauritania [Cæsariensis] now Tenez, on the shores of the Mediterranean.

CARTHÆA, a town in the island of Cea, whence the epithet of Cartheius. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 368.

CARTHAGINIENSES, the inhabitants of Carthage, a rich and commercial nation. vid. Carthago.

CARTHÄGO, a celebrated city of Africa, the rival of Rome, and long the capital of the country, and mistress of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. The precise time of its foundation is unknown, yet most writers seem to agree that it was first built by Dido about 869 years before the christian era, or, according to others, 72 or 93 years before the foundation of Rome. [vid. Byrsa.] This city and republic flourished for 737 years, and the time of its greatest glory was under Annibal and Amilcar. During the first Punic war, it contained no less than 700,000 inhabitants. It maintained three famous wars against Rome, called the Punic wars, (vid. Punicum Bellum) in the third of which Carthage was totally destroyed by Scipio, the second Africanus, B. C. 147, and only 5000 persons were found within the walls. It was 24 miles in circumference, and when it was set on fire by the Romans, it burned incessantly during 17 days. After the destruction of Carthage, Utica became powerful, and the Romans thought themselves secure; and as they had no rival to dispute with them in the field, they fell into indolence and inactivity. Cæsar planted a small colony on the ruins of Carthage. [Augustus sent there 3000 men, and built a city at a small distance from the spot on which ancient Carthage stood, thus avoiding the ill effects of the imprecations which had been pronounced by the Romans at the time of its destruction against those who should rebuild it.] Adrian, after the example of his imperial predecessors, rebuilt part of it, which he called Adrianopolis. Carthage was conquered from the Romans by the arms of Genseric, A. D. 439; and it was for more than a century the seat of the Vandal empire in Africa. [It was at last destroyed by the Saracens under the Caliph of Abdel Melek towards the end of the 7th century. According to Livy, Carthage was 12 miles from Tunetum or Tunis, a distance which still subsists between that city and a fragment of the western wall of Carthage.] The Carthaginians were governed as a republic, and had two persons yearly chosen among them with regal authority. They were very superstitious, and generally offered human victims to their gods; an unnatural custom, which their allies wished them to abolish, but in vain. They bore the character of a faithless and treacherous people, and the proverb Punica fides is well known. [The Greeks called Carthage, Καρχηδών, and the Carthaginians, Καρχηδονίους. The name of Carthage was in Punic, Carthada, or the new city, being founded, not by Dido, as the common account states, but by fugitives from Tyre, whom domestic dissensions had driven from home, and who called their new place of residence, the new city, in contradistinction to the old. A specimen of the Carthaginian language, with a translation by Bochart, may be seen in the Pœnulus of Plautus, Act. 5. Scen. 1. In the total decay of the Phœnicio-

Punic literature we have nothing left for the critical examination of these languages, beside the passage of Plautus just mentioned, except a few insulated words found in old authors; inscriptions and coins found principally in Phœnician colonies; and lastly, proper names of persons and places, so far as they have an appellative signification and etymology in the language of the country. Respecting the relation of the Hebrew and Phœnician we have the following results: 1. The greater part of those Phœnician words which are correctly decyphered, coincide closely with the ancient Hebrew, even in words and forms which are quite peculiar to the Hebrew, and which, namely, in the Aramaic, sound otherwise. 2. Deviations rarely occur, and may be considered as provincial; for example, the alphabetical, names, ἀλφα, &c. (with a kind of st. emphat. or feminine form); Edom for Dom, blood: the frequent use of the vowels u and i in the Punic. We must look for the greater part of the deviations more especially in the vowels. 3. The words which cannot be recognised are usually as little to be found in the other dialects as in the Hebrew. Akerblad also considers the Phœnician and Hebrew to have been anciently the very same, but blames Bochart and his followers for mingling together many Oriental dialects for the purpose of finding support for their conjectures, and consequently forming a Phœnician tongue altogether unlike the true one. As regards the literary progress of the Phœnicians and Carthaginians we may observe that it does not appear to have been insignificant at least. Pliny (N. H. 18, 5,) makes mention of libraries. Of Phœnician authors we can name as historians, Sanchuniathon (comp. Bocharti Canaan, c. 17.); Moschus, (Jos. Antiq. 1, 3, Strabo. 16.); Theodotus, (Tatiani Orat. e Gent. no. 37.) and Dios (Jos. Apion. 1, 17.) Of the Carthaginians, Mago on husbandry, (Plin. 1. c.); and Hanno, author of the Periplus. vid. Oxford Classical Journal, no. 65, p. 123.] Strab. 17.—*Virg. CARVILIUS SPURIUS, a Roman who made a large image of the breastplates taken from the Samnites, and placed it in the capitol. Plin. 34, c. 7.—The first Roman who divorced his wife during the space of above 600 years. This was for barrenness, B. C. 231. Dionys. Hal. 2.—Val. Max. 2, c. 1.—[A grammarian of this name, according to Flutarch (de quest. Rom. n. 54,) first introduced the G into the Roman alphabet, C having been previously used for it. This was nearly 500 years after the building of the city.]

CARUS, a Roman emperor who succeeded

Probus. He was a prudent and active general; he conquered the Samaritans, and continued the Persian war which his predecessor had commenced. He reigned two years, and died on the banks of the Tigris as he was going on an expedition against Persia, A. D. 283. He made his two sons, Carinus and Numerianus, Cæsars; and as his many virtues had promised the Romans happiness, he was made a god after death. Eutrop.

CARYA, a town of Arcadia.—A city of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 10. Here a festival was observed in honour of Diana Caryatis. It was then usual for virgins to meet at the celebration, and join in a certain dance, said to have been first instituted by Castor and Pollux. When Greece was invaded by Xerxes, the Laconians did not appear before the enemy for fear of displeasing the goddess by not celebrating her festival. At that time the peasants assembled at the usual place, and sang pastorals called Βουκολισμοί, from Βουκολος, a neat-herd. From this circumstance some suppose that bucolics originated. Stat. 4. Theb. 225.

CARYANDA, a town and island on the coast of Caria, now Karacoion.

CARYATÆ, a people of Arcadia. [It is said that they joined the Persians upon their invading Greece, and that, after the expulsion of the invaders, the Greeks made war upon the Caryatæ, took their city, slew all the males, carried the women into slavery, and decreed by way of ignominy, that their images should be used as supporters for public edifices. Hence the Caryatides of ancient architecture. No trace of this story however is to be found in any Greek historian, and no small argument against its credibility may be deduced from the situation of the Caryatæ, within the Peloponnesus. A writer in the Museum Criticum, (Vol. 2, p. 402,) suggests, that these figures were so called from their resembling the statue of Ἀστειμς Καρυατῆς, or the Laconian virgins, who celebrated their annual dance in her temple; and he refers to Paus. 3, c. 10.—Lucian. Salt. 10.—Plut. *Vit. CASCELLIUS AULUS, a lawyer of great merit in the Augustan age. Horat. Art. Poet. 371.

CASILINUM, a town of Campania. When it was besieged by Annibal, a mouse sold for 200 denarii. The place was defended by 540 or 570 natives of Præneste, who, when half their number had perished either by war or famine, surrendered to the conqueror. [Modern Capua is built upon its site. vid. Capua.] Liv. 23, c. 19.—Strab. 5.—Cic. de Inr. 2, c. 57.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

CASIUS, a mountain [between Pelusium and Rhinocorura,] where Pompey's tomb was raised by Adrian. Jupiter, surnamed Casius, had a temple there. Lucan. 8, v. 258.— [Another in Syria, below Antiochia. It is a very lofty mountain. Pliny, in a style of exaggeration, asserts that at the 4th watch, (3 o'clock A. M.) the rising sun could be seen from its top while the base was enveloped in darkness.] Plin. 5, 22.—Mela, 1 and 3.

CASPIÆ PORTÆ [or PYLÆ, the Caspian pass, a name belonging properly to a defile near Teheran in ancient Media. It is vaguely applied by Tacitus and some other ancient writers to different passes of Mount Caucasus. For the Caucasian and Albanian gates, vid. Caucasus.]

CASPII, a Scythian nation near the Caspian sea. Such as had lived beyond their 70th year were starved to death. Their dogs were remarkable for their fierceness. Herodot. 3, c. 92, &c. 1. 7, c. 92, &c.—C. Nep. 14, c. 8.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 798.

CASPIUM MARE, or HYRCANUM, a large sea in the form a lake, which has no communication with other seas, and lies between the Caspian and Hyrcanian mountains, at the north of Parthia, receiving in its capacious bed the tribute of several large rivers. Ancient authors assure us that it produced enormous serpents and fishes, different in colour and kind from those of all other waters. [The south-eastern part was termed Mare Hyrcanum, a name which the Greeks applied to the whole sea. The Tartars call it Akdinghis, or the White Sea; by the Georgians it is termed the Kurshenskian Sea; while the Persians denominate it Gursen, from the old Persian capital Gurgan, which stood near it. It is 646 miles long from north to south, and 265 in its greatest breadth; and though it receives several large rivers, particularly the Volga, the ancient Rha, the longest river in Europe, it has no outlet. This sea has been observed notwithstanding to remain constantly full, which is owing perhaps to the porous quality of its bottom.] There are no tides in it, and on account of its numerous shoals it is navigable to vessels drawing only nine or ten feet water. It has strong currents, and like inland seas, is liable to violent storms. Some navigators examined it in 1708, by order of the Czar Peter, and after the labour of three years, a map of its extent was published. Its waters are described as brackish, and not impregnated with salt so much as the wide ocean. Herodot. 1, c. 202, &c.—Curt. 3, c. 2, l. 6, c. 4, l. 7, c. 3.—Strab. 11.—Mela, 1, c. 2, l. 3, c. 5 and 6.—Plin. 6, c. 13.—*Dionys. CASSANDER, son of Antipater, made himself master of Macedonia after his father's death, where he reigned for 18 years. He married Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander, to strengthen himself on his throne. Olympias, the mother of Alexander, wished to keep the kingdom of Macedonia for Alexander's young children; and therefore she destroyed the relations of Cassander, who besieged her in the town of Pydna, and put her to death. Roxane, with her son Alexander, and Barsena the mother of Hercules, both wives of Alexander, shared the fate of Olympias with their children. Antigonus, who had been for some time upon friendly terms with Cassander, declared war against him; and Cassander, to make himself equal with his adversary, made a league with Lysimachus and Seleucus, and obtained a memorable victory at Ipsus, B. C. 301. He died three years after this victory, of a dropsy. His son Antipater killed his mother, and for this unnatural murder he was put to death by his brother Alexander, who, to strengthen himself, invited Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, from Asia. Demetrius took advantage of the invitation, and put to death Alexander, and ascended the throne of Macedonia. Paus. 1, c. 25.—Diod. 19.—Justin. 12, 13, &c.

CASSANDRA, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was passionately loved by Apollo, who promised to grant her whatever she might require if she would gratify his passion. She asked the power of knowing futurity; and as soon as she had received it, she refused to perform her promise and slighted Apollo. The god, in his disappointment, wetted her lips with his tongue, and by this action effected that no credit or reliance should ever be put upon her predictions, however true or faithful they might be. Some maintain that she received the gift of prophecy with her brother Helenus, by being placed when young one night in the temple of Apollo, where serpents were found wreathed round their bodies, and licking their ears, which circumstance gave them the knowledge of futurity. She was looked upon by the Trojans as insane, and she was even confined, and her predictions were disregarded. She was courted by many princes during the Trojan war. When Troy was taken, she fled for shelter to the temple of Minerva, where Ajax found her, and offered her violence, with the greatest cruelty, at the foot of Minerva's statue. In the division of the spoils of Troy, Agamemnon, who was enamoured of her, took her as his wife, and returned with her to Greece. She repeatedly foretold to him the sudden calamities that awaited his return; but he gave no credit to her, and was assassinated by his wife Clytemnestra. Cassandra shared his fate, and saw all her prophecies but too truly fulfilled. vid. Agamemnon. Æschyl. in Agam.—Hom. Il. 13, v. 363. Od. 4.—Hygin. fab. 117.—*Virg. CASSIA LEX, was enacted by Cassius Longinus, A. U. C. 649. By it no man condemned [by the people] was permitted to enter the senate-house.—Another, enacted by C. Cassius, the pretor, about supplying the senate.—Another, that the people should vote by ballot.—[Another, vid. Terentia lex.]

CASSIODORUS, a writer in the 6th century. He died A. D. 562, at the age of 93. [He was highly favoured by Theodoric, and filled in succession many high offices. At last, however, growing weary of public life, he retired to a monastery, where he ended his days. His Latin style partakes largely of the corruptions of the age. He is, however, a learned writer.] His works were edited by Chandler, 8vo. London. 1722.

CASSIOPE and CASSIOPĒA, married Cepheus, king of Æthiopia, by whom she had Andromeda. She boasted herself to be fairer than the Nereides; upon which Neptune, at the request of these despised nymphs, punished the insolence of Cassiope, and sent a huge sea-monster to ravage Æthiopia. The wrath of Neptune could be appeased only by exposing Andromeda, whom Cassiope tenderly loved, to the fury of the sea-monster; and just as she was going to be devoured, Perseus delivered her. vid. Andromeda. Cassiope was made a southern constellation, consisting of 13 stars. called Cassiope. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 43.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—*Ovid. CASSITERĪDES, islands in the western ocean, where tin was found, supposed to be the Scilly islands, the Land's end, and Lizard point, of the moderns. [The term Cassiterdes is derived from the Greek Κασσιτερος, tin. The tin was obtained by the islanders from the mainland, and afterwards sold to strangers. Solinus mentions these islands under the name of Saburum Insulæ. and Sulpitius Severus under that of Sylma Insula.] Plin. 4, c. 22.

CASSIVELAUNUS, a Briton invested with sovereign authority when J. Cæsar made a descent upon Britain. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 19, &c.

CASSIUS, a celebrated Roman, who made himself known by being first quaestor to Crassus in his expedition against Parthia. from which he exticated himself with uncommon address. He followed the interest of Pompey; and when Cæsar had obtained the victory in the plains of Pharsalia, Cassius was one of those who owed their life to the mercy of the conqueror. He married Junia the sister of Brutus, and with him he resolved to murder the man to whom he was indebted for his life, on account of his oppressive ambition; and before he stabbed Cæsar, he addressed himself to the statue of Pompey who had fallen by the ambition of him he was going to assassinate. When the provinces were divided among Cæsar's murderers, Cassius received Africa; and when his party had lost ground at Rome, by the superior influence of Augustus and M. Antony, he retired to Philippi, with his friend Brutus and their adherents. In a battle that was fought there, the wing which Cassius commanded was defeated, and his camp was plundered. In this unsuccessful moment he suddenly gave up all hopes of recovering his losses, and concluded that

Brutus was conquered and ruined as well as himself. Fearful to fall into the enemy's hands he ordered one of his freed-men to run him through, and he perished by that very sword which had given wounds to Cæsar. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by his friend Brutus, who declared over him that he deserved to be called the last of the Romans. If he was brave, he was equally learned. Some of his letters are still extant among Cicero's epistles. He was a strict follower of the doctrine of Epicurus. He was often too rash and too violent, and many of the wrong steps which Brutus took are to be ascribed to the prevailing advice of Cassius. He is allowed by Paterculus to have been a better commander than Brutus, though a less sincere friend. The day after Cæsar's murder he dined at the house of Antony, who asked him whether he had then a dagger concealed in his bosom; yes, replied he, if you aspire to tyranny. Sueton. in Cæs. & Aug.—Plut. in Brut. & Cæs.—Paterc. 2, c. 46.—Dio. 40.—A tribune of the people, who made many laws tending to diminish the influence of the Roman nobility. He was competitor with Cicero for the consulship.—A poet of Parma, of great genius. He was killed by Varus by order of Augustus, whom he had offended by his satirical writings. His fragments of Orpheus were found and edited some time after by the poet Statius. Horat. 1, sat. 19, v. 62.—Spurius, a Roman, put to death on suspicion of his aspiring to tyranny, after he had been three times consul, B. CASTABĀLA, a city of Cilicia Campestris, [placed by D'Anville north west of Issus. Ptolemy, however, whom Mannert follows, locates it east of Anazarbus.—Another in Cappadocia, north-east of Cybistra.]

CASTALIUS FONS, or CASTALIA, a fountain of Parnassus, sacred to the muses. The waters of this fountain were cool and excellent, and they had the power of inspiring those that drank of them with the true fire of poetry. The muses have received the surname of Castalides from this fountain.— [Another in Syria, near Daphne. The waters of this fountain were believed to give a knowledge of futurity to those who drank them. The oracle at the fountain promised Adrian the supreme power when he was yet in a private station. He had the fountain shut up with stones when he ascended the throne.] *Virg. CASTANĒA, a town [of Thessaly, at the foot of mount Pelion.] Whence the noces Castaneæ received their name. Plin. 4, c. 9.

CASTELLUM MENAPIORUM, a town of Belgium on the Maese, now Kessel.— MORINORUM, now Mount Cassel in Flanders.— CATTORUM, now Hesse Cassel.

CASTOR and POLLUX, were twin brothers, sons of Jupiter, by Leda, the wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta. The manner of their birth is uncommon. Jupiter, who was enamoured of Leda, changed himself into a beautiful swan, and desired Venus to metamorphose herself into an eagle. After this transformation the goddess pursued the god with apparent ferocity, and Jupiter fled for refuge into the arms of Leda who was bathing in the Eurotas. Jupiter took advantage of his situation, and nine months after, Leda, who was already pregnant, brought forth two eggs, from one of which came Pollux and Helena: and from the other, Castor and Clytemnestra. The two former were the offspring of Jupiter, and the latter were believed to be the children of Tyndarus. [This story of the egg may be explained as follows: The women's apartments in the Grecian houses were in the upper part of the building. These upper rooms were sometimes, especially at Lacedæmon, called ἄζα, ἄζα, or ὀρεσφῶζα, which words, being distinguished only by the accent, (the use of which seems not to have been known to the more ancient Greeks) from ἄζα, eggs, are thought to have given rise to the fable, as Castor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra were born in one of these upper chambers.] Some suppose that Leda brought forth only one egg, from which Castor and Pollux sprung. Mercury, immediately after their birth, carried the two brothers to Pallena, where they were educated; and as soon as they had arrived to years of maturity, they embarked with Jason to go in quest of the golden fleece. In this expedition both behaved with superior courage; Pollux conquered and slew Amycus in the combat of the cestus, and was ever after reckoned the god and patron of boxing and wrestling. Castor distinguished himself in the management of horses. The brothers cleared the Hellespont, and the neighbouring seas, from pirates, after their return from Colchis; from which circumstance they have been always deemed the friends of navigation. During the Argonautic expedition, in a violent storm, two flames of fire were seen to play round the heads of the sons of Leda, and immediately the tempest ceased and the sea was calmed. From this occurrence their power to protect sailors has been more firmly credited, and the two mentioned fires, which are very common in storms, have since been known by the name of Castor and Pollux; and when they both appeared it was a sign of fair weather; but if only one was seen it prognosticated storms, and the aid of Castor and Pollux was consequently solicited. Castor and Pollux made war against the Athenians to recover their sister Helen, whom Theseus had carried away; and from their clemency to the conquered, they acquired the surname of Anaces, or benefactors. They were initiated in the sacred mysteries of the Cabiri, and in those of Ceres of Eleusis. They were invited to a feast when Lynceus and Idas were going to celebrate their marriage with Phœbe and Calaira, the daughters of Leucippus, who was brother to Tyndarus. Their behaviour after this invitation was cruel. They became enamoured of the two women whose nuptials they were to celebrate, and resolved to carry them away and marry them. This violent step provoked Lynceus and Idas; a battle ensued, and Castor killed Lynceus, and was killed by Idas. Pollux revenged the death of his brother by killing Idas; and as he was immortal, and tenderly attached to his brother, he entreated Jupiter to restore him to life, or to be deprived himself of immortality. Jupiter permitted Castor to share the immortality of his brother; and consequently, as long as the one was upon earth, so long was the other detained in the infernal regions, and they alternately lived and died every day; or, according to others, every six months. This act of fraternal love Jupiter rewarded by making the two brothers constellations in heaven, under the name of Gemini, which never appear together, but when one rises the other sets, and so on alternately. Castor made Talaira mother of Anogon, and Phœbe had Mnesileus by Pollux. They received divine honours after death, and were generally called Dioscuri, sons of Jupiter. White lambs were more particularly offered on their altars, and the ancients were fond of swearing by the divinity of the Dioscuri, by the expressions of Ædopol and Æcastor. Among the ancients, and especially among the Romans, there prevailed many public reports, at different times, that Castor and Pollux had made their appearance to their armies; and, mounted on white steeds, had marched at the head of their troops, and furiously attacked the enemy. Their surnames were many, and they were generally represented mounted on two white horses, armed with spears, and riding side by side, with their head covered by a bonnet, on whose top glittered a star. *Ovid. CATĀNA, a town of Sicily, at the foot of mount Ætna, founded by a colony from Chalcis 753 years before the christian era. [Hiero, king of Syracuse, having become master of the place, transferred the former inhabitants to Leontium, and settled in their territory at the foot of Ætna 5000 Peloponnesians and 5000 Syracusans. The name of the city he changed to Ætna. After his death the city was taken by the Siculi, and wrested from these by the old inhabitants of Catania who had been transplanted to Leontium. The city once more resumed the name of Catana. It is now Catania.] Ceres had here a temple, in which none but women were permitted to appear. It was large and opulent, and it is rendered remarkable for the dreadful overthrows to which it has been subjected from its vicinity to Ætna. L. SERGIUS CĀTILĪNA, [a noble Roman, of patrician rank, and the last of the gens Sergia. He appears to have been born in poverty, which accounts for the names of his parents not having been transmitted. The cruelty of his disposition, his undaunted resolution, and the depravity of his morals, fitted him for acting a distinguished part in the turbulent and bloody period in which he lived. He embraced the interest of Sylla, in whose army he held the office of quæstor. That monster in his victory had in Catilina an able coadjutor, whose heart knew no sympathy, and his lewdness no bounds. He rejoiced in the carnage and plunder of the proscribed, and revenged some previous wrongs by butchering the citizens with his own hands. In the civil war he caused the death of his own brother, and afterwards, at the request of his murderer, inserted his name, as if alive, in the list of those whom Sylla had proscribed. Public opinion charged him with the death of his sister's husband, Q. Cæcilius, a Roman knight, of no party, who was peaceful both from age and natural inclination. By these and other similar acts he recommended himself to Sylla, who appointed him prætor, B. C. 68, and the next year he obtained Africa for his province where his rapacity and cruelty knew no bounds. For this he was accused on his return to Rome, but was saved by bribery. Sunk at last in infamy, he entered into a conspiracy to massacre the higher classes, set fire to the city, and seize the supreme authority.] This conspiracy was timely discovered by the consul Cicero, whom he had resolved to murder; and Catiline, after he had declared his intentions in the full senate, and attempted to vindicate himself, retired into Etruria, where his partisans were assembling an army; Cicero at Rome punished the condemned conspirators. [Antonius, the other consul, originally an accomplice in the conspiracy, but who had been gained over to the side of the state by Cicero, pursued the insurgents with an army. Upon overtaking them, not daring to face Catiline himself, he feigned a fit of the gout, and consigned his army to his lieutenant Petreius, who attacked Catiline's ill-disciplined troops and routed them. [The battle was fought near Pistoria, in Etruria.] Catiline was killed in the engagement, bravely fighting, about the middle of December, B. C. 63. Sallust has written an account of the conspiracy. Cic. in Catil.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 668.

M. CATIUS, an epicurean philosopher of Insubria, who wrote a treatise in four books, on the nature of things, and the summum bonum, and an account of the doctrine and tenets of Epicurus. But as he was not a sound or faithful follower of the epicurean philosophy, he has been ridiculed by Horat. 2, Sat. 4.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

CATO, a surname of the Porcian family, rendered illustrious by M. Porcius Cato, a celebrated Roman, afterwards called Censorius, from his having exercised the office of censor. He rose to all the honours of the state, and the first battle he ever saw was against Annibal, at the age of seventeen, where he behaved with uncommon valour. In his quæstorship, under Africanus against Carthage, and in his expedition in Spain against the Celtiberians, and in Greece, he displayed equal proofs of his courage and prudence. [He is said to have served also in the island of Sardinia, and to have brought from thence to Rome the poet Ennius, who was one of the Calabrian auxiliaries attached to the Roman army. vid. Ennius.] He was remarkable for his love of temperance; he never drank but water, and was always satisfied with whatever meats were laid upon his table by his servants, whom he never reproved with an angry word. During his censorship, which he obtained, though he had made many declarations of his future severity if ever in office, he behaved with the greatest rigour and impartiality, showed himself an enemy to all luxury and dissipation, and even accused his colleague of embezzling the public money. He is famous for the great opposition which he made against the introduction of the finer arts of Greece into Italy, and his treatment of Carneades is well known. This prejudice arose from an apprehension that the learning and luxury of Athens would destroy the valour and simplicity of the Roman people; and he often observed to his son, that the Romans would be certainly ruined whenever they began to be infected with Greek. It appears, however, that he changed his opinion, and made himself remarkable for the knowledge of Greek which he acquired in his old age. He himself educated his son, and instructed him in writing and grammar. He taught him dexterously to throw the javelin, and inured him to the labours of the field, and to bear cold and heat with the same indifference, and to swim across the most rapid rivers with ease and boldness. He was universally deemed so strict in his morals, that Virgil makes him one of the judges of hell. He repented only of three things during his life; to have gone by sea when he could go by land, to have passed a day inactive, and to have told a secret to his wife. A statue was raised to his memory, and he distinguished himself as much for his knowledge of agriculture as his political life. In

Cicero's age there were 150 orations of his, besides letters, and a celebrated work called Origines, of which the first book gave a history of the Roman monarch; the second and third an account of the neighbouring cities of Italy; the fourth a detail of the first, and the fifth of the second Punic war; and in the others, the Roman history was brought down to the war of the Lusitanians carried on by Ser. Galba. Some fragments of the Origines remain, supposed by some to be supposititious. Cato's treatise, De Re rusticâ, was edited by Anton. Popma, 8vo. Ant. Plant. 1590; but the best edition of Cato, &c. is Gesner's, 2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1735. Cato died in an extreme old age, about 150 B. C.; and Cicero, to show his respect for him, has introduced him in his treatise on old age as the principal character. Plin. 7, c. 14. Plutarch & C. Nepos have written an account of his life. Cic. Acad. & de Senect. &c.—Marcus, the son of the censor, married the daughter of P. Æmylius. He lost his sword in a battle, and though wounded and tired, he went to his friends, and, with their assistance, renewed the battle and recovered his sword. Plut. in Cat.—Marcus, surnamed Uticensis, from his death at Utica, was great grandson to the censor of the same name. The early virtues that appeared in his childhood seemed to promise a great man; and at the age of fourteen he earnestly asked his preceptor for a sword to stab the tyrant Sylla. He was austere in his morals, and a strict follower of the tenets of the stoics; he was careless of his dress, often appeared barefooted in public, and never travelled but on foot. He was such a lover of discipline, that in whatever office he was employed he always reformed its abuses, and restored the ancient regulations. When he was set over the troops in the capacity of a commander, his removal was universally lamented, and deemed almost a public loss by his affectionate soldiers. His fondness for candour was so great, that the veracity of Cato became proverbial. In his visits to his friends, he wished to give as little molestation as possible; and the importuning civilities of king Dejotarus so displeased him when he was at his court, that he hastened away from his presence. He was very jealous of the safety and liberty of the republic, and watched carefully over the conduct of Pompey, whose power and influence were great. He often expressed his dislike to serve the office of a tribunè; but when he saw a man of corrupted principles apply for it he offered himself a candidate to oppose him, and obtained the tribuneship. In the conspiracy of Catiline he supported Cicero, and was the chief cause that the conspirators were capitally punished. When the provinces of Gaul were decreed for five years to Cæsar, Cato observed to the senators, that they had introduced a tyrant into the capitol. He was sent to Cyprus against Ptolemy, who had rebelled, by his enemies, who hoped that the difficulty of the expedition would injure his reputation. But his prudence extricated him from every danger. Ptolemy submitted; and after a successful campaign, Cato was received at Rome with the most distinguishing honours, which he, however, modestly declined. When the first triumvirate was formed between Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, Cato opposed them with all his might, and with an independent spirit foretold to the Roman people all the misfortunes which soon after followed. After repeated applications he was made pretor, but he seemed rather to disgrace than support the dignity of that office, by the meanness of his dress. He applied for the consulship, but could never obtain it. When Cæsar had passed the Rubicon, Cato advised the Roman senate to deliver the care of the republic into the hands of Pompey; and when his advice had been complied with, he followed him with his son to Dyrrachium, where, after a small victory there, he was intrusted with the care of the ammunition and of 15 cohorts. After the battle of Pharsalia, Cato took the command of the Corycæan fleet; and when he heard of Pompey's death on the coast of Africa, he traversed the deserts of Libya to join himself to Scipio. He refused to take the command of the army in Africa, a circumstance of which he afterwards repented. When Scipio had been defeated, partly for not paying regard to Cato's advice, Cato fortified himself in Utica, but, however, not with the intentions of supporting a siege. When Cæsar approached near the city, Cato disdained to fly, and rather than fall alive into the conqueror's hands, he stabbed himself, after he had read Plato's treatise on the immortality of the soul, B. C. 46, in the 59th year of his age. He had first married Attilia, a woman whose licentious conduct obliged him to divorce her. Afterwards he united himself to Martia, daughter of Philip. Hortensius, his friend, wished to raise children by Martia, and therefore obtained her from Cato. After the death of Hortensius, Cato took her again. This conduct was ridiculed by the Romans, who observed that Martia had entered the house of Hortensius very poor, but returned to the bed of Cato loaded with treasures. It was observed that Cato always appeared in mourning, and never laid himself down at his meals after the defeat of Pompey, but always sat down, contrary to the custom of the Romans, as if depressed with the recollection that the supporters of republican liberty were decaying. Plutarch has written an account of his life. Lucan. 1, v. 123, &c.—Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Horat. 3, od. 21.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 841, l. 8, v. 670.—A son of Cato of Utica, who was killed in a battle, after he had acquired much honour. Plut. in Cat.

CATTI, [a powerful nation of Germany, south of the Cherusci. Cæsar calls them Suevi. They were a warlike people, and their infantry was reckoned the best in Germany. A fortress of the Catti, called Castellum, still bears the name of Cassel, but their capital Mattium, is Marburg.] Tacit. Ann. 13, v. 57.

CATULLUS, C. or Q. VALERIUS, a poet of Verona, whose compositions, elegant and simple, are the offspring of a luxuriant imagination. He was acquainted with the most distinguished people of his age, and directed his satire against Cæsar, whose only revenge was to invite the poet, and hospitably entertain him as usual at his table. Catullus was the first Roman who imitated with success the Greek writers, and introduced their numbers among the Latins. Though the pages of the poet are occasionally disfigured with licentious expressions, the whole is written with great purity of style. Catullus died in the 46th year of his age, B. C. 40. The best editions of his works, are, that of Vulpius, 4to. Patavii, 1737, that of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754, [and that of Doering, Lips. 1788-92, 2 vols. 8vo.] Martial. 1, ep. 62.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 427.

Q. LUTATIUS CATULUS, [a Roman naval commander, famous for his victory over the fleet of the Carthaginians, consisting of 400 sail, off the Ægæis insulæ; 40 of the Carthaginian vessels were sunk, 70 taken, and the remainder dispersed. This celebrated victory put an end to the first Punic war.]—An orator, distinguished also as a writer of epigrams, and for the polished style of his compositions. He is supposed to be the same with the colleague of Marius, when a consul the fourth time; and he shared with him the triumph over the Cimbri. He was, by his colleague's order, suffocated in a room filled with the smoke of burning coals. Lucan. 2, v. 174.—Plut. in Mario.

CATURIGES, a people of Gaul, now Chorges, near the source of the Durance, [at the foot of the Cottian Alps.] Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 10.—Plin. 3, c. 20.

CAVARES, a people of Gaul, who inhabited the present province of Comtat in Provence.

CAUCASUS, [the name of the highest and most extensive range of mountains in the northern part of Asia, and which the ancients erroneously considered as a continuation of the chain of Taurus. According to Strabo, it extended from the Euxine to the Caspian sea. It divided Albania and Iberia towards the south, from the level country of the Sarmatæ on the north. The inhabitants of these mountains formed, according to some 70, and according to others 300 different nations, who spoke various languages and lived in a savage state. The breadth of this chain, according to the best Russian authorities, is about 400 miles between the mouths of the Don and Kooma; about 756 between the straits of Cassa and the peninsula of Absheron; and about 350 between the mouths of the Phasis and the city of Derbend. The etymology of the name of Caucasus, so celebrated in history and poetry, is not agreed upon; the most probable opinion is, that it is a compound of a Persian word Caw, signifying "a mountain," and a Scythian word Cas-pi, that is, "a white mountain." This opinion is supported by a passage of Eratosthenes, where he informs us that the natives of Caucasus called it Caspius. Pliny, however, states that the native name was Graucanus, which may be considered as Gothic. The range of Caucasus cannot be compared with the Alps in point of elevation, though in resemblance it may, as the middle of the chain is covered with glaciers, or white with eternal snows. The highest summit is only 5900 feet above the level of the Black Sea. The two principal passages of Caucasus are mentioned by the ancients under the name of the Caucasian and Albanian gates. The first is the defile which leads from Mosdok to Tiflis. It is the narrow valley of four days journey, where, according to Strabo, the river Aragon, now called Arakui, flows. It is, as Pliny calls it, an enormous work of nature, which has cut out a long opening among the rocks, which an iron gate would be almost sufficient to close. It is by this passage that the barbarians of the north threatened both the Roman and the Persian empire. It is now called Dariel. The Albanian pass of the ancients was, according to common opinion, the pass of Derbend along the Caspian Sea. Later and better authorities sanction the belief, however, that it was the same with the Sarmatian pass, and coincides with a defile passing through the territory of Ooma-khan, along the frontier of Daghestan, and then traversing the district of Kagmansharie. CAUCONES, a people of Paphlagonia, originally inhabitants of Arcadia, or of Scythia according to some accounts. Some of them made a settlement near Dymæ in Elis. Herodot. 1, &c.—Strab. 8, &c.

CAUDI and CAUDIUM, a town of the Samnites, near which, in a place called Caudina Furcula, [or fauces,] the Roman army under T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Posthumius was obliged to surrender to the Samnites, and pass under the yoke with the greatest disgrace. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 138.

CAULONIA, or Caulon, a town of Italy in the country of the Brutii, founded by a colony of Achæans, and destroyed by Dionysius the elder, about 400 B. C. Its inhabitants were transported by him into Sicily. It lay above the Locri Epizephyrii, on the eastern coast.] Paus. 6, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 553.

CAUNUS, a son of Miletus and Cyane. He was passionately fond of, or, according to others, he was tenderly beloved by, his sister Byblis, and to avoid an incestuous commerce, he retired to Caria, where he built a city called by his own name. vid. Byblis. Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 11.—A city of Caria, [at the foot of mount Taramelus, west of the Sinus Glaucus. The air was proverbially unhealthy in summer and autumn, by reason of the extreme heat, and the evil was increased by the abundance of its fruits. The figs of this place were famous.] Cic. de Div. 2, c. 4.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 1, c. 176.

CAUROS, [another name for Andros. vid. Andros.] Plin. 4, c. 12.

CAURUS, [or CORUS, in Greek Argestes, the west-north-west wind.]

CAÏSTER, or CAÏSTRUS, a river of Lydia, falling into the Ægean sea near Ephesus. According to the poets, the banks and neighbourhood of this river were generally frequented by swans. [In its course it flowed through a marsh, called the Asian marsh, much frequented by water-fowl, and mentioned by Homer and Virgil. The Cayster is now called Kitchik-Minder, or little Mæander, from its wandering course.] Ovid. Met. 2, v. 253, l. 5, v. 386.—Mart. 1, ep. 54.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 461.—Virg. G. 1, v. 384.

CEA or CEOS, an island near Eubœa, called also Cos. vid. Cos.

CEBA, now Ceva, a town of modern Piedmont, famous for cheese. Plin. 11, c. 42.

CEBENNA, mountains, now the Cevennes, separating the Averni from the Helvii, extending from the Garonne to the Rhone. Cæs. B. G. 7, c. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 5.

CEBES, a Theban philosopher, one of the disciples of Socrates, B. C. 405. He attended his learned preceptor in his last moments, and distinguished himself by three dialogues that he wrote; but more particularly by his beautiful picture of human life, delineated with accuracy of judgment, and great splendour of sentiment. Little is known of the character of Cebes from history. Plato mentions him once, and Xenophon the same, but both in a manner which conveys most fully the goodness of his heart and the purity of his morals. The best editions of Cebes are those of Gronovius, 8vo. 1689; and [that of Schweighæuser, Lips. 1798, 8vo. appended to his edition of Epicetetus.]

CEBRENIA, a country of Troas with a town of the same name, called after the river Cebrenus, which is in the neighbourhood. Ceone, the daughter of the Cebrenus, received the patronymic of Cebrenis. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 769.—Stat. 1, Sylv. 5, v. 21.

CEBRUS, now Zebris, a river falling into the Danube, and dividing Lower from Upper Mœsia. [It is south-east of Ratiaria.]

CECIDAS, an ancient dithyrambic poet.

CECINA, a river near Volaterra in Etruria; [at its mouth were the Vada Volaterrana.] Mela, 2, c. 4.

A. CECINA, a Roman knight in the interest of Pompey, who used to breed up young swallows and send them to carry news to his friends as messengers. He was a particular friend of Cicero, with whom he corresponded. Some of his letters are still extant in Cicero. Plin. 10, c. 24.—Cic. 15, ep. 66. Orat. 29.

CECROPÏA, the original name of Athens, in honour of Cecrops, its first founder. The ancients often use this word for Attica, and the Athenians are often called Cecropidæ. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 671.

CECROPIDÆ, an ancient name of the Athenians, more particularly applied to those who were descended from Cecrops the founder of Athens. The honourable name of Cecropidæ was often conferred as a reward for some virtuous action in the field of battle. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.—Ovid. 7, Met. 671.

CECROPS, a native of Sais in Egypt, who led a colony to Attica about 1556 years before the christian era, and reigned over part of the country which was called from him Cecropia. He softened and polished the rude and uncultivated manners of the inhabitants, and drew them from the country to inhabit twelve small villages which he had founded. He gave them laws and regulations, and introduced among them the worship of those deities which were held in adoration in Egypt. He married the daughter of Acteus a Grecian prince, and was deemed the first founder of Athens. He taught his subjects to cultivate the olive, and instructed them to look upon Minerva as the watchful patroness of their city. It is said that he was the first who raised an altar to Jupiter in Greece, and offered him sacrifices. After a reign of 50 years, spent in regulating his newly formed kingdom, and in polishing the manners of his subjects. Cecrops died, leaving three daughters, Aglauros, Herse, and Pandrosia. He was succeeded by Cranaus, a native of the country. Some time after, Theseus, one of his successors on the throne, formed the twelve villages which he had established into one city, to which the name of Athens was given. (vid. Athenæ.) Some authors have described Cecrops as a monster, half a man and half a serpent; and this fable is explained by the recollection that he was master of two languages, the Greek and Egyptian; or that he had the command over two countries, Egypt and Greece. Others explain it by an allusion to the regulations which Cecrops made amongst the inhabitants concerning marriage and the union of the two sexes. Paus. 1, c. 5.—Strab. 9.—Justin. 2, c. 6.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 561.—Hugin. fab. 166.—The second of that name, was the seventh king of Athens, and the son and successor of Erechtheus. CEDREÁTIS, the name of Diana among the Orchomenians, because her images were hung on lofty cedars.

CEL, the inhabitants of the island Cea.

CELÁDUS, a river of Arcadia, [falling into the Alpheus.] Paus. 8, c. 38.—An island of the Adriatic sea. Mela, 3, c. 1.

CELÆNÆ, or CELENE, [a city of Phrygia, in the south-west, at the sources of the Marsyas. This was a small river which flows into the Mæander, and which, according to Xenophon, was named after Marsyas, whom Apollo caused to be flayed alive, and whose skin he hung in the cave where the river rises. Cyrus the younger had a palace there, with a park filled with wild beasts, where he exercised himself in hunting. Within the enclosure of this palace rose the Mæander, and flowed through the park; the Marsyas rose in the market-place. At the sources of the latter, Xerxes, after his return from Greece, built a palace and citadel. The inhabitants of Celænæ were in after days carried off, by Antiochus Soter to the city of Apamea, founded by him a few miles to the south-east, at the confluence of the Marsyas and Mæander.] Strab. 12.—Liv. 38, c. 13.—Xenoph. Anab. 1.

CELÆNO, one of the harpies, daughter of Neptune and Terra. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 245.

CELEIA and CELA, a town of Noricum, [now Cillei.] Plin. 3, c. 24.

CELENDRIIS, a colony of the Samians in Cilicia [T'achea, south-west of Seleucia. It is now Kelnar.]

CELENÆUS, a Cimmerian, who first taught how persons guilty of murder might be expiated. Flacc. 3, v. 406.

CELENNÆ, or CELENA, a town of Campania where Juno was worshipped. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 739.

CELER, a man who with Severus undertook to rebuild Nero's palace after the burning of Rome. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 42.—A man called Fabius, who killed Remus when he leaped over the walls of Rome, by order of Romulus. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 837.—Plut. in Romul.—Metius, a noble youth to whom Statius dedicated a poem.

CELÈRES, [vid. Equites.]

CELÉTRUM, a town of Macedonia, [north-east of Beræa, on a lake formed by the river Astræus. Under the Greek empire it was called Castoria.] Liv. 31, c. 40.

CELÈUS, a king of Eleusis, father to Triptolemus by Metanira. He gave a kind reception to Ceres, who taught his son the cultivation of the earth. (vid. Triptolemus.) His rustic dress became a proverb. The invention of several agricultural instruments made of osiers is attributed to him. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 508, l. 5, v. 296.—Virg. G. 1, v. 165.—Apollod. 1, c. 5.—Paus. 1, c. 14.—A king of Cephallenia.

CELMUS, a man who nursed Jupiter, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He was changed into a magnet stone for saying that Jupiter was mortal. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 281.

CELSUS, an epicurean philosopher in the second century, to whom Lucian dedicated one of his compositions. He wrote a treatise against the christians, to which an answer was returned by Origen.—Corn. [a physician, born at Rome or Verona. He came from the Patrician family of the Cornelii, and flourished under Augustus, Tiberius, and Caligula. He was styled the Hippocrates of the Latins. He wrote on rhetoric, medicine, military tactics, and agriculture, and seems to have understood all these sciences perfectly. Of the eight books of Celsus which remain, the first four treat of internal maladies; the 5th and 6th of external; and the 7th and 8th of such diseases as come under the cognisance of the surgeon. The works of Celsus are valuable, not only on account of the purity of the language, but also for the excellence of the precepts which they contain.] The best editions of Celsus de medicinâ are the 8vo. L. Bat. 1746, and that of Vallart, 12mo. Paris apud Didot, 1772.—Albinovanus, a friend of Horace, warned against plagiarisms, 1, ep. 3, v. 15, and pleasantly ridiculed in the 8th epistle for his follies. Some of his elegies have been preserved.—Juventius, a lawyer who conspired against Domitian.—Titus, a man proclaimed emperor, A. D. 265, against his will, and murdered seven days after.

CELTÆ, [a powerful race, found at the dawn of history in possession of the western extremity of Europe. They were discovered by the Romans in Gaul in a state of disunion and military decline, which speedily effected their subjugation. They seem to have dwelt originally in the countries watered by the Danube, and in the vicinity of the Alps. Dispossessed of these settlements by the Teutones, and driven towards the west, they not only spread themselves over Gaul, but, upon the gradual receding of the Iberian tribes, over Spain and other countries. Their possessions in Gaul reached to the extremity of Bretagne throughout all the country between the Seine and Garogne, and eastward to the Rhine and the Alps. Towards the south, a branch of them, named Volcæ, had established themselves along the coast of the Mediterranean; and towards the east the Helvetii also belonged to their nation. On account of these extensive possessions the Romans and Greeks gave the name of Galatia, ΚΑΛΑΤΙΑ, or Celtica, to the whole land. By the more ancient Greeks the whole of western Europe, at some distance from the Mediterranean, was called the land of the Celtæ. In the west of Gaul and of Britain there is evidence to presume that the greater part of the population consisted of that division of the Celtic race whose posterity now possesses the name of Cymri. But in Ireland the population was wholly Celtic, of that original stem which had penetrated in the earliest ages into Gaul, Spain, and the British Islands. Murray's Philosophical History of European Lang: Vol. 2, p. 6.—*Mannert's Anc. CELTIBERI, a people of Spain, [brave and powerful, who occupied the greater part of the interior of Spain. According to Dionysius Siculus, they were a people composed of two nations, the Celtæ and Iberi, whence their name. And this perhaps was used for distinction sake from the Celtæ beyond the Pyrenees in Gaul. [CENOMANI, a people of Gaul, belonging to the Auleri, and corresponding, to the Diocese of Mans.—There was another people of the same name, who originally came from Transalpine Gaul, and settled in Italy a little after B. C. 600.]

CENSORES, two magistrates of great authority at Rome, first created [A. U. C. 312.] Their office was to number the people, estimate the possessions of every citizen, reform and watch over the manners of the people, and regulate the taxes. Their power was also extended over private families: they punished irregularity, and inspected the management and education of the Roman youth. They could inquire into the expenses [and moral conduct] of every citizen, and even degrade a senator from all his privileges and honours, if guilty of any extravagance. This punishment was generally executed in passing over the offender's name in calling the list of the senators. The office of public censor was originally exercised by the kings. Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome, first established a census, by which every man was obliged to come to be registered, and give in writing the place of his residence, his name, his quality, the number of his children, of his tenants, estates, and domestics, &c. The ends of the census were very salutary to the Roman republic. They knew their own strength, their ability to support a war, or to make a levy of troops, or raise a tribute. It was required, [at least towards the end of the republic and under the emperors,] that every knight should be possessed of 400,000 sesterces [£3229 sterling,] to enjoy the rights and privileges of his order; and a senator was entitled to sit in the senate, if he was really worth 800,000 sesterces, [between six and seven thousand pounds sterling. Augustus raised the senatorial fortune to 1,200,000 sesterces, and supplied the deficiency to those who had not that sum.] This laborious task of numbering and reviewing the people, was, after the expulsion of the Tarquins, one of the duties and privileges of the consuls. But when the republic was become more powerful, and when the number of its citizens was increased, the consuls were found unable to make the census, on account of the multiplicity of business. After it had been neglected for 17 years, two new magistrates, called censors, were elected. They remained in office for five years, and every fifth year they made a census of all the citizens in the Campus Martius, and offered a solemn sacrifice, and made a lustration in the name of all the Roman people. This space of time was called a lustrum, and ten or twenty years were commonly expressed by two or four lustra. After the office of the censors had remained for some time unaltered, the Romans, jealous of their power, abridged the duration of their office, and a law was made, A. U. C. 420, by Mamercus Æmilius, [ordaining that they should still be elected every five years, but that their power should continue only a year and a half.] After the second Punic war, they were always chosen from such persons as had been consuls; their office was more honourable, though less powerful than that of the consuls; the badges of their office were the same, but the censors were not allowed to have lictors to walk before them as the consuls. [The sentence of the censors only affected the rank and character of persons, and in later times had no other effect than that of putting a man to the blush. It was not fixed and unalterable, as the decision of a court of justice, but might be either taken off by the next censors, or rendered ineffectual by the verdict of a jury or by the suffrages of the Roman people. Sometimes the senate added force to the feeble decree of the censors, by imposing an additional punishment.] When one of the censors died, no one was elected in his room till the five years were expired, and his colleague immediately resigned. This circumstance originated from the death of a censor [in the lustrum in which Rome was taken by the Gauls,] and was ever after deemed an unfortunate event to the republic. [No one, moreover, could be elected a censor a second time.] The emperors abolished the censors, and took upon themselves to execute their office, [or gave them to other magistrates.]

CENSORINUS, Ap. 1. was compelled, after many services to the state, to assume the imperial purple by the soldiers, by whom he was murdered some days after, A. D. 270.—A grammarian of the 3d century, whose book, De die natali, is extant, best edited in 8vo. by Havercamp, L. Bat. 1767. It treats of the birth of man, of years, months, and days.

CENSUS, the numbering of the people at Rome, performed by the censors, a censo to value. vid. Censores.—A god worshipped at Rome, the same as CONSUS.

CENTAURI, a people of Thessaly, half men and half horses. They were the offspring of Centaurus, son of Apollo, by Stilba, daughter of the Peneus. According to some, the Centaurs were the fruit of Ixion's adventure with the cloud in the shape of Juno, or, as others assert, of the union of Centaurus with the mares of Magnesia. This fable of the existence of the Centaurs, monsters supported upon the four legs of a horse, arises from the ancient people of Thessaly having tamed horses, and having appeared to the neighbours mounted on horseback, a sight very uncommon at that time, and which, when at a distance, seemed only one body, and consequently one creature. Some derive the name απο του κεντηνταυρους, from *goad*ing bulls, because they went on horseback after their bulls which had strayed, or because they hunted wild bulls with horses. Some of the ancients have maintained, that monsters like the Centaurs can have existed in the natural course of things. Plutarch in Sympos. mentions one seen by Periander tyrant of Corinth; and Pliny 7, c. 3, says, that he saw one embalmed in honey, which had been brought to Rome from Egypt in the reign of Claudius. The battle of the Centaurs with the Lapithæ is famous in history. Ovid has elegantly described it, and it has also employed the pen of Hesiod, Valerius Flaccus, &c. and Pausanias in Eliac says it was represented in the temple of Jupiter at Olympia, and also at Athens by Phidias and Parrhasius according to Pliny 36, c. 5. The origin of this battle was a quarrel at the marriage of Hippodamia with Pirithous, where the Centaurs, intoxicated with wine, behaved with rudeness, and even offered violence to the women that were present. Such an insult irritated Hercules, Theseus, and the rest of the Lapithæ, who defended the women, wounded and defeated the Centaurs, and obliged them to leave their country and retire to Arcadia. Here their insolence was a second time punished by Hercules, who, when he was going to hunt the boar of Erymanthus, was kindly entertained by the Centaur Pholus, who gave him wine which belonged to the rest of the Centaurs, but had been given them on condition of their treating Hercules with it whenever he passed through their territory. They resented the liberty which Hercules took with their wine, and attacked him with uncommon fury. The hero defended himself with his arrows, and defeated his adversaries, who fled for safety to the Centaur Chiron. Chiron had been the preceptor of Hercules, and therefore they hoped that he would desist in his presence. Hercules, though awed at the sight of Chiron, did not desist, but, in the midst of the engagement he wounded his preceptor in the knee, who, in the excessive pain he suffered, exchanged immortality for death. The death of Chiron irritated Hercules the more, and the Centaurs that were present were all extirpated by his hand, and indeed few escaped the common destruction. The most celebrated of the Centaurs were Chiron, Eurytus, Amycus, Gryneus, Caumas, Lycidas, Arneus, Medon, Rhœtus, Pisenor, Mermeros, Pholus, &c. *Diod. 4.—Tzetzes Chil. 9. CENTRÏTIS, [a river of Armenia Major, flowing under the ramparts of Tigranocerta, and falling into the Euphrates. Diodorus Siculus says that it flowed between Media and Armenia, and in Xenophon's Anabasis it is said to have separated Armenia from the Carduchi. It is now the Khabour.]

CENTRŌNES, [a people of Gaul, among the Alpes Cotticæ, who, along with the Graioceli and Caturiges, were defeated by Cæsar in several engagements. Their chief city was Forum Claudii Centronum, now Centron.—There was another nation of the same name, placed by Cæsar in dependence on the Nervii. Some locate them in the territory of Gaud, others in that of Courtray, their precise situation is unknown.] Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 10, l. 5, c. 38.—Plin. 3, c. 20.

CENTUMVIRI, the members of a court of justice at Rome. They were originally chosen, three from the 35 tribes of the people, and though 105, they were always called Centumviri. They were afterwards increased to the number of 180, and still kept their original name. The prætor sent to their tribunal causes of the greatest importance, as their knowledge of the law was extensive. [They were generally summoned by the Decemviri, who also presided among them in the absence of the prætor. These decemviri consisted of five senators and five equites, and they assembled in the Basilicæ, spacious halls built around the forum for the administration of justice.] Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 38.—Quintil. 4, 5, and 11.—Plin. 6, ep. 33.

CENTUM CELLÆ, [a sea-port town of Etruria, north-west of Cære. Trajan made this the place of his frequent residence, and gave it importance by erecting a harbour which he called after his own name. It is now Civita Vecchia, the principal port in the Papal dominions. Previous to Trajan's erecting a villa here, the place was very thinly inhabited; and received its name from the mean and scanty abodes scattered here and there along the shore.] Plin. 6, ep. 31.

CENTURIA, a division of the people among the Romans, consisting of a hundred. [At first a century contained a hundred, as its name imported, but not so afterwards.] The Roman people were originally divided into three tribes, and each tribe into 10 Curicæ. [In process of time, the tribes increased to 35, and were divided into Rusticæ and Urbanæ, the former more honourable; the number of Curicæ was always 30.] Servius Tullius made a census; and when he had the place of habitation, name, and profession of every citizen, who amounted to 80,000 men, all able to bear arms, he divided them into six classes, and each class into several centuries or companies of a hundred men. The first class consisted of 80 centuries, 40 of which were composed of men from the age of 45 and upwards, appointed to guard the city. The 40 others were young men from 17 to 45 years of age, appointed to go to war, and fight the enemies of Rome. Their arms were all the same, that is, a buckler, a cuirass, a helmet, cushions of brass, with a sword, a lance, and a javelin; and as they were of the most illustrious citizens, they were called, by way of eminence, classici, and their inferiors infra classem. [To these were added 18 centuries of Equites; in all 98 centuries. They were to be worth 100,000 asses, or pounds of brass; which sum is commonly reckoned equal to £322 18s. 4d. sterling; but if we suppose each pound of brass to contain 24 asses, as was the case afterwards, it will amount to £7750.] The second, third, and fourth classes, consisted each of twenty centuries, ten of which were composed of the more aged, and the others of the younger sort of people. [To the second class were added two centuries of artificers, carpenters, smiths, &c. These Livy joins to the first class. To the fourth class Dionysius adds two centuries of trumpeters, whom Livy divides into three centuries, and includes among the 30 centuries of the fifth class.] Their arms were a large shield, a spear, and a javelin; they were to be worth in the second class, 75,000 asses. In the third, 50,000, and in the fourth, 25,000. The fifth class consisted of 30 centuries. They were to be worth 11,000 asses, [but, according to Dionysius, 12,500.] The sixth class contained only one century, comprising the whole body of the poorest citizens, who were called Proletarii, as their only service to the state was procreating children. They were also called capite censi, as the censor took notice of their person, not of their estate. [The whole number of centuries was, according to Livy, 191; and, according to Dionysius, 193. vid. Comitia.] The word Centuria is also applied to a subdivision of the Roman legions. [vid. Legio]

CENTURIPA, (es. or æ. orum.) now Centorbi, a town of Sicily [on the eastern shore, near Catania.] Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 23.—Ital. 14, v. 205.—Plin. 3, c. 8.

CÆOS and CÆA, [an island of the Ægean, one of the Cyclades, opposite the promontory of Sunium in Attica. It was famed for its fertility and rich pastures. The island became so populous, that a law was made commanding all persons upwards of 60 years of age to be poisoned, that the others might subsist; so that none above 60 years of age were to be seen in the island being obliged, after they had attained that age, either to submit to the law or abandon the place. Such at least is the account of ancient writers; most probably, however, they have mistaken for a national custom, a law passed by the inhabitants while the island was suffering from want during a siege by the Athenians. Simonides was born here. It is now Zia.]

CEPHALËNIA, and CEPHALLENIA, an island in the Ionian sea, below Corcyra, whose inhabitants went with Ulysses to the Trojan war [It was known in the time of Homer by the names of Samus or Black Epirus. (Ἡπειρος μελαίνα).] It abounds in oil and excellent wines. It was anciently divided into four different districts, from which circumstance it received the name of Tetrapolis. It is about 90 miles in circumference. [Its capital was Same, destroyed by the Romans, and supposed to have stood in the place which the Italians call Porto Guiscardo. The name of the four cities, according to Thucydides, were Same, Prone, Cranii, and Talæ. The island is said to have taken its name from Cephalus. vid. Cephalus. CEPHALON, a Greek of Ionia, who wrote an history of Troy, besides an epitome of universal history from the age of Ninus to Alexander, which he divided into nine books, inscribed with the names of the nine muses. He affected not to know the place of his birth, expecting it would be disputed like Homer's. He lived in the reign of Adrian.

CEPHALUS, son of Deioneus, king of Thesaly, by Diomede, daughter of Xuthus, married Procris, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. Aurora fell in love with him, and carried him away; but he refused to listen to her addresses, and was impatient to return to Procris. The goddess sent him back: and to try the fidelity of his wife, she made him put on a different form, and he arrived at the house of Procris in the habit of a merchant. Procris was deaf to every offer; but she suffered herself to be seduced by the gold of this stranger, who discovered himself the very moment that Procris had yielded up her virtue. This circumstance so ashamed Procris, that she fled from her husband, and devoted herself to hunting in the island of Eubœa, where she was admitted among the attendants of Diana, who presented her with a dog always sure of his prey, and a dart which never missed its aim, and always returned to the hands of its mistress of its own accord. Some say that the dog was a present from Minos, because Procris had cured his wounds. After this Procris returned in disguise to Cephalus, who was willing to disgrace himself by some unnatural concessions to obtain the dog and the dart of Procris. Procris discovered herself at the moment that Cephalus showed himself faithless, and a reconciliation was easily made between them: They loved one another with more tenderness than before, and Cephalus received from his wife the presents of Diana. As he was particularly fond of hunting, he every morning early repaired to the woods, and after much toil and fatigue, laid himself down in the cool shade, and earnestly called for Aura, or the refreshing breeze. This ambiguous word was mistaken for the name of a mistress; and some informer reported to the jealous Procris, that Cephalus daily paid a visit to his mistress, whose name was Aura. Procris too readily believed the information, and secretly followed her husband into the woods. According to his daily custom, Cephalus retired to the cool, and called after Aura. At the name of Aura Procris eagerly lifted up her head to see her expected rival. Her motion occasioned a rustling among the leaves of the bush that concealed her; and as Cephalus listened, he thought it to be a wild beast, and he let fly his unerring dart. Procris was struck to the heart, and instantly expired in the arms of her husband, confessing that ill-grounded jealousy was the cause of her death. [After this unfortunate event, Cephalus fled to Amphytrion, who made him governor of the island, which from him was named Cephalonia or Cephalenia.] According to Apollodorus, there were two persons of the name of Cephalus; one, son of Mercury and Herse, carried away by Aurora, with whom he dwelt in Syria, and by whom he had a son called Tithonus. The other married Procris, and was the cause of the tragical event mentioned above. Cephalus was father of Arcesius by Procris, and of Phaeton, according to Hesiod, by Aurora. *Ovid. The former he makes king of Tegea, and father of Sterope; and says, that he, with his twelve sons, assisted Hercules in a war against Hippocoon, where they were killed. The latter he calls king of Æthiopia and father of Andromeda.

CEPHISIA, a part of Attica, through which the Cephissus flows. Plin. 4, c. 7.

CEPHISIDORUS, a tragic poet of Athens in the age of Æschylus.—An historian who wrote an account of the Phocian war.

CEPHISUS and CEPHISSUS, a celebrated river of Greece, that rises at Lillæa in Phocis, and after passing at the north of Delphi and mount Parnassus, enters Bœotia, where it flows into the lake Copais. The graces were particularly fond of this river, whence they are called the goddesses of the Cephissus. [There were two other rivers of the same name in Attica, one of which ran on the north of Athens, near the northern wall of the Piræus, and the other rose near Phyle, and flowed into the Sinus Saronicus near Scirus. There was a fourth river of this name in Argolis, flowing into the Inachus, above Argos.] Strab. 9.—Plin. 4, c. 7.—Paus. 9, c. 24.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 29.—Lucan. 3, v. 175.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 369, l. 3, v. 19.

CÆPIO or CÆPIO, Servilius, a Roman consul, who put an end to the war in Spain. He took gold from a temple, and for that sacrilege the rest of his life was always unfortunate. He was conquered by the Cimbrians, his goods were publicly confiscated, and he died at last in prison.

CERAMICUS, a bay of Caria, [north of the peninsula of Doris,] receiving its name from Ceramus. Plin. 5, c. 29.—Mela, 1, c. 16.—A public walk, and a place to bury those that were killed in defence of their country, at Athens. Cic. ad Att. 1, ep. 10.

CERÁSUS, (untis) [a city of Pontus, on the sea-coast, south-west of Trapezus. It was founded by a colony from Sinope in Paphlagonia, to which it paid a yearly tribute. Pharnaces greatly improved it, and gave it the name of Pharnacia. From hence, according to Pliny, Lucullus first brought cherries into Italy, A. U. C. 680, which were introduced 120 years after into Britain. Hence the Latin cerasa, cherries. According to Tournefort, the country is hilly, and the hills covered with forests, in which cherry-trees grow naturally. It is now Kerasoun.] Marcell. 22, c. 13.—Plin. 15, c. 25, l. 16, c. 18, l. 17, c. 14.—Mela, 1, c. 19.

CERAUNIA and CERAUNII, large mountains of Epirus, extending far into the sea, and forming a promontory which projects between the Ionian and Adriatic seas. They are the same as the Acroceraunia.

CERAUNII, mountains of Asia, opposite the Caspian sea. [A part of the chain of Taurus is here meant by Mela, proceeding from the coast of the Euxine, the Palus Mœotis, and Tanais.] Mela, 1, c. 19.

CERAUNUS, a river of Cappadocia.—A surname of Ptolemy the 2d, from his boldness. C. Nep. Reg. c. 3.

CERBALUS, a river of Apulia. Plin. 3, c. 11.

CERBERUS, a dog of Pluto, the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. He had 50 heads according to Hesiod, and three according to other mythologists. He was stationed at the entrance of Hell, as a watchful keeper, to prevent the living from entering the infernal regions, and the dead from escaping from their confinement. It was usual for those heroes, who in their life-time visited Pluto's kingdom, to appease the barking mouths of Cerberus with a cake. Orpheus lulled him to sleep with his lyre; and Hercules dragged him from hell when he went to redeem Alceste. [Horace gives him the title of Centiceps, by poetic amplification.] *Virg. CERCÖPES, the inhabitants of the island Pithecusa, changed into monkeys on account of their dishonesty. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 91.

CERCOPS, a Milesian author of a fabulous history mentioned by Athenæus.—A Pythagorean philosopher.

CERCYON and CERCYÖNES, a king of Eleusis son of Neptune, or, according to others, of Vulcan. He obliged all strangers to wrestle with him; and as he was a dexterous wrestler, they were easily conquered and put to death. After many cruelties, he challenged Theseus in wrestling, and he was conquered and put death by his antagonist. His daughter Alope was loved by Neptune, by whom she had a child. Cercyon exposed the child, called Hippothon, but he was preserved by a mare, and afterwards placed upon his grandfather's throne by Theseus. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 439.—Hygin. fab. 187.—Plut. in These.—Paus. 1, c. 5 and 39.

CERCÛRA, [vid. Cercyra.]

CEREÄLIA, festivals in honour of Ceres; first introduced at Rome by Mummius the œdile, and celebrated on the 19th of April. Persons in mourning were not permitted to appear at the celebration; therefore they were not observed after the battle of Cannæ. They are the same as the Thesmophoria of the Greeks. vid. Thesmophoria.

CERES, the goddess of corn and harvests, was daughter of Saturn and Vesta. She had a daughter by Jupiter, whom she called Pherephatta, and afterwards Proserpine. This daughter was carried away by Pluto, as she was gathering flowers in the plains near Enna. The rape of Proserpine was grievous to Ceres, who sought her all over Sicily; and when night came, she lighted her torch in the flames of Mount Ætna, to continue her search by night all over the world. She at last found her veil near the fountain Cyane; but no intelligence could be received of the place of her concealment, till at last the nymph Arethusa informed her that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto. No sooner had Ceres heard this than she flew to heaven with her chariot drawn by two dragons, and demanded of Jupiter the restoration of her daughter. The endeavours of Jupiter to soften her by representing Pluto as a powerful god, to become her son-in-law, proved fruitless, and the restoration was granted, provided Proserpine had not eaten any thing in the kingdom of Pluto. Ceres upon this repaired to Pluto, but Proserpine had eaten the grains of a pomegranate, which she had gathered as she walked over the Elysian fields, and Ascalaphus, the only one who had seen her, discovered it to make his court to Pluto. The return of Proserpine was therefore impracticable; but Ascalaphus, for his unsolicited information, was changed into an owl. vid. Ascalaphus. The grief of Ceres for the loss of her daughter was so great, that Jupiter granted Proserpine to pass six months with her mother, and the rest of the year with Pluto. During the inquiries of Ceres for her daughter, the cultivation of the earth was neglected, and the ground became barren; therefore, to repair the loss which mankind had suffered by her absence, the goddess went to Attica, which was become the most desolate country in the world, and instructed Triptolemus of Eleusis, in every thing which concerned agriculture. She taught him how to plough the ground, to sow and reap the corn, to make bread, and to take particular care of fruit trees. After these instructions, she gave him her chariot, and commanded him to travel all over the world, and communicate his knowledge of agriculture to the rude inhabitants, who hitherto lived upon acorns and the roots of the earth. vid. Triptolemus. Her beneficence to mankind made Ceres respected. Sicily was supposed to be the favourite retreat of the goddess, and Diodorus says that she and her daughter made their first appearance to mankind in Sicily, which Pluto received as a nuptial dowry from Jupiter when he married Proserpine. The Sicilians made a yearly sacrifice to Ceres, every man according to his abilities; and the fountain of Cyane, through which Pluto opened himself a passage with his trident, when carrying away Proserpine, was publicly honoured with an offering of bulls, and the blood of the victims was shed in the waters of the fountain. Besides these, other ceremonies were observed in honour of the goddesses who had so peculiarly favoured the island. The commemoration of the rape was celebrated about the beginning of the harvest, and the search of Ceres at the time that corn is sown in the earth. The latter festival continued six successive days; and during the celebration, the votaries of Ceres made use of some free and wanton expressions, as that language had made the goddess smile while melancholy for the loss of her daughter. Attica, which had been so eminently distinguished by the goddess, gratefully remembered her favours in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. vid. Eleusinia. Ceres also performed the duties of a legislator, and the Sicilians found the advantages of her salutary laws; hence her surname of Thesmophora. She is the same as the Isis of the Egyptians, and her worship, it is said, was first brought into Greece by Erechtheus. She met with different adventures when she travelled over the earth, and the impudence of Stello was severely punished. To avoid the importunities of Neptune, she changed herself into a mare: but the god took advantage of her metamorphosis, and from their union arose the horse Arion. vid. Arion. The birth of this monster so offended Ceres, that she withdrew herself from the sight of mankind; and the earth would have perished for want of her assistance, had not Pan discovered her in Arcadia, and given information of it to Jupiter. The Parca were sent by the god to comfort her, and at their persuasion she returned to Sicily, where her statues represented her veiled in black, with the head of a horse, and holding a dove in one hand and in the other a dolphin. In their sacrifices the ancients offered Ceres a pregnant sow, as that animal often injures and destroys the productions of the earth. While the corn was yet in grass they offered her a ram, after the victim had been led three times round the field. Ceres was represented with a garland of ears of corn on her head, holding in one hand a lighted torch, and in the other a poppy, which was sacred to her. She appears as a country-woman mounted on the back of an ox, and carrying a basket on her left arm, and holding a hoe; and sometimes she rides in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. She was supposed to be the same as Rhea, Tellus, Cybele, Bona Dea, Berecynthia, &c. The Romans paid her great adoration, and her festivals were yearly celebrated by the Roman matrons in the month of April, during eight days. These matrons abstained during several days from the use of wine and every carnal enjoyment. They always bore lighted torches in commemoration of the goddess; and whoever came to these festivals without a previous initiation was punished with death. Ceres is metaphorically called bread and corn, as the word Bacchus is frequently used to signify wine. Apollod. 1, c. 5, l. 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 12 and 14.—Paus. 1, c. 31, l. 2, c. 34, l. 3, c. 23, l. 8, c. 25, &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—*Hesiod. CERILLI or CARILLÆ, now Cirella, a town of the Brutii, [south-west of Pandosia.] Strab. 6.

CERILIMUM, a place of Lucania, [probably the same with Cerilli.] Strab. 6.—Sil. Ital. 3, v. 580.

CERINTHUS, now Zero, a town of Eubœa, [on the Euripus, north-east of Chalcis.] whose inhabitants went to the Trojan war, headed by Elphenor, son of Chalcedon. Homer. Il. 2, v. 45.—Strab. 10.

CERNE, [an island without the pillars of Hercules, on the African coast, mentioned by Hanno, in his Periplus as it is usually though incorrectly termed. Here he established a colony, and it was always the depôt of the Carthaginians on the Atlantic coast of Africa. Hanno says that it was the same distance from the columns of Hercules that Carthage was. It is supposed to have been the present isle of Arguin, which the Moors call Ghir.] Strab. 1.—Plin. 5 and 6.

CERON, a fountain of Histæotis, whose waters rendered black all the sheep that drank of them. Plin. 3, c. 2.

CERETANI, a people of Spain that inhabited the modern district of Cerdana in Catalonia. Plin. 3, c. 3.

CERTONIUM, a town of Asia Minor, [between Adramyttium and the Caicus, according to Xenophon.]

CESTIUS, an epicurean of Smyrna, who taught rhetoric at Rhodes in the age of Cicero.—A bridge at Rome.

CESTRINUS, son of Helenus and Andromache; after his father's death he settled in Epirus, above the river Thyamis, and called the country Cestrina. Paus. 1, c. 11.

CETES, a king of Egypt, the same as Proteus. Diod. 1.

CETHËGUS, the surname of one of the branches of the Cornelii.—Marcus, a consul in the second Punic war. Cic. in Brut.—A tribune at Rome, of the most corrupt morals, who joined Catiline in his conspiracy against the state, and was commissioned to murder Cicero. He was apprehended, and with Lentulus, put to death by order of the Roman senate. Plut. in Cic. &c.—P. Corn. a powerful Roman, who embraced the party of Marius against Sylla. His mistress had obtained such an ascendancy over him, that she distributed his favours, and Lucullus was not ashamed to court her smiles when he wished to be appointed general against Mithridates.

CETII, [a people of Mysia, who probably derived their name from the small river Cetus, which traversed their district, and fell into the Adriatic. Strabo, however, places them in Cilicia.]

CETIUS, a river of Mysia.—[A chain of mountains in Noricum, forming its eastern boundary. According to Busching it was a ridge extending from the Saave towards the Danube, about nine British miles on the west of Vienna, where it is called Leopoldsbërg. Mannert gives the name of Kalenbërg to its northern part.]

CETO, a daughter of Pontus and Terra, married Phorcys, by whom she had the three Gorgons, &c. Hesiod. Theog. v. 237.—Lucan. 9, v. 646.

CEUS and CÆROS, a son of Cœlus and Terra, who married Phœbe, by whom he had Latone and Asteria. Hesiod. Theog. v. 135.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 179.

CËYX, a king of Trachinia, son of Lucifer, and husband of Alcyone. He was drowned as he went to consult the oracle of Claros. His wife was apprized of his misfortune in a dream, and found his dead body washed on the sea-shore. They were both changed into birds called Alcyons. vid. Alcyone. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 587.—Paus. 1, c. 32. According to Apollod. 1, c. 7, l. 2, c. 7, the husband of Alcyone and the king of Trachinia were two different persons.

[CHABÔRAS, or, as most of the Greek writers call it, ABORRAS, a river of Mesopotamia, springing, according to Ptolemy, from Mount Masius, a little to the west of Nisibis, but, according to other authorities, a little east of Charræ. These last are followed by D'Anville. It fell into the Euphrates near the town of Circesium. Its modern name is the Khabour. In the Anabasis of Xenophon it is called the Araxes, which appears to be an appellative term, as we find it applied to many other rivers in antiquity.]

CHABRIAS, an Athenian general, who chiefly signalized himself when he assisted the Bœotians against Agesilaus. In this celebrated campaign, he ordered his soldiers to put one knee on the ground, and firmly to rest their spears upon the other, and cover themselves with their shields, by which means he daunted the enemy, and had a statue raised to his honour in that same posture. He assisted also Nectanebus, king of Egypt, and conquered the whole island of Cyprus: but he at last fell a sacrifice to his excessive courage, and disdained to fly from his ship when he had it in his power to save his life like his companions. B. C. 376. C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 16.—Plut. in Phoc.

CHERËAS, an Athenian, who wrote on agriculture.—An officer who murdered Caligula A. D. 41, to prevent the infamous death which was prepared against himself.

CHERËMON, a comic poet and disciple of Socrates.—A stoic, who wrote on the Egyptian priests.

CHERËPHON, a tragic poet of Athens, in the age of Philip of Macedonia.

CHERONËA, [a city of Bœotia, previously called Arne, and situate on a small branch of the Cephissus. It was memorable for the defeat of the Athenians by the Bœotians, B. C. 447, and much more for their irretrievable defeat by Philip, B. C. 338, which put an end to the liberties of Greece. Here also Sylla gained a victory over the generals of Mithridates. It was the birth-place of Plutarch.]

CHALÆON, [a part of the Locri Ozolæ, south-west of Crissa.]

CHALCEA, an island with a town near Rhodes. Plin. 5, c. 3.—A festival at Athens. vid. Panathenæa.

CHALCËDON, now Kadi-Keui, an ancient city of Bithynia, opposite Byzantium, built by a colony from Megara, headed by Argias, B. C. 685, [some years before the founding of Byzantium.] It was first called Procerastis, and afterwards Colpusa. Its situation, however, was so improperly chosen, that it was called the city of blind men, intimating the inconsiderate plan of the founders [in overlooking the superior position on the opposite side of the straits, where Byzantium was afterwards founded.] Strab. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 32.—Mela, 1, c. 19.

CHALCIDENSES, the inhabitants of the isthmus between Teos and Erythræ.—A people near the Phasis.

CHALCIDICE, [a district of Macedonia, between the Sinus Thermaicus and Strymonicus. The lower part of it formed three peninsulas, Phlegra or Pallene, Sithonia, and Athos, which vid. The small town of Chalcis gave name to this district.—Another in Syria, adjacent to the town of Chalcis.]

[CHALCIÆCUS, an epithet applied to Minerva at Sparta, from her having a brazen temple, (χαλκίους σίκος). Gell. in his account of the Treasury at Argos, gives a reasonable explication of this seemingly strange term. He discovered in the interior of the Treasury, which still remains in a great degree entire, a number of brass nails placed throughout at regular intervals on the walls, and these he supposes were originally used for securing plates of the same metal to the wall, and hence the seeming fables of brazen chambers and brazen temples. Gell's Itinerary, p. 33. In a similar manner may be explained the account given by the ancients, of the brazen vessel made by Eurystheus, and into which he retired whenever Hercules returned from his labours. vid. Eurystheus.]

CHALCIOPÉ, a daughter of Æetes king of Colchis, who married Phryxus son of Athamas, who had fled to her father's court for protection. She had some children by Phryxus, and she preserved her life from the avarice and cruelty of her father, who had murdered her husband to obtain the golden fleece. [vid. Phryxus.] Ovid. Heroid. 17, v. 232.—Hygin. fab. 14, &c.

CHALCIS, now Egripo, the chief city of Eubœa, in that part which is nearest to Bœotia. It was founded by an Athenian colony. The island was said to have been anciently joined to the continent in the neighbourhood of Chalcis. [The inhabitants were famed for their skill in navigation, but were very dissolute. Some derive the name from Chalcis, a daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia, surnamed Chalcis, from her having invented brazen armour. Pliny deduces it from χαλκος, brass or copper, which he supposes to have been first used here.]—[Another of Macedonia.—Another of Syria, now Old Alep.—Another near Libanus, now Kalcos.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 10.—Paus. 5, c. 23.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 10.

CHALDÆA, [a country of Asia at the top of the Persian gulf, and south of Babylonia. Some writers, however, make Babylonia a part of it. With respect to the origin of the Chaldæans, who are called in Scripture Chasdim, various opinions have been entertained. Michaëlis considers them as a foreign race in Assyria, and is inclined to derive them from the Chalybes of the Greek geographers, who are called Chaldi by Stephanus Byzantinus.

His chief reason for this opinion is founded on the names of Chaldæan and Babylonian kings preserved in Scripture, and by Ptolemy and Syncellus, which differ from the Assyrian names and bear an apparent resemblance to those of some northern nations of Slavonic origin. Thus Nebucadnezar would be in Slavonic, Nebu-godnoi-tzar, i. e. a prince worthy of heaven. Belshazar would be equivalent to Bolshoi-tzar, i. e. a great prince; and so of others. (See the supplement to Michaelis's work on the Hebrew Law, sect. 1367, and his Spicilegium Geographiæ Hebræorum extera, vol. 2, p. 77, et seqq.) On the other hand, Adelung contends that all these names are resolvable into the Hebrew, or its cognate dialects. This author considers the Chaldæans or Chasdim, as a mountaineer people from the north of Mesopotamia, but belonging to the Assyrian, or, as he calls it, the Shemitic race. (See his Mithridates, Erster Theil, p. 517, and also Rosenmuller on Hab. 1, 6, and Gesenius's larger Hebrew Lexicon, p. 489.) The Chaldæan are highly commended in many of the ancient writers for their skill in the sciences, especially in astronomy. If we are to believe Diodorus, however, their claims to this high character were very slight. They seem to have pursued the study of astronomy no farther than as it might tend to aid their fancied astrological researches. They taught that the shape of the earth was that of a skiff or small boat, and of eclipses of the sun they knew but little, and never ventured to predict them or fix the time of their occurring. So says Diodorus. Diod. Sic. 2, 31.—Aulus Gellius. 14, 1.—Sextus Empiricus, p. 338.—Montucla Hist. de Math. vol. 1, l. 2, §. 4.]

CHALYBES and CALYBES, a people of Asia Minor, [in the south-east corner of] Pontus, once very powerful, and possessed of a great extent of country, abounding in iron mines, where the inhabitants worked naked. The Calybes attacked the ten thousand in their retreat, and behaved with much spirit and courage. They were partly conquered by Cræsus, king of Lydia. [Their country is still called Keldir. Strabo calls them Chaldæi. vid. Chaldæa.] Virg. Æn. 8, v. 421.—Strab. 12, &c.—Apollon. 2, v. 375.—Xenoph. Anab. 4, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 28.—Justin. 44, c. 3.

CHALYBON, now supposed to be Aleppo, a town of Syria, which gave the name of Chalibonitis to the neighbouring country. [vid. Bæra.]

CHALYBONITIS, a country of Syria, so famous for its wines that the king of Persia drank no other.

CHALYBS, [now Cabe,] a river in Spain, where Justin 34, c. 3, places the people called Calybes.

CHAMANI and CHAMAVI, a people of Germany, [south-east of the Frisii.] Tacit. in Germ.

CHAÏNES, a people of Epirus.

CHAÏNIA, a mountainous part of Epirus, which receives its name from Chaou, a son of Priam, inadvertently killed by his brother Helenus. There was a wood near, where doves (Chaonia aves) were said to deliver oracles. [vid. Dodona.] The words Chaonius victus are by ancient authors applied to acorns, the food of the first inhabitants. Lucan. 6, v. 426.—Claudian de Pros. rapt. 3, v. 47.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 335.—Propert. 1, el. 9.—Ovid. A. A. 1.

CHAOS, a rude and shapeless mass of matter, and confused assemblage of inactive elements, which, as the poets suppose, pre-existed the formation of the world, and from which the universe was formed by the hand and power of a superior being. This doctrine was first established by Hesiod, from whom the succeeding poets have copied it; and it is probable that it was obscurely drawn from the account of Moses, by being copied from the annals of Sanchoniathon, whose age is fixed antecedent to the siege of Troy. Chaos was deemed, by some, one of the oldest of the gods, and invoked as one of the infernal deities. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 510.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 1.

CHARADRA, a town of Phocis, [about 20 stadia from Lilaæ. Near it flowed the river Charadrus, which fell into the Cephissus.] Herodot. 3, c. 33.

CHARAX, a philosopher of Pergamus, who wrote an history of Greece in 40 books.

CHARAKES and CHARAXUS, a Mitylenean, brother to Sappho, who became passionately fond of the courtesan Rhodope, upon whom he squandered all his possessions, and reduced himself to poverty, and the necessity of piratical excursions. Ovid. Heroid. 15, v. 117.—Heroid. 2, c. 135, &c.

CHARES, an Athenian general.—A statuary of Lindus, who was 12 years employed in making the famous Colossus at Rhodes. Plin. 34, c. 7.—A man who wounded Cyrus when fighting against his brother Artaxerxes.—An historian of Mitylene, who wrote a life of Alexander.

CHARICLES, one of the 30 tyrants set over Athens by the Lacedæmonians. Xenoph. Memor. 1.—Arist. Polit. 5, c. 6.—A famous physician under Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 50.

CHARILA, a festival observed once in nine years by the Delphians. It owes its origin to this circumstance. In a great famine the people of Delphi assembled and applied to their king to relieve their wants. He accordingly distributed the little corn he had among the noblest; but as a poor little girl, called Charila, begged the king with more than common earnestness, he beat her with his shoe, and the girl, unable to bear his treatment, hanged herself in her girdle. The famine increased; and the oracle told the king, that to relieve his people, he must atone for the murder of Charila. Upon this a festival was instituted, with expiatory rites. The king presided over this institution, and distributed pulse and corn to such as attended. Charila's image was brought before the king, who struck it with his shoe; after which it was carried to a desolate place, where they put a halter round its neck, and buried it where Charila was buried. Plut. in Quest. Græc.

CHARILÆUS and CHARILLUS, a son of Polydectes king of Sparta, educated and protected by his uncle Lycurgus. He made war against Argos and attacked Tegea. He was taken prisoner, and released on promising that he would cease from war, an engagement he soon broke. He died in the 64th year of his age. Paus. 2, 36, l. 6, c. 48.

CHARISIA, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 3.—A festival in honour of the Graces, with dances which continued all night. He who continued awake the longest was rewarded with a cake.

CHARISIUS, an orator at Athens. Cic. in B. 83.

CHARISTIA, festivals at Rome, celebrated on the 20th of February, by the distribution of mutual presents, with the intention of reconciling friends and relations. Val. Max. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Fast. 1.

CHARITES and GRATIÆ, the Graces, daughters of Venus by Jupiter or Bacchus, were three in number, Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphrosyne. They were the constant attendants of Venus, and they were represented as three young, beautiful, and modest virgins, all holding one another by the hand. They presided over kindness and all good offices, and their worship was the same as that of the nine muses, with whom they had a temple in common. They were generally represented naked, because kindnesses ought to be done with sincerity and candour. The moderns explain the allegory of their holding their hands joined, by observing, that there ought to be a perpetual and never-ceasing intercourse of kindness and benevolence among friends. Their youth denotes the constant remembrance that we ought ever to have of kindnesses received; and their virgin purity and innocence teach us, that acts of benevolence ought to be done without any expectations of restoration, and that we ought never to suffer others or ourselves to be guilty of base or impure favours. Homer speaks only of two Graces.

CHARITON, a writer of Aphrodisium, at the latter end of the fourth century. He composed a Greek romance, called The Loves of Chareas and Callirhoe, which has been much admired for its elegance and the originality of the characters it describes. There is a very learned edition of Chariton by Reiske, with D'Orville's notes, 2 vols. 4to. Amst. 1783.

CHARMIDES, a philosopher of the third academy, B. C. 95.

CHARMIÖNE, a servant maid of Cleopatra, who stabbed herself after the example of her mistress. Plut. in Anton.

CHARMIS, a physician of Marseilles, in Nero's age, who used cold baths for his patients, and prescribed medicines contrary to those of his contemporaries. Plin. 21, c. 1.

CHARMUS, a poet of Syracuse, some of whose fragments are found scattered in Athens.

CHARON, a Theban, who received into his house Pelopidas, and his friends, when they delivered Thebes from tyranny, &c. Plut. in Pelop.—An historian of Lampsacus, son of Pytheus, who wrote two books on Persia, besides other treatises, B. C. 479.—An historian of Naucratis, who wrote an history of his country and of Egypt.—A god of hell, son of Erebus and Nox, who conducted the souls of the dead in a boat over the river Styx and Acheron to the infernal regions, for an obolus. Such as had not been honoured with a funeral were not permitted to enter this boat without previously wandering on the shore for one hundred years. If any living person presented himself to cross the Stygian lake, he could not be admitted before he shewed Charon a golden bough, which he had received from the Sibyl, and Charon was imprisoned for one year, because he had ferried over, against his own will, Hercules without this passport. Charon is represented as an old robust man, with a hideous countenance, long white beard, and piercing eyes. His garment is ragged and filthy, and his forehead is covered with wrinkles. As all the dead were obliged to pay a small piece of money for their admission, it was always usual, among the ancients, to place under the tongue of the deceased, a piece of money for Charon. This fable of Charon and his boat is borrowed from the Egyptians, whose dead were carried across a lake, where sentence was passed on them, and according to their good or bad actions, they were honoured with a splendid burial or left unnoticed in the open air. vid. Acherusia. Diod. 1.—Senec. in Her. Fur. act. 3, v. 765.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 298, &c.

CHARONDAS, [a native of Catana, flourished about 446 B. C. and is supposed to have been a disciple of Pythagoras. He was distinguished both as a philosopher and legislator, and is said to have framed a code of laws for his own native place, and several other cities.] He gave laws also to the people of Thurium, and among other things, ordained that no man should be permitted to come armed into the assembly. He inadvertently broke this law, and when told of it, he fell upon his sword. Val. Max. 6, c. 5.

[CHARONIUS, an epithet for caves, some of which are found in Italy and in other parts of the world, where the air is so loaded with a poisonous vapour, that animals cannot live in them even for a few moments.]

CHARONIUM, a cave near Nysa, where the sick were supposed to be delivered from their disorders by certain superstitious solemnities.

CHAROPS and CHAROPES, a powerful Epirot who assisted Flaminius when making war against Philip the king of Macedonia. Plut. in Flam.

CHARYBDIS, a dangerous whirlpool on the coast of Sicily, opposite another whirlpool called Scylla, on the coast of Italy. It was very dangerous to sailors, and it proved fatal to part of the fleet of Ulysses. The exact situation of the Charybdis is not discovered by the moderns, as no whirlpool sufficiently tremendous is now found to correspond to the description of the ancients. The words Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdim, became a proverb, to show that in our eagerness to avoid one evil we often fall into a greater. It is supposed that Charybdis was an avaricious woman, who stole the oxen of Hercules, for which theft she was struck with thunder by Jupiter, and changed into a whirlpool. [Spallanzani has explained the noted wonders of Scylla and Charybdis; the former being a lofty rock on the Calabrian shore, with some caverns at the bottom, which by the agitation of the waves emit sounds resembling the barking of dogs. The only danger is when the current and winds are in opposition, so that vessels are impelled towards the rock. Charybdis is not a whirlpool, or involving vortex, but a spot where the waves are greatly agitated by pointed rocks, and the depth does not exceed 500 feet. Spallanzani. 3, 99.] Lycophr. in Cass.—Homer. Od. 12.—Pierpont. 3, el. 11.—Ital. 14.—Ovid. in Ib. de Ponto. 4, el. 10. Amor. 2, el. 16.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 420.

CHAUCI, a people of Germany, [a Suevic race, and distinguished by Tacitus as the most noble and just of the German nations. They were divided into Majores and Minores. The former were situated between the Visurgis or Weser, and the Albis or Elbe. The latter between the Amisia or Ems, and the Visurgis. Tacit. Germ. 35.]

CHELIDONIA, a festival at Rhodes, in which it was customary for boys to go begging from door to door, [and singing a song called Chelidonisma, so called because it began with an invocation of the χελιδων, or swallow.] Athen.—The wind Favonius was called also Chelidonia, from the 6th of the ides of February to the 7th of the calends of March, the time when swallows first made their appearance. Plin. 2, c. 47.

CHELIDONÆ, now Kelidoni, small islands [south of the Sacrum Promontorium, on the coast of Lycia,] very dangerous to sailors. Dionys. Perieg. v. 506.—Plin. 5, c. 27 and 31.—Liv. 33, c. 41.

CHELIDONIUM Promontorium, [the same with Sacrum Promontorium.]

[CHELONITES, Promontorium, a promontory of Elis, now Cape Tornese.]

CHELONE, a nymph changed into a tortoise by Mercury, for not being present at the nuptials of Jupiter and Juno, and condemned to perpetual silence for having ridiculed these deities.

CHELONIS, a daughter of Leonidas king of Sparta, who married Cleombrotus. She accompanied her father whom her husband had expelled, and soon after went into banishment with her husband, who had in his turn been expelled by Leonidas. Plut. in Agid. & Cleom.

CHELONOPHAGI, a people of Carmania, [also the name of a people of Ethiopia,] who fed upon turtle, and covered their habitations with the shells. Plin. 6, c. 24.

CHEMMIS, an island in a deep lake of Egypt. Herodot. 2, c. 156.

CHEOPS and CHEOPSES, a king of Egypt, after Rhampsinitus, who built a famous pyramid, upon which 1600 talents were expended only in supplying the workmen with leeks, garlic, and other vegetables. [vid. Pyramids.] Herodot. 2, c. 124.

CHEPHREN, a brother of Cheops, who also built a pyramid. The Egyptians so inveterately hated these two royal brothers, [that, from an aversion towards mentioning their names, they called their pyramids by the name of the shepherd Philitis, who fed at that time his cattle in those places. [For some remarks on this Philitis, vid. Pyramids.] Herodot. 2, c. 127.

CHERONÆA. vid. Chæronea.

CHEROPHON, a tragic writer of Athens in the age of Philip. Philostr. in vitis.

CHERRONÆSUS. vid. Chersonesus.

CHERSIAS, an Orchomenian, reconciled to Periander by Chilo. Pausanias praises some of his poetry, 9, c. 38.

CHERSONÆSUS, a Greek word, [from χῆρος, land, and νῆσος, an island, that is, an island joining the land,] rendered by the Latins Peninsula. There were many of these among the ancients, of which these five are the most celebrated; one called Peloponnesus; one called Thracian, in the south of Thrace, and west of the Hellespont, where Miltiades led a colony of Athenians, and built a wall across the isthmus. [The neck of land joining it to the continent is about 6 modern Greek, or perhaps not 5 British miles in breadth. From its isthmus to its further shores it measured 480 stadia according to Herodotus, but 400 according to Scylax, extending between the bay of Melas and the Hellespont.] The third, called Taurica, now Crim Tartary, was situated near the Palus Mæotis. The fourth, called Cimbrica, now Julland, is in the northern parts of Germany; and the fifth, surnamed Aurea, lies in India, beyond the Ganges. [D'Anville makes it to be the peninsula of Malacca. In this opinion Rennell and Maupertuis coincide; but M. Gosselin, author of "The Geography of the Greeks analysed, &c." differs from this and other positions of D'Anville in his Indian geography. The golden Chersonese is probably the southern part of the kingdom of Pegu.] Herodot. 6, c. 33, l. 7, c. 58.—Liv. 31, c. 16.—Cic. ad Br. 2.—Also a peninsula near Alexandria in Egypt, Hirt. Alex. 10.

CHERUSCI, [a people of Germany, between the Weser and the Elbe, south-east of the Chauci. Under the conduct of Arminius, they defeated and slew three Roman legions commanded by Varus, A. D. 10, in the Salvus Teutobergensis, or Bishoprick of Padernborn. They were afterwards defeated by Germanicus, and never recovered their former eminence.] Tacit.—Cæs. B. G. 6, c. 9.

CHIDORUS, a river of Macedonia near Thessalonica, not sufficiently large to supply the army of Xerxes with water. Herodot. 7, c. 127.

CHILO, a Spartan philosopher, who has been called one of the seven wise men of Greece. One of his maxims was "know thyself." He died through excess of joy, in the arms of his son, who had obtained a victory at Olympia, B. C. 597. Plin. 7, c. 33.—Laert.

CHIMÆRA, a celebrated monster, sprung from Echidna and Typhon, which had three heads, that of a lion, of a goat, and a dragon, and continually vomited flames. The fore-parts of its body were those of a lion, the middle was that of a goat, and the hinder parts were those of a dragon. It generally lived in Lycia, about the reign of Jobates, by whose orders Bellerophon, mounted on the horse Pegasus, overcame it. This fabulous tradition is explained by the recollection that there was a burning mountain in Lycia, called Chimæra, whose top was the resort of lions, on account of its desolate wilderness; the middle, which was fruitful, was covered with goats; and at the bottom the marshy ground abounded with serpents. [Bellerophon is said to have conquered the Chimæra, because he cultivated the mountain.] Plutarch says that it is the captain of some pirates, who adorned their ship with the images of a lion, a goat, and a dragon. From the union of the Chimæra with Orthos, sprung the Sphinx and the lion of Nemæa. Homer. Il. 6, v. 181.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 322.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 2, c. 3.—Lucret. 5, v. 903.—Ovid. 9, Mét. v. 646.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 288.—One of the ships in the fleet of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 118.

CHIMARUS, a river of Argolis. Paus. 2, c. 36.

CHIMERIUM, a mountain of Phthiotis in Thessaly. Plin. 4, c. 8.

CHIONE, a daughter of Dædalion of whom Apollo and Mercury became enamoured. From them Chione became mother of Philammon and Aatolycus, the former of whom, as being son of Apollo, became an excellent musician; and the latter was equally notorious for his robberies, of which his father Mercury was the patron. Chione grew so proud of her commerce with the gods, that she even preferred her beauty to that of Diana, for which impiety she was killed by the goddess and changed into a hawk. Ovid. Mét. 11, fab. 8.—A daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, who had Eumolpus by Neptune. She threw her son into the sea, but he was preserved by his father. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 38.

CHIOS, now Scio, an island in the Ægean sea, between Lesbos and Samos, on the coast of Ionia. [It is about 900 leagues in circuit, and was probably once connected with the main land, from which it is separated only by a strait three leagues wide. It was known by the names of Æthalia, Macris, and Pityusa, but its most prevalent name was Chios, derived, according to some, from χίαν, snow, because its mountains were often covered with it. Isidorus, however, deduces the name from a Syriac term signifying mastich, with which the island abounds.] It was well inhabited, and could once equip a hundred ships; and its chief town, called Chios, had a beautiful harbour, which could contain eighty ships. The wine of this island, so much celebrated by the ancients, is still in general esteem. [The Chians were said to have first known the art of cultivating the vine, taught them by Oenopion the son of Bacchus, and by them communicated to the rest of mankind. The first red wine was made here. It was one of the places which contended for the honour of having given birth to Homer, and his school was shown in the island. Modern Scio, until the late dreadful ravages of the Turks, contained 115,000 inhabitants, nearly all Greeks, and was the best cultivated and most flourishing island in the Archipelago.] *Plut. de Virt. CHIRON, a centaur, half a man and half a horse, son of Philyra and Saturn, who had changed himself into a horse, to escape the inquiries of his wife Rhea. Chiron was famous for his knowledge of music, medicine, and shooting. He taught mankind the use of plants and medicinal herbs; and he instructed in all the polite arts, the greatest heroes of his age; such as Achilles, Æsculapius, Hercules, Jason, Peleus, Eneas, &c. He was wounded in the knee by a poisoned arrow, by Hercules, in his pursuit of the centaurs. Hercules flew to his assistance; but as the wound was incurable, and the cause of the most excruciating pains, Chiron begged Jupiter to deprive him of immortality. His prayers were heard, and he was placed by the god among the constellations, under the name of Sagittarius. Hesiod. in Scuto.—Homer. Il. 11.—Paus. 3, c. 18, l. 5, c. 19, l. 9, c. 31.—*Ovid. CHLOE, a surname of Ceres at Athens. Her yearly festivals, called Chloe, were celebrated with much mirth and rejoicing, and a ram was always sacrificed to her. The name of Chloe is supposed to bear the same signification as Flava, so often applied to the goddess of corn. The name, from its signification, (χλωη, herba virens) has generally been applied to women possessed of beauty and of simplicity.

CHLORIS, the goddess of flowers, who married Zephyrus. She is the same as Flora. Ovid. Fast. 5.—A daughter of Amphion, son of Jasus and Persephone, who married Neleus, king of Pylos, by whom she had one daughter and twelve sons, who all, except Nestor, were killed by Hercules. Homer. Od. 11, v. 280.—Paus. 2, c. 21, l. 9, c. 36.

CHLORUS, Constantine, one of the Cæsars in Dioclesian's age, who reigned two years after the emperor's abdication, and died July 25, A. D. 306.

CHOARINA, a country near India, reduced by Craterus, &c. [It was that part of Parthia which was nearest to India.]

CHOASPES, an Indian river. [vid. Suasus.] Curt. 5, c. 2.—A river of [Susiana. vid. Eulaeus.]

CHOBUS, a river of Colchis, [passing into the Euxine north of the mouth of the Phasis.] Arrian.

CHERÆDES, [islands of the Euxine near the Hellespont, supposed to be the same with the Cyanean isles.—Islands on the coast of Euxina, near the promontory of Caphareus, where the Oilean Ajax was shipwrecked.—Islands in the Sinus Persicus.—Islands in the Ionian sea, off the coast of Iapygia. Thucyd. 7, c. 33.]

CHERILUS, a tragic poet of Athens, who wrote 150 tragedies, of which 13 obtained the prize.—An historian of Samos.—Two other poets, one of whom was very intimate with Herodotus. He wrote a poem on the victory which the Athenians had obtained over Xerxes, and on account of the excellence of the composition, he received a piece of gold for each verse from the Athenians, and was publicly ranked with Homer as a poet. The other was one of Alexander's flatterers and friends. It is said the prince promised him as many pieces of gold as there should be good verses in his poetry, and as many slaps on his forehead as there were bad; and in consequence of this, scarce six of his verses in each poem were entitled to gold, while the rest were rewarded with the castigation. Plut. in Alex.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 232.

CHONNIDAS, a man made preceptor to Theseus, by his grandfather Pittheus king of Trœzene. The Athenians instituted sacrifices to him for the good precepts he had inculcated into his pupil. Plut. in Thes.

[CHORASMI, a people of Asia, between Sogdiana and the north-eastern shore of the Caspian; their capital was Gorgo, now Urg-heng. Their country is now Kharasm.]

CHORÆBUS, vid. Corœbus.

CHOSROES, a king of Persia in Justinian's reign, surnamed the Great.—[The 2d of the same name, was grandson to, and succeeded the first, after having deposed Hormidas. He reigned in the time of the Emperor Heraclius, and after having been defeated by him, was imprisoned and put to death by his own son A. D. 628. Persia soon after fell under the power of the Arabian Caliphs.]

CHERMÊTES, a river of Libya, [falling into the Atlantic: supposed to be the Zaire.]

CHRONOS, the Greek name of Saturn, or time, in whose honour festivals called Chronia were yearly celebrated by the Rhodians and some of the Greeks.

CHRYSA, [a town of Troas, south of the island of Tenedos, famous for a temple of Apollo Smintheus, whence the town was also called Sminthium. vid. Sminthium.] Homer. Il. 1, v. 37.—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 174.

CHRYSÆME, a Thessalian, priestess of Diana Trivia. She fed a bull with poison, which she sent to the enemies of her country, who eat the flesh and became delirious, and were an easy conquest. Polyan.

CHRYSANTHIUS, a philosopher in the age of Julian, known for the great number of volumes he wrote.

CHRYSÆOR, a son of Medusa by Neptune. Some report that he sprung from the blood of Medusa, armed with a golden sword, whence his name χρυσος αογ. He married Callirhoe, one of the Oceanides, by whom he had Geryon, Echidna, and the Chimæra. Hesiod. Theog. v. 295.

CHRYSÆOREUS, a surname of Jupiter, from his temple at Stratonicea, where all the Carians assembled upon any public emergency. Strab. 4.

CHRYSAS, a river of Sicily, falling into the Simæthus. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 44.

CHRYSÆIS, [vid. Chryseis.]

CHRYSERMUS, a Corinthian, who wrote an history of Peloponnesus, and of India, besides a treatise on rivers. Plut. in Parall.

CHRYSÆS, the priest of Apollo, father of Astynome, called from him Chryseis. When Lynxessus was taken, and the spoils divided among the conquerors, Chryseis, who was the wife of Eetion, the sovereign of the place, fell to the share of Agamemnon. Chryseis upon this went to the Grecian camp to solicit his daughter's restoration; and when his prayers were fruitless, he implored the aid of Apollo, who visited the Greeks with a plague, and obliged them to restore Chryseis. Homer. Il. 1, v. 11, &c.

CHRYSIPPUS, a natural son of Pelops, highly favoured by his father, for which Hippodamia, his step-mother, ordered her own sons, Atreus and Thyestes, to kill him, and to throw his body into a well, on account of which they were banished. Some say that Hippodamia's sons refused to murder Chrysippus, and that she did it herself. They further say, that Chrysippus had been carried away by Laius, king of Thebes, to gratify his unnatural lusts, and that he was with him when Hippodamia killed him. Hygin. fab. 35.—Plato de Leg. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Paus. 6, c. 20.—[A stoic philosopher of Soli in Cilicia Cæmpestris. He fixed his residence at Athens, and became a disciple of Cleanthes, the successor of Zeno. He was equally distinguished for natural abilities and industry, seldom suffering a day to elapse without writing 500 lines. He wrote several hundred volumes, of which 300 were on logical subjects, but in all he borrowed largely from others. He maintained, with the stoics in general, that the world was God, or an universal effusion of his spirit, and that the superior part of this spirit, which consisted in mind and reason, was the common nature of things, containing the whole and every part. Sometimes he speaks of God as the power of fate, and the necessary chain of events: sometimes he calls him fire; and sometimes he deifies the fluid parts of nature, as water and air; and again, the earth, sun, moon, and stars, and the universe in which these are comprehended, and even those men who have obtained immortality. He was very fond of the figure Sorites in arguing, which is hence called by Persius, the heap of Chrysippus. His discourses abounded more in curious subtleties and nice distinctions, than in solid arguments.] He died through excess of wine, or, as others say, from laughing too much on seeing an ass eating figs on a silver plate, 207 B. C. in the 83d year of his age.

CHRYSOCÆRAS, or the horn of gold, a long cove on the north-east side of Byzantium, forming an excellent harbour, whence its name.]

CHRYSOGŌNUS, a celebrated singer in [the time of Alcibiades, who was victorious at the Pythian games.—Another of the same name is mentioned in Juv. 6, v. 74.]

CHRYSOPŌLIS, a promontory and port of Asia, opposite Byzantium, now Scutari. [The Athenians encompassed this place with walls, imposed a tenth on the ships which came hither from the Euxine, and had a fleet here of 30 sail.]

CHRYSORHŌAS, [or Golden stream, a river of Syria, near Damascus, called also Bardine, and now Baradi.]

CHRYSOSTOM, a [native of Antioch,] bishop of Constantinople, who died A. D. 407, in his 53d year. He was a great disciplinarian, and by severely lashing the vices of the age, he procured himself many enemies. [He was at length accused of disrespect to the empress Eudoxia and cruelty to some of the clergy, and was in consequence banished. His great popularity, however, and a dreadful tumult which his banishment occasioned at Constantinople, produced his speedy recall. He was soon, however, banished a second time, for his severe remarks on the empress, in relation to a statue which had been erected to her. The place of his second banishment was Cucusus, a lonely town among the ridges of Mount Taurus on the confines of Cappadocia and Cilicia. From this place he was ordered afterwards to be taken to Pityoeus, a town on the Euxine, but died on the journey at Comana in Cappadocia. Within 10 years after his death, he was generally revered as a saint, and his remains transported to Constantinople. The name of Chrysostom, or golden mouth, was not applied to him until after his death, when his works had rendered him illustrious for eloquence. His previous name was John.] His works have been nobly and correctly edited, without a Latin version, by Saville, 8 vols. fol. Etonæ, 1613. They have appeared, with a translation, at Paris. edit. Benedict. Montfaucon, 13 vols. fol. 1718.

CHRYSOSTHÆMIS, a name given by Homer to Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra.—A Cretan, who first obtained the poetical prize at the Pythian games. Paus. 10, c. 7.

CHTHONIA, a surname of Ceres, [either from χθων, terra, or,] from a temple built to her by Chthonia, at Hermione. She had a festival there called by the same name, and celebrated every summer. During the celebration, the priests of the goddess marched in procession, accompanied by the magistrates, and a crowd of women and boys in white apparel, with garlands of flowers on their heads. Behind was dragged an untamed heifer, just taken from the herd. When they came to the temple, the victim was let loose, and [the door-keepers, who till then had kept the temple gates open, having made all secure, four old women armed with scythes, were left within, who pursued the heifer and dispatched her as soon as they were able by cutting her throat.] A second, a third, and a fourth victim, was in a like manner dispatched by the old women; and it was observable, that they all fell on the same side. Paus. 2, c. 35.

CIBALE, a town of Lower Pannonia, [situate on the Saarus, about 50 miles from Sirmium and about 100 from the confluence of the Saavus and Danube. It was famous for the defeat of Licinius by Constantine, A. D. 315, and was also the birth-place of Gratian. Its name is preserved in the obscure ruins of Savilei.] Eutrop. 10, c. 4.—Marcell. 30, c. 24.

CIBYRA, [a flourishing commercial city in the south-west angle of Phrygia, between Lycia and Caria. It was surnamed the Great for distinction sake from another city of the same name situate in Pamphylia. A colony of Lydians were its first founders; to these succeeded one of Pisidians, who transplanted the city to a more favourable situation. Its authority extended far over the adjoining country, and it could arm at one time 30,000 foot and 2000 horse. It suffered severely from an earthquake, on which account Tiberius remitted the tribute due from it for 3 years, and he was regarded as its second founder. Four different languages were spoken here, viz. the Lydian, Pisidian, Lycian, and Greek. It is now in ruins. D'Anville gives it the modern name of Burur.—A city of Pamphylia, south-east of Aspendus.]

M. T. CICERO, born at Arpinum, was son of a Roman knight, and lineally descended from the ancient kings of the Sabines. His mother's name was Helvia. After displaying many promising abilities at school, he was taught philosophy by Piso, and law by Mutius Scævola. He was naturally of a weak and delicate constitution, and he visited Greece on account of his health; though, perhaps, the true cause of his absence from Rome might be attributed to his fear of Sylla. His friends, who were well acquainted with his superior abilities, were anxious for his return; and when at last he obeyed their solicitations, he applied himself with uncommon diligence to oratory, and was soon distinguished above all the speakers of his age in the Roman forum. When he went to Sicily as quæstor, he behaved with great justice and moderation; and the Sicilians remembered with gratitude the eloquence of Cicero, their common patron, who had delivered them from the tyranny and avarice of Verres. After he had passed through the offices of ædile and prætor, he stood a candidate for the consulship, A. U. C. 691; and the patricians and the plebeians were equally anxious to raise him to that dignity against the efforts and bribery of Catiline. His new situation was critical, and required circumspection. Catiline, with many dissolute and desperate Romans, had conspired against their country, and combined to murder Cicero himself. The consul detected and defeated their plans, and claimed by his success the proud title of father of his country. The vehemence with which he had attacked Clodius proved injurious to him; and when his enemy was made tribune, Cicero was driven by the power of the opposite faction into banishment. vid. Thessalonica. [The principal charge against him was his having put to death in an illegal manner the accomplices of Catiline, though this had been done, not by him individually, but in consequence of a general vote of the senate.] He was not, however, deserted in his banishment, [although he tarnished the lustre of his character by his want of patient firmness under misfortune.] Wherever he went he was received with the highest marks of approbation and reverence; and when the faction had subsided at Rome, the whole senate and people were unanimous for his return. After sixteen months absence he entered Rome with universal satisfaction; and when he was sent, with the power of proconsul, to Cilicia, his integrity and prudence made him successful against the enemy, and at his return he was honoured with a triumph which the factious prevented him from enjoying. After much hesitation during the civil commotions between Cæsar and Pompey, he joined himself to the latter and followed him to Greece. When victory had declared in favour of Cæsar, at the battle of Pharsalia, Cicero went to Brundisium, and was reconciled to the conqueror, who treated him with great humanity. From this time Cicero retired into the country, and seldom visited Rome. When Cæsar had been stabbed in the senate, Cicero recommended a general amnesty, and was the most earnest to decree the provinces to Brutus and Cassius. But when he saw the interest of Cæsar's murderers decrease, and Antony come into power, he retired to Atheus. He soon after returned, but lived in perpetual fear of assassination. Augustus courted the approbation of Cicero, and expressed his wish to be his colleague in the consulship. But his wish was not sincere; he soon forgot his former professions of friendship; and when the two consuls had been killed at Mutina, Augustus joined his interest to that of Antony, and the triumvirate was soon after formed. The great enmity which Cicero bore to Antony was fatal to him; and Augustus, Antony, and Lepidus, the triumvirs, to destroy all cause of quarrel, and each to dispatch his enemies, produced their list of proscription. About two hundred were doomed to death, and Cicero was among the number upon the list of Antony. Augustus yielded a man to whom he partly owed his greatness, and Cicero was pursued by the emissaries of Antony, among whom was Popilius, whom he had defended upon an accusation of parricide. He had fled in a litter towards the sea of Caieta; and when the assassins came up to him, he put his head out of the litter, and it was severed from the body by Herennius. This memorable event happened in December, 43 B. C. after the enjoyment of life for 63 years, 11 months, and five days. The head and right hand of the orator were carried to Rome, and hung up in the Roman forum; and so inveterate was Antony's hatred against the unfortunate man, that even Fulvia, the triumvir's wife, wreaked her vengeance upon his head, and drew the tongue out of his mouth, and bored it through repeatedly with a gold bodkin, verifying in this act of inhumanity what Cicero had once observed, that no animal is more revengeful than a woman. Cicero has acquired more real fame by his literary compositions than by his spirited exertions as a Roman senator. The learning and the abilities which he possessed have been the admiration of every age and country, and his style has always been accounted as the true standard of pure latinity. The words nascitur poeta have been verified in his attempts to write poetry; and the satire of Martial, Carmina quod scribit musis et Apolline nullo, though severe, is true. He once formed a design to write the history of his country, but he was disappointed. He translated many of the Greek writers, poets as well as historians, for his own improvement. When he travelled into Asia, he was attended by most of the learned men of his age; and his stay at Rhodes, in the school of the famous Molo, conduced not a little to perfect his judgment. Like his countrymen he was not destitute of ambition, and the arrogant expectations with which he returned from his quaestorship in Sicily are well known. He was of a timid disposition; and he who shone as the father of Roman eloquence never ascended the pulpit to harangue without feeling a secret emotion of dread. His conduct, during the civil wars, is far from that of a patriot; and when we view him, dubious and irresolute, sorry not to follow Pompey, and yet afraid to oppose Cæsar, the judgment would almost brand him with the name of coward. In his private character, however, Cicero was of an amiable disposition; and though he was too elated with prosperity and debased by adversity, the affability of the friend conciliated the good graces of all. He married Terentia, whom he afterwards divorced, and by whom he had a son and a daughter. He afterwards married a young woman to whom he was guardian; and because she seemed elated at the death of his daughter Tullia, he repudiated her. The works of this celebrated man, of which, according to some, the tenth part is scarce wanting, have been edited by the best scholars in every country. [All the orations pronounced by Cicero during the five years intervening between his election to the quaestorship and ædileship have perished, except that for M. Tullius, the exordium and narratio of which were brought to light by the discoveries of Maii, in the Ambrosian library at Milan. From the same quarter have been obtained many other reliques of the eloquence of Cicero, among the most important of which are, a large fragment of the oration for Scaurus, and detached portions of that delivered against Clodius for his profanation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Of all the lost orations the two most regretted are, that in defence of Cornelius, and the speech delivered by him in the temple of Bellona in quelling the disturbance excited by the law of Otho. This last is said to have been one of the most signal victories of eloquence over the turbulence of human passions, while to the former Cicero himself frequently alludes, as among the most finished of his compositions. The oration for Marcellus is maintained by many to be a spurious performance. It would seem, however, after weighing all the arguments adduced by modern critics, that a part is actually genuine, but that much has been subsequently interpolated by some rhetorician or declaimer. Of the Rhetorical works of Cicero, the most admired and finished is the dialogue "De Oratore," of which Cicero himself highly approved, and which his friends were accustomed to regard as one of the happiest of his productions. In the "Oratorie Partitiones," the subject is the art of arranging and distributing the parts of an oration so as to adapt them in the best manner to their proper end, that of moving and persuading an audience. In the dialogue on famous orators, entitled "Brutus," he gives a short character of all who had ever flourished in Greece or Rome with any considerable reputation for eloquence, down to his own time. It was intended as a fourth and supplemental book to the treatise "De Oratore." The "Orator," addressed to Brutus, and written at his solicitation, was intended to complete the two works just mentioned. It enlarges on the favourite topic of Cicero, which had already been partially discussed in the treatise "De Oratore," the character of the perfect orator, and seeks to confirm his favourite proposition that perfection in oratory requires an extensive acquaintance with every art. It is on the merits of this work in particular that Cicero in a letter to a friend asserts his perfect willingness that his reputation should be staked. The "Topica" are a compend of the Topica of Aristotle. The treatise "De Optimo genere Oratorum" was originally intended as a preface to a translation of the celebrated orations of Demosthenes and Æschines "De Corona." The work "De Inventione" was a youthful performance, and that addressed to Herennius, according to the best authorities, never proceeded from his pen. With respect to the other works of Cicero, the treatise "De Legibus" has reached us in an imperfect state, only three books remaining, and these disfigured by numerous chasms that cannot be supplied. It traces the philosophic principles of jurisprudence to their remotest sources, sets forth a body of laws conformable to Cicero's idea of a well regulated state, and is supposed to have treated in the books that are lost of the executive power of the magistrates and the rights of Roman citizens. The treatise "De finibus bonorum et malorum" is written after the manner of Aristotle, and discusses the chief good and ill of man: in it Cicero explains the several opinions entertained on this subject by the sages of antiquity. The "Academica Questiones" relate to the Academic Philosophy, whose tenets Cicero himself had embraced. It is an account and defence of the doctrines of the Academy. In the "Tusculana Disputationes" five books are devoted to as many different questions of philosophy, bearing the most strongly on the practice of life, and involving topics the most essential to human happiness. The "Paradoxa" contain a defence of six paradoxes of the Stoics. The work "De natura Deorum" embraces a full examination of the various theories of heathen antiquity on the nature of the gods, to which the treatise "De Divinatione" may be regarded as a supplement. The essay "De Officiis" on moral duties, has not unaptly been styled the heathen "Whole Duty of Man;" nor have the dialogues "De Senectute," and "De Amicitia," been incorrectly regarded as among the most highly finished and pleasing performances of which any language can boast. We have to lament the loss of the treatises "De Consolatione," (that which we have under this title being a patched-up imposture of Sigonius,) "De Gloria," and that entitled "Hortensius," in which last Cicero undertook the defence of learning and philosophy, and left to his illustrious competitor the task of arraigning them. It was this book which first led St. Austin to the study of Christian philosophy and the doctrines of Christianity. Cicero's correspondence is one of the most valuable legacies bequeathed to us by antiquity. The collection addressed to his friends is full of political information; the letters to Atticus pour-tray, besides this, the mind of the writer in its most engaging form, in all the frankness of familiar intercourse. The treatise "De Republica," a part of which has been recently discovered by Maii; a work so highly extolled by the unanimous suffrages of antiquity, does not seem so profound a treatise as we had been led to imagine, if indeed it be just to form an opinion of the work in question when we have only a portion of it in our hands.] The most valuable editions of the works complete, are that of Verburgius, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1724—that of Olivet, 9 vols. 4to. Geneva, 1758—the Oxford edition in 14 vols. 4to. 1782—that of Lallemand, 12mo. 10 vols. Paris apud Barbou, 1768—[that of Ernesti, Halæ, 1774-77, in 8 vols. 8vo. and that of Schütz, Lips. 1814, &c. in 16 vols. small octavo. This last edition is highly praised, and contains the fragments of Cicero's orations lately discovered. The treatise de Republica, was first published by Maius at Rome in 1822, and re-published in London, 1823. There are several recent editions of it also in Germany, the best of which is that of Moser, Francfurti, 1826, 8vo.] Plutarch in vitâ.—Quintil.—Dio. Cass.—Appian.—

CICONES, a people of Thrace near the Hebrus. Ulysses, on his return from Troy, conquered them, and plundered their chief city Ismarus because they had assisted Priam against the Greeks. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 83, l. 15, v. 313.—Virg. G. 4, v. 520, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 2.

CILICIA, a country of Asia Minor, on the sea-coast, south of Cappadocia and Lycæonia, and bounded by Syria on the east, and Pisidia and Pamphylia on the west. It was so surrounded by steep and rugged mountains, that a few men might defend it against a whole army, there being but three narrow passes leading into it, the Pylæ Ciliciæ on the side of Cappadocia, and on the east the Pylæ Amanicæ and Pylæ Syriæ. The country was divided into Trachea and Campes- tris, or the rugged and level Cilicia. The former was subsequently considered as a continuation of Isauria. The latter was one of the most fruitful provinces of Asia, excepting the western part; which however, though barren, was famed for its horses.] The inhabitants enriched themselves by piratical excursions, till they were conquered by Pompey. The country was opulent, and was governed by kings, under some of the Roman emperors; but reduced into a province by Vespasian. Cicero presided over it as a proconsul. It receives its name from Cilix, the son of Agenor. [Bochart derives the name from the Phœnician word Challekim, signifying "a stone," a term which well suits Cilicia Trachea, which to this day is called by the Turks "Tis-Weleith," or, "the stony province." To what is said above of the Cilicians, may be added, that they were rough in their manners, unfair in their dealings, cruel, and great liars. They claimed their share of the proverb, τρία κάρρα κακιστά, which applied to the Cretans, Cappadocians, and Cilicians.] Apollod. 3, c. 1.—*Varro. R. CIMBER, TULL. one of Cæsar's murderers. He laid hold of the dictator's robe, which was a signal for the rest to strike. Plut. in Cæs.

CIMBRI, a people of Germany, who invaded the Roman empire with a large army, and were conquered by Marius. [They occupied the Chersonesus Cimbrica, or modern Jutland.] Flor. 3, c. 3.

CIMBRICUM BELLUM, was begun by the Cimbric Teutones [and Ambrones,] by an invasion of the Roman territories, B. C. 109. These barbarians were so courageous, and even desperate, that they fastened their first ranks each to the other with cords. [In the first battle they vanquished the consul Papirius Carbo; in another they defeated M. Junius Silanus, another consul; in a third L. Cassius; and in a fourth, M. Aurelius Scaurus, whom they took prisoner and put to death. After various other successes, they were defeated by the valour and policy of Marius and Catulus.] Marius, in his second consulship, was chosen to carry on the war; he met the Teutones at Aquæ Sextiæ, where, after a bloody engagement, he left dead on the field of battle 20,000, and took 90,000 prisoners, B. C. 102. The Cimbric, who had formed another army, had already penetrated into Italy, where they were met at the river Athesis, by Marius and his colleague Catulus a year after. An engagement ensued, and 140,000 of them were slain. This last battle put an end to this dreadful war, and the two consuls entered Rome in triumph. [Marius, if we credit the account of Plutarch who quotes the lost commentaries of Sylla, deserved little if any of the credit of this second victory. He missed his way in the field, in consequence of a thick cloud of dust which arose, and the whole brunt of the action fell upon the legions of Catulus. A hot dispute arose between the soldiers of the two commanders, which had the better claim for the victory, and certain ambassadors from Parma, who were present, were appointed arbitrators. Catulus's soldiers led them to the field of battle to see the dead, and clearly proved that they had been killed by their javelins, because Catulus had taken care to have the shafts inscribed with his name. Nevertheless the whole honour of the day was ascribed by the Roman populace to Marius, on account of his former victory and present authority. He declined, however, the honour of a sole triumph, and shared it with Catulus.] Flor. 3, c. 3.—Plin. 7, c. 22, l. 17, c. 1.—Mela, 3, c. 3.—Paterc. 2, c. 12.—Plut. in Mario.

CIMINUS, now Viterbe, a lake and mountain of Etruria. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 697.—Liv. 9, c. 36.

CIMMERII, a people near the Palus Mæotis, who invaded Asia Minor, and seized upon the kingdom of Cyaxares. After they had been master of the country for 28 years, they were driven back by Alyattes king of Lydia. [The Cimmerians seem to have been a northern nation, driven from their abodes by the Scythians, and compelled to seek for new habitations. Posidonius makes them of Cimberic or German origin. Their first appellation is not known; that of Cimmerii, they obtained, it is said, after inhabiting the town of Cimmerium and its vicinity, on the Cimmerian Bosphorus. This, however, seems very improbable, as it is more natural to suppose that they gave name to the town and strait. The country bordering on the Palus Mæotis and Bosphorus, which was inhabited by the Cimmerii, is represented by the ancients as inhospitable and bleak, covered with forests and fogs which the sun could not penetrate. Hence, according to some, arose the expression, Cimmerian darkness. Homer places his Cimmerians beyond the Oceanus, in a land of continual gloom, and immediately after them the empire of the shades. This poetic fable, however, is like that of Lycophron, which Pliny and others copy, viz. that the Cimmerii were a people dwelling near the lake Averrus in Italy, in whose canton the sun never shines; whereas Strabo represents it as a pleasant and agreeable district. vid. Avernus.] Herodot. 1, c. 6, &c. 1, 4, c. 1, &c.

CIMMERIUM, [a town in the interior of the Tauric Chersonese, north of Mons Cimmerius, now Eski-Krin, or, the old Krim.—A town of Italy in Campania, near lake Avernus.] Mela, 1, c. 19.

CIMMERIUS BOSPORUS. [vid. Bosphorus.]

CIMOLUS, [one of the Cyclades, north-east of Melos. Its more ancient name was Echinusa or Viper's Island, from the number of vipers which infested it before it was inhabited. It produced what was called the Cimolia terra, a species of earth resembling, in some of its properties, fullers earth, though not the same with it. The ancients used it for cleaning their clothes. It was white, dense, of a loose texture, mixed with sand or small pebbles, insipid to the taste, and unctuous to the touch. Cimolus is now Kimoli, though more generally known by the name of Argentiera.] Ovid. Met. 7, v. 463.—Plin. 35, c. 16.

CIMON, an Athenian, son of Miltiades and Hegisipyle, famous for his debaucheries in his youth, and for the reformation of his morals when arrived to years of discretion. When his father died, he was imprisoned, because unable to pay the fine laid upon him by the Athenians: but he was released from confinement by his sister and wife Elpinice. [vid. Elpinice and Callias.] He behaved with great courage at the battle of Salamis, and rendered himself popular by his munificence and valour. His famous exploit, however, was at Mycale. [This battle of Mycale must not be confounded with the one fought on the same day with the action at Plataea. It is thought to have been fought off the coast of Pamphylia, near the river Eurymedon. vid. Eurymedon and Mycale.] The money that he obtained by his victories was not applied to his own private use; but with it he fortified and embellished the city. He some time after lost all his popularity, and was banished by the Athenians, who declared war against the Lacedæmonians. He was recalled from his exile, and at his return, he made a reconciliation between Lacedæmon and his countrymen. He was afterwards appointed to carry on the war against Persia in Egypt and Cyprus, with a fleet of 100 ships; and on the coast of Asia, he gave battle to the enemy, and totally ruined their fleet. [This is the same battle alluded to above under the name of Mycale.] He died as he was besieging the town of Citrum in Cyprus, B. C. 449, in the 51st year of his age. He may be called the last of the Greeks, whose spirit and boldness defeated the armies of the barbarians. He was such an inveterate enemy to the Persian power, that he formed a plan of totally destroying it; and in his wars, he had so reduced the Persians, that they promised in a treaty, not to pass the Chelidonian islands with their fleet, or to approach within a day's journey of the Grecian seas. The munificence of Cimon has been highly extolled by his biographers, and he has been deservedly praised for leaving his gardens open to the public. Thucyd. 1, c. 100 and 112.—Justin. 2, c. 13.—Diod. 11.—Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—A Roman, supported in prison by the milk of his daughter.—An Athenian, who wrote an account of the war of the Amazons against his country.

CINCIA LEX, was enacted by M. Cincius, tribune of the people, A. U. C. 549. By it no man was permitted to take any money as a gift or a fee in pleading a cause. Liv. c. 4.

L. Q. CINCINNATUS, a celebrated Roman, who was informed, as he ploughed his field, that the senate had chosen him dictator. Upon this he left his ploughed land with regret, and repaired to the field of battle, where his countrymen were closely besieged by the Volsci and Æqui. He conquered the enemy, and returned to Rome in triumph; and, 16 days after his appointment, he laid down his office and retired back to plough his fields. In his 80th year he was again summoned against Præneste as dictator; and after a successful campaign, he resigned the absolute power he had enjoyed only 21 days, nobly disregarding the rewards that were offered him by the senate. He flourished about 460 years before Christ. Liv. 3, c. 26.—Flor. 1, c. 11.—Cic. de Finib. 4.—Plin. 18, c. 3.

L. CINCIUS ALIMENTUS, a prætor of Sicily in the second Punic war, who wrote annals in Greek. Dionys Hal. 1.

CINÉAS, a Thessalian, minister and friend to Pyrrhus king of Epirus. He was sent to Rome by his master to sue for a peace, which he, however, could not obtain. He told Pyrrhus that the Roman senate were a venerable assembly of kings; and observed, that to fight with them, was to fight against another Hydra. He was of such a retentive memory, that the day after his arrival at Rome, he could salute every senator and knight by his name. Plin. 7, c. 24.—Cic. ad Fam. 9, ep. 25.

CINESIAS, a Greek poet of Thebes in Bœotia, who composed some dithyrambic verses, Athen.

CINÉTHON, a Spartan, who wrote genealogical poems, in one of which he asserted that Medea had a son by Jason, called Medus, and a daughter called Eriopis. Paus. 2, c. 18.

CINGA, now Cinea, a river of Spain, flowing from the Pyrenean mountains [through the territories of the Hergetes,] into the Iberus. Lucan. 1, v. 21.—Cæs. B. C. 1, c. 48.

CINGULUM, now Cingoli, a town of Picenum. Plin. 3, c. 13.—Cæs. Bell. Civ. 1, c. 15.—Sil. It. 10, v. 34.—Cic. Att. 7, ep. 11.

L. CORN. CINNA, a Roman who oppressed the republic with his cruelties, and was banished by Octavius for attempting to make the fugitive slaves free. He joined himself to Marius; and with him, at the head of 30 legions, he filled Rome with blood, defeated his enemies, and made himself consul even to a fourth time. He massacred so many citizens at Rome that his name became odious; and one of his officers assassinated him at Ancona as he was preparing war against Sylla. His daughter Cornelia married Julius Cæsar, and became mother of Julia. Plut. in Mar. Pomp. & Syll.—Lucan. 4, v. 822.—*Appian. Bell. He went to attend the obsequies of Cæsar, and being mistaken by the populace for the other Cinna, he was torn to pieces. He had been eight years in composing an obscure poem called Smyrna, in which he made mention of the incest of Cinyras. Plut. in Cæs.—A grandson of Pompey. He conspired against Augustus, who pardoned him, and made him one of his most intimate friends. He was consul, and made Augustus his heir. Dio.—Seneca de Clem. c. 9.—A town of Italy, taken by the Romans from the Samnites.

CINXIA, a surname of Juno, who presided over marriages, and was supposed to untie the girdle of new brides.

CINYPHS or CINYPS, [a small river of Africa, below Tripolis, and falling into the sea south-west of the promontory of Cephalæ. It owed its name, according to Bochart, to the great number of porcupines in the adjacent country. It flowed from a hill called in Punic Zachabari, or the hill of the Graces, in the country of the Macæ. vid. Macæ. It is now called Wadi-Quaham.] *Virg. CINYRAS, a king of Cyprus, son of Paphus, who married Cenchreis, by whom he had a daughter called Myrrha. Myrrha fell in love with her father; and in the absence of her mother at the celebration of the festivals of Ceres, she introduced herself into his bed by means of her nurse. Cinyras had by her a son called Adonis; and when he knew the incest he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, who escaped his pursuit and fled to Arabia, where, after she had brought forth, she was changed into a tree, which still bears her name. Cinyras, according to some, stabbed himself. He was so rich that his opulence, like that of Croesus.

became proverbial. Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 9.—Plut. in Parall.—Hygin. fab. 242, 248, &c.

C1OS, [a river of Thrace, rising in the north-western part of the chain of Mount Rhodope, and falling into the Ister. It is now the Escher. D'Anville calls the river Ceseu.—A river and town of Bithynia. The town was destroyed by Philip, father of Perses, and rebuilt by Prusias, who called it after his own name, Prusa.]

CIRCEII, [a promontory of Latium, with a town of the same name, the fabled residence of Circe. The adjacent country being very low, gives this promontory at a distance the appearance of an island. It would seem that Hesiod's making the kings of the Tyrrheni to have been descended from Circe and Ulysses, led to the opinion that the island of that goddess was to be found on the Italian coast. An accidental resemblance in name also may have induced many to select this promontory as the place of her abode. Homer's account, however, of the isle of Circe does not at all suit this spot. The island was a low one, whereas this is a lofty promontory. The adjacent sea also is represented by the poet as boundless to the view, which is not the case as regards Circeii. vid. Æea. The promontory is now called Monte Circello, and was famed for its oysters in the time both of Horace and Juvenal.] Ovid. Met. 14, v. 248.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 799.—Liv. 6, c. 17.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 19.

CIRCEÆ, a daughter of Sol and Perseis, celebrated for her knowledge in magic and venomous herbs. She was sister to Æetes king of Colchis, and Pasiphae the wife of Minos. She married a Sarmatian prince of Colchis, whom she murdered to obtain his kingdom. She was expelled by her subjects, and carried by her father upon the coasts of Italy, to an island called Æea. Ulysses, at his return from the Trojan war, visited the place of her residence; and all his companions, who ran headlong into pleasure and voluptuousness, were changed by Circe's potions into filthy swine. Ulysses, who was fortified against all enchantments by an herb called moly, which he had received from Mercury, went to Circe, and demanded, sword in hand, the restoration of his companions to their former state. She complied, and loaded the hero with pleasures and honours. In this voluptuous retreat, Ulysses had by Circe one son, called Telegonus, or two, according to Hesiod, called Agrinus and Latinus. For one whole year Ulysses forgot his glory in Circe's arms, and at his departure, the nymph advised him to descend to hell, and consult the manes of Tiresias concerning the fates that attended him. Circe showed herself cruel to Scylla her rival, and to Picus. vid. Scylla and Picus. Ovid. Met. 14, fab. 1 and 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 2, l. 1, od. 17.—*Virg. CIRCENSES LUDI, games performed in the circus at Rome. They were dedicated to the god Consus, and were first established by Romulus at the rape of Sabines. They were in imitation of the Olympian games among the Greeks, and, by way of eminence, were often called the great games. Their original name was Consualia, and they were first called Circenses by Tarquin the elder after he had built the Circus. They were not appropriated to one particular exhibition, but were equally celebrated for leaping, wrestling, throwing the quoit and javelin, races on foot as well as in chariots, and boxing. Like the Greeks, the Romans gave the name of Pentathlon or Quinquertium to these exercises. The celebration continued five days, beginning on the 15th of September. All games in general that were exhibited in the Circus, were soon after called Circensian games. Some sea-fights and skirmishes, called by the Romans Naumachia, were afterwards exhibited there. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 636.

CIRCIUS, a part of Mount Taurus. Plin. 5, c. 27.—A rapid and tempestuous wind, frequent in Gallia Narbonensis, and unknown in any other country. Lucan. 1, v. 408.

CIRCUS, a large and elegant building at Rome, where plays and shows were exhibited. There were about eight at Rome; the first, called Maximus Circus, was the grandest, raised and embellished by Tarquin Priscus. [Its figure was of an oblong circular form, whence its name circus. The length of it was 3 furlongs and a half, i. e. 437½ paces, or 2187½ feet; the breadth little more than one furlong, with rows of seats all around, rising one above another. The lowest of these seats were of stone, and the highest of wood, where separate places were allowed to the senators and equites. It is said to have contained at least 150,000 persons, or, according to others, above double that number; according to Pliny, 250,000; some moderns say 380,000. Its circumference was one mile. It was surrounded with a ditch or canal, called Euripus, 10 feet broad and 10 feet deep; and with porticoes 3 stories high; both the work of Cæsar. The canal served to supply it with water in naval exhibitions.]

CIRIS, the name of Scylla, daughter of Nisus, who was changed into a bird of the same name. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 151.

CIRRHA and CYRRHA, [a maritime town of Phocis, at the top of the Sinus Crisæus, serving as a port to Delphi, and being 60 stadia distant from it.]

CIRTHA and CIRTA, [a city of Numidia, about 48 miles from the sea on a branch of the river Ampsagas. It was intended as the royal residence, and being in fact the only city originally in the country and erected by Carthaginian workmen, it hence took the Punic name of Cartha, or, "the city". It was the residence of Syphax, Masinissa, and the other rulers of the land. When Cæsar had landed in Africa, and was in great danger of being overpowered by Scipio and Juba, a certain Sittius, who had fled from Rome into Africa, and was roaming about the latter country with a predatory band, having made a sudden attack upon Cirra, took it, and compelled Juba to return and defend his kingdom. Cæsar being thus relieved, when the war was over, gave Cirra as a reward to Sittius with a part of the adjacent country. The city now changed its name to Sittianorum Colonia. In the time of the emperor Constantine, having suffered much on account of its fidelity to that prince, he repaired and embellished it, giving it the name of Constantina. This name remains with a slight variation to the present day, and the small city built upon the ruins of the ancient capital is still called Cosantina.] Strab. 7.

CISALPINA GALLIA, [vid. Gallia.]

CISPADANA GALLIA, [vid. Gallia.]

CISSEÏS, a patronymic given to Hecuba as daughter of Cisseus.

CISSEÛS, a king of Thrace, father of Hecuba, according to some authors. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 320.

CISSA, [vid. Susiana.]

CISSUS, [a town and mountain of Macedonia, south of Thessalonica.]

CISTENÆ, a town of Æolia.—A town of Lycia. Mela, 1, c. 18.

CITHÆRON, a king who gave his name to a mountain of Bœotia, situate at the south of the river Asopus, and sacred to Jupiter and the Muses. Actæon was torn to pieces by his own dogs on this mountain, and Hercules killed there an immense lion. [Here also the infant Œdipus was exposed. It was midway between Thebes and Corinth.] *Virg. CITHARISTA, [a harbour of Gallia Narbonensis, now the port of Cireste.]

CITIUM, now Chitti, a town of Cyprus, where Cimon died in his expedition against Egypt. [It was the birth-place of Zeno. Josephus says that it was built by Chittim the son of Javan.] Plut. in Cym.—Thucyd. 1, c. 112.

J. CIVILIS, a powerful Batavian, who raised a sedition against Galba, &c. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 59.

CLADEUS, a river of Elis, passing near Olympia, and honoured next to the Alpheus, [into which it fell.] Paus. 5, c. 7.

CLANIUS or CLANIS, a river of Campania, [rising near Abella, on the confines of Samnium, and falling into the sea below Vulturnum. It is now the Agno.] Virg. G. 2, v. 225.—A river of Etruria, now Chiaca, [rising near Arretium, and falling into the Tiber, north-east of Vulsinii.]

CLARUS, or Claros, a town of Ionia, famous for an oracle of Apollo. It was built by Manto daughter of Tiresias, who fled from Thebes, after it had been destroyed by the Epigoni. She was so afflicted with her misfortunes, that a lake was formed with her tears, where she first founded the oracle. Apollo was from thence surnamed Clarius, Strab. 14.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 516.—An island of the Ægean, between Tenedos and Scios. Thucyd. 3, c. 33.

CLASTIDIUM, now Schiattazzo, a town of Liguria. Strab. 5.—Liv. 32, c. 29.

CLAUDIA, a patrician family at Rome, descended from Clausus, a king of the Sabines. It gave birth to many illustrious patriots in the republic; and it is particularly recorded that there were not less than 28 of that family who were invested with the consulship, five with the office of dictator, and seven with that of censor, besides the honour of six triumphs. Sueton. in Tib. 1.

CLAUDIA, a vestal virgin accused of incontinence. To show her innocence, she offered to remove a ship which had brought the image of Cybele to Rome, and had stuck in one of the shallow places of the river. This had already baffled the efforts of a number of men; and Claudia, after addressing her prayers to the goddess, untied her girdle, and with it easily dragged after her the ship to shore, and by this action was honourably acquitted. *Val. He dismissed her undefiled immediately after the contract of marriage, on account of a sudden quarrel with her mother Fulvia. Sueton. in Aug. 62.—The wife of Metellus Celer, sister to P. Claudius and to Appius Claudius.—A Roman road [which branched off from the Via Flaminia, at the Pons Mulvius, near Rome, and proceeding through the more inland parts of Etruria, and joined the Via Aurelia at Lucca.] Ovid. 1, ex Pont. el. 8, v. 44.—A tribe which received its name from Appius Claudius, who came to settle at Rome with a large body of attendants. Liv. 2, c. 16.—Antonia, a daughter of the emperor Claudius, married Cn. Pompey, whom Messalina caused to be put to death. Her second husband, Sylla Faustus, by whom she had a son, was killed by Nero, and she shared his fate when she refused to marry his murderer.

CLAUDIA LEX, de comitiis, was enacted by M. Cl. Marcellus, A. U. C. 703. [It ordained that no one should be allowed to stand candidate for an office while absent; thus taking from Cæsar the privilege granted him by the Pompeian law.]—Another, de usurâ, [by the emperor Claudius,] which forbade people to lend money to minors on condition of payment after the decease of their parents.—Another, de negotiatione, by Q. Claudius the tribune, A. U. C. 535. It forbade any senator, or father of a senator, to have any vessel containing above 300 amphoræ, for fear of their engaging themselves in commercial schemes. The same law also forbade the same thing to the scribes and the attendants of the quæstors, as it was naturally supposed that people who had any commercial connections could not be faithful to their trust, nor promote the interest of the state.—Another, A. U. C. 576, to order the allies to return to their respective cities, after their names were enrolled. Liv. 41, c. 9.—Another, to take away the freedom of the city of Rome from the colonists which Cæsar had carried to Novi-comum. Sueton. in Jul. 28.

CLAUDIÆ AQUÆ, the first water brought to Rome by means of an aqueduct erected by the censor Appius Claudius, A. U. C. 441. Eutrop. 2, c. 4.—Liv. 9, c. 29.

CLAUDIÂNUS, a celebrated poet, born at Alexandria in Egypt [in the age of Theodosius and his sons Honorius and Arcadius,] who seems to possess all the majesty of Virgil without being a slave to the corrupted style which prevailed in his age. Scaliger observes, that he has supplied the poverty of his matter by the purity of his language, the happiness of his expressions, and the melody of his numbers. [His poems, however, display great inequalities of genius; he often flags in the midst of his finest passages, and in his longer poems especially, falls off generally before he reaches the conclusion.] As he was the favourite of Stilicho, he removed from the court when his patron was disgraced, and passed the rest of his life in retirement and learned ease. His poems on Rufinus and Eutropius, [whom he severely satirises as being the rivals of his patron Stilicho,] seem to be the best of his compositions. The best editions of his works are that of Burman, 4to. 2 vols. Amst. 1760, and that of Gesner, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1758.

CLAUDIOPOLIS, a town of Cappadocia. Plin. 5, c. 24.—[Another in Bithynia—in Isauria—in Cataonia, &c.]

CLAUDIUS I. (Tiber. Drusus Nero,) son of Drusus, Livia's second son, succeeded as emperor of Rome after the murder of Caligula, whose memory he endeavoured to annihilate. He made himself popular for awhile, [but soon, under the guidance of Messalina, who possessed the most absolute control over him, he became a cruel and bloody tyrant.] He passed over into Britain, and obtained a triumph for victories which his generals had won, and suffered himself to be governed by favourites whose licentiousness and avarice plundered the state, and distracted the provinces. He married four wives, one of whom, called Messalina, he put to death on account of her lust and debauchery. He was at last poisoned [by his niece Agrippina, whom he had married after the death of Messalina, and who wished to raise to the throne her son Nero by a former marriage, to the prejudice of Britannicus, the son and lawful heir of Claudius; which she effected.] The poison was conveyed in mushrooms; but as it did not operate fast enough, his physician, by order of the empress, made him swallow a poisoned feather. He died in the 63d year of his age, 13 October, A. D. 54, after a reign of 13 years; distinguished neither by humanity nor courage, but debased by weakness and irresolution. He was succeeded by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 11, &c.—Dio. 60.—Juv. 6, v. 619.—Suet. in vitâ.—The second emperor of that name was a Dalmatian, who succeeded Gallienus. [He defeated the Goths, who had passed over into Greece, to the number of 300,000 men, in two bloody battles, and destroyed nearly all their vast force. A pestilence, however, which had broken out among the Gothic fugitives, carried him off at Sirmium, after a short but splendid reign of two years.] The excellence of his character, marked with bravery, and tempered with justice and benevolence, is well known by these words of the senate, addressed to him: Claudi Auguste, tu frater, tu pater, tu amicus, tu bonus senator, tu vere princeps.—Nero, a consul, with Liv. Salinator, who defeated and killed Asdrubal near the river Metaurus, after he had passed from Spain into Italy to the assistance of his brother Annibal. Liv. 27, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 37.—Suet. in Tib.—The father of the emperor Tiberius, quæstor to Cæsar in the wars of Alexandria.—Pontius, a general of the Samnites, who conquered the Romans at Furcæ Caudinæ, and made them pass under the yoke. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.—App. Cæcus, a Roman censor, who built an aqueduct A. U. C. 441, which brought water to Rome from Tusculum. It was the first that was brought to the city from the country. Before his age the Romans were satisfied with the waters of the Tiber, or of the fountains and wells in the city. [vid. Appian.] Liv. 9, c. 29.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 203.—Cic. de sen. 6.—Tiberius Nero, was elder brother of Drusus, and son of Livia Drusilla, who married Augustus after his divorce of Scribonia. He married Livia, the emperor's daughter by Scribonia, and succeeded in the empire by the name of Tiberius. vid. Tiberius. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 2.—The name of Claudius is common to many Roman consuls and other officers of state; but nothing is recorded of them, and their name is but barely mentioned. Liv.

CLAVIGER, a surname of Janus, from his being represented with a key. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 228. Hercules received also that surname, as he was armed with a club. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 284.

CLAUSUS, or CLAUDIUS, a king of the Sabines who assisted Turnus against Æneas. He was the progenitor of that Ap. Claudius who migrated to Rome, and became the founder of the Claudian family. Verg. Æn. 7, v. 707, l. 10, v. 345.

CLAZOMËNÆ and CLAZOMËNA, [a city of Ionia, on the coast of the Ægean sea, west of Smyrna. There were two cities of this name; the more ancient stood on the continent, and was strongly fortified by the Ionians to resist the Persians. After the defeat of Cæsus, however, they were terrified, and withdrew to a neighbouring island, where they built the second Clazomenæ so often mentioned in Roman history. Alexander, according to Pausanias, joined it to the continent by a causeway 250 paces long; from which time it was reckoned among the cities on the continent. Augustus greatly embellished it, and was styled, on some medals, its founder, through flattery. Anaxagoras was born here. On or near its site stands the small town of Dowlak, or Vourla.] Mela, 1. c. 17.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 14.—Liv. 38, c. 39.

CLEANTHES, [a stoic philosopher of Assos in Lydia, disciple of Zeno. After the death of Zeno, his school was continued by Cleanthes. His first appearance was in the character of a wrestler. In this capacity he visited Athens, where the love of philosophy was diffused through all ranks of people. He soon caught the general spirit, and though he was possessed of no more than four drachmæ, he determined to put himself under the tuition of some eminent philosopher. His first master was Crates, the Academic. He afterwards became a disciple of Zeno, and a celebrated advocate of his doctrines. By night he drew water as a common labourer in the public gardens, that he might have leisure in the day-time to attend the schools of philosophy. The Athenian citizens observing, that, though he appeared strong and healthy, he had no visible means of subsistence, summoned him before the Areopagus, according to the custom of the city, to give an account of his manner of living. Upon this he produced the gardener for whom he drew water, and a woman for whom he ground meal, as witnesses to prove that he subsisted by the labour of his hands. The judges of the court were struck with such admiration of his conduct, that they ordered ten minæ to be paid him out of the public treasury; which, however, Zeno would not suffer him to accept. Antigonus afterwards presented him with three thousand minæ. From the manner in which this philosopher supported himself, he was called ῥεαντλος, or, the well-drawer. For many years he was so very poor that he was compelled to write the heads of his master's lectures on shells and bones for the want of money to buy better materials. He remained, however, notwithstanding every obstacle, a pupil of Zeno for nineteen years. His natural faculties were slow; but resolution and perseverance enabled him to overcome every difficulty; and, at last, he became so complete a master of the stoic philosophy, as to be perfectly well qualified to succeed Zeno. His fellow-disciples often ridiculed him for his dullness, by calling him an ass; but his answer was that if he were an ass, he was better able to bear the weight of Zeno's doctrine. He wrote much, but none of his writings remain except a most beautiful hymn to Jupiter, preserved in the Anthology. After his death, the Roman senate erected a statue in honour of him at Assus. It is said that he starved himself in his 90th year, B. C. 240.] Strab. 13.—Cic. de Finib. 2, c. 69, l. 4, c. 7.

CLEARCHUS, a tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, who was killed by Chion and Leonidas, Plato's pupils, during the celebration of the festivals of Bacchus, after the enjoyment of the sovereign power during twelve years, 353 B. C. Justin. 16, c. 4.—Diod. 15.—The second tyrant of Heraclea of that name died B. C. 288.—A Lacedæmonian sent to aid the Byzantines. He was recalled, but refused to obey, and fled to Cyrus the younger. [After the battle of Cunaxa, and the death of Cyrus, he, together with the other Greek commanders, were made prisoners by the treachery of Tissaphernes, and put to death.] Diod. 14.—A disciple of Aristotle, who wrote a treatise on tactics, &c. Xenoph.

CLEMENS ROMANUS, one of the fathers of the church, said to be contemporary with St. Paul. Several spurious compositions are ascribed to him, but the only thing extant is his epistle to the Corinthians, written to quiet the disturbances that had arisen there. It has been much admired. The best edition is that of Wotton, 8vo. Cantab. 1718.—Another of Alexandria, called from thence Alexandrinus, who flourished 206 A. D. His works are various, elegant, and full of erudition; the best edition of which is Potter's, 2 vols. folio, Oxon. 1715.

CLEOBIS and BITON, two youths, sons of Cydippe, the priestess of Juno at Argos. When oxen could not be procured to draw their mother's chariot to the temple of Juno, they put themselves under the yoke, and drew it 45 stadia to the temple, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, who congratulated the mother on account of the filial affection of her sons. Cydippe entreated the goddess to reward the piety of her sons with the best gift that could be granted to a mortal. They went to rest, and awoke no more; and by this the goddess showed that death is the only true happy event that can happen to man. The Argives raised them statues at Delphi. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 47.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Herodot. 1, c. 31.—Plut. de Cons. ad Apol.

CLEOBŪLINA, a daughter of Cleobulus, remarkable for her genius, learning, judgment, and courage. She composed ænigmas, some of which have been preserved. One of them runs thus: "A father had 12 children, and these 12 children had each 30 white sons, and 30 black daughters, who are immortal, though they die every day." In this there is no need of an Œdipus to discover that there are 12 months in the year, and that every month consists of 30 days and of the same number of nights. Laert.

CLEOBŪLUS, one of the seven wise men of Greece, son of Evagoras of Lindos, famous for the beautiful shape of his body. He wrote some few verses, and died in the 70th year of his age, B. C. 564. Diog. in vitâ.—Plut. in Symp.

CLEOMBROTUS, son of Pausanias, a king of Sparta, after his brother Agesipolis 1st. He made war against the Bœotians, and lest he should be suspected of treacherous communication with Epaminondas, he gave that general battle at Leuctra, in a very disadvantageous place. He was killed in the engagement, and his army destroyed, B. C. 371. Diod. 15.—Paus. 9, c. 13.—Xenoph.—A son-in-law of Leonidas, king of Sparta, who, for awhile, usurped the kingdom after the expulsion of his father-in-law. When Leonidas was recalled, Cleombrotus was banished; and his wife Chelonis, who had accompanied her father, now accompanied her husband in his exile. Paus. 3, c. 6.—Plut. in Ag. and Cleom.—A youth of Ambracia, who threw himself into the sea after reading Plato's treatise upon the immortality of the soul. Cic. in Tusc. 1, c. 34.—Ovid. in Ib. 493.

CLEOMÉDES, a famous athlete of Astypalæa, above Crete. In a combat at Olympia he killed one of his antagonists by a blow with his fist. On account of this accidental murder, he was deprived of the victory, and he became delirious. On his return to Astypalæa, he entered a school, and pulled down the pillars which supported the roof, and crushed to death 60 boys. He was pursued with stones, and he fled for shelter into a tomb, whose doors he so strongly secured, that his pursuers were obliged to break them for access. When the tomb was opened, Cleomedes could not be found either dead or alive. The oracle of Delphi was consulted, and gave this answer, Ultimus heroum Cleomedes Astypalæus. Upon this they offered sacrifices to him as a god. Paus. 6, c. 9.—Plut. in Rom.

CLEOMENES 1st, king of Sparta, conquered the Argives, and burnt 5000 of them by setting fire to a grove where they had fled, and freed Athens from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. By bribing the oracle, he pronounced Demaratus, his colleague on the throne, illegitimate, because he refused to punish the people of Ægna, who had deserted the Greeks. He killed himself in a fit of madness, 491 B. C. Herodot. 5, 6, and 7.—Paus. 2, c. 3, &c.—The 2d, succeeded his brother Agesipolis 2d. He reigned 6½ years in the greatest tranquillity, and was father to Acrotatus and Cleonymus, and was succeeded by Areus 1st, son of Acrotatus. Paus. 3, c. 6.—The 3d, succeeded his father Leonidas. He was of an enterprising spirit, and resolved to restore the ancient discipline of Lyncurgus in its full force, by banishing luxury and intemperance. He killed the Ephori, and removed by poison his royal colleague Eurydamides, and made his own brother, Euclidas, king, against the laws of the state, which forbade more than one of the same family to sit on the throne. He made war against the Achæans, and attempted to destroy their league. Aratus, the general of the Achæans, who supposed himself inferior to his enemy, called Antigonus to his assistance; and Cleomenes, when he had fought the unfortunate battle of Sellasia, B. C. 222, retired into Egypt, to the court of Ptolemy Euergetes, where his wife and children had fled before him; Ptolemy received him with great cordiality; but his successor, weak and suspicious, soon expressed his jealousy of this noble stranger, and imprisoned him. Cleomenes, with 12 friends, forced the place where he was confined, but finding escape from the city impracticable, they slew each other, and Cleomenes' body was flayed, and exposed on a cross, B. C. 219. Polyb. 6.—Plut. in vitâ.—Justin. 28, c. 4.

CLEON, an Athenian, who, though originally a tanner, became general of the armies of the state, by his intrigues and eloquence. He took Thoron in Thrace, and after distinguishing himself in several engagements, he was killed at Amphipolis, in a battle with Brasidas the Spartan general, 422 B. C. Thucyd. 3, 4, &c.—Diod. 12.—An orator of Halicarnassus, who composed an oration for Lysander, in which he intimated the propriety of making the kingdom of Sparta elective. C. Nep. and Plut. in Lys.

CLEONÆ and CLEONA, a city of Argolis, between Corinth and Argos. Hercules killed the lion of Nemæa in its neighbourhood, and thence it is called Cleonæus. It was made a constellation. Stat. 4. Sylv. 4, v. 28.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 417.—Sil. 3, v. 32.—Paus. 2, c. 15.—Plin. 36, e. 5.—A town of Phocis.—[Another in Arcadia.—Another on the peninsula of Athos.]

CLEONICA, a young virgin of Byzantium, whom Pausanias, king of Sparta, invited to his bed. She was introduced into his room when he was asleep, and unluckily overturned a burning lamp which was by the side of the bed. Pausanias was awakened at the sudden noise, and thinking it to be some assassin, he seized his sword, and killed Cleonica before he knew who it was. Cleonica often appeared to him, and he was anxious to make proper expiation to her manes. Paus. 7, c. 17.—Plut. in Cim. &c.

CLEONYMUS, a son of Cleomenes 2d, who called Pyrrhus to his assistance, because Areus, his brother's son, had been preferred to him in the succession; but the measure was unpopular, and even the women united to repel the foreign prince. His wife was unfaithful to his bed, and committed adultery with Acrotatus. Plut. in Pyrrh.—Paus. 1, c. 3.—A person so cowardly that Cleonymo timidior became proverbial.

CLEOPÁTRA, the grand-daughter of Attalus, betrothed to Philip of Macedonia, after he had divorced Olympias. When Philip was murdered by Pausanias, Cleopatra was seized by order of Olympias and put to death. Diod. 16.—Justin. 9, c. 7.—Plut. in Pyrrh.—A sister of Alexander the Great, who married Perdiccas, and was killed by Antigonus, as she attempted to fly to Ptolemy in Egypt. Diod. 16 and 20.—Justin. 9, c. 6, l. 13, c. 6.—A wife of Tigranes, king of Armenia, sister of Mithridates. Justin. 38, c. 3.—A daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, who married Alexander Bala, and afterwards Nicanor. She killed Seleucus, Nicanor's son, because he ascended the throne without her consent. She was suspected of preparing poison for Antiochus her son, and compelled to drink it herself, B. C. 120.—A wife and sister of Ptolemy Euergetes, who raised her son Alexander, a minor, to the throne of Egypt, in preference to his elder brother Ptolemy Lathurus, whose interest the people favoured. As Alexander was odious, Cleopatra suffered Lathurus to ascend the throne, on condition, however, that he should repudiate his sister and wife, called Cleopatra, and marry Seleucia, his younger sister. She afterwards raised her favourite Alexander to the throne; but her cruelties were so odious that he fled to avoid her tyranny. Cleopatra laid snares for him: and when Alexander heard it he put her to death. Justin. 39, c. 3 and 4. —A queen of Egypt, daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, and sister and wife to Ptolemy Dionysius, celebrated for her beauty and her cunning. She admitted Cæsar to her arms, to influence him to give her the kingdom in preference to her brother, who had expelled her, and had a son by him, called Cæsarion. As she had supported Brutus, Antony, in his expedition to Parthia, summoned her to appear before him. She arrayed herself in the most magnificent apparel, and appeared before her judge in the most captivating attire. Her artifice succeeded; Antony became enamoured of her, and publicly married her, forgetful of his connections with Octavia, the sister of Augustus. He gave her the greatest part of the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. This behaviour was the cause of a rupture between Augustus and Antony; and these two celebrated Romans met at Actium, where Cleopatra, by flying with sixty sail, ruined the interest of Antony, and he was defeated. Cleopatra had retired into Egypt, where soon after Antony followed her. Antony killed himself upon the false information that Cleopatra was dead; and as his wound was not mortal, he was carried to the queen, who drew him up by a cord from one of the windows of the monument where she had retired and concealed herself. Antony soon after died of his wounds, and Cleopatra, after she had received pressing invitations from Augustus, and even pretended declarations of love, destroyed herself by the bite of an asp, not to fall into the conqueror's hands. She had previously attempted to stab herself, and had once made a resolution to starve herself. Cleopatra was a voluptuous and extravagant woman, and in one of the feasts she gave to Antony at Alexandria, she melted pearls into her drink to render her entertainment more sumptuous and expensive. She was fond of appearing dressed as the goddess Isis; and she advised Antony to make war against the richest nations to support her debaucheries. Her beauty has been greatly commended, and her mental perfections so highly celebrated, that she has been described as capable of giving audience to the ambassadors of seven different nations, and of speaking their various languages as fluently as her own. Two treatises, De medicamine faciei epistola erotica, and De morbis mulierum, have been falsely attributed to her. She died B. C. 30 years, after a reign of 24 years, aged 39. Flor. 4, c. 11. —Appian. 5, Bell. Civ. —Plut. in Pomp. & Ant. —Horat. 1, od. 37, v. 21, &c. —Strab. 17. —A daughter of Ptolemy Epiphanes, who married Philometor, and afterwards Phiscon of Cyrene.

CLEOPATRISS OF ARSINOË, a fortified town of Egypt on the Arabian gulf. [vid. Arsinoë.]

CLEOPHANTHUS, a son of Themistocles, famous for his skill in riding.

CLEOSTRATUS, an ancient philosopher and astronomer of Tenedos, about 533 years before Christ. He first reformed the Greek calendar.

CLEPSYDRA, a fountain of Messenia, [in mount Ithome.] Paus. 4, c. 31.

CLIMAX, a pass of Mount Taurus, formed by the projection of a brow into the Mediterranean sea. [It was on the eastern coast of Lycia, above the mountain and town of Olympus, near the city Phaselis. The army of Alexander, which passed here in the winter, were in the utmost danger, being compelled to wade a whole day up to their middles in water.] Strab. 14.

CLINIUS, a Pythagorean philosopher and musician, 520 years before the Christian era. Plut. Symp. —Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 23. —A son of Alcibiades, the bravest man in the Grecian fleet that fought against Xerxes. Herodot. 8, c. 7. —The father of Alcibiades, killed at the battle of Coronea. Plut. in Alc. —The father of Aratus, killed by Abantidas, B. C. 263. Plut. in Arat.

CLINUS of Cos, was general of 7000 Greeks in the pay of king Nectanebus. He was killed with some of his troops by Nicostratus and the Argives, as he passed the Nile. Diod. 16.

CLIO, the first of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over history. She is represented crowned with laurels, holding in one hand a trumpet, and a book in the other. Sometimes she holds a plectrum, or quill with a lute. Her name signifies honour and reputation, (κλέος, gloria,) and it was her office faithfully to record the actions of brave and illustrious heroes. She had Hyacintha by Pierus, son of Magnes. She was also mother of Hymenæus, and Ialemus, according to others. Hesiod. Theog. v. 75. —Apollod. 1, c. 3. —Strab. 14. [vid. Museæ.]

CLISTHENES, the last tyrant of Sicyon. Aristot. —An Athenian of the family of Alcmaeon. It is said that he first established ostracism, and that he was the first who was banished by that institution. He banished Isagoras, and was himself soon after restored. Plut. in Arist. —Herodot. 5, c. 66, &c.

CLITÆ, [a people of Cilicia Campestris, who retired to mount Taurus in order to avoid paying tribute to Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and maintained themselves there under their leader Trosova, against the troops sent to reduce them.] Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 55.

CLITARCHUS, a man who made himself absolute at Eretria, by means of Philip of Macedonia. He was ejected by Phocion. —An historian, who accompanied Alexander the Great, of whose life he wrote the history. Curt. 9, c. 5.

CLITOMACHUS, a Carthaginian philosopher of the third academy, who was pupil and successor to Carneades at Athens, B. C. 128. Diog. in vitâ.

CLITOR, a son of Azan, who founded a city in Arcadia, called after his name. Paus. 8, c. 4. —Apollod. 3, c. 8. Ceres, Esculapius, the Dioscuri, and other deities, had temples in that city. There was also in the town a fountain, called Clitorum, whose waters gave a dislike for wine. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 322.—Plin. 32, c. 2.

CLITUMNUS, [a river of Umbria, rising in the vicinity of Spoleto, and falling into the Topinus or Tina, now Tupino, and both together into the Tiber. The modern name of the Clitumnus is Clitumno. It was famous, according to Virgil, for its milk-white flocks and herds, selected as victims in the celebration of the triumph.] Propert. 2, el. 10, v. 25.—Virg. G. 2, v. 146.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

CLITUS, a familiar friend and foster-brother of Alexander. He saved the king's life in a bloody battle. Alexander killed him with a javelin, in a fit of anger, because, at a feast, he preferred the actions of Philip to those of his son. Alexander was inconsolable for the loss of a friend, whom he had sacrificed in the hour of drunkenness and dissipation. Justin. 12, c. 6.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 4, &c.

CLOACINA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the Cloacæ. Some suppose her to be Venus, whose statue was found in the Cloacæ, whence the name. The Cloacæ were large receptacles for the filth and dung of the whole city, begun by Tarquin the elder, and finished by Tarquin the proud. [They were built under the city, and their arches were so high, that, according to Procopius, a man on horseback might ride through them even in the ordinary course of the channel, and a wain loaded with hay might pass and vessels sail in them. There were in the streets at proper distances, openings for the admission of dirty water or any other filth, which persons were appointed always to remove and also to keep the Cloacæ clean. The principal sewer, now existing, with which the rest communicated, was called Cloaca maxima, and was principally the work of Tarquinius Superbus. Such at least is the general opinion: see, however, remarks at the end of the article Roma. The Cloacæ were at first carried through the streets, but through the want of regularity in rebuilding the city, after it was burnt by the Gauls, they in many places passed under private houses. The cleaning of the Cloacæ was the more easily effected by means of the declivity of the ground, and the plenty of water with which the city was supplied. Under the republic, censors had charge of them, but under the emperors, Curatores cloacarum were appointed, and a tax was imposed for keeping them in repair, called Cloacarium.] Liv. 3, c. 48.—Plin. 5, c. 29.

CLODIA, the wife of Lucullus, repudiated for her lasciviousness. Plut. in Lucull.—A woman who married Q. Metellus, and afterwards disgraced herself by her amours with Cælius and her incest with her brother Publius, for which he is severely and eloquently arraigned by Cicero.

CLODIA LEX de Cypro, was enacted by the tribune Clodius, A. U. C. 695, [that Cyprus should be taken from Ptolemy and made a Roman province. This was done in order to punish that monarch for having refused Clodius money to pay his ransom when taken by the pirates, and to remove Cato out of the way by appointing him to see the law executed.]—Another, de Magistratibus, A. U. C. 695, by Clodius the tribune. It forbade the censors to put a stigma or mark of infamy upon any person who had not been actually accused and condemned by both the censors.—Another, de Religione, by the same, A. U. C. 696, to deprive the priest of Cybele, a native of Pessinus, of his office, and confer the priesthood upon Brotignus, a Gallogrecian.—Another de Provinciis, A. U. C. 695, which nominated the provinces of Syria, Babylon, and Persia, to the consul Gabinius; and Achaia, Thessaly, Macedon, and Greece, to his colleague Piso, with pro-consular power. It empowered them to defray the expenses of their march from the public treasury.—Another, A. U. C. 695, which required the gratis of corn among the people gratis, as had been given them before at six asses and a triens the bushel.—Another, A. U. C. 695, by the same, de Judiciis It prohibited from fire and water such as had executed a Roman citizen without a judgment of the people and all the formalities of a trial. [Cicero was aimed at by this law, and soon after, by means of a hired mob, was actually banished.]—Another, by the same, to pay no attention to the appearances of the heavens while any affair was before the people.—Another, to make the power of the tribunes free, in making and proposing laws—Another, to re-establish the companies of artists which had been instituted by Numa, but since his time abolished.

P. CLŌDIUS, a Roman, descended from an illustrious family, and remarkable for his licentiousness, avarice, and ambition. He committed incest with his three sisters, and introduced himself in women's clothes into the house of J. Cæsar, whilst Pompeia, Cæsar's wife of whom he was enamoured, was celebrating the mysteries of Ceres, where no man was permitted to appear. He was accused for this violation of human and divine laws; but he corrupted his judges, and by that means screened himself from justice. He descended from a patrician into a plebeian family to become a tribune. He was such an enemy to Cato, that he made him go with prætorian power in an expedition against Ptolemy king of Cyprus, that, by the difficulty of the campaign, he might ruin his reputation, and destroy his interest at Rome during his absence. Cato, however, by his uncommon success, frustrated the views of Clodius. He was also an inveterate enemy to Cicero; and by his influence he banished him from Rome, partly on pretence that he had punished with death, and without trial, the adherents of Catiline. He wreaked his vengeance upon Cicero's house, which he burnt, and set all his goods to sale; which, however, to his great mortification, no one offered to buy. In spite of Clodius, Cicero was recalled, and all his goods restored to him. Clodius was some time after murdered by Milo, whose defence Cicero took upon himself. Plut. in Cic.—Ap- pian. de Civ. 2.—Cic. pro Milon. & pro domo.—Dio.

CLÆLIA, a Roman virgin, given with other maidens as hostages to Porsenna king of Etru- ria. She escaped from her confinement, and swam across the Tiber to Rome. Her un- precedented virtue was rewarded by her countrymen with an equestrian statue in the Via sacra. Lin. 2, c. 16.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 651.—Dionys. Hal. 5.—Juv. 8, v. 265.—A patrician family descended from Clælius, one of the companions of Æneas. Dionys.

CLÆLIÆ FOSSÆ, a place near Rome. Plut. in Coriol.

CLOTHO, the youngest of the three Parcæ, daughter of Jupiter and Themis, or, according to Hesiod, of Night, was supposed to preside over the moment that we are born. She held the distaff in her hand, and span the thread of life, whence her name (κλαβειν, ιο spin.) She was represented wearing a crown with seven stars, and covered with a variegated robe. vid. Parcæ. Hesiod. Theog. v. 218.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.

CLUACINA, a name of Venus, whose statue was erected in that place where peace was made between the Romans and Sabines, after the rape of the virgins. vid. Cloacina.

CLUENTIUS, a Roman citizen, accused by his mother of having murdered his father, 54 years B. C. He was ably defended by Cice- ro, in an oration still extant. The family of the Cluentii was descended from Cloanthus, one of the companions of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 122.—Cic. pro Cluent.

CLUPÆA and CLYPEA, now Akibia, a town of Africa Propria, 22 miles east of Carthage. [It was built upon a promontory which was shaped like a shield. Agathocles seized upon this place when he landed in Africa, fortified it, and gave it, from the shape of the promon- tory, the name Aspis, (a shield, in Greek, whence Clypeus in Latin). The natives called the promontory Taphitis. This town served also as a stronghold to Regulus in the first Punic war.] Lucan. 4, v. 586.—Strab. 17.—Liv. 27, c. 29.—Cæs. Civ. 2, c. 23.

CLUSIA, a daughter of an Etrurian king, of whom V. Torquatus, the Roman general, be- came enamoured. He asked her of her fa- ther, who slighted his addresses; upon which he besieged and destroyed his town. Clusia threw herself down from a high tower, and came to the ground unhurt. Plut. in Pa- rall.

CLUSINI FONTES, baths in Etruria, [near Clusium. They are now called Bagni de S. Cantiano.] Horat. 1, ep. 15, v. 9.

CLUSIUM, [now Chiusi, a town of Etruria, on the banks of the Clanis. Its more ancient name was Camers. Here Porsenna held his court, and was buried. Pliny speaks of his tomb, and a monument erected in honour of him, called the Labyrinth. The Gauls under Brennus besieged it, but marched to Rome without taking it. It is now almost forsaken on account of the insalubrity of the air.] Diod. 14.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 167 and 655.

CLUSIUS, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, [now La Chiese.] Polyb. 2.—The surname of Janus, when his temple was shut. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 130.

CLYMÈNE, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, who married Japetus, by whom she had Atlas, Prometheus, Menetius, and Epi- metheus. Hesiod. Theog.—The mother of Phaëton.

CLYMENEIDES, a patronymic given to Phaëton's sisters, who were daughters of Cly- mene.

CLYMENUS, a king of Orchomenos, son of Preshon, and father of Erginus, Stratius, Arrhion, and Axius. He received a wound from a stone thrown by a Theban, of which he died. His son Erginus, who succeeded him, made war against the Thebans to re- venge his death. Paus. 9, c. 37.

CLYTEMNESTRA, a daughter of Tyndarus king of Sparta, by Leda. She was born, to- gether with her brother Castor, from one of the eggs which her mother brought forth after her amour with Jupiter under the form of a swan. [This story of the egg has thus been explained. The women's apartments in the Grecian houses, were in the upper part of the house. These upper rooms were sometimes, especially at Lacedæmon, called ᾄα, αἴα, or ὑπεῖθαξ, which words being distinguished only by the accent (the use whereof seems not to have been known by the more ancient Greeks,) from ᾄα, eggs, are thought by some to have given occasion to the inven- tors of fables to feign that Castor, Pollux, Helen, and Clytemnestra, were produced from eggs, when in fact they were born in one of these upper chambers.] Clytemnes- tra married Agamemnon king of Argos. She had before married Tantalus, son of Thyestes, according to some authors. When Aga- memnon went to the Trojan war, he left his cousin Ægysthus to take care of his wife, of his family, and all his domestic affairs. Be- sides this, a certain favourite musician was appointed by Agamemnon to watch over the conduct of the guardian, as well as that of Clytemnestra. In the absence of Agamem- non, Ægysthus made his court to Clytemnes- tra, and publicly lived with her. Her infidelity reached the ears of Agamemnon be- fore the walls of Troy, and he resolved to take full revenge upon the adulterers at his return. He was prevented from putting his schemes into execution; Clytemnestra, with her adulterer, murdered him at his arrival, as he came out of the bath, or, according to other accounts, as he sat down at a feast pre- pared to celebrate his happy return. Cas- sandra, whom Agamemnon had brought from Troy, shared his fate; and Orestes would al- so have been deprived of his life, like his fa- ther, had not his sister Electra removed him from the reach of Clytemnestra. After this murder, Clytemnestra publicly married Æ- gysthus, and he ascended the throne of Argos. Orestes, after an absence of seven years, returned to Mycenæ, resolved to revenge his father's murder. He concealed himself in the house of his sister Electra, who had been married by the adulterers to a person of mean extraction and indigent circumstances. His death was publicly announced; and when Ægysthus and Clytemnestra repaired to the temple of Apollo, to return thanks to the god for the death of the surviving son of Agamemnon, Orestes, who with his faithful friend Pylades, had concealed himself in the temple, rushed upon the adulterers and killed them with his own hand. They were buried without the walls of the city, as their remains were deemed unworthy to be laid in the sepulchre of Agamemnon. *vid. Ægysthus, Agamemnon, Orestes, Electra. Diod. 4.—Homer. CLYTIA or CLYTIE, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, beloved by Apollo. She was deserted by her lover, who paid his addresses to Leucothoe; and this so irritated her that she discovered the whole intrigue to her rival's father. Apollo despised her the more for this, and she pined away, and was changed into a flower, called [the Heliotrope (ἡλιος and τροπή, or) sun-flower,] which still turns its head towards the sun in his course, as in pledge for her love. Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 3, &c.

CNACADIUM, a mountain of Laconia, [near which was the town of Las, south-west of Gythium.] Paus. 3, c. 24.

CNACALIS, a mountain of Arcadia, where festivals were celebrated in honour of Diana. Id. 8, c. 23.

CNEMIS, a mountain of Locris, near the coast which faces Eubœa. From it the Locri Epizephirij derived their appellation. In its vicinity was a town of the same name.]

CNIDUS and CNIDŪS, a town of Doris in Caria, [at the extremity of a promontory called Triopium, now Cape Crio.] Venus was the chief deity of the place, and had here a famous statue made by Praxiteles. [Nicomedes of Bithynia offered to pay the debts of this city, which were immense, in order to obtain this masterpiece of art, but the offer was declined. The shores of Cnidus furnished in ancient times, as they do now, a great abundance of fishes. The wines were famous, and Theophrastus speaks of the Cnidian onions as of a particular species, being very mild, and not occasioning tears. Cnidus is now a heap of ruins.] Horat. 1, od. 30.—Plin. 36, c. 15.

CNOSUS, or CNOSUSUS, [a town of Crete, on the northern coast, at a small distance from the sea. According to Strabo, it was 30 stadia in extent. Here Mias held his court, and in its vicinity was the famous Labyrinth. A small village, called Cnosson, occupies part of the ancient site of Cnosus. The name of the port of the city was Heraclæum.] Paus. 1, c. 27.

COASTRÆ and COACTRÆ, a people of Asia, near the Palus Mæotis. Lucan. 3, v. 246.

COCÆLUS, a king of Sicily, who hospitably received Dædalus, when he fled before Minos. When Minos arrived in Sicily, the daughters of Cocælus destroyed him. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 261.—Diod. 4.

COCCEIUS NERVA, a friend of Horace and Mæcenas and grandfather to the emperor Nerva. He was one of those who settled the disputes between Augustus and Antony. He afterwards accompanied Tiberius in his retreat in Campania, and starved himself to death. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 58 and 6, c. 26.—Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 27.—An architect of Rome, one of whose buildings is still in being, the present cathedral of Naples.

COCINTUM, a promontory of the Brutii, now Cape Stilo.

COCLES, PUB. HORAT. a celebrated Roman, who, alone, opposed the whole army of Porsenna at the head of a bridge, while his companies behind him were cutting off the communication with the other shore. When the bridge was destroyed, Cocles, though severely wounded in the leg by the darts of the enemy, leapt into the Tiber, and swam across with his arms. A brazen statue was raised to him in the temple of Vulcan by the consul Publicola, for his eminent services. He had the use only of one eye, as Cocles signifies. Liv. 2, c. 10.—Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 650.

COCYTUS, a river of Epirus. The word is derived from κωκυτος, to weep and to lament. Its etymology, the unwholesomeness of its water, and above all, its vicinity to the Acheron, have made the poets call it one of the rivers of hell; hence Cocytia virgo, applied to Alecto, one of the furies. Virg. G. 3, v. 38, l. 4, v. 479. Æn. 6, v. 297, 323, l. 7, v. 479.—Paus. 1, c. 17.—A river of Campania, flowing into the Lucrine lake.

CODANUS SINUS, one of the ancient names of the Baltic. [Mela represents it as full of large and small islands, the largest of which he calls Scandinavia; so also Pliny. The name Codanus seems to have some reference to that of the Goths in sound. Mela, 3, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 13.]

CODOMĀNUS, a surname of Darius the third, king of Persia.

CODRIDÆ, the descendants of Codrus, who went from Athens at the head of several colonies. Paus. 7, c. 2.

CODROPŌLIS, [a town of Illyricum, at the lower part of the Adriatic, and serving as a boundary to the empire divided between Marc. Antony and Augustus.]

CODRUS, the 17th and last king of Athens, son of Melanthus. When the Heraclidæ made war against Athens, the oracle declared that the victory would be granted to that nation whose king was killed in battle. The Heraclidæ upon this gave strict orders to spare the life of Codrus; but the patriotic king disguised himself, and attacked one of the enemy, by whom he was killed. The Athenians obtained the victory, and Codrus was deservedly called the father of his country. He reigned 22 years, and was killed 1070 years before the christian era. To pay greater honour to his memory, the Athenians made a resolution, that no man after Codrus should reign in Athens under the name of king, and therefore the government was put into the hands of [elective magistrates, called Archons, who held the office for life, and transmitted it to their children. The first of these was Medon, eldest son of Codrus, from whom the thirteen following archons were called Medontidae, as being descended from him. In the first year of the seventh Olympiad, the power and succession devolved on the people, who made the office decennial.] Paterc. 1, c. 2.—Justin. 2, c. 6 and 7.—Paus. 1, c. 19. 1. 7, c. 25.—Val. Max. 5, c. 6.—A Latin poet, contemporary with Virgil. Virg. Ecl. 7.—Another, in the reign of Domitian, whose poverty became a proverb. Juv. 3, v. 203.

[COELE, or, the Hollow, the northern division of Elis.—A town situate on the Hellespont, south of Sestos, where the Athenians obtained a naval victory over the Lacedæmonians. It changed its name to Ælium in the time of Adrian.]

COELESYRIA and CÆLOSRYIA, [the Hollow Syria,] a country of Syria, between mountains Libanus and Antilibanus, where the Orontes takes its rise. Its capital was Damascus.—Antiochus Cyzicenus gave this name to that part of Syria which he obtained as his share when he divided his father's dominions with Grypus, B. C. 112. Dionys Perieg.

CÆLIA, the wife of Sylla. Plut. in Syll. The Cælian family, which was plebeian, but honoured with the consulship, was descended from Vibenna Cœles, an Etrurian, who came to settle at Rome in the age of Romulus.

[COELIA LEX, a law passed A. U. C. 630. that in trials for treason the people should vote by ballot, which had been excepted by the Cassian law.]

CÆLUS or URĀNUS, an ancient deity, supposed to be the father of Saturn, Oceanus, Hyperion, &c. [vid. end of this article.] He was son of Terra, whom he afterwards married. The number of his children, according to some, amounted to forty-five. They were called Titans, and were so closely confined by their father that they conspired against him, and were supported by their mother, who provided them with a scythe. Saturn armed himself with this scythe, and deprived his father of the organs of generation as he was going to unite himself to Terra. From the blood which issued from the wound, sprang the giants, furies, and nymphs. The mutilated parts were thrown into the sea, and from them, and the foam which they occasioned, arose Venus the goddess of beauty. [The Grecian religion appears to have been in its origin pure Sabaism, or worship of the heavenly bodies. Hence the similarity between the term Sabaism and the Greek verb σεβωμαι, "to worship." In like manner the name Uranus is from the Greek οὐρανός, heaven. So also the Titans were nothing more than the constellations, as appears by the titles given them. Thus, Hyperion (he that moves on high, i. e. the sun). Kotos, (he that inflames or burns), father of Asteria, (from αστρα a star,) husband of Phœbe (the bright shining). It is rather remarkable that in the Iroquois language of our own continent, the sun is similarly styled Icare, i. e. he who is above our heads.] Hesiod. &c.

CÆUS, a son of Cœlus and Terra. He was father of Latona, Asteria, &c. by Phœbe. Hesiod. Th. 135 and 405.—Virg. G. 1, v. 279.—A river of Messenia, flowing by Electra Paus. 4, c. 33.

COHOR, [vid. Legio.]

COLCHI, the inhabitants of Colchis.

COLCHIS, a country of Asia, at the south of Asiatic Sarmatia, east of the Euxine sea, north of Armenia, and west of Iberia, now called vingrelia. It is famous for the expedition of the Argonauts, and the birthplace of Medea. [The country abounded, according to Strabo, with fruit of every kind, and every material requisite for navigation. Its only exceptionable produce was the honey, which had a bitter taste. The linen manufactured here was in high repute, and some of it curiously painted and dyed like that of the Indians; and no washing could efface the colours, according to Herodotus. This species of manufacture, together with the dark complexion and crisped locks of the natives, were so many arguments among the ancients to prove them of European origin, independent of other proof derived from their language and general mode of life. The tradition was, that the Colchians were descended from a part of the army of Sesostris, left by him in Colchis to people the country and guard the passes, when he was going on his Scythian expedition.] Juv. 6, v. 640.—Flacc. 5, v. 18.—Horat. 2, od. 13, v. 8.—Strab. 11.—Ptol. 5, c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 24. Amor. 2, el. 14, v. 28.—Mela. 1, c. 19, l. 2, c. 3.

COLENTA, a town of Spain, [now Cavarruvia.]

COLIAS, now Agio Nocolo, a promontory of Attica, [south-east of the port of Phalerus,] where Venus had a temple. Herodot. 8, c. 96.

COLLATIA, a town on the Anio, built by the people of Alba. It was there that Sext. Tarquin offered violence to Lucretia. Liv. 1, 37, &c.—Strab. 3.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 774.

L. TARQUINIUS COLLATINUS, a nephew of Tarquin the Proud, who married Lucretia, to whom Sext. Tarquin offered violence. He, with Brutus, drove the Tarquins from Rome, and they were made first consuls. As he was one of the Tarquins so much abominated by all the Roman people, he laid down his office of consul, and retired to Alba in voluntary banishment. Liv. 1, c. 57, l. 2, c. 2.—Flor. 1, c. 9.

COLLINA, one of the gates of Rome, on Mount Quirinalis, [so called a collibus Quirinali et Viminali. It was called also Quirinalis. To this gate Annibal rode up and threw a spear within the city.] Ovid. 4, Fast. v. 871.—A goddess at Rome who presided over hills.—[The name of one of the four regions or wards into which Rome was divided by Servius Tullius. The other three were Palatina, Suburrana, and Esquilina.]

COLŌNE, a place of Troas. Nepos, 4, c. 3.

COLŌNE, a city of Phocis—of Thessaly—of Messenia.—A rock of Asia, on the Thracian Bosphorus.

COLŌNIA AGRIPPINA, a city of Germany, on the Rhine, now Cologne.—Equestris, a town on the lake of Geneva, now Nyon.—Mormorum, a town of Gaul, now Terrouen, in Artois.—Trajana, or Ulpia, a town of Germany, now [Koln or Kelz, about a mile from Cleves.]—Valentia, a town of Spain, which now bears the same name.

COLŌNOS, an eminence near Athens, where Œdipus retired during his banishment; from which circumstance Sophocles has given the title of Œdipus Coloneus to one of his tragedies.

COLŌPHON, [a city of Ionia, near the sea, north-west of Ephesus. It was founded by Mopsus, grandson of Tiresias, and in process of time, Damasichthon and Promether, sons of Codrus, conducted a colony hither. It was destroyed by Lysimachus, and its inhabitants sent to people Ephesus; but after his death, it was rebuilt in a more convenient situation. The Colophonians were such excellent horsemen that they generally turned the scale on the side on which they fought; and hence the proverb, Κολοφωνα επιτιθειναι, "to add a Colophonian," i. e. to put the finishing hand to an affair. Hence, also, in the early periods of the art of printing, the account which the printer gave of the place and date of the edition, being the last thing printed at the end of the book, was called the Colophon. This city was one of the places which contended for the birth of Homer. Its port was called Notium. It was also famed for its resin, whence the name of Colophony, otherwise called Spanish wax, and Grecian resin. The modern name of the city is Attobosco, or, according to others, Belvidere.] Strab. 14.—Plin. 14, c. 20.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 54.—Cic. pro Arch. Poet. 8.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 8.

COLOSSE and COLOSSIS, a large town of Phrygia [Pacatiana,] near Laodicea. One of the first christian churches was established there, and one of St. Paul's epistles was addressed to it. [Colossæ, together with Laodicea and Hierapolis, from which it was equidistant, perished by an earthquake in the 10th year of Nero's reign, or about two years after St. Paul's epistle was sent. The government of Colossæ was democratic, and its chief magistrate styled Archon. It was rebuilt after the earthquake, and became a flourishing city. Its name was subsequently changed to Chonæ, which remains in that of the village of Conus, south-east of the ancient site.] Plin. 21, c. 9.

COLOSSUS, [a celebrated brazen image of Rhodes, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. It was the workmanship of Chares, a pupil of Lysippus, who was employed 12 years in making it. Its height was 105 Grecian feet; there were few persons who could clasp round its thumb, and its fingers were larger than most statues. It was hollow, and in its cavities were large stones, placed there to counterbalance its weight, and render it steady on its pedestal. It is generally supposed to have stood with distended legs, upon the two moles which formed the entrance of the harbour. As the city, however, had two harbours, the main one, and a second much smaller, within which their fleet were secured, it seems more natural to suppose that the Colossus was placed at the entrance of this latter one, inasmuch as the space between the legs at the base could not have greatly exceeded 50 feet; a space too narrow to be the entrance to the main harbour. There was a winding stair-case to go up to the top of the statue, from whence one might discover Syria, and the ships that went to Egypt. It was erected B. C. 300, and after having stood about 66 years, was broken off below the knees, and thrown down by an earthquake.] It remained in ruins for the space of 894 years; and the Rhodians, who had received several large contributions to repair it, divided the money among themselves, and frustrated the expectations of the donors, by saying that the oracle of Delphi forbade them to raise it up again from its ruins. In the year 672 of the christian era, it was sold by the Saracens, who were masters of the island, to a Jewish merchant of Edessa, who loaded 900 camels with the brass. [Allowing 800 pounds weight for each load, the brass, after the diminution which it had sustained by rust, and probably by theft, amounted to about 720,000 pounds weight. The city of Rhodes had, according to Pliny, 100 other colossuses, of inferior size, in its different quarters.]

COLUBERARIA, a small island at the east of Spain supposed to be the same as Ophiusa. Plin. 3, c. 5.

COLUMELLA, (L. Jun. Moderatus,) a native of Gades, who wrote, among other works, twelve books on agriculture, of which the tenth, on gardening, is in verse. The style is elegant, and the work displays the genius of a naturalist and the labours of an accurate observer. The best edition of Columella is that of Gesner, 2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1735, and reprinted there 1772.

COLUMNÆ HERCŪLIS, a name given to two mountains on the extreme parts of Spain and Africa, at the entrance into the Mediterranean. They were called Calpe and Abyla, the former on the coast of Spain, and the latter on the side of Africa, at the distance of only 18 miles. They are reckoned the boundaries of the labours of Hercules, and they were supposed to have been joined, till the hero separated them and opened a communication between the Mediterranean and Atlantic seas. [vid. Remarks under the article Mediterraneum Mare.]—Protei, the boundaries of Egypt, or the extent of the kingdom of Proteus. Alexandria was supposed to be built near them, though Homer places them in the island Pharos. Odys. 4, v. 351.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 262.

COLŪTHUS, a native of Lycopolis in Egypt, [in the time of the emperor Anastasius, in the beginning of the 6th century,] who wrote a short poem on the rape of Helen in imitation of Homer. The composition remained long unknown, till it was discovered in the 15th century by the learned cardinal Bessarion. Coluthus was, as some suppose, a contemporary of Tryphidorus. [The poem is of inferior merit. The best edition is that of Lennep, Leovard. 1747, in 8vo.]

COMAGÈNE, [the northern part of Syria, on the declivity of mount Taurus and Amanus,] extending on the east as far as the Euphrates. Its chief town was called Samosata, the birth-place of Lucian. Strab. 11 and 17.

COMANA (æ and orum), a town of Pontus, [on the Iris, south-east of Amasea, now Almons.] Hist. Alex. 34.—Another in Cappadocia, [on the Sarus, now el Bostan.] Both these places were famous for temples of Bellona, where there were above 6000 ministers of both sexes. The chief priest among them was very powerful, and knew no superior but the king of the country. This high office was generally conferred upon one of the royal family. [Strabo makes the goddess worshipped at these places to have been Venus, and Procopius the Tauric Diana. The temple of the Cappadocian Comana was plundered by Antony.] Hist. Alex. 66.—Flacc. 7, v. 636.—Strab. 12.

COMARIA, the ancient name of Cape Comorin in India.

COMETHO, a daughter of Pterilaus, who deprived her father of a golden hair in his head, upon which depended his fate. She was put to death by Amphitryon for her perfidy. Apollod. 2, c. 4.

COMITIA, (orum), an assembly of the Roman people. The word is derived from Comitium, the place where they were convened. quasi a con eundo. The Comitium was a part of the Forum, which was left uncovered at the top in the first ages of the republic; so that the assembly was often dissolved in rainy weather. [It was covered the year that Hannibal came into Italy, and afterwards adorned with paintings and statues.] The Comitia were known by the name of Comitia Curiata, Centuriata, and Tributa. The Curiata was when the people gave their votes by curia. [These were the most ancient, having been established by Romulus. They became very little used after the institution of the other two.] The Centuriata were not convened in later times. (vid. Centuria.) Another assembly was called Comitia Tributa, where the votes were received from the whole tribes together. [These were first introduced by the tribunes of the commons at the trial of Coriolanus, A. U. C. 263. In them every individual's vote counted, and the people consequently had the full power, as the nobility and richer classes had at the Centuriata.] At first the Roman people were divided only into three tribes; but as their numbers increased, the tribes were at last swelled to 35. The chief object of these assemblies was the electing of magistrates, and all the public officers of state. They could be dissolved by one of the tribunes; if he differed in opinion from the rest of his colleagues. If one among the people was taken with the falling sickness, [or epilepsy,] the whole assembly was immediately dissolved; whence that disease is called morbus comitalis. After the custom of giving their votes vivâ voce had been abolished, every one of the assembly, in the enacting of a law, was presented with two ballots, on one of which were the letters U. R. that is, uti rogas, [be it as you request:] on the other was an A, that is, antiquo, which bears the same meaning as antiquam volo, [I am for the old law. I vote against the new.] If the number of ballots with U. R. was superior to the A's, the law was approved constitutionally; if not it was rejected. Only the chief magistrates, and sometimes the pontifices, had the privilege of convening these assemblies. [The pontifex maximus is thought to have held the comitia for creating a rex sacrorum, but this is not certain.]

COMMŌDUS, (L. Aurelius Antonius), son of M. Antoninus, succeeded his father in the Roman empire [A. D. 180.] He was naturally cruel, fond of indulging his licentious propensities, and regardless of the instruction of philosophers and of the decencies of nature. Desirous to be called Hercules, like that hero, he adorned his shoulders with a lion's skin, and armed his hand with a knotted club. He showed himself naked in public, and fought with the gladiators, and boasted of his dexterity in killing the wild beasts in the amphitheatre. He required divine honours from the senate, and they were granted. He was wont to put such an immense quantity of gold dust in his hair, that when he appeared bare-headed in the sun-shine, his head glittered as if surrounded with sun-beams. Martia, one of his concubines, whose death he had prepared, poisoned him; but as the poison did not quickly operate, he was strangled by a wrestler. He died in the 31st year of his age, and the 13th of his reign, A. D. 192. It has been observed that he never trusted himself to a barber, but always burnt his beard, in imitation of the tyrant Dionysius. Herodian.

COMPITALIA, festivals celebrated by the Romans [on the 2d of May] in the cross-ways, in honour of the household gods, called Lares. Tarquin the proud, or, according to some, Servius Tullius, instituted them, on account of an oracle which ordered him to offer heads to the Lares. He sacrificed to them human victims; but J. Brutus, after the expulsion of the Tarquins, thought it sufficient to offer them only poppy heads and men of straw. The slaves were generally the ministers, and during the celebration they enjoyed their freedom. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 140.—Dionys. Hal. 4.

COMUM, now Como, [a town of Gallia Transpadana, at the southern extremity of the Lacus Larius, or Lake of Como. It was founded by the Gauls, became afterwards a Roman colony, and was enlarged by Scipio. Julius Cæsar established Greeks in it, and changed its name to Neo-Comum, but upon their departure, it lost this, and resumed its former appellation. It is now Como, and was the birth-place of the younger Pliny.] Plin. 3, c. 18.—Liv. 33, c. 36 and 37.—Suet. in Jul. 28.—Plin. 1, ep. 3.—Cic. Fam. 13, ep. 35.

COMUS, the god of revelry, feasting, and nocturnal entertainments. During his festivals, men and women exchanged each other's dress. He was represented as a young and drunken man, with a garland of flowers on his head and a torch in his hand, which seemed falling. He is more generally seen sleeping upon his legs, and turning himself when the heat of the falling torch scorched his side. Phil. 2, Icon.—Plut. Quest. Rom.

CONCANI, a people of Spain, [among the Cantabri. Their chief beverage was horse's blood.] Virg. G. 3, v. 463.—Sil. 3, v. 361.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 34.

CONCORDIA, the goddess of peace and concord at Rome, to whom Camillus first raised a temple in the capitol, where the magistrates often assembled for the transaction of public business. She had, besides this, other temples and statues, and was addressed to promote the peace and union of families and citizens. Plut. in Camil.—Plin. 33, c. 1.—Cic. pro Domo.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 639, l. 6, v. 637.

CONDATE, a town of Gaul, now Rennes (Rhedonum urbs) in Brittany. [There were many others of the same name in Gaul. Among them may be enumerated what are now Condat.—Cône.—Coignac.—Condé-sur-Iton.]

CONDIVIENUM, a town of Gaul, now Nantes in Brittany. [vid. Namnetes.]

CONDOCHATES, a river of India, flowing into the Ganges. [According to D'Anville, the Kandak, or, according to the orthography of Mannert, the Gunduk. It falls into the Ganges opposite Patna.]

CONDRŪSI, [a people of Gallia Belgica. Their country answers now to the district of Condros, in the Bishopric of Liege.] Cæs. Bell. G. 4, c. 6.

CONFLUENTES, a town at the confluence of the Moselle and Rhine, now Coblentz. This town, in the time of the Romans, was the station of the first legion; and afterwards it became the residence of the successors of Charlemagne.]

CONFUCIUS, [or Kong-fu-tse, a celebrated Chinese philosopher of imperial descent, born about four centuries and a half before Christ, and contemporary with Pythagoras.]

CONIACI, a people of Spain, at the sources of the Iberus. Strab. 3.

CONIMERICA, [a town of Lusitania, near the sea-coast, on the river Munda, now Cóimbra of Portugal.]

CONISALTUS, a god worshipped at Athens, with the same ceremonies as Priapus at Lampsacus. Strab. 3.

CONNIDAS, the preceptor of Theseus, in whose honour the Athenians instituted a festival called Connideia. It was then usual to sacrifice to him a ram. Plut. in These.

CONON, a famous general of Athens, son of Timotheus. He was made governor of all the islands of the Athenians, and was defeated in a naval battle by Lysander near the Egeospotamos, [on the coast of the Thracian Chersonese.] He retired in voluntary banishment to Evagoras king of Cyprus, and afterwards to Artaxerxes king of Persia, by whose assistance he freed his country from slavery. He defeated the Spartans near Cnidus, in an engagement where Pisander, the enemy's admiral, was killed. By his means the Athenians fortified their city with a strong wall, [and were bidding fair, under his guidance, to recover their former power, when with their wonted fickleness they accused him of a misapplication of the money received by him from the king of Persia, and of other crimes for which there was not apparently the slightest foundation. He died in prison, having been murdered, as is generally supposed.] C. Nep. in vitâ.—Plut. in Lys. & Artax.—Isocrates.—A Greek astronomer of Samos. He was intimate with Archimedes, and flourished 247 B. C. [He gave the name to the constellation called Coma Berenices. He invented a spiral, the properties of which were demonstrated by Archimedes, whence it has obtained the name of the latter. Archimedes held him in high estimation.] Catul. 67.—Virg. Ecl. 3, v. 40.—A Grecian mythologist, in the age of Julius Cæsar, who wrote a book which contained 40 fables, still extant, preserved by Photius.

CONSENTES, the name which the Romans gave to the twelve superior gods, the Dii majorum gentium. The word signifies as much as consentientes, that is, who consented to the deliberations of Jupiter's council. They were twelve in number, whose names Ennius has briefly expressed in these lines:

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovi, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo.

[In ancient inscriptions they are thus marked: J. O. M. (i. e. Jovi optimo maximo) CETERIS. DIS CONSENTIBUS.]

CONSENTIA, now Cosenza, a town in the country of the Brutii, [on the Mare Tyrrhæum.] Liv. 8, c. 24, l. 28, c. 11.—Cic. Fin. 1, c. 3.

CONSTANS, a son of Constantine. vid. Constantinus.

CONSTANTIA, a grand-daughter of the great Constantine, who married the emperor Gratian.

CONSTANTINA, a princess, wife of the emperor Gallus.

CONSTANTINOPŌLIS, [vid. Byzantium.]

CONSTANTINUS, surnamed the Great, from the greatness of his exploits, was son of Constantius. As soon as he became independent he assumed the title of Augustus, and made war against Licinius, his brother-in-law, and colleague on the throne, because he was cruel and ambitious. He conquered him, and obliged him to lay aside the imperial power. It is said that as he was going to fight against Maxentius, one of his rivals, he saw a cross in the sky, with this inscription, in cruce via, in hoc vince. [Eusebius, from whom this account is taken, adds that Constantine was instructed on the following night by a vision of Christ himself, bearing his cross, and directing him to make a similar standard under which he should march to victory. In the morning Constantine communicated this vision to his friends, and sending for ingenious workmen, caused them to form in gold and precious stones a representation of the sign which he had seen. This was placed upon the imperial standard. vid. Labarum. Constantine, in consequence, became a Christian. Dr. Lardner very properly doubts the whole story.] After the death of Diocletian, Maximian, Maxentius, Maximinus, and Licinius, who had reigned together, though in a subordinate manner, Constantine became sole emperor, and began to reform the state. He founded a city in a most eligible situation, where old Byzantium formerly stood, and called it by his own name, Constantinopolis. Thither he transported part of the Roman senate; and by keeping his court there, he made it the rival of Rome in population and magnificence. From that time the two imperial cities began to look upon each other with an eye of envy; and soon after the age of Constantine, a separation was made of the two empires, and Rome was called the capital of the western, and Constantinopolis was called the capital of the eastern dominions of Rome. The emperor has been distinguished for personal courage, and praised for the protection he extended to the Christians. He at first persecuted the Arians, but afterwards inclined to their opinions. His murder of his son Crispus has been deservedly censured. By removing the Roman legions from the garrisons on the rivers, he opened an easy passage to the barbarians, and rendered his soldiers unwarlike. He defeated 100,000 Goths, and received into his territories 300,000 Sarmatians, who had been banished by their slaves, and allowed them land to cultivate. Constantine was learned, and preached, as well as composed, many sermons, one of which remains. He died A. D. 337, after a reign of 31 years of the greatest glory and success. He left three sons, Constantinus, Constans, and Constantius, among whom he divided his empire. The first, who had Gaul, Spain, and Britain for his portion, was conquered by the armies of his brother Constans, and killed in the 26th year of his age, A. D. 340. Magnentius, the governor of the provinces of Rhætia, murdered Constans in his bed, after a reign of 13 years over Italy, Africa, and Illyricum; and Constantius, the only surviving brother, now became the sole emperor, A. D. 353, punished his brother's murderer, and gave way to cruelty and oppression. He visited Rome, where he displayed a triumph, and died in his march against Julian, who had been proclaimed independent emperor by his soldiers.—The name of Constantine was very common to the emperors of the east in a later period.—A private soldier in Britain, raised on account of his name to the imperial dignity.

CONSTANTIUS CHLORUS, son of Eutropius, and father of the great Constantine, merited the title of Cæsar, which he obtained by his victories in Britain and Germany. He became the colleague of Galerius, on the abdication of Diocletian; and after bearing the character of a humane and benevolent prince, he died at York, and made his son his successor, A. D. 306.—The second son of Constantine the Great. vid. Constantinus.—The father of Julian and Gallus, was son of Constantius by Theodora, and died A. D. 337.—A Roman general of Nyssa, who married Placidia, the sister of Honorius, and was proclaimed emperor, an honour he enjoyed only seven months. He died universally regretted, 421 A. D. and was succeeded by his son Valentinian in the west.

CONSULES LUDI or CONSUALIA, festivals at Rome in honour of CONSUM, the god of counsel, whose altar Romulus discovered under the ground. This altar was always covered except at the festival, when a mule was sacrificed, and games and horse-races exhibited in honour of Neptune. It was during these festivals that Romulus carried away the Sabine women who had assembled to be spectators of the games. They were first instituted by Romulus. Some say, however, that Romulus only regulated and re-instituted them after they had been before established by Evander. During the celebration, which happened about the middle of August, horses, mules, and asses, were exempted from all labours, and were led through the streets adorned with garlands and flowers. Juson. 69, v. 9.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 199.—Liv. 1, c. 9.—Dionys. Hal.

CONSUL, a magistrate at Rome, with regal authority for the space of one year. There were two consuls, a consulendo, annually chosen in the Campus Martius. The two first consuls were L. Jun. Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, chosen A. U. C. 244, after the expulsion of the Tarquins. In the first ages of the republic, the two consuls were always chosen from patrician families, or noblemen; but the people obtained the privilege, A. U. C. 388, of electing one of the consuls from their own body; and sometimes both were plebeians. The first consul among the plebeians was L. Sextius. It was required that every candidate for the consulship should be 43 years of age, called legitimum tempus. He was always to appear at the election as a private man, without a retinue; and it was requisite, before he canvassed for the office, to have discharged the inferior functions of quæstor, ædile, and prætor. [Sometimes these qualifications were disregarded. Val. Corvus was made a consul in his 23d year, Scipio Africanus the elder, in his 28th, and the younger, at 38. T. Q. Flaminius, when not quite 30; Pompey, before he was full 36. The consuls were at the head of the whole republic; all the other magistrates were subject to them, except the Tribunes of the commons. They assembled the people and senate, laid before them what they pleased, and executed their decrees. The laws which they proposed and got passed were usually called by their name. They received all letters from the governors of provinces, and from foreign kings and states, and gave audience to ambassadors. The year was named after them, as it used to be at Athens from one of the Archons. Their insignia were the same with those of the kings, (excepting the crown,) namely, the toga pretextata, sella curulis, the sceptre or ivory staff, and 12 lictors with the fascēs and securis. Within the city, the lictors went before only one of the consuls, and that commonly for a month alternately. A public servant, called accensus, went before the other consul, and the lictors followed. He who was eldest, or had most children, or who was first elected, or had most suffrages, had the fascēs first. When the consuls commanded different armies, each of them had the fascēs and securis, but when they both commanded the same army they commonly had them for a day alternately. Valerius Poplicola took away the securis from the fascēs, i. e. he took from the consuls the power of life and death, and only left them the right of scourging. Out of the city, however, when invested with military command, they retained the securis, i. e. the right of punishing capitally.] This office lasted from the year of Rome 244 till the year 1294, or 541st year of the christian era, when it was totally suppressed by Justinian. [Their provinces used anciently to be decreed by the senate after the consuls were elected or had entered on their office. But by the Sempronian law, passed A. U. C. 631, the senate always decreed two provinces to the future consuls before their election, which they, after entering upon their office, divided by lot or agreement. Sometimes a certain province was assigned to some one of the consuls, both by the senate and people, and sometimes again the people reversed what the senate had decreed respecting the provinces. vid. Marius and Sylla.] They were not permitted to return to Rome without the special command of the senate, and they always remained in the province till the arrival of their successor. At their return they harangued the people, and solemnly protested that they had done nothing against the laws or interest of their country, but had faithfully and diligently endeavoured to promote the greatness and welfare of the state. No man could be consul two following years; [an interval of 10 years must have elapsed previous to the second application;] yet this institution was sometimes broken; and we find Marius re-elected consul after the expiration of his office, during the Cimbric war. The office of consul, so dignified during the times of the commonwealth, became a mere title under the emperors, and retained nothing of its authority but the useless ensigns of original dignity. [In retaining the badges of the ancient consuls, they indulged in even greater pomp; for they wore the toga picta or palmata, and had their fascēs wreathed with laurel, which used formerly to be done only by those who triumphed.] They also added the securis to the fascēs.] Even the office of consul, which was originally annual, was reduced to two or three months by J. Cæsar; but they who were admitted on the first of January denominated the year, and were called ordinarii. Their successors, during the year, were distinguished by the name of suffecti. Tiberius and Claudius abridged the time of the consulship, and the emperor Commodus made no less than 25 consuls in one year. Constantine the Great renewed the original institution, and permitted them to remain a whole year in office.—Here follows a list of the consuls, from the establishment of the consular power to the battle of Actium, when the consular office virtually ceased.

The two first consuls chosen about the middle of June, A. U. C. 244, were L. Jun. Brutus, and L. Tarq. Collatinus. Collatinus retired from Rome as being of the family of the Tarquins, and Pub. Valerius was chosen in his room. When Brutus was killed in battle, Sp. Lucretius was elected to succeed him; and after the death of Lucretius, Marcus Horatius was chosen for the rest of the year with Valerius Publicola. The first consulship lasted about 16 months, during which the Romans fought against the Tarquins, and the capitol was dedicated.

A. U. C. 246. Pub. Valerius Publicola 2. Tit. Lucretius. Porsenna supported the claims of Tarquin. The noble actions of Cicles, Scævola, and Clœlia.

247. P. Lucretius, or M. Horatius; P. Valer. Publicola 3. The vain efforts of Porsenna continued.

Consus, a deity at Rome, who presided over councils. His temple was covered in the Maximus Circus, to show that counsels ought to be secret and inviolable. Some suppose that he is the same as Neptunus Equestris. Romulus instituted festivals to his honour, called Consualia, during the celebration of which the Romans carried away the Sabine women. (vid. Consuales ludi.) Plut. in Rom.—Auson. 69, and eleg. de far. R. 19—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

COPÆ, [a town of Bœotia, on the northern bank of the Lacus Copais, to which it gave name. According to Pliny, cars were invented at this place.]

COPÆIS LACUS, [a lake of Bœotia, called sometimes Haliartos Lacus, from Haliartos, on its southern bank. It was formed principally by the Cephissus. Its present name is given by some as Livadia Limne, by others Lago di Topoghia. It was 360 stadia, or 143 leagues in circumference, and received the rivers which flowed from the mountains by which Bœotia was surrounded. According to Strabo there was a subterranean passage under Mount Ptous, connecting this lake with the sea; it had been formed by an earthquake, and prevented the lake from gaining upon the adjacent country. Diodorus informs us that the lake itself was produced by Hercules having stopped up this outlet, by which the river Cephissus was prevented from falling into the sea, and the neighbouring fields were inundated. The existence of such a passage appears altogether fabulous. The opinion that there was one seems to have arisen from the circumstance of there being a deep cavern near Copæ, and also from springs breaking forth on the other side of the mountain. An attempt to cleanse this imaginary canal was made in Alexander's time, but soon abandoned. Wheeler, in modern times, pretended to have discovered this passage; his error arose, however, from his having mistaken the mouth of a small stream for that of the Cephissus.]

COPHES or COPHENES, [a river of India, supposed by Rennel to be modern Cow.]

COPIA, the goddess of plenty among the Romans, represented as bearing a horn filled with grapes, fruits, &c.

COPRATES, a river of Asia falling into the Tigris. Diod. 9.

COPTUS and COPROS, now Kypt, a town of Egypt, about 100 leagues from Alexandria, on a canal which communicates with the Nile. [It was the centre of communication between Egypt and the Red Sea, by a north-east route to Myos-hormos, and by a south-east course to Berenice; which last place was the staple of the trade with India. According to Plutarch, Isis, upon receiving the news of the death of Osiris, cut off here one of her locks in token of her grief, and hence the place was called Coptos, which signified in the Egyptian language, want or privation. Plut. de Isid. et Os.—Plin. 5, c. 9, l. 6, c. 23.—Strab. 16.—Jur. 15, v. 23.

CORACESIUM and CORACENSIVM, a maritime town of Pamphylia, [where Pompey vanquished the pirates. It is now Anahich.] Liv. 33, c. 20.

CORALLI, a savage people [of Sarmatia Europæa, who inhabited the shores of the Euxine, near the Danube.] Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 2, v. 37.

CORBULO, Domitius, [a celebrated Roman commander, famous for his rigid observance of military discipline, and for the success of his arms, especially against the Parthians. On account of his great reputation, he became an object of jealousy and suspicion to Nero, who recalled him, under pretence of rewarding his merit. When Corbulo reached Corinth he met there an order to die. Reflecting on his own want of prudence and foresight, he fell upon his sword, exclaiming. I have well deserved this! A. D. 66.] His name was given to a place (Monumentum) in Germany, which some suppose to be modern Groningen. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 18.

CORCYRA, now Corfu, an island in the Ionian sea, about 12 miles from Buthrotum, on the coast of Epirus; famous for the shipwreck of Ulysses, and the gardens of Alcinoüs. [Its more ancient names were Drepane and Scheria. The island is said to have been first inhabited by the Phæaces, or Phæacians. It is 45 miles in length, 22 in breadth, and 210 in compass. The southern parts are barren, mountainous, and ill provided with water, but the northern coast is very fertile in all sorts of delicious fruits, in excellent wines, olives, grain, &c. Homer calls it the fruitful, and celebrates the gardens of Alcinoüs. It had anciently two cities, both of note: Corcyra the capital, and Cassiope. For an account of the war of the Corcyreans with the Corinthians, vid. Peloponnesiacum Bellum.] Some Corinthians, with Chersicrates at their head, came to settle here, when banished from their country, 756 years before the christian era. A colony of Colchis had settled here 1349 years before Christ. Ovid. Ib. 512.—Homer. Od. 5, &c.—Lucan. 9, v. 32.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 6.

CORE, the same as Proserpine, [from the Greek, κορη, puella.] Festivals, called Coreia, were instituted to her honour in Greece.

CORFINIUM, the capital of the Peligni, three miles from the Aturnus, which falls into the Adriatic, [now Santo Pelino. It was the capital of the Italian allies during the social war, and the place where their senate met.] Cæs. Civ. 1, c. 16.—Lucan. 2, v. 478.—Sil. 5, v. 522.

CORINNA, a celebrated woman of Tanagra, near Thebes, disciple to Myrtis. Her father's name was Archelodorus. It is said that she obtained five times a poetical prize, in which Pindar was her competitor; but it must be acknowledged, that her beauty greatly contributed to defeat her rivals. She had composed 50 books of epigrams and odes, of which only some few verses remain. Propert. 2, el. 3.—Paus. 9, c. 22.

CORINNUS, an ancient poet in the time of the Trojan war, on which he wrote a poem. Homer, as some suppose, took his subject from the poem of Corinnus.

CORINTHUS, an ancient city of Greece, now called Corinto, situated on the middle of the Isthmus of Corinth. [The isthmus itself is now called Ilxamili, being 6 modern Greek, or not 5 British miles in breadth.] It was first founded by Sisyphus a son of Æolus, A. M. 2616, and received its name from Corinthus the son of Pelops. [Corinth appears to have been of Pelagic origin, and to have been first called Ephyre. In the language of fable, Ephyre was the name of one of the daughters of Oceanus, and a descendant of her's, called Corinthus, gave its second appellation to the city. Before the Trojan war it was ruled by Argive princes from Mycenæ, and after the termination of that contest, was seized by the Dorians. The government was monarchical until 779 B. C. when officers, termed Prytanes, were instituted. The situation of Corinth was admirably adapted for commerce. It lay on the Corinthian and Saronic gulphs, and hence was called Bimaris, having the harbour of Lechaëum on the former, and that of Cenchræa on the latter. There was also a third, but smaller, harbour on the Saronic gulph, called Schœnus. Hence the isthmus was narrowest, and small vessels were accustomed to be conveyed across on machines. In this place also was the attempt made to cut a canal through from sea to sea. (vid. Corinthi isthmus.) By reason of its favourable position, Corinth became a staple to all northern and southern Greece for wares transported by land-conveyance, and a central point for the trade of Asia, Italy, and Illyricum. To the Corinthians is also to be ascribed the invention of triremes, or, vessels with three banks of oars. Their power by sea, however, gradually yielded to that of Corcyra and Athens.] They colonized Syracuse in Sicily, and delivered it from the tyranny of its oppressors, by the means of Timoleon. Corinth was totally destroyed by L. Mummius, the Roman consul, and burnt to the ground, 146 B. C. [The true cause of its destruction was its having joined the Achæan league, although the ostensible one was an insult offered to the Roman ambassadors by the inhabitants.] The riches which the Romans found there were immense. During the conflagration, all the metals, as is said, which were in the city melted and mixed together, and formed that valuable composition of metals which has since been known by the name of Corinthium Æs. This, however, appears improbable; especially when it is remembered that the artists of Corinth made a mixture of copper, with small quantities of gold and silver, and so brilliant was the composition, that the appellation of Corinthian brass afterwards stamped an extraordinary value on pieces of inferior worth. [Klaproth also rejects the common opinion respecting the origin of the Corinthian brass. He seems to think, and adduces the authority of Pliny in his favour, that it was merely a term of art, and applied to a metallic mixture in high estimation among the Romans, and though of a superior quality, nearly resembling aurichalcum. This last was composed of either copper and zinc, or of copper, tin, and lead, the former of a pale yellow, the latter of a darker colour resembling gold. The mixture by means of calamine was rendered tough and malleable.] There was there a famous temple of Venus where lascivious women resorted, and sold their pleasures so dear, that many of their lovers were reduced to poverty; whence the proverb of

to show that all voluptuous indulgences are attended with much expense. J. Cæsar planted a colony at Corinth, and endeavoured to raise it from its ruins, and restore it to its former grandeur. [It is mentioned by Plutarch as a singular coincidence that Corinth and Carthage were destroyed the same year, rebuilt and re-peopled at the same time, and both by the same individual, Julius Cæsar. Corinth after this became the capital of the province of Achaia.] The war which has received the name of Corinthian war, because the battles were fought in the neighbourhood of Corinth, was begun B. C. 395, by the combination of the Athenians, Thebans, Corinthians, and Argives, against Lacedæmon. Pissander and Agesilaus distinguished themselves in that war; the former, on the first year of hostilities, was defeated with the Lacedæmonian fleet, by Conon, near Cnidus; while a few days after Agesilaus slaughtered 10,000 of the enemy. The most famous battles were fought at Leuctra and Mantinea; but Agesilaus refused to besiege Corinth, lamenting that the Greeks, instead of destroying one another, did not turn their arms against the Persian power. Martial. 9, ep. 53.—Sueton. [CORINTHI ISTHMUS, or, Isthmus of Corinth, between the Saronicus Sinus and Corinthiacus Sinus, and uniting the Peloponnesus to the northern parts of Greece or Græcia Propria. It is now called Hexamili, being 6 modern Greek, or not 5 British miles in breadth. Nero attempted to cut it through, and persisted, in spite of the idle tales propagated by the superstitious, until, in 75 days, he had completed 4 stadia, or about a tenth part of the whole breadth. He is said to have stopped in the midst of the work, on account of an alarm of disturbances at Rome. According to others he was terrified, and induced to desist from the report made by some Egyptian mathematicians, who pretended that the waters of the Ionian sea were higher than those of the Ægean, and that if the communication were cut, the island of Ægina, and the low lands on the side of the Ægean sea would be overflowed and destroyed.]

[CORINTHIACUS SINUS, or Gulf of Lepanto, an arm of the sea, running in between the coast of Achaia and Sycionia to the south, and that of Phocis, Locris, and Ætolia to the north. The Sinus Corinthiacus properly commenced from the mouth of the Achelous on the outside of the promontories of Rhium and Antirrhium, and extended inwards. It was in this anterior part of the gulf and not under Lepanto, (the ancient Naupactus,) that the Ottoman fleet was defeated by that of the Christians in 1571.]

CORIOLANUS, the surname of C. Martius, from his victory over Corioli, where, from a private soldier, he gained the amplest honours. When master of the place, he accepted as the only reward, the surname of Coriolanus, a horse, and prisoners, and his ancient host, to whom he immediately gave his liberty. After a number of military exploits, and many services to his country, he was refused the consulship by the people, when his scars had for a while influenced them in his favour. This raised his resentment; and when the Romans had received a present of corn from Gelo king of Sicily, Coriolanus insisted that it should be sold for money, and not be given gratis. Upon this the tribunes raised the people against him for his imprudent advice, and even wished him to be put to death. This rigorous sentence was stopped by the influence of the senators, and Coriolanus submitted to a trial. He was banished by a majority of three tribes, and he immediately retired among the Volsci, to Tullus Aufidius, his greatest enemy, from whom he met a most friendly reception. He advised him to make war against Rome, and he marched at the head of the Volsci as general. The approach of Coriolanus greatly alarmed the Romans, who sent him several embassies to reconcile him to his country, and to solicit his return. He was deaf to all proposals, and bade them prepare for war. He pitched his camp only at the distance of five miles from the city; and his enmity against his country would have been fatal, had not his mother Volumnia and his wife Vergilia been prevailed upon by the Roman matrons to go and appease his resentment. The meeting of Coriolanus with his family was tender and affecting. He remained long inexorable; but at last the tears and entreaties of a mother and a wife prevailed over the stern and obstinate resolutions of an enemy, and Coriolanus marched the Volsci from the neighbourhood of Rome. To show their sense of Volturnia's merit and patriotism, the Romans dedicated a temple to Female Fortune. The behaviour of Coriolanus, however, displeased the Volsci. He was summoned to appear before the people of Antium; but the clamours which his enemies raised were so prevalent, that he was murdered on the place appointed for his trial, B. C. 488. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by the Volsci, and the Roman matrons put on mourning for his loss. Some historians say that he died in exile, in an advanced old age. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 2, c. 22.

CORIOLI and CORIOLLA, a town of Latium, on the borders of the Volsci, taken by the Romans under C. Marius, called from thence Coriolanus. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Plut.—Liv. 2, c. 33.

CORNELIA LEX, de Judiciis, enacted A. U. C. 670, by L. Corn. Sylla. It ordained that the prætor should always observe the same invariable method in judicial proceedings, and that the process should not depend upon his will.—Another, de Sumptibus, by the same. It limited the expenses which generally attended funerals.—Another, de Religione, by the same, A. U. C. 677. It restored to the college of priests the privilege of choosing the priests, which, by the Domitian law, had been lodged in the hands of the people.—Another, de Municipiis, by the same; [that the free towns which had sided with Marius should be deprived of their lands and the right of citizens; the last of which Cicero says could not be done. Pro Dom. 30.—Cæcin. 33.]—Another, de Magistratibus, by the same; which gave the power of bearing honours and being promoted before the legal age, to those who had followed the interest of Sylla, while the sons and partisans of his enemies, who had been proscribed, were deprived of the privilege of standing for any office of the state.—Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A. U. C. 673. It ordained that no person should exercise the same office within ten years distance, or be invested with two different magistracies in one year; [and that no one should be prætor before being quæstor, nor consul before being prætor.]—Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A. U. C. 673. It divested the tribunes of the privilege of making laws, interfering, holding assemblies, and receiving appeals. All such as had been tribunes were incapable of holding any other office in the state by that law.—Another, de Majestate, by the same, A. U. C. 670. It made it treason to send an army out of a province, or engage in a war without orders, to influence the soldiers to spare or ransom a captive general of the enemy, to pardon the leaders of robbers or pirates, or for the absence of a Roman citizen, to a foreign court without previous leave. The punishment was aquæ & ignis interdictio.—Another, by the same, which gave the power to a man accused of murder, either by poison, weapons, or false accusations, and the setting fire to buildings, to choose whether the jury that tried him should give their verdict clam or palam by ballots.—Another, by the same, which made it aquæ & ignis interdictio to such as were guilty of forgery, concealing and altering of wills, corruptions, false accusations, and the debasing or counterfeiting of the public coin; all such as were accessory to this offence were deemed as guilty as the offender.—Another, de pecuniis repetundis, by which a man convicted of peculation or extortion in the provinces, was condemned to suffer the aquæ & ignis interdictio.—Another by the same, which gave the power to such as were sent into the provinces with any government, of retaining their command and appointment, without a renewal of it by the senate, as was before observed.—Another by the same, which ordained that the lands of proscribed persons should be common, especially those about Volaterræ and Fesulæ in Etruria, which Sylla divided among his soldiers.—Another by C. Cornelius, tribune of the people, A. U. C. 686; which ordained that no person should be exempted from any law, according to the general custom, unless 200 senators were present in the senate; and no person thus exempted, could hinder the bill of his exemption from being carried to the people for their concurrence.—Another by Nasica, A. U. C. 582, to make war against Perseus, son of Philip, king of Macedonia, if he did not give proper satisfaction to the Roman people.

CORNELIA, a daughter of Cinna, who was the first wife of J. Cæsar. She became mother of Julia, Pompey's wife, and was so affectionately loved by her husband, that at her death he pronounced a funeral oration over her body. Plut. in Cæs.—A daughter of Metellus Scipio, who married Pompey, after the death of her husband P. Crassus. She has been praised for her great virtues. When her husband left her in the bay of Alexandria, to go on shore in a small boat, she saw him stabbed by Achilles, and heard his dying groans without the possibility of aiding him. She attributed all his misfortunes to his connection with her. Plut. in Pomp.—A daughter of Scipio Africanus, who married Sempronius Gracchus, and was mother of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus. She was courted by a king; but she preferred being the wife of a Roman citizen to that of a monarch. Her virtues have been deservedly commended, as well as the wholesome principles she inculcated in her two sons. When a Campanian lady made once a show of her jewels at Cornelia's house, and entreated her to favour her with a sight of her own, Cornelia pre-duced her two sons, saying, these are the only jewels of which I can boast. [She is said to have reproached her sons in their youth, that they had not rendered her illustrious as the mother of the Gracchi; and after their untimely death, she replied to one who would have condoled with her on their account, "that the woman who had given birth to the Gracchi could not be deemed unfortunate." After her decease, the Romans erected a statue to her memory, with this inscription, "To Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi."'] Some of her epistles are preserved. Plut. in Gracch.—Juv. 6, v. 167.—*Val. CORNELII, an illustrious family at Rome, of whom the most distinguished were, Caius Cornelius, a soothsayer of Padua, who foretold the beginning and issue of the battle of Pharsalia.—Cossus, a military tribune during the time that there were no consuls in the republic. He offered to Jupiter the spoils called Opima, [after having slain Lar Tolumnius, king of the Veientes, A. U. C. 318.] Liv. 4, c. 19.—Balbus, a man of Gades, intimate with Cicero, whom he ably defended when accused.—Gallus, an elegiac poet. vid. Gallus.—C. Nepos, an historian. *vid. His grandson followed the interest of Sylla; and when Marius entered the city, he killed himself, by opening his veins.—Severus, an epic poet in the age of Augustus, of great genius. He wrote a poem on mount Ætna, and on the death of Cicero. Quintil. 10, v. 1.—Aur. Celsus, wrote eight books on medicine, still extant, and highly valued.—Cn. and Publ. Scipio. *vid. CORNICULUM, a town of Latium. Dionys. Hal.

CORNIFICIUS, a poet and general in the age of Augustus, employed to accuse Brutus, &c. His sister Cornificia, was also blessed with a poetical genius. Plut. in Brut.—A friend of Cicero, and his colleague in the office of augur.

CORNIGER, a surname of Bacchus.

CORNÛTUS, a stoic philosopher of Africa,ceptor to Persius the satirist. He wrote some treatises on philosophy and rhetoric, Pers. 5, v. 36.—A Roman saved from the proscription of Marius, by his servants, who hung up a dead man in his room, and said it was their master. Plut. in Mario.

CORÆBUS, a Phrygian, son of Mygdon and Anaximena. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, with the hopes of being rewarded with the hand of Cassandra for his services. Cassandra advised him in vain to retire from the war. He was killed by Peneleus. Paus. 10, c. 27.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 341, &c.—A courier of Elias, killed by Neoptolemus. He obtained a prize at Olympia, B. C. 776; [from which time the regular dates of the Olympiads begin. vid. Olympias.] Paus. 5, c. 8.—A hero of Argolis, who killed a serpent called Pœne, sent by Apollo to avenge Argos, and placed by some authors in the number of the furies. His country was afflicted with the plague, and he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which commanded him to build a temple, where a tripod, which was given him, should fall from his hand. Paus. 1, v. 43.

[CORONE, a city of Messenia, on the western shore of the Sinus Messeniacus. It is now Coron, and the gulf is called after it, the Gulf of Coron. Its original name was Æpeia; but Epimelides leading a colony to it from Coronea in Bœotia, changed its name to Corone, after his native town. The harbour of this city was called "the port of the Achæans."']

CORONÆA, a town of Bœotia, where, in the first year of the Corinthian war, Agesilaus defeated the allied forces of Athens, Thebes, Corinth and Argos, B. C. 394. [It was situate to the south-east of Cheronæa, on a branch of the Cephissus, and not far to the south-west of the temple of Minerva Itonia, where the states of Bœotia were accustomed to assemble.] C. Nep. in Ages.—Paus. 9, c. 34.—Dioid. 12.—A town of Cyprus—of Phthiotis.

CORONIS, a daughter of Phlegias, loved by Apollo. She became pregnant by her lover, who killed her on account of her criminal partiality to Ischys the Thessalian. According to some, Diana killed her, for her infidelity to her brother, and Mercury saved the child from her womb as she was on the burning pile. Others say, that she brought forth her son, and exposed him near Epidaurus to avoid her father's resentment; and they farther mention, that Apollo had set a crow to watch her behaviour. The child was preserved, and called Æsculapius; and the mother, after death, received divine honours, and had a statue at Sicyon, in her son's temple, which was never exposed to public view. Paus. 2, c. 26.—The daughter of Coronæus, king of Phocis, changed into a crow by Minerva, when flying before Neptune. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 543.

CORSI, a people [who inhabited the northern part] of Sardinia, descended from the Corsicans.

CORSICA, an island of the Mediterranean, called by the Greeks Κέρκος. Its inhabitants were styled by the same people Κέρκοιοι, by the Latins, Corsi. The ancient writers represent it as mountainous, woody, and well cultivated only along the eastern coast, where the Romans had settlements. Its natural products were resin, honey, and wax. The honey, however, had a bitter taste, in consequence of the bees deriving it from the yew trees with which the island abounded. The inhabitants were a rude race of mountaineers, indebted for their subsistence more to the produce of their flocks than to the cultivation of the soil. Seneca, who was banished to this island in the reign of Claudius, draws a very unfavourable picture of the island and its inhabitants; describing the former as rocky, unproductive, and unhealthy, and the latter as the worst of barbarians. He writes, however, under the influence of prejudiced feelings, and many allowances must be made. The Corsi appear to have derived their origin from Ligurian and Iberian (called by Seneca, Spanish,) tribes. Eustathius says that a Ligurian female, named Corsa, having pursued in a small boat a bull which had taken to the water, accidentally discovered the island, which her countrymen named after her. The Phocæans, on retiring from Asia, settled here for a time, and founded the city Aleria, but were driven out finally by the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians. The Romans took the island from this latter people B. C. 231, and subsequently two colonies were sent to it; one by Marius, which founded Mariana, and another by Sylla, which settled on the site of Aleria. Mantinorum Oppidum, in the same island, is now Bastia; and Urcinium, Ajaccio, the birth-place of Napoleon. Senec. de Cons. c. 6, 8.—Eustath. ad Dionys. v. 458.—Virg. Ecl. 9, v. 30.]

CORSÏE, [a city of Mesopotamia, on the river Masca. D'Anville places it at the confluence of the Masca and Euphrates. The Masca, according to Xenophon, flowed around the city in a circular course. Mannert supposes it to have been nothing more than a canal cut from the Euphrates. vid. Masca, where notice is taken of an error in D'Anville's chart. Xen. Anab. 1, 5.]

CORSÛRA, an island in the bay of Carthage.

CORTONA, [a town of Etruria, a short distance north-west of the Lacus Thrasymenus. It is thought to have been built on the ruins of an ancient town called Corythus. It is called by this name in Virgil. From the similarity of names, it has been supposed to owe its origin to Corythus the father of Dardanus. Others deduce the name from the circumstance of Dardanus having lost his helmet (Korymbos) there in fighting. Both, however, are pronounced by Heyne to be mere fables. (vid. Heyn. Excurs. 6, ad Æn. 3.) Perhaps the opinion most entitled to credit is that of Mannert, who makes the place to have been of Pelagic origin. This, in fact, is strongly corroborated by the massy remains of the ancient walls, evidently of Pelagic structure. The original name of the place, according to the same learned writer, was Croton, subsequently altered by the Romans to Cortona. Herodotus informs us that even in his time the Pelagic language prevailed here; he writes the name, however, erroneously, Creston. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who quotes the passage, rectifies the error. Herod. 1, 57.—Dionys. Hal. 1, p. 23.]—Liv. 9, c. 37, l. 22, c. 4.

CORVINUS, a name given to M. Valerius, from a crow, which assisted him when he was fighting against a Gaul.—Messala, an eloquent orator in the Augustan age, distinguished for integrity and patriotism, yet ridiculed for his frequent quotations of Greek in his orations. In his old age, he became so forgetful as not even to remember his own name.

T. CORUNCĀNUS, the first plebeian who was made high-priest at Rome.—The family of the Coruncani was famous for the number of great men which it supplied for the service and honour of the Roman republic. Cic. pro Domo.

CORUS, a river of Arabia, falling into the Red Sea. Herodot. 3, c. 9.

CORYBANTES, the priests of Cybele, called also Galli. In the celebration of their festivals, they beat their cymbals, and behaved as if delirious. They first inhabited on mount Ida, and from thence passed into Crete, and secretly brought up Jupiter. Some suppose that they receive their name from Corybas son of Jasus and Cybele, who first introduced the rights of his mother into Phrygia. There was a festival at Cnossus in Crete, called Corybantica, in commemoration of the Corybantes, who there educated Jupiter. [Some derive the name from their moving along in a kind of dance, and tossing the head to and fro, (απο του κορυπιου τας βασιμιν.)] Paus. 8, c. 37.—Diod. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 16.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 617, l. 10, v. 250.

CORÛBAS, a son of Jasus and Cybele. Diod. 5.

[CORYCIUM ANTRUM, a cave or grotto on Mount Parnassus, about 60 stadia from Delphi, on the ascent of the hill. The nymphs of this grotto were called Corycides, a name which is sometimes applied to the Muses. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 320.]

CORÛCUS, [a town of Cilicia Campestris, on the coast, south-east of Seleucia Trachea. Strabo merely terms it a promontory. In its vicinity was produced the best saffron of antiquity. The famous Corycian cave (different from the one mentioned in the preceding article,) was also situated near it, in the same valley which produced the saffron, about 20 stadia north of the town. This cave, according to the poets, was the residence of the monstrous Titan Typhon.] Horat. 2, Sat. 4, v. 68.—Lucan. 9, v. 809.—Plin. 5, c. 27.—Cic. ad Fam. 12, ep. 13.—Strab. 14.—[A promontory of Ionia, south-east of the southern extremity of Chios, now Cape Curco. It was a famous place of retreat for robbers.—A town of Lycia, south of Phaselis, on the eastern coast.]

CORYMBIFER, a surname of Bacchus, from his wearing a crown of corymbi, certain berries that grow on the ivy. Ovid. 1, Fast. v. 393.

CORYNËTA and CORYNETES, a famous robber, son of Vulcan, killed by Theseus. Plut. in These.

CORYPHASIUM, [a promontory on the western coast of Messenia, north of Methone, now Cape Zonchio. There was a town of the same name on it, to which the inhabitants of Pylos retired after their town was destroyed.] Paus. 4, c. 36.

CORYTUS, a king of Etruria, father to Jasius. [vid. Cortona.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 170, l. 7, v. 209.—Sil. 5, v. 123, l. 4, v. 721.

COS, [an island of the Ægean, one of the Sporades, west of the promontory of Doris. Its more ancient names were Merope, Cæa, Nymphæa, and Caris. It is now called Stau-Co. Its chief city was Astypalæa. From this island came both the substance and name of the whet-stone (Cos.) It produced Hippocrates, Apelles, Sisyphus, and others. The island was famous for its manufacture of a species of transparent silk stuff, against the use of which by the Romans Juvenal in particular so strongly inveighs.]

COSA and COSSA, or COSÆ, a town of Etruria, [near the coast, on the promontory of Mount Argentario, north-west of Centum Cellæ.] Virg. Æn. 10, v. 168.—Liv. 22, c. 11.—Cic. 9, Att. 6.—Cæs. B. C. 1, c. 3..

COSSEA, [vid. Cusseti.]

COSSUS, a surname given to the family of the Cornelli.—A Roman, who killed Volturnus, king of Veii, and obtained the Spolia Opima, A. U. C. 318. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 841.

COSUTII, a family at Rome, of which Cosutia, Cæsar's wife, was descended. Suet. in Cæs. 1.—One of the family was distinguished as an architect about 200 B. C. He first introduced into Italy the more perfect models of Greece.

COTES and COTTES, a promontory of Mauritania.

COTHON, a small island near the citidal of Carthage, with a convenient bay, which served for a dock-yard. [The term signifies an artificial port or harbour, and was pronounced by the Carthaginians "Kathum" or "Kathom."] Servius in Virg. Æn. 1, v. 431.—Diod. 3.

* COTISO, a king of the Daci whose army invaded Pannonia, and was defeated by Corn. Lentulus, the lieutenant of Augustus. It is said that Augustus solicited his daughter in marriage. Suet. in Aug. 63.—Horat. 3, od. 8, v. 18.

COTTA M. AURELIUS, a Roman who opposed Marius. He was consul with Lucullus; and when in Asia he was defeated by sea and land, by Mithridates. He was surnamed Ponticus, because he took Heraclea of Pontus by treachery. Plut. in Lucull.—An orator, greatly commended by Cicero de Orat.

COTTLE ALPES, [now Mont St. Genevre, generally, though erroneously, supposed to be the place where Annibal crossed into Italy. vid. Alpes. They took their name from Cottius, a Gallic prince, established in his dominions by Augustus, when he subdued the nations of the Alps.]

COTTUS, a giant, son of Cælus and Terra, who had 100 hands and 50 heads. Hesiod. Theog. v. 147.

COTYÆUM, [a town of Phrygia, south of Dorylæum, on the Thymbris, a branch of the Sangarius. It is now Kutiæh.]

COTYLÆUS, a surname of Æsculapius, worshipped on the borders of the Eurotas. His temple was raised by Hercules. Paus. 3, c. 19.

COTYS, king of Thrace, who divided the kingdom with his uncle, by whom he was killed. It is the same to whom Ovid writes from his banishment. Tacit. 2, Ann. 64.—Ovid. 2, de Pont. ep. 9.—A king of Armenia Minor, who fought against Mithridates, in the age of Claudius. Tacit. Ann. 11 and 13.

COTYTTO, the goddess of all debauchery, whose festivals, called Cotyttia, were celebrated by the Athenians, Corinthians, Thracians, &c. during the night. Her priests were called Baptæ, and nothing but debauchery and wantonness prevailed at the celebration. A festival of the same name was observed in Sicily, where the votaries of the goddess carried about boughs hung with cakes and fruit, which it was lawful for any person to pluck off. It was a capital punishment to reveal whatever was seen or done at these sacred festivals, and it cost Eupolis his life for an unseasonable reflection upon them. The goddess Cotytto is supposed to be the same as Proserpine or Ceres. Horat. epod. 17, v. 58.—Juv. 2, v. 91.

CRAGUS, [a chain of woody mountains, sacred to Diana, running along the eastern shore of the Sinus Glaucus. The fabulous monster Chimæra, said to have been subdued by Bellerophon, was a volcano in this ridge, which he cultivated.] Ovid. Met. 9, v. 645.—Horat. 1, od. 21.

CRANAI, a surname of the Athenians, from their king Cradaus. Herodot. 8, c. 44.

CRANÆUS, the second king of Athens, who succeeded Cecrops, and reigned nine years, B. C. 1497. Paus. 1, c. 2.—A city of Caria. Plin. 5, c. 29.

CRANON and CRANNON, a town of Thessaly, [on the river Onchestus, south-east of Pharsalus,] where Antipater and Craterus defeated the Athenians after Alexander's death. Liv. 26, c. 10, 1 42, c. 64.

CRANTOR, a philosopher of Soli, among the pupils of Plato, B. C. 310. [He was the first who wrote commentaries on the works of Plato. He was highly celebrated for the purity of his moral doctrine, as may be inferred from the praises bestowed by the ancients, especially by Cicero, upon his discourse "on grief." Horace also (Ep. 1, 2, v. 3.) alludes to his high reputation as a moral instructor.] Diog.

CRASSUS, a grandfather of Crassus the Rich, who never laughed. Plin. 7, c. 19.—Publ. Licinius, a Roman high-priest, about 130 years B. C. who went into Asia with an army against Aristonicus, where he was killed, and buried at Smyrna.—M. Licinius, a celebrated Roman, surnamed Rich, on account of his opulence. At first he was very circumscribed in his circumstances; but, by educating slaves and selling them at a high price, he soon enriched himself. The cruelties of Cinna obliged him to leave Rome; and he retired to Spain, where he remained concealed for eight months. After Cinna's death he passed into Africa, and thence to Italy, where he served Sylla, and ingratiated himself in his favour. When the gladiators, with Sparticus at their head, had spread an universal alarm in Italy, and defeated some of the Roman generals, Crassus was sent against them. A battle was fought, in which Crassus slaughtered 12,000 of the slaves, and by this decisive blow, he soon put an end to the war, and was honoured with an oratio at his return. He was soon after made consul with Pompey: and in this high office he displayed his opulence, by entertaining the populace at 10,000 tables. He was afterwards censor, and formed the first triumvirate with Pompey and Cæsar. As his love of riches was more predominant than that of glory, Crassus never imitated the ambitious conduct of his colleagues, but was satisfied with the province of Syria, which seemed to promise an inexhaustible source of wealth. With hopes of enlarging his possessions, he set off from Rome, though the omens proved unfavourable, and every thing seemed to threaten his ruin. He crossed the Euphrates, and, forgetful of the rich cities of Babylon and Seleucia, he hastened to make himself master of Parthia. He was betrayed in his march by the delay of Artavasdes, king of Armenia, and the perfidy of Ariamnes. He was met [near Charæ] by Surenæ, the general of the forces of Orodes, king of Parthia, and a battle was fought, in which 20,000 Romans were killed and 10,000 taken prisoners. The darkness of the night favoured the escape of the rest, and Crassus, forced by the mutiny and turbulence of his soldiers, and the treachery of his guides, trusted himself to the general of the enemy, on pretence of proposing terms of accommodation, and he was put to death B. C. 53. His head was cut off, and sent to Orodes, who poured melted gold down his throat. The firmness with which Crassus received the news of his son's death, who perished in that expedition, has been deservedly commended; and the words that he uttered when he surrendered himself into the hands of Surenæ, equally claim our admiration. He was wont often to say, that no man ought to be accounted rich if he could not maintain an army. Though he has been called avaricious, yet he showed himself always ready to lend money to his friends without interest. He was fond of philosophy, and his knowledge of history was great and extensive. Plutarch has written his life. Flor. 3, c. 11. —Publius, the son of the rich Crassus, went into Parthia with his father. When he saw himself surrounded by the enemy, and without any hope of escape, he ordered one of his men to run him through. His head was cut off, and shown with insolence to his father by the Parthians. Plut. in Crass. —L. Licinius, a Roman orator, commended by Cicero, and introduced in his book de Oratore as the principal speaker. —A son of Crassus the rich, killed in the civil wars after Cæsar's death.

CRATER, [or, Sinus Crater, the ancient name of the Gulf of Naples, given to it from its resembling the mouth of a large bowl or mixer, (κατρηγ.) It is about 12 miles in diameter.]

rary fame, as well as by his valour in the field, and wrote the history of Alexander's life. He was greatly respected and loved by the Macedonian soldiers, and Alexander always trusted him with unusual confidence. After Alexander's death, he subdued Greece with Antipater, and passed with his colleague into Asia, where he was killed in a battle against Eumenes, B. C. 321. [So highly was Craterus respected by the Macedonians, that they were desirous of having him for their leader after the death of Alexander, and such was their known attachment to him, that Eumenes, in the engagement in Cappadocia, which proved fatal to Craterus, took particular care not to oppose any Macedonian to him. He was wounded by a Thracian, and falling from his horse, was trampled to death by the enemy's cavalry.] He had received for his share of Alexander's kingdoms, Greece and Epirus. Nep. in Eumen. 2.—Justin. 12 and 13.—Curt. 3.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.—An Athenian, who collected into one body all the decrees which had passed in the public assemblies at Athens.

CRATES, a philosopher of Bœotia, son of Ascondus, and disciple of Diogenes the Cynic, B. C. 324. [He is considered as the most distinguished philosopher of the Cynic sect, after Diogenes. In his natural temper, however, he differed from his master, and instead of being morose and gloomy was cheerful and facetious. Hence he obtained access to many families of the most wealthy Athenians, and became so highly esteemed, that he frequently became an arbiter of disputes and quarrels among relations. He was honourably descended, and inherited large estates; but when he turned his attention to philosophy, he sold them and distributed the money among the poorer citizens. He adopted all the singularities of the Cynic sect. His wife, Hipparchia, who was rich and of a good family, and had many suitors, preferred Crates to every other, and when her parents opposed her inclinations, so determined was her passion that she threatened to put an end to her life.] Diog. in vitâ. —A stoic, son of Timocrates, who opened a school at Rome, where he taught grammar. Sueton.—A native of Pergamus, who wrote an account of the most striking events of every age, B. C. 165. Ælian. de Anim. 17, c. 9.—A philosopher of Athens, who succeeded in the school of his master Polemon.

CRATHIS, a river of Achaia, falling into the bay of Corinth. [It passed to the north-west of Ægira, and had Ægæ at its mouth.] Strab. 8.—Another in Magna Græcia, whose waters, [according to Strabo,] gave a yellow colour to the hair and beard of those that drank them. [It rises near Consentia, and runs into the Sinus Tarentinus below Sybaris. It is now the Crati. Strab. 6.]—Ovid. 14.—Met. v. 315.—Paus. 7, c. 25.—Plin. 31, c. 2.

CRATINUS, a native of Athens, celebrated for his comic writings, and his fondness for drinking. He died at the age of 97, B. C.

531 years. Quintilian greatly commends his comedies, which the little remains of his poetry do not seem fully to justify. Horat. 1. Sat. 4.—Quintil.—A wrestler, of uncommon beauty. Paus. 6, c. 3.

CRATIPPUS, a [Peripatetic] philosopher of Mytelene, who, among others, taught Cicero's son at Athens. [He first became acquainted with Cicero at Ephesus, whither he had gone for the purpose of paying his respects to him. Afterwards, being aided by the orator, he obtained from Cæsar the rights of Roman citizenship. On coming to Athens, he was requested by the Areopagus to settle there, and become an instructor of youth in the tenets of philosophy, a request with which he complied. He wrote on Divination, and on the interpretation of dreams.] After the battle of Pharsalia, Pompey visited the house of Cratippus, where their discourse was chiefly turned upon Providence, which the warrior blamed, and the philosopher defended. Plut. in Pomp.—Cic. in Offic. 1.—An historian, contemporary with Thucydides. Dionys. Hal.

CRATYLUS, a philosopher, a preceptor to Plato after Socrates.

CRAUSIÆ, two islands on the coast of [Argolis, off Cape Spirea.]

CREMERA, a small river of Tuscany, falling into the Tiber, famous for the death of the 300 Fabii, who were killed there in a battle against the Veientes, A. U. C. 277; [306 of the Fabii perished: one alone of the whole family remained, who had been left at Rome on account of his tender years. He was grandfather of Fabius Maximus. The Cremera is now called the Varea.] Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 205—Juv. 2, v. 155.

CREMMYON, and CROMMYON, a town near Corinth, where Theseus killed a sow of uncommon bigness. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 435.

CREMNI [or CREMNA, a strong place in the interior of Pisidia, where the Romans established a colony, now Kebrinar.]—A commercial place on the Palus Mæotis. [Mannert supposes the name to be one of Greek origin, and to have reference to its rocky situation. He locates the place near the mouth of the Tanais, near the modern Taganrock. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 4, p. 115.] Herodot. 4, c. 2.

CREMNA, [a city of Cisalpine Gaul, north-east of Placentia, and a little north of the Pocremona and Placentia, were both settled by Roman colonies, A. U. 535, when Annibal was threatening Italy. They maintained themselves successfully against Annibal, and Cremona especially became subsequently a large and powerful city. It suffered a little under Augustus, when a portion of its lands were divided among his veterans, but soon recovered its former prosperity. In the contest between Vitellius and Vespasian. Cremona met with its death blow. It had favoured the party of the former, and their camp was pitched in the vicinity of the city. The camp was stormed by the soldiers of Vespasian, their opponents yielded, and the city also opened its gates. The soldiery, however, could not be restrained, and Cremona was sacked and destroyed. It was afterwards rebuilt, but with little if any of its former magnificence.] Liv. 21, c. 56.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 4 and 19.

CREMUTIUS CORDUS, an historian, who wrote an account of Augustus, and of the civil wars, and starved himself for fear of the resentment of Tiberius, whom he had offended, by calling Cassius the last of the Romans. Tacit. Ann. 55, c. 34, 35.—Suet. in Aug. 35. in Tib. 60. in Calig. 16.

CREON, king of Corinth, was son of Sisyphus. He promised his daughter Glauce to Jason, who repudiated Medea. To revenge the success of her rival, Medea sent her for a present [an enchanted robe.] Glauce put it on, and was seized with sudden pains. Her body took fire, and she expired in the greatest torments. The house also was consumed by the fire, and Creon and his family shared Glauce's fate. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 7.—Eurip. in Med.—Hygin. fab. 25.—Diod. 4.—A son of Menœtius, brother to Jocasta, the wife and mother of Œdipus. At the death of Laius, who had married Jocasta, Creon ascended the vacant throne of Thebes. As the ravages of the Sphinx (vid. Sphinx) were intolerable, Creon offered his crown, and [sister] in marriage, to him who could explain the ænigmas which the monster proposed. Œdipus was happy in his explanations, and he ascended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocasta, without knowing that she was his mother, and by her he had two sons, Polynices and Eteocles. These two sons mutually agreed, after their father's death, to reign in the kingdom, each alternately. Eteocles first ascended the throne, by right of seniority; but when he was once in power, he refused to resign at the appointed time, and his brother led against him an army of Argives to support his right. The war was decided by a single combat between the two brothers. They both killed one another, and Creon ascended the throne, till Leodamas the son of Eteocles should be of a sufficient age to assume the reins of government. In this regal capacity, Creon commanded that the Argives, and more particularly Polynices, who was the cause of all the bloodshed, should remain unburied. If this was in any manner disobeyed, the offenders were to be buried alive. Antigone, the sister of Polynices, transgressed, and was accordingly punished. Hæmon, the son of Creon, who was passionately fond of Antigone, killed himself on her grave, when his father refused to grant her pardon. Creon was afterwards killed by Theseus, who made war against him at the request of Adrastus, because he refused burial to the Argives. vid. Eteocles, Polynices, Adrastus, Œdipus. Apollod. 3, c. 56. &c.—Paus. 1, c. 39, l. 9, c. 5, &c.—Stat. in Theb.—Sophoc. in Antig.—Æschyl. Sept. in Theb.—Hygin. fab. 67 and 76.—Diod. 1 and 4.—The first annual archon at Athens, 684 B. C. Pater. 1, c. 8.

CREOPHILUS, a Samian, who hospitably entertained Homer, from whom he received a poem in return. Some say that he was that poet's master, &c. Strab. 14.

[CRESSA, a port of Doris, opposite Rhodes, at the distance of about 11 miles from that island.]

CRESPHONTES, a son of Aristomachus, who, with his brothers Temenus and Aristodemus, attempted to recover the Peloponnesus. Paus. 4, c. 3, &c.

CRESTON, a town of Thrace, capital of a part of the country called Crestonia.

CRETA, one of the largest islands of the Mediterranean sea, at the south of all the Cyclades. [Its name Crete is derived by some from the Curetes, who are said to have been its first inhabitants; by others, from the nymph Crete, daughter of Hesperus; and by others, from Cretus, the son of Jupiter, who is supposed to have reigned there. It was called also Macaris, or the fortunate island, on account of the fruitfulness of the soil, and purity of the air.] It was once famous for its hundred cities, and for the laws which the wisdom of Minos established there. [Of its 100 cities, 90 existed before the Trojan war, and the remaining 10 were built after the Dorians settled there. Of these 100, there were 40 remaining in the time of Ptolemy, who enumerates as many. Among the principal cities were Cnossus, Cydonia, and Gortynia. The principal mountain was Ida, and next to it Dicte. From Ida came the worship of Cybele and the priests, called Idæi Dactyli; here also Jupiter was nursed. The laws of Minos were in such high repute, that Lycurgus passed a considerable time in Crete in order to study them, and made them the basis of his Spartan code. The primary effect of these laws was to render the Cretans eminent for virtue, justice, and probity. They afterwards, however, degenerated and became dishonest, avaricious, addicted to the most impure practices, and, in a word, the most vicious people of all antiquity. They shared with the Cretans and Cappadocians the honour of the old adage, "τῆς κατὰ κρητὸν ἡλικίας." They were notoriously given to falsehood. St. Paul mentions this trait in their character, (Ep. ad Tit. 1, 12), and is supposed to quote the words of one of their own poets, Epimenides. [vid. Remarks at the end of the article Jupiter.] The Cretans were very skilful archers, especially the inhabitants of Cydonia. They submitted to the Roman yoke B. C. 66. The modern name of Crete is Candia.] Chalk was produced there, and thence called Creta, and with it the Romans marked their lucky days in their calendar. Horat. 1, od. 36, v. 10, epod. 9.—*Ovid. CRETHEIS, the wife of Acastus, king of Iolchos, who fell in love with Peleus, son of Æacus, and accused him of attempts upon her virtue, because he refused to comply with her wishes, &c. She is called by some Hippolyte or Astiadamia. Pindar. Nem. 4.

CREÛSA, a daughter of Creon king of Corinth. As she was going to marry Jason, who had divorced Medea, she put on an enchanted garment, presented by Medea, which immediately set her body on fire, and she expired in the most excruciating torments. She had received this gown as a gift from Medea, who wished to take that revenge upon the infidelity of Jason. Some call her Glauce. Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 335.—A daughter of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba. She married Æneas, by whom she had some children, among whom was Ascanius. When Troy was taken, she fled in the night, with her husband; but they were separated in the midst of the confusion, and Æneas could not recover her, nor hear where she was. Virgil makes Creusa appear to her husband in a vision, while he was seeking her in the tumult. She predicted to Æneas the calamities that attended him, the fame he should acquire when he came to Italy, and his consequent marriage with a princess of the country. Paus. 10, c. 16.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 562, &c.—A daughter of Erechtheus king of Athens. She was mother of Janus by Apollo.—A town of Bœotia. Strab. 9.—Paus. 9, c. 32.

CREÛSIS, [a maritime town of Bœotia, on the Sinus Corinthiacus. It was the arsenal of the Thespians.] Paus. 9, c. 32.

CRIMISUS, [or CRIMISSUS,] a river on the western parts of Sicily, where Timoleon defeated the Carthaginian forces. [It falls into the Hypsa. The god of the river was represented under the shape of a dog on the coins of the city of Segesta. It is supposed by Manner to be the modern Sân Bartolomeo, but Clavier inclines in favour of the Belici. D'Anville gives the modern name as Callibellotta.] C. Nep. in Tim.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 38.—The word in the various editions of Virgil, is spelt Cremissus, Crimissus, Crimisus, Crimesus, Crimnisus. [The true reading is Crimisus or Crimissus. Heyne adopts the former, and alludes to both in Var. Lect.] Crimisus or Crimissus, was a Trojan prince, who exposed his daughter on the sea, rather than suffer her to be devoured by the sea-monster which Neptune sent to punish the infidelity of Laomedon. vid. Laomedon. The daughter came safe to the shores of Sicily. Crimisus some time after went in quest of his daughter, and was so disconsolate for her loss, that the gods changed him into a river in Sicily, and granted him the power of metamorphosing himself into whatever shape he pleased.—[A river of the Brutii in Magna Græcia, falling into the Sinus Terentinus, north of Crotona, near Petilia. It is now the Fiumica.]

CRISPINUS, a prætorian, who, though originally a slave in Egypt, was, after the acquisition of riches, raised to the honours of Roman knighthood by Domitian. Juv. 1, v. 26.—A stoic philosopher, as remarkable for his loquacity as for the foolish and tedious poem he wrote to explain the tenets of his own sect, to which Horace alludes in the last verses of 1 Sat. 1.

CRISPUS SALLUSTIUS. Vid. Sallustius.

—VIRO, a famous orator. Quintil. 10, c. 1.

—FLAV. JUL. a son of the Great Constantine made Cæsar by his father, and distinguished for valour and extensive knowledge. Fausta, his stepmother, wished to seduce him; and when he refused, she accused him before Constantine, who believed the crime, and caused his son to be poisoned, A. D. 326.

CRISÆUS SINUS, [an arm of the Sinus Corinthiacus, on the northern shore. It extends into the country of Phocis, and had at its head the town of Crissa, whence it took its name. Its modern name is the Gulf of Salona, from the modern city of Salona, the ancient Amphissa, which was the chief town of the Loeri Ozolæ, and lay to the north-east of Delphi.]

CRITHÆIS, a daughter of Melanippus, who became pregnant by an unknown person, and afterwards married Phemicus of Smyrna, and brought forth the poet Homer, according to Herodot. in vitâ.

CRITIÆS, one of the thirty tyrants set over Athens by the Spartans. He was eloquent and well bred, but of dangerous principles, and he cruelly persecuted his enemies and put them to death. He was killed in a battle against those citizens whom his oppression had banished. He had been among the disciples of Socrates, and had written elegies and other compositions, of which some fragments remain. Cic. 2, de Orat.

CRITO, one of the disciples of Socrates, who attended his learned preceptor in his last moments, and composed some dialogues now lost. Diog.—A physician in the age of Artaxerxes Longimanus.—An historian of Naxos, who wrote an account of all that had happened during eight particular years of his life.—A Macedonian historian, who wrote an account of Pallene, of Persia, of the foundation of Syracuse, of the Getæ, &c.

CRITOBŪLUS, a general of Phocis, at the battle of Thermopylæ between Antiochus and the Romans. Paus. 10, c. 20.—A son of Crito, disciple to Socrates. Diog. in Crit.

CRITOLÆUS, a citizen of Tegea in Arcadia, who, with two brothers, fought against the two sons of Demostratus of Pheneus, to put an end to a long war between their respective nations. The brothers of Critolæus were both killed, and he alone remained to withstand his three bold antagonists. He conquered them; and when, at his return, his sister deplored the death of one of his antagonists, to whom she was betrothed, he killed her in a fit of resentment. The offence deserved capital punishment; but he was pardoned, on account of the services he had rendered his country. He was afterwards general of the Achæans, and it is said that he poisoned himself, because he had been conquered at Thermopylæ by the Romans. Cic. de Nat. D.—A peripatetic philosopher of Athens, sent ambassador to Rome, 140 B. C. [vid.

Carneades. He is said to have maintained that the world is eternal.] Cic. 2, de Orat.

—An historian who wrote about Epirus.

[CRIV-METŌPON, a promontory of the Tauric Chersonese, and the most southern point of that peninsula. It is now called Karadjebouroun, according to D'Anville, which signifies in the Turkish language, Black-nose. Mannert, however, makes the modern name to be Ajadag, or the Holy Mountain. The meaning of the ancient appellation is Ram's front, (Κριου μεταπον).]

CRIVS, a river of Achaia, called after a giant of the same name. [It was north-east of Cyllene, and ran into the sea near Ægira.] Paus. 7, c. 27.

CROBYZI, a people [between Mount Hæmus and the Danube, in Lower Mæsia.]

CROCODILOPOLIS, [a city of Egypt, south-east of the Lake Mæris, and afterwards called Arsinoë. It derived its name from the crocodiles which were fed and worshipped there. The Egyptians honoured the crocodile, because it was consecrated to Typhon, an evil genius, whom they dreaded and sought to appease by worshipping an animal which was his symbolical image. This city has been succeeded by the modern Faioum, situate about a league to the north-east. vid. Arsinoë.—Another city of Egypt, of the name of Aphroditopolis.—Another, near the coast of Phœnicia, south of Cæsarea, in the vicinity of the Lacus Crocodilorum, which received the river Cana.] Herodot. 2, c. 69. —Strab. 17.

CROCUS, a beautiful youth, enamoured of the nymph Smilax. He was changed into a flower of the same name, and Smilax was metamorphosed into a yew-tree. Ovid. 4, Met. v. 283.

CRÆSUS, the fifth and last of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia, was son of Alyattes, and passed for the richest of mankind. He was the first who made the Greeks of Asia tributary to the Lydians. His court was the asylum of learning; and Æsop, the famous fable writer, among others, lived under his patronage. In a conversation with Solon, Cræsus wished to be thought the happiest of mankind; but the philosopher apprized him of his mistake, and gave the preference to private virtue. Cræsus undertook a war against Cyrus the king of Persia, and marched to meet him with an army of 420,000 men and 60,000 horse. After a reign of 14 years, he was defeated, B. C. 548, [vid. Thymbra.] his capital, Sardis, was besieged, and he fell into the conqueror's hands, who ordered him to be burnt alive. The pile was already on fire, when Cyrus heard the conquered monarch three times exclaim, Solon! with lamentable energy. He asked him the reason of his exclamation, and Cræsus repeated the conversation he had once had with Solon on human happiness. Cyrus was moved at the recital, and at the recollection of the inconstancy of human affairs, he ordered Cræsus to be taken from the burning pile, and he became one of his most intimate friends. The kingdom of Lydia became extinct in his person, and the power was transferred to Persia. [Crœsus survived Cyrus, who in his last moments recommended him to his son Cambyses, as one in whom he might place the most unlimited confidence. Cambyses, however, treated him ill and condemned him to death, a sentence from which he escaped. His subsequent history is unknown.] He is celebrated for the immensely rich presents which he made to the temple of Delphi, from which he received an obscure and ambiguous oracle, which he interpreted in his favour, and which was fulfilled in the destruction of his empire. [The river Halys formed the eastern boundaries of the possession of Crœsus. The words of the oracle were,

Κροισος ἄλυσ διὰ βασι, μεγάλην ἀρχὴν διαλύσει.

"If Crœsus cross the Halys he will put an end to a great empire." He crossed in expectation of destroying the Persian power, but the kingdom alluded to proved to be his own. It is related of this monarch, also, that when Sardis was taken, his life was preserved by his son, who until then had been dumb, but who, on seeing a soldier about to kill his father, suddenly exclaimed, "Soldier, spare the king." Herodot. 1, c. 26, &c.—Plut. in Solon. 8, c. 24.—Justin. 1, c. 7.

CROMMYON and CROMYON, a [village in the territory of Corinth,] where Hercules killed a large sow that laid waste the neighbouring country. Ovid. Met. 7.—Xen.

CRONIA, a festival at Athens, in honour of Saturn. The Rhodians observed the same festival, and generally sacrificed to the god a condemned malefactor.

CROPHI, [a mountain of Egypt, between Elephantina and Syene. Between this mountain and another called Mophi were the sources of the Nile, according to a statement made to Herodotus by an Egyptian priest at Sais.] Herodot. 2, c. 28.

CRŌTŌNA, a town of Italy, still known by the same name, on the bay of Tarentum, founded 739 years before the Augustan age, by a colony from Greece. The inhabitants were excellent warriors and great wrestlers. Democedes, Alcæmon, Milo, &c. were natives of this place. [The situation in fact was a most healthy one, and Crotona acquired such reputation for the long life and vigour of its inhabitants, that its name was used proverbially to signify a very healthy spot. The attention paid by the inhabitants to gymnastic exercises contributed not a little to the same result. In one Olympiad, seven inhabitants of Crotona carried off the first prize; hence the proverb that the least champion among the Crotonians was the first among the rest of the Greeks. Crotona was equally famous for its Pythagorean schools of philosophy and its military achievements. In a contest with the Sybarites, 100,000 Crotonians, headed by Milo in the costume of Hercules, defeated 300,000 of the enemy, so that few escaped and their city was depopulated. In after days, however, they lost their high character, and 130,000 Crotonians were defeated by the Locrians at the battle of Sagra. Crotona suffered severely in the wars of Pyrrhus and Hannibal. It became a Roman colony A. U. C. 559.] Herodot. 8, c. 37.—Strab. 6.—Plin. 2, c. 96.—Liv. 1, c. 18, l. 24, c. 3.—Justin. 20, c. 2.

CRUSTUMERIUM and CRŪSTUMERIA, a town of the Sabines. Liv. 4, c. 9, l. 42, c. 34.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 631.

CRUSTŪMINUM, a town of Etruria, near Veii, famous for pears; whence the adjective Crustumia. Virg. G. 2, v. 88.

CRUSTŪMIUS, [a river of Umbria in Italy, rising in the Apennines, and falling into the sea below Ariminum. It is now called the Conca.] Lucan. 2, v. 406.

CRYPŒA, a passage through mount Pausilypus. vid. Pausilypus.

CTENOS, [a harbour of Chersonesus Taurica, on the western coast. It lay to the east of the modern Achtiar, according to Mannert.]

CTESIAS, a Greek historian and physician of Cnidos, taken prisoner by Artaxerxes Mneumon at the battle of Cunaxa. He cured the king's wounds, and was his physician for 17 years. He wrote an history of the Assyrians and Persians, which Justin and Diodorus have partially preferred to that of Herodotus. [He contradicts Herodotus in many instances, and also Xenophon, calling the former a false and fabulous writer; a character to which he himself appears richly entitled.] Some fragments of his compositions have been preserved by Photius, and are to be found in Wesseling's, and other editions, of Herodotus. Strab. 1.—Athen. 12.—Plut. in Artax.

CTESIBIUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, who flourished 135 years B. C. He was the inventor of the pump, and other hydraulic instruments. He also invented a clepsydra, or a water clock. This invention of measuring time by water, was wonderful and ingenious. Water was made to drop upon wheels, which it turned. The wheels communicated their regular motion to a small wooden image, which by a gradual rise pointed with a stick to the proper hours and months, which were engraved on a column near the machine. This artful invention gave rise to many improvements; and the modern manner of measuring time with an hour-glass, is an imitation of the clepsydra of Ctesibius. Vitruv. de Archit. 9, c. 9.—A cynic philosopher.—An historian, who flourished 254 years B. C. and died in his 104th year. Plut. in Dem.

CTESIPHON, an Athenian, son of Leosthenes, who advised his fellow-citizens publicly to present Demosthenes with a golden crown for his probity and virtue. This was opposed by the orator Æschines, the rival of Demosthenes, who accused Ctesiphon of seditious views. Demosthenes undertook the defence of his friend, in a celebrated oration still extant, and Æschines was banished. Demost. and Æschin. de Coronâ.—[A city of Parthia, situate on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite to, and distant 3 miles from Selencæ.

It was founded by Vardanes, fortified by Pacorus, and became the metropolis of the whole Parthian empire. It was at first an inconsiderable village, but the camp of the Parthian monarchs being frequently pitched in its vicinity, caused it gradually to become a large city. In A. D. 165, it was taken by the Romans, and 33 years after by the emperor Severus. Notwithstanding, however, its losses, it succeeded to Babylon and Seleucia, as one of the great capitals of the East. In the time of Julian, Ctesiphon was a great and flourishing city; and Coche, as the only remaining part of Seleucia was called, was merely its suburb. To these two has been assigned the modern epithet of Al Modain, or "the cities." They are now both in ruins. Ctesiphon never recovered its sack by the Saracens, A. D. 637. This place was the winter residence of the Parthian and Persian monarchs. In summer they dwelt at Ecbatana in Media.]

CULĀRO, a town of the Allobroges in Gaul, called afterwards Gratianopolis, and now Grenoble. Cic. ep.

CUMA and CUMÆ, [one of the oldest and most powerful states of Æolia, in Asia Minor. It lay north-east of Phocæa, and gave birth to Hesiod and Ephorus. The inhabitants bore the character of stupidity; and among other anecdotes related of them with reference to this trait, it is said, that for 300 years they laid no duty on merchandise imported and exported. Their neighbours said that they only then discovered that their city was a maritime one. This little story, however, seems, on the contrary, very much to their credit, and argues a liberal spirit. The name of the city is said to have been derived from the Amazon Cyme, and so the name should properly be written in Latin. In Greek, it is Κύμη. It was afterwards called Phriconis, (vid. Phriconis;) and is now termed Nemourt.] — [Another in Italy, founded, it is said, by a colony from the former place. It was situate on the coast of Campania, north-west of Neapolis, or Naples. In its vicinity resided the famed Cumæan Sybil. Some make a colony of Chalcidians, from Chalcis in Eubœa to have united with the Cumæan colony in founding this city. The name of this city is commonly given by the Greek writers in the singular, Κύμη, and by the Latins, Cyme: the true form, however, is the plural. Eusebius, (with whom Paterculus nearly coincides,) makes the date of its foundation 1050 B. C. This will prove a much earlier acquaintance, on the part of the Asiatic Greeks, with Italy than is generally allowed them. Cumæ sent out colonies to Neapolis, and to Zancle in Sicily, and eventually destroyed the power of the Ætrurians by sea.] *Ovid. CUNEUS, [vid. Lusitania.]

CUPIDO, a celebrated deity among the ancients, god of love, and love itself. There are different traditions concerning his parents. Cicero mentions three Cupids; one, son of Mercury and Diana; another, son of Mercury and Venus, and the third, of Mars and Venus. Plato mentions two; Hesiod, the most ancient theogonist, speaks only of one, who, as he says, was produced at the same time as Chaos and the Earth. There are, according to more received opinions, two Cupids, one of whom is a lively ingenious youth, son of Jupiter and Venus, whilst the other, son of Nox and Erebus, is distinguished by his debauchery and riotous disposition. Cupid is represented as a winged infant, naked, armed with a bow and a quiver full of arrows. On gems, and all other pieces of antiquity, he is represented as amusing himself with some childish diversion. Sometimes he appears driving a hoop, throwing a quoit, playing with a nymph, catching a butterfly, or trying to burn with a torch; at other times he plays upon a horn before his mother, or closely embraces a swan, or with one foot raised in the air, he, in a musing posture, seems to meditate some trick. Sometimes like a conqueror he marches triumphantly with a helmet on his head, a spear on his shoulder, and a buckler on his arm, intimating that even Mars himself owns the superiority of love. His power was generally known by his riding on the back of a lion, or a dolphin, or breaking to pieces the thunderbolts of Jupiter. Among the ancients he was worshipped with the same solemnity as his mother Venus, and as his influence was extended over the heavens, the sea, and the earth, and even the empire of the dead, his divinity was universally acknowledged, and vows, prayers, and sacrifices were daily offered to him. According to some accounts, the union of Cupid with Chaos gave birth to men, and all the animals which inhabit the earth, and even the gods themselves were the offspring of love before the foundation of the world. Cupid, like the rest of the gods, assumed different shapes; and we find him in the Æneid putting on, at the request of his mother, the form of Ascanius, and going to Dido's court, where he inspired the queen with love. *Virg. CURES, the chief town of the Sabines, of which Tatiſ was king. The inhabitants, called Quirites, were carried to Rome, of which they became citizens. [Cluverius fixes upon the modern Il Vescovio as the site of the ancient Cures. The Abbe Chaupy, however, discovered what he took to be the ruins of this ancient town, at a place called Arci, on the left bank of the river Correse. According to Mannert, it is the little village of Correse, on the river of the same name, two miles north of Monte Rotondo, and one mile east of the Tiber.] Virg. Æn. 1, v. 292, l. 8, v.

CURĒTES, [a class of priests or people of Crete, called also Corybantēs. They are said to have been originally from mount Ida in Phrygia, whence some derive their name of Idæi Dactyli. This, however, came more probably from Ida in Crete, and the Curetes themselves were in all likelihood of Cretan origin. Strabo derives their name from Kou-gez, lonsura, from the circumstance of their cutting off the hair in front to prevent the enemy from taking hold. They were very ingenious, and invented many things, and proved highly useful to mankind. They first taught how to manage flocks, to gather honey, to hunt, to tame horses, to cast darts. They formed men into societies, are said to have invented swords and helmets, and to have introduced dancing in armour. Other accounts make them Phœnicians, and state that they accompanied Cadmus, that some of them settled in Phrygia, and were called Corybantēs; others in Crete, and were termed Idæi Dactyli, and a third class in Rhodes, with the name of Telchines.] They were intrusted with the education of Jupiter, and to prevent his being discovered by his father, they invented a kind of dance, and drowned his cries in the harsh sounds of their shields and cymbals. As a reward for their attention, they were made priests and favourite ministers of Rhea, called also Cybele, who had intrusted them with the care of Jupiter. Dionys. Hal. 2.—*Virg. CURĒTIS, a name given to Crete, as being the residence of the Curetes. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 136.

CURIA, a division of the Roman tribes. Romulus originally divided the people into three tribes, and each tribe into ten Curia. Over each Curia was appointed a priest, who officiated at the sacrifices of his respective assembly. The sacrifices were called Curionia, and the priest Curio. He was to be above the age of fifty. His morals were to be pure and unexceptionable, and his body free from all defects. The Curiones were elected by their respective Curia, and above them was a superior priest, called Curio maximus, chosen by all the Curia in a public assembly.—The word Curia was also applied to public edifices among the Romans. These were generally of two sorts, divine and civil. In the former were held the assemblies of the priests, and of every religious order, for the regulation of religious sacrifices and ceremonies. The other was appointed for the senate, where they assembled for the despatch of public business. The Curia was solemnly consecrated by the Augurs, before a lawful assembly could be convened there. There were three at Rome, which more particularly claim our attention; Curia Hostilia, built by king Tullus Hostilius; Curia Pompeii, where Julius Cæsar was murdered; and Curia Augusti, the palace and court of the emperor Augustus.—A town of the Rhoeti, now Coire, the capital of the Grisons.

CURIA LEX, de Comitibus, was enacted by M. CURIUS DENTATUS the tribune. It forbade the convening of the Comitia, for the election of [plebeian] magistrates, without a previous permission from the senate.

CURIATI, a family of Alba, which was carried to Rome by Tullus Hostilius, and entered among the patricians. The three Curiatii, who engaged the Horatii and lost the victory, were of this family. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionys. Hal. 5.—Liv. 1, c. 24.

Q. CURIO, an excellent orator. Tacit. 21. Ann. c. 7.—Suet. in Cæs. 49.—Cic. in Brut.—His son, C. Scribonius, was tribune of the people, and an intimate friend of Cæsar. Flor. 4, c. 2.—Plut. in Pomp. & Cæs. 49.—Val. Max. 9, c. 1.—Lucan. v. 268.

CURIOSOLITÆ, [a people of Gallia Celtica, in Armorica, north-west of the Redones.] Cæs. Bell. G. 2, c. 34, l. 3, c. 11.

CURIUM, a town of Cyprus, [on the southern coast, or rather, according to the ancients, at the commencement of the western coast, at a small distance from which, to the south-east, there is a cape which bears the name of Curias. The town is supposed by D'Anville to answer to the modern Piscopra. The promontory is now called Capo delle Gatte.] Herodot. 5, c. 113.

CURIUS DENTATUS MARCUS ANNIUS, a Roman celebrated for his fortitude and frugality. He was three times consul, and was twice honoured with a triumph. He obtained decisive victories over the Samnites, the Sabines, and the Lucanians, and defeated Pyrrhus near Tarentum. The ambassadors of the Samnites visited his cottage, while he was boiling some vegetables in an earthen pot, and they attempted to bribe him by the offer of large presents. He refused their offers with contempt, and said, I prefer my earthen pots to all your vessels of gold and silver, and it is my wish to command those who are in possession of money, while I am deprived of it, and live in poverty. Plut. in Cat. Cens.—Horat. 1, od. 12, v. 41.—Flor. 1, c. 15.

M. CURTIUS, a Roman youth who devoted himself to the gods Manes for his country, about 260 years B. C. A wide gap, called afterwards Curtius lacus, had suddenly opened in the forum, and the oracle had said that it would never close before Rome threw into it that in which the Romans were most powerful. [Curtius, on hearing the answer, demanded of his countrymen whether they possessed any thing so valuable as their arms and courage. They yielded a silent assent to the question put them by the heroic youth. Whereupon, having arrayed himself in full armour and mounted his horse, he plunged into the chasm, and the people threw after him flowers and fruit. Valerius Maximus states that the earth closed immediately over him. From the account of Livy, however, and the words of Festus, it would seem that a lake, called Curtius lacus, afterwards occupied the spot. Liv. 7, c. 6.—Val. Max. 5, c.

2.—Festus, p. 45, ed. Scaliger.]—Fons, a stream which conveyed water to Rome, from the distance of 40 miles by an aqueduct so elevated as to be distributed through all the hills of the city. Plin. 36, c. 15.

CURŪLIS MAGISTRĀTUS, [Roman magistrates who had the privilege of using the sella curulis, or chair of state. This was anciently made of ivory, or at least adorned with it. The magistrates who enjoyed this privilege, were the dictator, consuls, prætors, censors, and curule ædiles. They sat on this chair, in their tribunals on all solemn occasions. Those commanders who triumphed, had it with them in their chariot. Persons whose ancestors or themselves had borne any curule office, were called nobiles, and had the jus imaginum. They who were the first of the family that had raised themselves to any curule office, were called homines novi, new men, or upstarts.]

CUSSÆI, [or COSSÆI, a nation occupying the southern declivity of the mountains which separated Susiana from Media. The Elymæi possessed the northern declivities. The Cussæi, or Cossæi, were a brave people, and the kings of Persia were frequently compelled to purchase a passage over these mountains from them. Alexander effected one by taking them by surprise. Antigonus lost a large portion of his army in crossing over. According to Mannert, this people, together with the Carduchi and some other neighbouring tribes, were the ancestors of the modern Curds. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 5, p. 493.]

CUSUS, a river of Hungary, falling into the Danube, now the Vag, [according to D'Anville. Mannert, however, makes it the same with the Granna, or Gran. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 3, p. 380, in notis.]

[CUTILĒ, a town of the Sabines, east of Reate, famous for its mineral waters. This country and that of Reate were, according to Varro, the most elevated part of Italy, and the name Umbilicus, or Navel of Italy, was applied to them. The town was situate on the banks of the lake, in which there were, according to ancient accounts, floating islands. Suetonius states that the emperor Vespasian resided here during the summer, and according to Xiphilinus, he died in this place. It is now Cotila.] Plin. 3, c. 12, l. 31, c. 2.—Seneca. Q. N. 3, c. 25.—Liv. 26, c. 11.

CYANE, a nymph of Sicily, who endeavoured to assist Proserpine when she was carried away by Pluto. The god changed her into a fountain now called Pisme, a few miles from Syracuse. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 112.—A town of Lycia. Plin. 5, c. 27.

CYANÆ, now the Pavorani, two rugged islands at the entrance of the Euxine Sea, about 20 stadia from the mouth of the Thracian Bosphorus. [They are now very small rocks, so that probably the attrition of the water has diminished them in size.] One of them is on the side of Asia, and the other on the European coast; and according to Strabo, there is only a space of 20 furlongs between them. The waves of the sea, which continually break against them with a violent noise, fill the air with a darkening foam, and render the passage extremely dangerous. The ancients supposed that these islands floated, and even sometimes united to crush vessels into pieces when they passed through the straits. This tradition arose from their appearing, like all other objects, to draw nearer when the navigators approached them. [They were sometimes called Symplegades, or, "the dashers," to which the term Cyaneon, or, "dark," is often added. They were also termed Planetæ, or, "the wanderers."] Their true situation and form was first explored and ascertained by the Argonauts. [Pindar (Pyth. 4, v. 370.) says that they were alive until the Argonauts brought death upon them. The Argo, according to Apollonius Rhodius, had a narrow escape with the loss of her rudder.] Plin. 6, c. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 85.—Apollon. 2, v. 317 and 600.—Lycoph. 1285.—Strab. 1 and 3.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—*Ovid. CYANEUS, a large river of Colchis.

CYARAXES, or CYAXĀRES, son of Phraortes, was king of Media or Persia. [In his reign the Scythians invaded his territory, and held Media and a great part of upper Asia for nearly 30 years. He destroyed them at last by stratagem, having invited them to a feast, and slain them when intoxicated. In conjunction with Nebucadnezzar he took and destroyed Nineveh. He died in the 40th year of his reign, and was succeeded by Astyages, upon whose death the crown devolved to Cyaxares 2d. This latter prince has been supposed to be the same with Darius the Mede, mentioned in Scripture. He reigned, in conjunction with Cyrus, until the year 336 B. C. when he died.]

CYBĒE, a name of Cybele, from κυβηβοι, because in the celebration of her festivals men were driven to madness.

CYBĒLE, [vid. end of the article,] a goddess, daughter of Cœlus and Terra, and wife of Saturn. She is supposed to be the same as Ceres, Rhea, Ops, Vesta, Bona Mater, Magna Mater, Berecynthia, Dindymene, &c. According to Diodorus, she was the daughter of a Lydian prince, called Menos, by his wife Dindymene; and he adds, that as soon as she was born she was exposed on a mountain. She was preserved and suckled by some of the wild beasts of the forest, and received the name of Cybele from the mountain where her life had been preserved. When she returned to her father's court, she had an intrigue with Atys, a beautiful youth, whom her father mutilated, &c. All the mythologists are unanimous in mentioning the amours of Atys and Cybele. The partiality of the goddess for Atys seems to arise from his having first introduced her worship into Phrygia. She enjoined him perpetual celibacy, and the violation of his promise was expiated by voluntary mutilation. In Phrygia the festivals of Cybele were observed with the greatest solemnity. Her priests, called Corybantes, Galli, &c. were not admitted in the service of the goddess without a previous mutilation. In the celebration of the festivals, they imitated the manners of madmen, and filled the air with dreadful shrieks and howlings, mixed with the confused noise of drums, tabrets, bucklers, and spears. This was in commemoration of the sorrow of Cybele for the loss of her favourite Atys. Cybele was generally represented as a robust woman, far advanced in her pregnancy, to intimate the fecundity of the earth. She held keys in her hand, and her head was crowned with rising turrets, and sometimes with the leaves of oak. She sometimes appears riding in a chariot, drawn by two tame lions; Atys follows by her side, carrying a ball in his hand, and supporting himself upon a fir-tree, which is sacred to the goddess. Sometimes Cybele is represented with a sceptre in her hand, with her head covered with a tower. She is also seen with many breasts, to shew that the earth gives aliments to all living creatures; and she generally carries two lions under her arms. From Phrygia the worship of Cybele passed into Greece, and was solemnly established at Eleusis, under the name of the Eleusian mysteries of Ceres. The Romans, by order of the Sibylline books, brought the statue of the goddess from Pessinus into Italy; and when the ship which carried it had run on a shallow bank of the Tiber, the virtue and innocence of Claudia were vindicated in removing it with her girdle. It is supposed that the mysteries of Cybele were first known about 1580 years B. C. The Romans were particularly superstitious in washing every year, on the 25th March, the chariot and sacred things of the goddess in the waters of the river Almon. There prevailed many obscenities in the observation of the festivals, and the priests themselves were the most eager to use indecent expressions, and to shew their unbounded licentiousness by the impurity of their actions. vid. Atys, Eleusis, Rhea, Corybantes, Galli, &c. [The first germ of the Grecian religion came from India, and many of the deities of the latter country will be found upon an attentive examination to have been the prototypes of those mentioned in classical mythology. Thus there is a very strong resemblance between Cybele and Pracriti, the goddess of nature among the Hindoos. Both are represented as drawn by lions; at the festival of Pracriti a drum is beaten, as it always was at that of Cybele: this drum is called Dindyma, and in the history of the goddess Cybele we find mention made of Mons Dindymus where her rites were celebrated, and of the appellation Dindymene given to the goddess herself. The priests of Cybele were called Curetes, and curta in the Sanscreeet language signifies castriatus. The parallel might be carried still farther.—As regards the name Cybele, and its metrical quantity, it is now a settled principle of philology that when the penult is long the word should be written Cybebe. vid.

CYBISTRIA, [a town of Cappadocia, in Cataonia, below Mons Argæus, and north of Tyana, according to D'Anville. The map of Asia Minor, however, which accompanies Mannert's Geography, varies in this respect, to say nothing of other discrepancies, essentially from that of the former. According to Mannert's chart, Tyana is situate near the centre of Cappadocia, and Cybistria is placed nearly due south from it, at a considerable distance. It is mentioned by Hierocles among the episcopal cities in Cappadocia. D'Anville makes the modern name Bustereh.] Cic. Div. 15.

CYCLÂDES, a name given to certain islands of the Ægean sea, that surround Delos, as with a circle; whence the name (κυκλῶν, circulus.) The principal were, Ceos, Naxos, Andros, Paros, Melos, Seriphos, Gyarus, Tenedos, &c. [The name given to these islands is not a very accurate one, as most of them lie west and south of Delos.] Plin. 4, c. 12.—Melo. 2, c. 7.—Ptol. 3, c. 15.—Strab. 10.—Dionys. Perieg.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 127, l. 8, v. 692.

CYCLÔPES, [vid. end of this article,] a certain race of men of gigantic stature, supposed to be the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They had but one eye, in the middle of the forehead; whence their name (κυκλῶν, circulus, ὁ ὀφθαλμῶς, oculus.) They were three in number, according to Hesiod, called Arges, Brontes, and Steropes. Their number was greater according to other mythologists, and in the age of Ulysses, Polyphemus was one of the most powerful. They inhabited the western parts of the island of Sicily, [but see end of this article;] and because they were uncivilized in their manners, the poets speak of them as men-eaters. The tradition of their having only one eye originates from their custom of wearing small bucklers of steel which covered their faces, and had a small aperture in the middle, which corresponded exactly to the eye. [vid. end of this article.] From their vicinity to mount Ætna, they have been supposed to be the workmen of Vulcan, and to have fabricated the thunderbolts of Jupiter. The shield of Pluto, and the trident of Neptune, were the produce of their labour. The Cyclops were reckoned among the gods, and we find a temple dedicated to their service at Corinth, where sacrifices were solemnly offered. Apollo destroyed them all, because they had made the thunderbolts of Jupiter, with which his son Æsculapius had been killed. From the different accounts given of the Cyclops by the ancients, it may be concluded that they were all the same people, to whom various functions have been attributed, which cannot be reconciled one to the other, without drawing the pencil of fiction or mythology. [Learned men have involved the question respecting the Cyclops in great obscurity, when the whole admits of a very easy and natural solution. The early religion of the Greeks was Sabaism, (compare the Greek term σεβασαι, "to worship," or, the adoration of the heavenly bodies, a system which came to them from the Oriental nations. Uranus (heaven) and Gea produced the Titans, the Giants and the Cyclops. The Titans were the same with the constellations, the Giants, with their hundred arms were the energies of nature, while the Cyclops represented the energies of the sky, as thunder and lightning. Their very names prove this, as well as the order in which they are usually given; thus, Steropes, (στεροπον), i. e. lightning; Arges (αργος) i. e. quick-flashing, as lightning; Brontes (βροντη) i. e. the noise of the thunder. In immediate connection with this mode of explaining the fables is the circumstance of but a single eye being assigned to the Cyclops. To the imagination of the early Greek, lightning and thunder were the weapons of Jupiter, which he hurled against a guilty world. The God of Olympus in the act of discharging his bolts would be pictured to their minds, by a rude though natural image, as closing one of his eyes for the purpose of taking a more effectual aim. Hence the fable. That this manner of explaining it is neither forced nor puerile will appear from the name given by the ancients to a Scythian nation, the Arimaspi, or, "One-eyed," who were excellent archers, and obtained this strange epithet from their habit of closing one eye in directing their arrows. Homer makes Ulysses in the course of his wanderings visit the land of the Cyclops. It has been usually supposed that Sicily was meant by the poet, an explanation involved however in many difficulties. In the first place, Homer never speaks of the land of the Cyclops as being an island, but only states that there was a small one in front of it. He represents their country moreover as very fertile, and spontaneously productive, so far indeed agreeing with Sicily, but the Cyclops are made at the same time to inhabit caves on the summits of lofty mountains, where the comparison totally ceases. Besides it would be very inconsistent in the poet to place the Cyclops, a race contemning the Gods, in an island sacred to, and in which were pastured the herds of the Sun. The distance too between the land of the Loto-phagi and that of the Cyclops could not have been very considerable, since it is not given in days and nights, a mode of measurement always adopted by Homer when the distance mentioned is a great one. Every thing conspires, therefore, to induce the belief that the Cyclops of Homer were placed by him on the coast of Africa, a little to the north of the Syrtis Minor. They who make them to have dwelt in Sicily blend an old tradition with one of more recent date. This last probably took its rise when Ætna and the Lipari islands were assigned to Vulcan, by the popular belief of the day, as his workshops, which could only have happened when Ætna had become better known, and Mount Moschylus in the isle of Lemnos, had ceased to be volcanic. As regards what are termed by the ancient writers Cyclopan walls, and were supposed by them to have been from their massy structure the works of a giant race, it is now well ascertained that they were reared by the ancient Pelasgi, and should consequently be called Pelasgian. Walls were styled Cyclopan by the ancients that were built of large masses of stone, which though rough were yet nicely and skilfully fitted together. Some of these still remain; as at Argos, Mycenæ, and Tiryns, in Greece, and at Cortona and elsewhere, in Italy. vid. Pelasgi.] Apollod. 1, c. 1 and 2.—Homer. od. 1 and 9.—*Hesiod. The illness of Alexander, resulting from this, is connected with the well known story of the physician Philip. On account of its antiquity, it was called by the Greeks, "the mother of cities." From Cydonia, the quince-tree was first brought into Italy, and thence the fruit was called malum Cydonium, or Cydonian apple. Its inhabitants were the best of the Cretan archers. Its modern name is Canea.] Ovid. Met. 8, v. 22.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 858.—Sil. 2, v. 109.—Liv. 37, c. 60.—Lucan. 7, v. 229.

CYDRARA, [a city of Phrygia. [CYCLICI, poetæ, a name given by the ancient grammarians to the minor poets who succeeded Homer. They were so termed, either from their selecting the materials for their poems from the whole compass (κυκλος) of mythological and epic narrative, from the union, namely, of Uranus and Gea, down to the death of Ulysses by the hand of Telegonus; or because the later grammarians formed out of their separate productions one united whole.]

CYLLARUS, a celebrated horse of Castor, according to Seneca, [Valerius Flaccus, and Claudian; but according to Virgil, of Pollux.] Virg. G. 3, v. 90.

CYMOLUS, [vid. Cimolus.] Ovid. 7, Met. v. 463.

CYNÆGIRUS, an Athenian, celebrated for his extraordinary courage. He was brother to the poet Æschylus. After the battle of Marathon, he pursued the flying Persians to their ships, and seized one of their vessels with his right hand, which was immediately severed by the enemy. Upon this he seized the vessel with his left hand, and when he had lost that also, he still kept hold with his teeth. Herodot. 6, c. 114.—Justin. 2, c. 9. [Herodotus merely relates, that he seized one of the Persian vessels by the stern, and had his hand cut off with an axe. The more detailed account is given by Justin. Phasis, an obscure painter, represented Cynægirus with both his hands, which Cornelius Longinus made the subject of an epigram, preserved in the Anthology.]

[CYNÆTHÆ, a town of Arcadia, on the river Crathis, near the northern borders, and some distance to the north-west of Cyllene. The inhabitants were remarkable for the barbarous rusticity of their manners, so as to be despised by, or almost excluded from associating with the other Greeks, who attributed their ferocity to a neglect of the study of music, so much cultivated among the Greeks in general.]

CYNESII and CYNETÆ, [according to Herodotus, the most western inhabitants of Europe, living beyond the Celtæ. Mannert makes them to have been situate in Spain, on both sides of the river Anas, and their western limit to have corresponded with the modern Faro in Algarve, while their eastern was the bay and islands formed by the small rivers Odiel and Tinto.] Herodot. 2, c. 33.

CYNICI, [a sect of philosophers, so called either from Cynosarges, where Antisthenes the founder of the sect lectured, or from the snarling humour of their master. This sect is to be regarded not so much as a school of philosophers as an institution of manners. It was formed rather for the purpose of providing a remedy for the moral disorders of luxury, ambition, and avarice, than with a view to establish any new theory of speculative opinions. The sole end of the Cynic philosophy was to subdue the passions, and produce simplicity of manners. Hence the coarseness of their outward attire, their haughty contempt of external good, and patient endurance of external ill. The rigorous discipline of the first Cynics, however, degenerated afterwards into the most absurd severity. The Cynic renounced every kind of scientific pursuit, in order to attend solely to the cultivation of virtuous habits. The sect fell gradually into disesteem and contempt, and many gross and disgraceful tales were propagated respecting them. vid. Diogenes.]

CYNISCA, a daughter of Archidamus king of Sparta, who obtained the first prize in the chariot races at the Olympic games. Paus. 3, c. 8.

CYNO, a woman who preserved the life of Cyrus. [Her name, in the Median language, was Spaco, according to Herodotus, who makes Cyno the Greek translation of it, and adds, that it signified, in the Median tongue, a female dog. It is not known whether the dialect of the Medes and Persians was the same. In such remains as we have of the Persian language, Burton and Reland have not been able to discover any term like this. Nevertheless Lefevre affirms that the Hyrcanians, a people in subjection to the Persians, call, even at the present time, a dog by the word Spac. Foster, in his letter to Michaëlis upon the origin of the Chaldees, thinks that he detects a resemblance between the Media Spaco and the Slavonic Sabaka, which has the same meaning. vid. Michaëlis Spicil-gium, vol. 2, p. 99.] Herodot. 1, c. 110.

CYNOCEPHALÆ, [eminences in Thessaly, south-east of Pharsalus, where the Romans under T. Quintius Flaminius gained a victory over Philip king of Macedonia, and put an end to the first Macedonian war. They are described by Plutarch as hills of small size, with sharp tops; and the name properly belongs to those tops, from their resemblance to the heads of dogs, (κυνων κεφαλαί.) Plut. vit. Flamin.]

CYNOCEPHALI, a nation in India, who had the head of a dog, according to some traditions. [They are supposed to have been merely a species of large baboons.—There was a promontory of this name upon the coast of the Red Sea, mentioned by Strabo, and another in Corcyra.] Plin. 7, c. 2.

CYNOPHONTIS, a festival at Argos, observed during the dog days. It received its name απο του κυναε φονειν, killing dogs, because they used to kill all the dogs they met.

CYNOS, a town in Thessaly, where Pyrrha, Deucalion's wife, was buried.

CYNOSARGES, [a place in the suburbs of Athens, where the school of the Cynics was held. It derived its name from a white dog, (κυνων αργος,) which, when Diomus was sacrificing to Hercules, snatched away part of the victim. It was adorned with several temples; that of Hercules was the most splendid. The most remarkable thing in it, however, was the Gymnasium, where all strangers, who had but one parent an Athenian, had to perform their exercises, because Hercules, to whom it was consecrated, had a mortal for his mother, and was not properly one of the immortals.] Herodot. 5 and 6.

CYNOSSEMA, (a dog's tomb.) a promontory of the Thracian Chersonesus, where Hecuba was changed into a dog, and buried. Ovid. 13, Met. 569.

CYNOSURA, a nymph of Ida in Crete. She nursed Jupiter, who changed her into a star which bears the same name. It is the same as the Ursa Minor. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 107.

CYNTHIA, a surname of Diana, from mount Cynthus, where she was born.

CYNTHIUS, a surname of Apollo, from mount Cynthus.

CYNTHUS, a mountain of Delos, so high that it is said to overshadow the whole island. [Modern travellers, however, represent it to be a hill of very moderate height. The city of Delos was at the foot of it.] Apollo was surnamed Cynthius, and Diana Cynthia, as they were born on the mountain, which was sacred to them. Virg. G. 3, v. 36.—Ovid. 6. Met. v. 304. Fast. 3, v. 346.

[CYPARISSÆ, a town of Messenia, situate at the mouth of the river Cyparissus. Its modern name is l'Acadia.]—A town of Peloponnesus, near Messenia. Liv. 32, c. 31.—Plin. 4, c. 5.

CYPARISSUS, a youth, son of Telephus of Cea, beloved by Apollo. He killed a favourite stag of Apollo's, for which he was so sorry, that he hined away, and was changed by the god into a cypress tree. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 680.—Ovid Met. 10, v. 121.

CYPRIANUS, a native of Carthage, who, though born of heathen parents, became a convert to christianity, and the bishop of his country. To be more devoted to purity and study, he abandoned his wife; and as a proof of his charity, he distributed his goods to the poor. He wrote 81 letters, besides several treatises, de Dei gratiâ, de virginum habitu, &c. and rendered his compositions valuable, by the information he conveys of the discipline of the ancient church, and by the soundness and purity of his theology. He died a martyr, A. D. 258. The best editions of Cyprian are that of Fell, fol. Oxon. 1682, and that re-printed Amst. 1700.

CYPRUS, a daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, who married Agrippa.—A large island in the Mediterranean sea, south of Cilicia, and west of Syria. [It was supposed to have been detached from the continent by some violent convulsion of nature. The opinions of more modern times, however, oppose this, and are in favour of its having been always an island. It was called by several names; Acamis, from one of its promontories; Amathusia, Paphia, and Salamina, from three of its ancient cities; Macaria, or the fortunate isle, from its fertility, mild climate, and beautiful scenery; Collinia, from its many hills Sphecia, from its ancient inhabitants, the Spheces; Cerastia, from the number of small capes by which its coasts are surrounded; Ærosa from its copper mines. The name Cyprus is not derived as some think, from the abundance of this last mentioned metal, but the metal gets its name from the island, which was called after an ancient king, who reigned there.] It has been celebrated for giving birth to Venus, surnamed Cypris, who was the chief deity of the place, and to whose service many places and temples were consecrated. It was anciently divided into nine kingdoms, and was for some time under the power of Egypt and afterwards of the Persians. The Greeks made themselves masters of it, and it was taken from them by the Romans. Its length, according to Strabo, is 1400 stadia. [Modern calculations make its length about 70 leagues from east to west; its breadth from north to south 30 leagues, and its circumference nearly 180.] There were three celebrated temples there, two sacred to Venus, and the other to Jupiter. The inhabitants were given much to pleasure and dissipation. Strab. 15.—Ptol. c. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 9.—Justin. 18, c. 5.—Plin. 12, c. 24, l. 33, c. 5, l. 36, c. 26.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

CYPSÉLDES, the name of three princes as descende its of Cypselus, who reigned at Co-ninth during 73 years. Cypselus was succeeded by his son Periander, who left his kingdom after a reign of 40 years, to Cypselus II.

CYPSĒLUS, a king of Arcadia, who married the daughter of Ctesiphon, to strengthen himself against the Heraclidæ. Paus. 4, c. 3. —A man of Corinth, son of Eetion, and father of Periander. He destroyed the Bacchiadæ, and seized upon the sovereign power, about 659 years before Christ. He reigned 30 years, and was succeeded by his son. Periander had two sons, Lycophron, and Cypselus, who was insane. Cypselus received his name from the Greek word κυσσῆλος, a coffer, because when the Bacchiadæ attempted to kill him, his mother saved his life by concealing him in a coffer. Paus. 5, c. 17.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 37.—Herodot. 1, c. 114, l. 5, c. 92. &c.—Aristot. Polit.—The father of Miltiades. Herodot. 6, c. 35.

CYRĒNAÏCA, a country of Africa, [east of the Syrtis Minor, and west of Marmarica. It corresponds with the modern Barca. Cyrenaica was considered by the Greeks a sort of terrestrial paradise. This was partly owing to the force of contrast, as all the rest of the African coast along the Mediterranean from Carthage to the Nile, was a barren, sandy and waste, and partly to the actual fertility of Cyrenaica itself. It was extremely well watered, and the inhabitants, according to Herodotus, employed eight months in collecting the productions of the land: the maritime places first yielded their fruits, then the second region, which they called the hills, and lastly those of the highest part inland. One of the chief natural productions of Cyrenaica was an herb called Silphium, a kind of laserpitium or assafoetida. It was fattening for cattle, rendering their flesh also tender, and a useful aperient for man. From its juice also when kneaded with clay a powerful antiseptic was obtained. The Silphium formed a great article of trade, and at Rome the composition above mentioned sold for its weight in silver. It is for this reason that the Silphium appeared always on the medals of Cyrene. Its culture was neglected, however, when the Romans became masters of the country, and pasturage more attended to. For the colonization of this district vid. Cyrene. It was called Pentapolis, from its having five towns of note in it, Cyrene, Barce, Ptolemais, Berenice, and Tauchira. All of these exist at the present day under the form of towns or villages, and, what is remarkable, their names are scarcely changed from what we may suppose the pronunciation to have been among the Greeks. They are now called Kurin, Barea, Tollamata, Bernic, and Taukera. For a full account of the Silphium, see the 36th vol. of the Memoires de l'Academ. des Belles Lettres, p. 18.]

CYRĒNAÏCA, a sect of philosophers who followed the doctrine of Aristippus. They placed their summum bonum in pleasure, and said that virtue ought to be commended because it gave pleasure. [Happiness consists not in tranquillity or indolence, but in a pleasing agitation of the mind or in active enjoyment. Pleasure is the ultimate object of human pursuit; it is only in subserviency to this, that fame, friendship, and even virtue, are to be desired. All crimes are venial, because never committed but through the immediate impulse of passion. Nothing is just or unjust by nature, but by custom and law. The business of philosophy is to regulate the senses in that manner which will render them most productive of pleasure. Since pleasure is to be derived not from the past or the future, but the present, a wise man will take care to enjoy the present hour, and will be indifferent to life or death. Such were the tenets of Aristippus.] Laert. in Arist.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

CYRĒNE, the daughter of the river Peneus, of whom Apollo became enamoured. He carried her to that part of Africa which is called Cyrenaica, where she brought forth Aristæus. She is called by some, daughter of Hypseus, king of the Lapithæ, and son of the Peneus. Virg. G. 4, v. 321.—Justin. 13, c. 7.—Pindar.—Pyth. 9.—A celebrated city [the capital of Cyrenaica], to which Aristæus, who was the chief of the colonists, settled there, gave his mother's name. [Others, however, derive it from a fountain in its neighbourhood, called Cyre.] Cyrene was situate in a beautiful and fertile plain, about eleven miles from the Mediterranean Sea. Its port was Apollonia. It gave birth to many great men, among whom were Callimachus, Eratosthenes, Carneades, Aristippus, &c. [Its territory produced a great number of excellent horses, a circumstance which led the Cyrenians to apply themselves to the study and practice of every thing relating to those animals.] The town of Cyrene was built by Battus, B. C. 630, and the kingdom was bequeathed to the Romans, B. C. 97, by king Ptolemy Apion. [Its modern name is Cu-rin.] Herodot. 3 and 4.—Paus. 10, c. 13.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 1, c. 8.—Plin. 5, c. 5.—Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 70.

CYRIĀDES, one of the thirty tyrants who harassed the Roman empire in the reign of Gallienus. He died A. D. 259.

CYRILLUS, a bishop of Jerusalem, who died A. D. 336. Of his writings, composed in Greek, there remain 23 catacheses, and a letter to the emperor Constantine, the best edition of which is Milles, fol. Oxon. 1703.—A bishop of Alexandria, who died A. D. 444. The best edition of his writings, which are mostly controversial in Greek, is that of Paris, fol. 7 vols. 1638.

CYRĒNOS, [vid. Corsica.]

CYRRHĒSTICA, a country of Syria, [north-east of the city Antiochia, and north of the district Chalybonitis. It was so called from its capital Cyrrhus, now Corus.] Plin. 5, c. 23.—Cic. Att. 5, ep. 18.

CYRSĪLUS, an Athenian, stoned to death by his countrymen, because he advised them to receive the army of Xerxes, and to submit to the power of Persia. Demosth. de Coronâ. Cic. 3, de Offic. c. 11.

CYRUS, a king of Persia, son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of Media. His father was of an ignoble family, whose marriage with Mandane had been consummated on account of the apprehensions of Astyages. (vid. Astyages.) Cyrus was exposed as soon as born; but he was preserved by a shepherdess, who educated him as her own son. As he was playing with his equals in years, he was elected king in a certain diversion, and he exercised his power with such an independent spirit, that he ordered one of his play companions to be severely whipped for disobedience. The father of the youth, who was a nobleman, complained to the king of the ill treatment which his son had received from a shepherd's son. Astyages ordered Cyrus before him, and discovered that he was Mandane's son, from whom he had so much to apprehend. He treated him with great coldness; and Cyrus, unable to bear his tyranny, escaped from his confinement, and began to levy troops to dethrone his grandfather. He was assisted and encouraged by the ministers of Astyages, who were displeased with the king's oppression. He marched against him, and Astyages was defeated in a battle, and taken prisoner, B. C. 559. From this victory the empire of Media became tributary to the Persians. Cyrus subdued the eastern parts of Asia, and made war against Cræsus, king of Lydia, whom he conquered, B. C. 548. He invaded the kingdom of Assyria, and took the city of Babylon, by drying the channels of the Euphrates, and marching his troops through the bed of the river while the people were celebrating a grand festival. He afterwards marched against Tomyris, the queen of the Massagetæ, a Scythian nation, and was defeated in a bloody battle, B. C. 530. The victorious queen, who had lost her son in a previous encounter, was so incensed against Cyrus, that she cut off his head, and threw it into a vessel filled with human blood, exclaiming, Satia te sanguine quem sitisti. Xenophon has written the life of Cyrus; but his history is not perfectly authentic. In the character of Cyrus, he delineates a brave and virtuous prince, and often puts in his mouth many of the sayings of Socrates. The chronology is false; and Xenophon, in his narration, has given existance to persons whom no other historian ever mentioned. The Cyropædia, therefore, is not to be looked upon as an authentic history of Cyrus the Great, but we must consider it as showing what every good and virtuous prince ought to be. Diod. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 75, &c.—Justin. 1, c. 5 and 7.—The younger Cyrus, was the younger son of Darius Nothus, and the brother of Artaxerxes. He was sent by his father at the age of sixteen, to assist the Lacedæmonians against Athens. Artaxerxes succeeded to the throne at the death of Nothus; and Cyrus who was of an aspiring soul, attempted to assassinate him. He was discovered, and would have been punished with death, had not his mother Parysatis saved him from the hands of the executioner by her tears and entreaties. [The sentence was commuted into banishment to the province of which Cyrus had been appointed Satrap by his father. The disgrace and ignominy to which he had been exposed excited in Cyrus a desire of revenge, which nothing could gratify but the dethronement of his brother. In furtherance of this end, he called in to his aid numerous bodies of Greek mercenaries, under various pretences, and at last took the field with an army of 100,000 barbarians, and about 13,000 Greeks. Artaxerxes met him with 900,000 men near Cunaxa. The Greeks soon routed the barbarians opposed to them, but committed an error in advancing too far in their pursuit. Cyrus was compelled, in order to avoid being surrounded by the rest of the king's army, to make an attack upon the centre, where his brother was in person. He routed the royal body-guard, but being hurried away by the violence of his feelings, the moment he espied the king, he engaged with him in a personal combat, wounded him, but was himself wounded and slain by a common soldier. Had Clearchus acted in conformity with the directions of Cyrus, and led his division against the king's centre, instead of being drawn off into pursuit of the flying enemy, the victory must have belonged to Cyrus.] Artaxerxes was so anxious of its being universally reported that his brother had fallen by his hand, that he put to death two of his subjects for boasting that they had killed Cyrus. [The Greeks after the battle began to negotiate with the king through Tissaphernes, who offered to lead them home. He treacherously violated his word, however, and having by an act of perfidy obtained possession of the persons of the Greek commanders, he sent them up to the king at Babylon, where they were put to death.] The Greeks were not, however, discouraged, though at a great distance from their country, and surrounded on every side by a powerful enemy. They unanimously united in the election of new commanders, among whom was Xenophon, and traversed a great part of the Asiatic provinces in spite of the continual attacks of the various barbarous nations through which they passed, and nothing is more truly celebrated in ancient history than the bold retreat of the ten thousand. The journey that they made from the place of their first embarkation till their return, has been calculated at 1155 leagues, performed in the space of 15 months, including all the time which was devoted to take rest and refreshment. This retreat has been celebrated by Xenophon, who was one of their leaders. [According to Diodorus and Diogenes Laertius, the expedition was undertaken by Cyrus in the 4th year of the 94th Olympiad. Larcher, on the contrary, in a dissertation inserted in the 17th vol. of the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, makes it to have been in the third year of that Olympiad, in the end of March or beginning of April. He makes the battle of Cunaxa to have been fought at the end of October, in the 4th year of the same Olympiad, and the time which the whole expedition occupied, including the retreat, down to the period when the Greeks entered the army of Thymbron, to have been two years.]

CYROPOLIS, [a large city of Asia, on the banks of the Jaxartes, founded by Cyrus. It was also called Cyreschata. Both of these names, however, are Greek translations of the true Persian terms. The termination of the last is the Greek ερχατην, expressing, as did the corresponding Persian one, the remote situation of the place. Alexander destroyed it, and built in its stead a city, called by the Roman geographers Alexandria Ultima, by the Greeks, however, Αλεξανδρεια ερχατην, of which the Latin is a translation. The modern Cogend is supposed by D'Anville to answer to the site of this city.]

CYRUS, [a large river of Asia rising in Iberia, and falling into the Caspian: now the Kur. This river waters the great valley of Georgia, and is increased by the Aragui, the Iora, probably the Iberus of the ancients, and the Alasan, which is their Alazo. When it reaches the plains of Shirvan its waters are mixed with those of the Arax or Araxes. These two rivers form several branches, sometimes united and sometimes separated, so that it appears uncertain, as it was in the time of Strabo and Ptolemy, whether their mouths were to be considered as separate, or if the Cyrus received the Araxes.]

CYTA, a town of Colchis, [at the mouth of the river Cyaneus,] famous for the poisonous herbs which it produces, and for the birth of Medea. Flacc. 6, v. 693.—Prop. 2, el. 1, v. 73.

CYTÆIS, a surname of Medea, from her being an inhabitant of Cyta. Propert. 2, el. 4, v. 7.

CYTHÆA, now Cerigo, an island on the coast of Laconia in Peloponnesus. It was particularly sacred to the goddess Venus, who was from thence surnamed Cytheræa, and who rose, as some suppose, from the sea, near its coasts. [Stephanus says that the island derived its name Cythera from a Phœnician named Cytherus who settled in it. Before his arrival it was called Porphyrus or Porphyrissa, because it abounded with porphyry, or, as others affirm on the authority of Aristotle, because the best scarlet was dyed here. The fable respecting Venus having arisen from the sea in its vicinity means nothing more than that her worship was introduced into the island by some maritime people, probably the Phœnicians. Cythera was a place of great importance to the Spartans, since an enemy, if in possession of it, would be thereby enabled to ravage the southern coast of Laconia. Hence the Argives, who originally held it, were driven out eventually by the Spartans. A magistrate was sent yearly from Sparta to examine into the state of the island, and so important a position was it, that Demaratus expressly advised Xerxes to seize it with a part of his fleet, since by that means he would compel the Spartans to withdraw from the confederacy and defend their own territories. Cythera (Cerigo) is now one of the Ionian islands.] Virg. Æn. 1, v. 262, l. 10, v. 5.—Paus. 3, c. 38.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 288. l. 15, v. 386. Fast. 5, v. 15.—Herodot. 1, c. 29.

CYTHÆRÆA, a surname of Venus.

CYTHNOS, [an island between Ceos and Seriphus, in the Mare Myrtoum. It was the birth-place of Cyadias an eminent painter. The cheese of Cythnos, according to Stephanus and Julius Pollux, was held in high estimation among the ancients. The island is now called Thermia. It was also called Ophiussa and Dryopis.]

CYTINIUM, one of the four cities in Doris. Strab. 9.—Thucyd. 1, c. 107, CYTŌRUS, [a city of Paphlagonia, on the coast between the promontory Carambis and Amastris. It is thought to have been founded by a colony of Milesians. According to Strabo it had been a port of the inhabitants of Sinope. In its vicinity was a mountain which produced a beautifully-veined species of box-tree. The city is said to have been founded by Cytor, son of Phryxus. It is now Kiros.] Catull. 4, v. 13.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 311.—Strab. 11.—Virg. G. 2, v. 437.

CYZICUM, or CYZICUS, an island of the Propontis, about 530 stadia in circumference, with a town called Cyzicus. Alexander joined it to the continent by two bridges, and from that time it was called a peninsula. [Strabo and Pliny both make it to have been an island until Alexander's time: Scylax, however, states that it was always a peninsula, and that the city was built at its neck. His authority is considered conclusive by Mannert, who is of opinion that the inhabitants may, after the time of Scylax, have separated it from the main land by a canal or ditch, for purposes of security; it is a peninsula at the present day. It was a flourishing commercial city, and called by Florus, the Rome of Asia. The ancient coins of the place, called Κυζικηνος στατηγες, were so beautifully executed that they were deemed a miracle of art. The inhabitants of Cyzicus laid claim to a very high antiquity for their city, and pretended that it was given by Jupiter to Proserpine for her dowry, on which account they worshipped her as their chief deity.] It had two harbours, called Panormus and Chytus, the first natural, and the other artificial. It was besieged by Mithridates, and relieved by Lucullus. Flor. 3, c. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 32.—Diod. 18.

CYZICUS, a son of Ceneus and Stilba, who reigned in Cyzicus. He hospitably received the Argonauts in their expedition against Colchis. After their departure from the court of Cyzicus, they were driven back in the night, by a storm, upon the coast; and the inhabitants, seeing such an unexpected number of men, furiously attacked them, supposing them to be the Pelagæi, their ancient enemies. In this nocturnal engagement many were killed on both sides, and Cyzicus perished by the hand of Jason himself, who honoured him with a splendid funeral, and raised a stately monument over his grave. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Flacc.—Apollon.—Orpheus.

DAÆ, DAHÆ, or DAI, now the Dalastan. a people of Scythia, [who dwelt on the south-eastern borders of the Caspian Sea, in the province of Hyrcania. They seem to have been a roving nomadic tribe. Virgil styles them indomiti, and Servius, in commenting on the passage of the poet where the term occurs, states that they extended to the northern part of Persia. He must allude evidently to the incursions they were accustomed to make into the countries south of Hyrcania.] Sil. 13, v. 764.—Lucan. 7, v. 429.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 728.

[DACIA, a large country of Europe, bounded on the south by the Danube, which separated it from Mœsia, on the north by Sarmatia, on the east by the Tyras and Pontus Euxinus, and on the west by the Jazyges Metanastæ. It corresponded nearly to Valachia, Transylvania, Moldavia, and that part of Hungary which lies to the east of the Tibiscus. or, Teiss, one of the northern branches of the Danube. In A. D. 105, Trajan, after a war of 15 years, added this country to the Roman empire. He erected a stately bridge over the Danube, 3325 English feet in length. This, his successor Aurelian destroyed: his motive in so doing is said to have been the fear lest the barbarians would find it an easy passage to the countries south of the Danube, for he had by a treaty abandoned to the Goths the Dacia of Trajan. On this occasion he named the province south of the Danube to which his forces were withdrawn, Dacia Aureliani. (vid. Mœsia.) There were afterwards distinguished in Dacia, the part bordering on the Danube and called Ripensis, and that which was sequestered in the interior country under the name of Mediterranea. This last was probably the same with what was more anciently termed Dardania. According to Strabo, the inhabitants of the eastern part of Dacia were called Getæ, with whom both the Greeks and Romans seem to have been better acquainted than with the Daci. From Dacus comes Davus, the common name of slaves in Greek and Roman plays. Getæ was used in the same sense.]

DACTÛLI, a name given to the priest of Cybele, which some derive from δακτυλος, finger, because they were ten, the same number as the fingers of the hand. Paus. 1, c. 8.

DÆDALA, a mountain and city of Lycia, where Dædalus was buried according to Pliny 5, c. 27.—A name given to Circe, from her being cunning, (διδάλαος), and like Dædalus addicted to deceit and artifice. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 232.—Two festivals in Bœotia. One of these was observed at Alalcomenos by the Platæans, in a large grove, where they exposed in the open air pieces of boiled flesh, and carefully observed whither the crows that came to prey upon them directed their flight. All the trees upon which any of these birds alighted were immediately cut down, and with them statues were made, called Dædala, in honour of Dædalus. The other festival was of a more solemn kind. It was celebrated every sixty years by all the cities of Bœotia, as a compensation for the intermission of the smaller festivals, for that number of years, during the exile of the Platæans. Fourteen of the statues, called Dædala, were distributed by lot among the Platæans, Lebædæans, Coroneans, Orchomenians, Thespians, Thebans, Tanagræans, and Chæroneans, because they had effected a reconciliation among the Platæans, and caused them to be recalled from exile, about the time that Thebes was restored by Cassander, the son of Antipater. During this festival, a woman in the habit of a bridemaid accompanied a statue which was dressed in female garments, on the banks of the Eurotas. This procession was attended to the top of mount Cithæron, by many of the Bœotians, who had places assigned them by lot. Here an altar of square pieces of wood, cemented together like stones, was erected, and upon it were thrown large quantities of combustible materials. Afterwards a bull was sacrificed to Jupiter, and an ox or heifer to Juno, by every one of the cities of Bœotia, and by the most opulent that attended. The poorest citizens offered small cattle; and all these oblations, together with the Dædala, were thrown in the common heap and set on fire, and totally reduced to ashes. They originated in this; When Juno, after a quarrel with Jupiter, had retired to Eubœa, and refused to return to his bed, the god, anxious for her return, went to consult Cithæron king of Platæa, to find some effectual measure to break her obstinacy. Cithæron advised him to dress a statue in woman's apparel, and carry it in a chariot, and publicly to report it was Platæa, the daughter of Asopus, whom he was going to marry. The advice was followed, and Juno, informed of her husband's future marriage, repaired in haste to meet the chariot, and was easily united to him, when she discovered the artful measures he made use of to effect a reconciliation. Pausan. & Plut.

DÆDALUS, an Athenian, son of Epaulamus, descended from Erechtheus, king of Athens. He was the most ingenious artist of his age, and to him we are indebted for the invention of the wedge, the axe, the wimble, the level, and many other mechanical instruments, and the sails of ships. He made statues, which moved of themselves, and seemed to be endowed with life. Talus, his sister's son, promised to be as great as himself, by the ingenuity of his inventions; and therefore, from envy, he threw him down from a window and killed him. After the murder of this youth, Dædalus, with his son Icarus, fled from Athens to Crète, where Minos, king of the country, gave him a cordial reception. Dædalus made a famous labyrinth for Minos, and assisted Pasiphæ, the queen, to gratify her unnatural passion for a bull. For this action, Dædalus incurred the displeasure of Minos, who ordered him to be confined in the labyrinth which he had constructed. Here he made himself wings with feathers and wax, and carefully fitted them to his body, and to that of his son, who was the companion of his confinement. They took their flight in the air from Crete; but the heat of the sun melted the wax on the wings of Icarus, whose flight was too high, and he fell into that part of the ocean, which from him has been called the Icarian Sea. The father, by a proper management of his wings, alighted at Cumæ, where he built a temple to Apollo, and thence directed his course to Sicily, where he was kindly received by Cocalus, who reigned over part of the country. He left many monuments of his ingenuity in Sicily, which still existed in the age of Diodorus Siculus. He was despatched by Cocalus, who was afraid of the power of Minos, who had declared war against him, because he had given an asylum to Dædalus. The flight of Dædalus from Crete with wings is explained, by observing that he was the inventor of sails, which in his age might pass at a distance for wings. Paus. 1, 7 and 9.—Diod. 4.—*Ovid. DÆMON, a kind of spirit, which, as the ancients supposed, presided over the actions of mankind, gave them their private counsels, and carefully watched over their most secret intentions. Some of the ancient philosophers maintained that every man had two of these Dæmons; the one bad, and the other good. These Dæmons had the power of changing themselves into whatever they pleased, and of assuming whatever shapes were most subservient to their intentions. At the moment of death, the Dæmon delivered up to judgment the person with whose care he had been intrusted; and according to the evidence he delivered, sentence was passed over the body. The Dæmon of Socrates is famous in history. That great philosopher asserted that the genius informed him when any of his friends was going to engage in some unfortunate enterprise, and stopped him from the commission of all crimes and impiety. [vid. Socrates.] The Genii or Dæmons, though at first reckoned only as the subordinate ministers of the superior deities, received divine honour in length of time, and we find altars and statues erected to a Genio loci, Genio Augusti, Junonibus, &c. Cic. Tusc. 1.—Plut. de Gen. Socr.

DAË. vid. Dæ.

DAÏDES, a solemnity observed by the Greeks. It lasted three days. The first was in commemoration of Latona's labour; the second in memory of Apollo's birth; and the third in honour of the marriage of Polalirius, and the mother of Alexander. Torches were always carried at the celebration; whence the name.

DALMATIUS, one of the Cæsars in the age of Constantine, who died A. D. 337.

DALMATIA, a part of Illyricum, at the east of the Adriatic. [Dalmatia was separated from Liburnia, the remaining part of Illyricum, to the south-east of which it lay, by the river Titius. Its modern name is Delmatia, from its ancient capital Delmum or Delminum, which the Romans took and destroyed A. U. C. 597. Dalmatia, according to ancient tradition, abounded with gold, and is partial in one of his epigrams calls it the land which produced gold.] Horat. 2, od. 1, v. 16.—Lamprid. in Commod. 8.—Strab. 7—Ptol. 2.

DAMAGETUS, a man of Rhodes, who inquired of the oracle what wise he ought to marry; and received for answer, the daughter of the bravest of the Greeks. He applied to Aristomenes, and obtained his daughter in marriage, B. C. 679. Paus. 4, c. 24.

DAMASCENE, a part of Syria near mount Libanus. [It derived its name from Damascus, which was situate in it.]

DAMASIUS, a stoic of Damascus, who wrote a philosophical history, the life of Isidorus, and four books on extraordinary events, in the age of Justinian. His works, which are now lost, were greatly esteemed, according to Photius.

DAMASCUS. [A rich and ancient city of Damascene in Syria, beautifully situated in a valley still called Gouteh Demesk, or, "the orchard of Damascus," and watered by a river called by the Greeks Bardine or Chryorrhoeas, "the golden stream," now Baradi. The Syriac name of the stream was Parphar. Damascus is supposed to have been founded by Uz, the eldest son of Aram. However this may be, it subsisted in the time of Abraham, and may be reckoned one of the most ancient cities in being. Damascus was seized by the Romans in the war of Pompey with Tigranes, B. C. 65, and remained in their possession until taken by the Saracens, A. D. 634. It is now the capital of a Pachalic. The Arabs call it El-Sham, and the oriental name Demesk is known only to geographers.] Lwan. 3, v. 215.—Justin. 36, c. 2.—Mela, 1, c. 11.

DAMASIPPUS, a merchant of old seals and vessels, who, after losing his all in unfortunate schemes in commerce, assumed the name and habit of a stoic philosopher. Horat. 2, Sat. 3.

DAMNII, [one of the ancient nations of Scotland, whose country answered to the modern Chydesdale, Renfrew, Lenox, and Stirling.]

DAMNONII [or DUMNONII, a people of Britain, whose country answered to the modern Devonshire and Cornwall. As the several tribes of the Damnonii submitted without much resistance to the Romans, and never joined in any revolt against them, their conquerors were under no necessity of building many forts, or keeping many garrisons in their country. Hence it happens that few Roman antiquities have been found here, and that the name of its people is seldom mentioned by the Roman writers.]

DAMO, a daughter of Pythagoras, who, by order of her father, devoted her life to per-actual celibacy, and induced others to follow her example. Pythagoras at his death intrusted her with all the secrets of his philosophy, and gave her the unlimited care of his compositions, under the promise that she never would part with them. She faithfully obeyed his injunctions; and though in the extreme poverty, she refused to obtain money by the violation of her father's commands. Laert. in Pythag.

DAMOCLES, one of the flatterers of Dionysius the elder, of Sicily. He admired the tyrant's wealth, and pronounced him the happiest man on earth. Dionysius prevailed upon him to undertake for a while the charge of royalty, and be convinced of the happiness which a sovereign enjoyed. Damocles ascended the throne, and while he gazed upon the wealth and splendour that surrounded him, he perceived a sword hanging over his head by a horse hair. This so terrified him that all his imaginary felicity vanished at once, and he begged Dionysius to remove him from a situation which exposed his life to such fears and dangers. Cic. in Tuscul. 5, c. 21.

DAMON, a poet and musician of Athens, intimate with Pericles and distinguished for his knowledge of government and fondness of discipline. He was banished for his intrigues about 430 years before Christ. C. Nep. 15, c. 2.—Plut. in Pericl.—A Pythagorean philosopher, very intimate with Pythias. When he had been condemned to death by Dionysius, he obtained from the tyrant leave to go and settle his domestic affairs, on promise of returning at a stated hour to the place of execution. Pythias pledged himself to undergo the punishment which was to be inflicted on Damon, should he not return in time, and he consequently delivered himself into the hands of the tyrant. Damon returned at the appointed moment, and Dionysius was so struck with the fidelity of those two friends, that he remitted the punishment, and entreated them to permit him to share their friendship, and enjoy their confidence. Val. Max. 4, c. 7.

DAMOPHILA, a poetess of Lesbos, wife of Pamphilus. She was intimate with Sappho, and not only wrote hymns in honour of Diana and of the gods, but opened a school, where the younger persons of her sex were taught the various powers of music and poetry. Philostr.

DANA, [a large town of Cappadocia D'Anville makes it to have been the same with Tyana, an opinion which is ably refuted by Mannert, who maintains that it lay more to the south-east, and coincides with the Tanadaris of Ptolemy. It is mentioned in Xenophon's Anabasis as being in the vicinity of the Cilician Gates. The position of Tyana on Mannert's chart is north of the Cilician pass; in D'Anville's, it is to the north-east.]

DANAË, the daughter of Acrisius king of Argos, by Eurydice. She was confined in a brazen tower by her father, who had been told by an oracle that his daughter's son would put him to death. His endeavours to prevent Danae from becoming a mother proved fruitless; and Jupiter, who was enamoured of her, introduced himself to her bed, by changing himself into a golden shower. From his embraces Danae had a son, with whom she was exposed on the sea by her father. The wind drove the bark which carried her to the coasts of the island of Seriphus, where she was saved by some fishermen, and carried to Polydectes king of the place, whose brother, called Dycis, educated the child, called Perseus, and tenderly treated the mother. Polydectes fell in love with her; but as he was afraid of her son, he sent him to conquer the Gorgons, pretending that he wished Medusa's head to adorn the nuptials which he was going to celebrate with Hippodamia, the daughter of Cœnomaus. When Perseus had victoriously finished his expedition, he retired to Argos with Danae, to the house of Acrisius, whom he inadvertently killed. Some suppose that it was Prætus the brother of Acrisius, who introduced himself to Danae in the brazen tower; and instead of a golden shower, it was maintained, that the keepers of Danae were bribed by the gold of her seducer. Virgil mentions that she came to Italy with some fugitives of Argos, and that she founded a city called Ardea. *Ovid. Met. 4, v. 611. Art. Am. 3, v. 415. DANAI, a name given to the people of Argos, and promiscuously to all the Greeks, from Danaus their king. Virg. and Ovid. passim.

DANAÏDES, the fifty daughters of Danaus king of Argos. When their uncle Ægyptus came from Ægypt with his fifty sons, they were promised in marriage to their cousins; but before the celebration of their nuptials, Danaus who had been informed by an oracle that he was to be killed by the hands of one of his sons-in-law, made his daughters solemnly promise that they would destroy their husbands. They were provided with daggers by their father, and all, except Hypermnestra, stained their hands with the blood of their cousins, the first night of their nuptials; and as a pledge of their obedience to their father's injunctions, they presented him each with the head of the murdered sons of Ægyptus. Hypermnestra was summoned to appear before her father, and answer for her disobedience in suffering her husband Lynceus to escape: but the unanimous voice of the people declared her innocent, and in consequence of her honourable acquittal, she dedicated a temple to the goddess Persuasion. The sisters were purified of this murder by Mercury and Minerva, by order of Jupiter; but, according to the more received opinion, they were condemned to severe punishment in hell, and were compelled to fill with water a vessel full of holes, so that the water ran out as soon as poured into it, and therefore their labour was infinite, and their punishment eternal. [Eusebius and some others suggest, that what had given rise to this fiction was, that they had laboured in digging wells in Argos, where some of them had been continually drawing water by pumps, which is a painful exercise; whence those who were condemned to this labour took occasion to say, that the gods, to punish these princesses, had sentenced them in hell to fill a vessel full of holes.] The names of the Danaides and their husbands were as follows, according to Apollodorus: Anymone married Enceladus; Automate, Busiris; Agave, Lycus; Scæa, Dayphron; Hippodamia, Ister; Rhodia, Chalcedon; Calyce, another Lynceus; Gorgophone, Proteus; Cleopatra, Agenor; Asteria, Chætes; Glauce, Aleis; Hippodamia, Dyacorytes; Hippomedusa, Alcmemon; Gorge, Hippothous; Iphimedusa, Euchenor; Rhode, Hippolitus; Pirea, Agostolemus; Cercestis, Dorion; Pharte, Eurydamas; Mnestra, Ægius; Evippe, Arigius; Anaxibia, Archelaus; Nello, Melachus; Clite, Clitus; Stenele, Stenelus; Chryssippe, Chryssippus; Autonoe, Eurylochus; Theano, Phantes; Electra, Peristhenes; Eurydice, Dryas; Glaucippe, Potamon; Autholea, Cisseus; Cleodora, Lixus; Evippe, Imbrus; Erata, Bromius; Stygne, Polyctor; Bryce, Chtonius; Actea, Periphas; Podarce, Ceneus; Dioxippe, Ægyptus; Adyte, Menalces; Ocipete, Lampus; Pilarge, Idmon; Hippodice, Idas; Adiante, Daiphron; Callidia, Pandion; Ceme, Arbelus; Celeno, Hixbius; Hyperia, Hippocoristes. The heads of the sons of Ægyptus were buried at Argos; but their bodies were left at Lerna, where the murder had been committed. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Horat. 3, od. 11.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 16.—Hygin. fab. 163, &c.

DANAPÉRIS, [another name for the Borysthenes, first mentioned in an anonymous Periplus of the Euxine Sea. It is now the Dnieper. The Dnieper rises in the Valdai hills, near the sources of the Duna, and after a winding course of about 800 miles, falls into the Black Sea a little to the east of the Dniester. In the lower part of its course the navigation is impeded by islands, and at one place, about 200 miles from its mouth, by falls which continue for nearly 40 miles. A little above its mouth the river widens into a kind of lake or marsh, called Liman, into which the Bog, the ancient Hypanis or Bogus, one of the principal tributaries of the Dnieper, discharges itself.]

[DANASTUS, another name of the Tyras or Dniester. It is called Danastus by Ammianus Marcellianus, Danastrus by Constantine, Porphyrogenitus; (de administr. Imperio, c. 8.) and Danaslu by Jornandes. The Dniester rises from a lake amid the Carpathian mountains in Austrian Galicia, and empties into the Black Sea, after a course of about 600 miles.]

DANÁUS, a son of Belus and Anchinoë, who, after his father's death, reigned conjointly with his brother Ægyptus on the throne of Egypt. Some time after, a difference arose between the brothers, and Danaus set sail with his fifty daughters in quest of a settlement. He visited Rhodes, where he consecrated a statue to Minerva, and arrived safe on the coast of Peloponnesus, where he was hospitably received by Gelanor, king of Argos. Gelanor had lately ascended the throne, and the first years of his reign were marked with dissensions with his subjects. Danaus took advantage of Gelanor's unpopularity, and obliged him to abdicate the crown. In Gelanor, the race of the Inachida was extinguished, and the Behdes began to reign at Argos in Danaus. Some authors say, that Gelanor voluntarily resigned the crown to Danaus on account of the wrath of Neptune, who had dried up all the waters of Argolis to punish the impiety of Inachus. The success of Danaus invited the fifty sons of Ægyptus to embark for Greece. They were kindly received by their uncle, who, either apprehensive of their number, or terrified by an oracle which threatened his ruin by one of his sons-in-law, caused his daughters, to whom they were promised in marriage, to murder them the first night of their nuptials. His fatal orders were executed, but Hypermnestra alone spared the life of Lynceus. (rid. Danaides.) Danaus, at first, persecuted Lynceus with unremitting fury, but he was afterwards reconciled to him, and he acknowledged him for his son-in-law and successor, after a reign of 50 years. He died about 1425 years before the Christian era, and after death he was honoured with a splendid monument in the town of Argos, which still existed in the age of Pausanias. According to Æschylus, Danaus left Egypt not to be present at the marriage of his daughters with the sons of his brother, a connexion which he deemed unlawful and impious. The ship in which Danaus came to Greece was called Armais, and was the first that had ever appeared there. It is said that the use of pumps was first introduced into Greece by Danaus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Paus. 2, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 163, &c.—Herodot. 2, c. 91, &c. 7, c. 94.

DANUBIUS, [the largest river of Europe (except the Rha, or Volga), and called in German the Donau, by us the Danube. Strabo and Pliny make it rise in the chain of Mons Abnoba, or the mountains of the Black forest. According to modern accounts it has its source near the small town of Donneschängen, in the court-yard of the palace of the princes of Furstenberg in Suabia. It is one of the few rivers which run from West to East, traversing Austria, Hungary, and part of Turkey in Europe, and, after a course of about 1620 miles, falls into the Black Sea. It is of irregular width, being sometimes confined between rocks and mountains, at other times so wide that it almost resembles a sea, and again broken and divided into small streams by numerous islands. It receives 60 navigable rivers, the largest of which is the Enus, or, Inn; and 120 smaller streams. It is always yellow with mud, and its sands are every where auriferous. At its entrance into the Black Sea, it is shallow, its waters are spread over an immense surface, and lie stagnating among an infinity of reeds and other aquatic plants. The current of the river communicates a whitish colour to the sea, and gives a freshness to it for nearly 9 leagues, and within one league renders it fit for use. Pomponius Mela says it had as many mouths as the Nile, of which three were small and four navigable. Only two now remain, which can scarcely be entered by ships of considerable size or burthen, the rest being choked up. The ancients gave the name of Ister to the eastern part of this river after its junction with the Savus or Saave. The Greeks and Romans were very imperfectly acquainted with the whole course of the stream, which was for a long period the northern boundary of the Roman empire in this quarter. This river was an object of worship to the Scythians. The river-god is represented on a medal of Trajan; but the finest figure of him is on the column of that emperor at Rome.] Dionys. Perieg.—Herodot. 2, c. 33, l. 4, c. 48, &c.—Strab. 4.—Phn. 4, c. 12.—Ammian. 23.

DAPHNÆ, a town of Egypt, 16 miles from Pelusium, [on the route from Memphis, on the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile.] Herodot. 2, c. 30.

DAPHNÆ, a daughter of the river Peneus or of the Ladon, by the goddess Terra, of whom Apollo became enamoured. This passion had been raised by Cupid, with whom Apollo, proud of his late conquest over the serpent Python, had disputed the power of his darts. Daphne heard with horror the addresses of the god, and endeavoured to remove herself from his importunities by flight. Apollo pursued her; and Daphne, fearful of being caught, entreated the assistance of the gods, who changed her into a laurel. Apollo crowned his head with the leaves of the laurel, and for ever ordered that the tree should be sacred to his divinity. Some say that Daphne was admired by Leucippus, son of Cœnoaus king of Pisa, who, to be in her company, disguised his sex, and attended her in the woods, in the habit of a huntress. Leucippus gained Daphnæ's esteem and love; but Apollo, who was his powerful rival, discovered his sex, and Leucippus was killed by the companions of Diana. [The fable of Apollo and Daphne merely denotes the perpetual verdure of the laurel, called Δαρύνη by the Greeks.] Ovid Met. 1, v. 452, &c.—Parthen. Erotic. c. 15.—Paus. 8, c. 20.—A daughter of Tiresias, priestess in the temple of Delphi, supposed by some to be the same as Manto. She was consecrated to the service of Apollo by the Epigoni, or, according to others, by the goddess Tellus. She was called Sibyl, on account of the wildness of her looks and expressions, when she delivered oracles. Her oracles were generally in verse, and Homer, according to some accounts, has introduced much of her poetry in his compositions. Didod. 4.—Paus. 10, c. 5.—A famous grove near Antioch, consecrated to voluptuousness and luxury.

DAPHNÉPHORIA, a festival in honour of Apollo, celebrated every ninth year by the Bœotians. It was then usual to adorn an olive bough with garlands of laurel and other flowers, and place on the top a brazen globe, on which were suspended smaller ones. In the middle was placed a number of crowns, and a globe of inferior size, and the bottom was adorned with a saffron-coloured garment. The globe on the top represented the sun, or Apollo; that in the middle was an emblem of the moon, and the others of the stars. The crowns, which were 365 in number, represented the sun's annual revolutions. This bough was carried in solemn procession by a beautiful youth of an illustrious family, and whose parents were both living. The youth was dressed in rich garments which reached to the ground, his hair hung loose and dishevelled, his head was covered with a golden crown, and he wore on his feet shoes called Iphicratidæ, from Iphicrates an Athenian who first invented them. He was called Δαφνιφόρος, laurel-bearer, and at that time he executed the office of priest of Apollo. He was preceded by one of his nearest relations, bearing a rod adorned with garlands, and behind him followed a train of virgins with branches in their hands. In this order the procession advanced as far as the temple of Apollo, sur-named Ismenius, where supplicatory hymns were sung to the god.—This festival owed its origin to the following circumstance: when an oracle advised the Ætoliæ, who inhabited Arne and the adjacent country, to abandon their ancient possessions, and go in quest of a settlement, they invaded the Theban territories, which at that time were pillaged by an army of Pelasgians. As the celebration of Apollo's festivals was near, both nations, who religiously observed it, laid aside all hostilities, and, according to custom, cut down laurel boughs from mount Helicon, and in the neighbourhood of the river Melas, and walked in procession in honour of the divinity. The day that this solemnity was observed, Polemates, the general of the Bœotian army, saw a youth in a dream that presented him with a complete suit of armour, and commanded the Bœotians to offer solemn prayers to Apollo, and walk in procession with laurel boughs in their hands every ninth year. Three days after this dream, the Bœotian general made a sally, and cut off the greatest part of the besiegers, who were compelled by this blow to relinquish their enterprise. Polemates immediately instituted a novennial festival to the god who seemed to be the patron of the Bœotians. Paus. Bœotic, &c.

DAPHNIS, a shepherd of Sicily, son of Merury by a Sicilian nymph. He was educated by the nymphs. Pan taught him to sing and play upon the pipe, and the muses inspired him with the love of poetry. It is supposed he was the first who wrote pastoral poetry, in which his successor Theocritus so happily excelled. He was extremely fond of hunting; and at his death, five of his dogs, from their attachment to him, refused all aliments, and pined away. From the celebrity of this shepherd, the name of Daphnis has been appropriated by the poets, ancient and modern, to express a person fond of rural employments, and of the peaceful innocence which accompanies the tending of flocks. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 13.—Diod. 4.

Into this river the body of Hesiod was thrown after his murder. vid. Hesiodus.]

DARABA, [a town of Ethiopia, placed by Strabo on the other side of the forest of Cumania, and in the vicinity of the country belonging to the people called Elephantophagi.]

DARANTASIA, a town of Belgic Gaul, called also Forum Claudii, and now Monstier.

DARDANIA, [a district of Troas, in the north, called so from its inhabitants the Dardani. These derived their name from Dardanus, who built here the city Dardania. [DARDANUS, a city of Troas, on the promontory Dardanis. It lay at the distance of 70 stadia from Rhæteum and about the same distance from the town of Abydos. It is said to have been founded by Dardanus and named after him. The city no longer exists, but the name is supposed to have been communicated to the Dardanelles or ancient Hellespont. In this city Mithridates and Sylla concluded peace.]

DARDANUS, a son of Jupiter and Electra, who killed his brother Jasius to obtain the kingdom of Etruria after the death of his reputed father Corytus, and fled to Samothrace, and thence to Asia Minor, where he married Batia, the daughter of Teucer, king of Teucris. After the death of his father-in-law he ascended the throne, and reigned 62 years. He built the city of Dardania, and was reckoned the founder of the kingdom of Troy. He was succeeded by Erichthonius. According to some, Corybas, his nephew, accompanied him to Teucris, where he introduced the worship of Cybele. Dardanus taught his subjects to worship Minerva; and he gave them two statues of the goddess, one of which is well known by the name of Palladium. *Virg. DARES, a Phrygian, who lived during the Trojan war, in which he was engaged, and of which he wrote the history in Greek. This history was extant in the age of Ælian; the Latin translation, now extant, is universally believed to be spurious, though it is attributed by some to Cornelius Nepos. [The best edition is that of Madame Dacier, in Usum Delphini, Paris, 1620, 4to. This edition, however, is very rare, and its place is usually supplied by a re-print, edited by Perizonius, Amst. 1702, 4to.] *Homer. DARIUS, [for the import of this name in ancient Persian, and other particulars, vid. Darius,] a noble satrap of Persia, son of Hystaspes, who conspired with six other noblemen to destroy Smerdis, who usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses. On the murder of the usurper, the seven conspirators universally agreed that he whose horse neighed first should be appointed king. In consequence of this resolution, the groom of Darius previously led his master's horse to a mare at a place near which the seven noblemen were to pass. On the morrow before sun-rise, when they proceeded to the appointed place, after riding up and down, they came at length to the spot whither the horse had been led the preceding evening; the horse recollecting the mare, suddenly neighed; and at the same time a clap of thunder was heard, as if in approbation of the choice. The noblemen dismounted from their horses, and saluted Darius king; and a resolution was made among them, that the king's wives should be taken from no other family but that of the conspirators, and that they should for ever enjoy the unlimited privilege of being admitted into the king's presence without previous introduction. Darius was 29 years old when he ascended the throne, and he soon distinguished himself by his activity and military accomplishments. He besieged Babylon; which he took after a siege of 20 months, by the artifice of Zopyrus. From thence he marched against the Scythians, and in his way conquered Thrace. This expedition was unsuccessful; and, after several losses and disasters in the wilds of Scythia, the king retired with shame. [The expedition of Darius into Scythia has given rise to considerable discussion, the point involved being to ascertain how far the Persian monarch penetrated into the country. According to Herodotus, he crossed the Thracian Bosphorus, marched through Thrace, passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, and then pursued a Scythian division as far as the Tanais. Having crossed this river, he traversed the territories of the Sauronatae as far as the Budini, whose city he burnt. Beyond the Budini he entered upon a vast desert, and reached the river Oarus, where he remained some considerable time, erecting forts upon its banks. Finding that the Scythians had disappeared, he left these works only half-finished, turned his course to the westward, and advancing by rapid marches, entered Scythia, where he fell in with two of the divisions of the enemy. Pursuing these, he traversed the territories of the Melanchlæni, Androphagi, and Neuri, without being able to bring them to an engagement. Provisions failing, he was eventually compelled to recross the Danube, (vid. Histieus,) glad to have saved a small portion of his once numerous army. According to Rennel, the Persian monarch, in marching against the Scythians, crossed the Danube between Ismail and the junction of that river with the Pruth, and penetrated as far as Saratow on the Wolga. It is very doubtful, however, whether Darius proceeded as far as this, especially when we take into consideration the time consumed by a Persian army in making an expedition, and the difficulty of crossing large and rapid rivers. According to other accounts, (Strabo 7, p. 305,) Darius only came as far as the sandy tract between the Danube and the Tyras, in the present Bessarabia, where, in after days, Antigonus was taken prisoner by the Scythians, with his whole army. To wipe away the disgrace of this unfortunate enterprise, we find the Persian monarch shortly after undertaking an expedition against India. In this he was more successful, and conquered a part of the Pendjab; not, however, the whole country, as some modern writers erroneously represent. Some time after this, Miletus having revolted, and Aristagoras, its ruler, having solicited aid from the Athenians, for the purpose of enabling it to maintain its independence, they sent twenty ships, to which the Eretrians added five more, in order to requite a kindness previously received from the Milesians. Aristagoras, upon this succour arriving, resolved to make an expedition against Sardis, the residence of the Persian satrap. Accordingly, landing at Ephesus, the confederates marched inland, took Sardis, and drove the governor into the citadel. Most of the houses in Sardis were built of reeds; and even those which were built of brick, were roofed with reeds. One of these was set on fire by a soldier, and immediately the flame spread from house to house, and consumed the whole city. The light of the conflagration shewing to the Greeks the great numbers of their opponents, who were beginning to rally, being constrained by necessity to defend themselves, as their retreat was cut off by the river Pactolus, the former retired through fear, and regained their ships. Upon the receipt of this intelligence Darius having called for a bow, put an arrow into it and shot it into the air, with these words, "Grant, O Jupiter, that I may be able to revenge myself upon the Athenians." After he had thus spoken he commanded one of his attendants thrice every time dinner was set before him, to exclaim, "master! remember the Athenians." Mardonius the king's son-in-law was entrusted with the care of the war. After crossing the Hellespont, he marched down through Thrace, but in endeavouring to double Mount Athos, he lost 300 vessels, and it is said more than 20,000 men. After this he was attacked in the night by the Brygi, who killed many of his men, and wounded Mardonius himself. He succeeded, however, in defeating and reducing them under his power, but his army was so weakened by these circumstances that he was compelled to return ingloriously to Asia. Darius, more animated by this loss, sent a more considerable force, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, with orders to sack the cities of Athens and Eretria, and to send to him all the surviving inhabitants in fetters. The Persians took the isle of Naxos and the city of Eretria in Eubœa, but were defeated with great slaughter by the Athenians and Platæans under the celebrated Miltiades at Marathon. Their fleet was also completely unsuccessful in an attempt to surprise Athens after the battle. vid. Miltiades and Marathon.] Darius was not disheartened by this severe blow, but he resolved to carry on the war in person, and immediately ordered a still larger army to be levied. He died in the midst of his preparations, B. C. 485, after a reign of 36 years, in the 65th year of his age. [This sovereign is entitled to the praise of wisdom, justice, and humanity, when compared with the generality of eastern despots.] Herodot. 1, 2, &c.—Diod. 1.—Justin. 1, c. 9.—Plut. in Arist.—C. Nep. in Miltiad.—The second king of Persia of that name, was also called Ochus in Persian, in Greek Nothus, because he was the illegitimate son of Artaxerxes Longimanus by a concubine. Soon after the murder of Xerxes he ascended the throne of Persia, and married Parysatis, his sister, a cruel and ambitious woman, by whom he had Artaxerxes Mnemon, Amestris, and Cyrus the younger. He carried on many wars with success, under the conduct of his generals and of his son Cyrus. He died B. C. 404, after a reign of 19 years, and was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes, who asked him on his death-bed, what had been the guide of his conduct in the management of the empire, that he might imitate him? The dictates of justice and of religion, replied the expiring monarch. Justin. 5, c. 11.—Diod. 12.—The third of that name was the last king of Persia, surnamed Codomanus. The eunuch Bagoas raised him to the throne, though not nearly allied to the royal family, in hopes that he would be subservient to his will; but he prepared to poison him when he saw him despise his advice, and aim at independence. Darius discovered his perfidy, and made him drink the poison which he had prepared against his life. The peace of Darius was early disturbed, and Alexander invaded Persia to avenge the injuries which the Greeks had suffered from the predecessors of Darius. [Darius did not take the command of his army in person, until after the battle of Granicus had been fought, and Alexander had advanced into Cilicia. He then proceeded to meet him in all the pomp of royalty, but with a force ill adapted to contend with such an enemy. He resolved, nevertheless, to hazard a battle, contrary to the advice and opinion of his Greek allies. The battle at Issus was fought, and Darius took the command, but fled with such precipitation that he left behind him his bow, shield, and mantle. His camp was plundered, and his mother, wife and children fell into the hands of the conqueror. In vain, after this, did Darius supplicate for an accommodation; Alexander went on in the career of victory, and in a second pitched battle, at Gaugamela, commonly called the battle of Arbela, (vid. Arbela) Darius again fought and again disgracefully fled. He now lost Babylon, Susa, Persepolis, and all his treasures, and sought for personal safety at Ecbatana; but his misfortunes had alienated the minds of his subjects, and he was seized by Bessus, governor of Bactriana, who assumed the royal authority in his stead. Alexander closely pursued the usurper and his captive beyond the Caspian straits. On reaching the camp of Bessus at the close of the pursuit, Darius was found extended on his chariot, pierced with many darts.] He asked for water, and exclaimed, when he received it from the hand of a Macedonian, "It is the greatest of my misfortunes that I cannot reward thy humanity. Beg Alexander to accept my warmest thanks for the tenderness with which he has treated my wretched family, whilst I am doomed to perish by the hand of a man whom I have loaded with kindness." These words of the dying monarch were reported to Alexander when he came up, who covered the dead body with his own mantle, and honoured it with a most magnificent funeral. The traitor Bessus met with a due punishment from the conqueror, who continued his kindness to the unfortunate family of Darius. [DARICUS, a Persian coin of the purest gold, equal to 20 Attic silver drachmæ, and of which consequently 5 went to a Mina, and 300 to a Talent. Its value in the currency of our own times is, however, very differently estimated by various writers. Reckoning the Attic drachma equal to 7½d. sterling, which is the ordinary computation, the darick will be equivalent to 13s. sterling, wanting one penny. If, however, it be supposed equal to 3½d. st. then the darick will be 13s. 9d. sterling. But M. Gosselin, (Coray, Plut. Parall. 5, p. 446,) estimates it at about 28½ francs, very nearly 5 dollars 75 cents, of our currency: a computation which appears much too large.—The darick had on one side the head of Darius, whence the name of the coin, and on the reverse an archer bending his bow. This gave rise to the witticism of Agesilaus, who said that he had been driven out of Asia by thirty thousand archers, meaning so many daricks distributed among the Greek cities by the Persian king. Who the Darius was from whom the coin received its name has never been clearly ascertained. According to the scholiast on Aristophanes (Eccles. 589,) and also Harpocration and Suidas, the darick did not obtain this appellation from the son of Hystaspes, but from a more ancient king of the name of Darius. Hence some writers are led to infer that Darius the Mede, who is mentioned by Daniel, (c. 5, v. 31,) was the same with the Cyaxares of whom Xenophon speaks. vid. Prideaux Hist. Connect. 1, 2, 538.—Hutchinson. ad Xen. Cyrop. 5, 2, 3.—Perizon. ad Ælian. V. H. 1, 22.) Wesseling, however, maintains the contrary, and ascribes the origin of the coin in question to the son of Hystaspes; 1st, because we find no mention made by the Greeks of any more ancient Darius than the one just alluded to; and 2d. because, as the lineage of the monarch is given by Herodotus, Darius the son of Hystaspes appears to have been the first who bore the name. Zeune conjectures (what in fact seems more than probable) that Darius the son of Hystaspes, only corrected, and gave his name to, an ancient coinage already existing.—As regards the import of the name Darius in Persian, Herodotus informs us that it signified, "one who restrains," (ἑξέλις.) But he is at variance with Hesychius, who makes it equivalent to εὐρύμορος, "prudent." The scanty remains which we have of ancient Persian have prevented the ablest oriental scholars, such as Bochart, Hyde, Reland, Anquetil, &c. from reconciling this discrepancy. *vid. Reland. [DASCYLUM, a city of Bithynia, in the district Olympena, placed by D'Anville on a lake at the mouth of the small river Horisius, which runs, according to him, into the Propontis. Mannert, however, locates it to the west of the mouth of the river Gebes or Gelbes, and makes the Horisius flow to the west towards the Rhyndacus. This city is named by Strabo and Ptolemy Dascylum, as it is here given, but by Mela and Pliny, Dascylos. During the continuance of the Persian empire it was the residence of the satrap of Mysia and Phrygia Minor; hence immediately after the battle of Granicus, Alexander despatched Parmenio to take possession of it. The modern name, according to D'Anville, is Diaskillo.]

DATAMES, a son of Camissares, governor of Caria, and a distinguished general of the armies of Artaxerxes. [The success and high merit of Datames excited the envy of the courtiers, who determined to ruin him. Datames, apprised of their intentions, resolved to be beforehand with them by quitting the king's service and making himself independent.] He was treacherously killed by Mithridates, who had invited him under pretence of entering into the most inviolable connection and friendship, 362 B. DATAPHERNES, one of the friends of Bessus. After the murder of Darius, he betrayed Bessus into Alexander's hands. He also revolted from the conqueror, and was delivered up by the Dahæ. Curt. 7, c. 5 and 8.

DATIS, a general of Darius 1st, sent with an army of 200,000 foot, and 10,000 horse, against the Greeks, in conjunction with Artaphernes. He was defeated at the celebrated battle of Marathon by Miltiades, and some time after put to death by the Spartans. This commander, in the exultation which he felt on occasion of his first success in reducing Naxos, (vid. Darius) exclaimed ὄς ἴδραμαι καὶ περποιαὶ καὶ χαιρομαι! The word χαιρομαι is a barbarism, for the Greeks always said χαίρω. These kinds of barbarisms were afterwards called Datisms. vid. Aristoph. Pax. v. 290, and the remarks of the scholiast on v. 288.] C. Nep. in Milit.

DATOS, [a town of Europe, which after having belonged to Thrace, was transferred to Macedonia when the empire was extended on that side. It was situate not far from the coast, to the north-east of Amphipolis, and near the southern extremity of the range of Mount Pangæus. It stood on a craggy hill, having a forest to the north, and to the south a lake or marsh at a small distance from the sea. Proserpine is said to have been gathering flowers here when she was carried away by Pluto. (vid. however, Enna.) This place was proverbially rich, on account of the mines of gold in its territory. It was at first called Crenides, from the fountains (κρηναὶ) which abounded in the hill on which it was built. Callistratus, the Athenian, afterwards gave it the name of Datos, expressive, as some suppose, of the abundance which prevailed there. When Philip, king of Macedonia, took possession of it, he fortified it and called it Philippi.] Appian. de Civ.

DAULIS, a nymph from whom the city of Daulis in Phocis, anciently called Anacris, received its name. It was there that Philomela and Procne made Tereus eat the flesh of his son, and hence the nightingale, into which Philomela was changed, is often called Daulias avis. Ovid. ep. 15, v. 154.—Strab. 9.—Paus. 10, c. 3.—Ptol. 3, c. 15.—Liv. 32, c. 18.—Plin. 4, c. 3.

DAUNUS, a son of Pilumnus and Danae. He came from Illyricum into Apulia, where he reigned over part of the country, which from him was called Daunia, and he was still on the throne when Diomedes came to Italy. [vid. Diomedes.] Ptol. 3, c. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—A river of Apulia, now Carapelle. Horat. 3, od. 30.

DECAPŌLIS, [a country of Palestine, lying to the east and south-east of the sea of Tiberias. It seems to have belonged originally to the possessions of the kingdom of Israel, but was afterwards reckoned as a part of Syria. Pliny and Ptolemy both speak of it as forming a part of the latter country. The name is derived from the circumstance of ten cities (δέκα πόλεις), contained in it, having formed a confederation in order to oppose the Asmonæan princes, by whom the Jewish nation was governed until the time of Herod. The inhabitants were not Jews, but for the most part of Grecian origin. These ten cities, according to Ptolemy, were Scythopolis, Hippod, Gadara, Dion, Pella, Gerasa, Philadelphia, Canatha, Capitolias, and Gadara. Pliny, instead of the two last, gives Damascus and Raphana; in the rest his account agrees with that of Ptolemy, who seems more worthy of reliance in this instance than the Roman writer.] Plin. 5, c. 18.

DECEBALUS, a warlike king of the Daci, who made a successful war against Domitian. He was conquered by Trajan, Domitian's successor, and he obtained peace. His active spirit again kindled rebellion, and the Roman emperor marched against him, and defeated him. He destroyed himself, and his head was brought to Rome, and Dacia became a Roman province A. D. 103. Dio. 68.

DECELEUM, or EA, [now Biola Castro, a small village of Attica, north-east of Athens, near the sources of the Cephisus. It was taken and fortified by the Lacedæmonians in the 19th year of the Peloponnesian war, and from it they greatly annoyed the Athenians.]

DECEMVIRI, ten magistrates of absolute authority among the Romans. The privileges of the patricians raised dissatisfaction among the plebeians; who, though freed from the power of the Tarquins, still saw that the administration of justice depended upon the will and caprice of their superiors, without any written statute to direct them, and convince them that they were governed with equity and impartiality. The tribunes complained to the senate, and demanded that a code of laws might be framed for the use and benefit of the Roman people. This petition was complied with, and three ambassadors were sent to Athens, and to all the other Grecian states, to collect the laws of Solon, and of the other celebrated legislators of Greece. Upon the return of the commissioners, it was universally agreed that ten new magistrates, called Decemviri, should be elected from the senate to put the project into execution. Their power was absolute; all offices ceased after their election, and they presided over the city with regal authority.

They were invested with the badges of the consul, in the enjoyment of which they succeeded by turns, and only one was preceded by the fasces, and had the power of assembling the senate and confirming decrees. The first decemvirs were Appius Claudius, T. Genutius, P. Sextus, Sp. Veturius, C. Julius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius Plurarius, T. Romulus, Sp. Posthumius, A. U. C. 303. Under them the laws which had been exposed to public view, that every citizen might speak his sentiments, were publicly approved of as constitutional, and ratified by the priests and augurs in the most solemn and religious manner. These laws were ten in number, and were engraved on tables of brass; two were afterwards added, and they were called the laws of the twelve tables, leges duodecim tabularum, and leges decemvirales. The decemviral power, which was beheld by all ranks of people with the greatest satisfaction, was continued; but the decemvirs now soon became odious on account of their tyranny, and the attempt of Ap. Claudius to ravish Virginia was followed by the total abolition of the office. The people were so exasperated against them, that they demanded them from the senate, to burn them alive. Consuls were again appointed, and tranquillity re-established in the state. [The affair of the decemviri is involved in considerable obscurity. A careful examination of the whole subject gives rise to the suspicion, that it was an artful and well concerted scheme on the part of the nobility to regain the power of which they had been dispossessed by the gradual encroachments of the commons, and was only frustrated by the selfish and inordinate ambition of the leading agents. In Rome (far earlier in its origin than the era of Romulus,) the patricians seem to have formed the ruling portion of the inhabitants. By engrossing all the power, and by intermarriages among themselves, they had become a distinct and peculiar caste. Perhaps they were so even from their very origin, since there is strong reason to believe that they were descended from some sacerdotal or sacred caste, especially as we find sacred rites attached to, and invariably accompanying, each patrician gens, and as all the sacerdotal offices were at first filled by none but persons of patrician rank. The early inhabitants along the Tiber would seem to have been nothing less than vassals of this higher order, a relation which was afterwards softened down into that of patron and client by Romulus, who appears to have come in as conqueror, and was finally taken off by those whose power he was beginning gradually to diminish. If, however, the lower orders of the early population of Rome were held in such subjection and dependence by the higher class, it was not so afterwards. In proportion as strangers, and especially Latins, flocked into the city, the inferior orders began to throw off their subjection, and to assume a more independent tone. The Plebeian order now arose, composed in a great measure of men strangers to, and disposed to resist, the haughty commands of the patricians, who on their side wished to bring matters back to their ancient footing. Hence the secret of all the contests between the two orders. A desperate effort was finally made by the patricians. The people had been clamorous for a code of laws, a demand which the patricians, in whom the whole judiciary power was vested, and to whom the knowledge of the few laws which then existed was confined, had always very strenuously opposed. After violent altercations between the two orders, the patricians on a sudden yielded to the popular wish, and became apparently as desirous of a code of laws as the people themselves were; when, however, it came to the choice of commissioners who should be sent abroad for the purpose of inspecting foreign codes, the nobility insisted that all three deputies should be of patrician rank. They gained their point, and three of their own order were sent. That these deputies actually went to Greece is a point far from being well established. Indeed, the contrary would seem much nearer the truth. We have, it is true, the authority of Florus, Orasius, and Aurelius Victor, in favour of the Roman laws having been compiled from the code of Solon; but, on the other hand, Diodorus Siculus, who makes mention of the Decemviri, and of the laws compiled by them, says nothing of the Romans having sent to Athens for that purpose; and in none of the works of Cicero is any account given of this deputation. It must not be denied, however, that Dion Cassius makes Cicero remark, a little after the death of Cæsar, that their forefathers had not disdained to borrow some laws from Athens; and Cicero himself, in his treatise "on laws", speaking of a funeral law of the twelve tables, states that it was nearly all borrowed from one of the laws of Solon. In opposition to this, however, it may be urged that a comparison of the fragments we possess of the decemviral laws with the code of Solon, shews so striking a discrepancy in general, as to lead at once to the belief that the coincidences mentioned by Cicero are to be explained on other and different grounds. Why, it may be asked, if the Roman code was borrowed from the Greek, did it breathe so little of the spirit of Grecian legislation, and contain so many things peculiar to the Romans and foreign to the Greeks? how came it that Hermodorus of Ephesus, who is reported to have interpreted and explained the Attic laws to the Roman commissioners, used many Latin terms, such as auctoritas, libripens, assiduus proletarius, and many others, for which there were no equivalent expressions among the Greeks? But the authority of Cicero himself is conclusive on this point. He hesitates not to rank the laws of the twelve tables far above those of Greece. "It is easy," he observes, "to perceive how much the wisdom and prudence of our forefathers surpassed that of other nations, if you compare our laws with those of Lycurgus.

Draco, and Solon. It is incredible how ill digested and almost ridiculous every system of civil law is, excepting our own. This I repeat every day, when in my discourses I prefer the wisdom of our Romans to that of other men, and in particular of the Greeks." (Cic de Orat. 1, c. 44). Is this the language of a man who believed that the decemviri had been indebted for the code which they promulgated to the legislators of Greece?—The truth appears to be that whatever admixture of Grecian laws there was in the Roman code, was derived from Grecian customs and usages prevalent at the time both in the vicinity of Rome and in the city itself, which forms one of the arguments against the commonly received notion of the origin of Rome. This city was in a great degree of Grecian origin. (vid. Roma.) To these Grecian customs were added others peculiar to the Romans. These last were in fact the old Leges Regiæ, which, as the ancient writers inform us, were observed, after the expulsion of the kings, not as written law, but as customs. The patricians might well be anxious to give them the sanction of written laws, as it is highly probable, being of regal institution, that they breathed more or less of an aristocratical spirit. Now the concurrence of the nobility in the views of the people, as regarded a code of laws, appears to have been all a preconceived plan. They wished to destroy the tribunician power, and bring in laws which would tend to strengthen their own hands. The short time in which the decemviri were occupied with digesting the code in question shews that the laws had already been compiled and arranged by the patricians, and that their object merely was to present them under the sanction of some esteemed and respected name, as that of Solon, to the Roman people. The very continuance of the decemviral office shews this; and Dionysius of Halicarnassus expressly states that the want of two additional tables was a mere pretext to continue the office, and crush the tribunician power. It was no difficult thing for the patricians to impose on the lower orders, and give them old Roman laws for Athenian ones, especially as the patricians were the sole depositaries of the ancient laws. The whole history of the decemviri would shew that until a short time previous to their abdication, they acted with a full understanding on the part of the patricians, and that even towards the close of their administration, when they wanted levies of troops, the opposition of the senate was little better than a mere farce. Had Appius not been tempted to play the tyrant, and to endeavour to monopolise too large a portion of the decemviral power, the plans of the nobility might have had a successful result.]—[There were also military decemviri; and on various emergencies, decemviri were created to manage and regulate certain affairs after the same manner as boards of commissioners are now appointed. Thus, there were decemviri for conducting colonies, decemviri who officiated as judges in litigated matters under the prætor; decemviri for dividing the lands among the veteran soldiers; decemviri to prepare and preside at feasts in honour of the gods; decemviri to take care of the sacrifices; and decemviri to guard the Sibylline books. With regard to the last of these, however, it must be observed that the number, after having been originally two, and then increased to 10, was subsequently still farther increased to 15 and 16. vid. Sibyllæ.]

DECIA LEX, was enacted by M. Decius the tribune, A. U. C. 443, to empower the people to appoint two proper persons to fit and repair the fleets.

DECIVS MUS, a celebrated Roman consul, who, after many glorious exploits, devoted himself to the gods Manes for the safety of his country, in a battle against the Latins, 338 years B. C. His son Decius imitated his example, and devoted himself in like manner in his fourth consulship, when fighting against the Gauls and Samnites, B. C. 296. His grandson also did the same in the war against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, B. C. 280. This action of devoting himself, was of infinite service to the state. The soldiers were animated by the example, and induced to follow with intrepidity, a commander, who arrayed in an unusual dress, and addressing himself to the gods with solemn invocation, rushed into the thickest part of the enemy to meet his fate. Liv. 8, 9, &c.—Val. Max. 5, c. 6.—Polyb. 2.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 824.—(Cn. Metius, Q. Trajanus,) a native of Pannonia, sent by the emperor Philip to appease a sedition in Mœsia. Instead of obeying his master's command he assumed the imperial purple. [His disaffected troops, it is said, forced him to this step. The emperor immediately marched against him, and a battle was fought near Verona, which terminated successfully for Decius, and Philip was either slain in the conflict or put to death after he fell into the conqueror's power. This took place A. D. 249, and from this period is dated the commencement of the reign of Decius. It was one of short duration, about two years. During this, however, he proved a very cruel persecutor of the Christians. He greatly signalized himself against the Persians, but was slain in an action with the Goths, who had invaded his dominions. In advancing upon them, he was, with the greatest part of his troops, entangled in a morass, where being surrounded by the enemy he perished under a shower of darts, A. D. 251, aged 50 years.]

DECURIO, a subaltern officer in the Roman armies. He commanded a decuria, which consisted of ten men, and was the third part of a turma, or the 30th part of the regular complement of horse allotted to each legion, viz. 300. [Each decurio had an optio or deputy under him.—There were also provincial magistrates called by this name. The colonies differed from the free towns in this, that they used the laws prescribed them by the Romans, but they had almost the same kind of magistrates. Their two chief magistrates were called Dumviri; and their senators Decuriones, because, as some say, when the colony was first planted, every tenth man was made a senator. The fortune requisite to be chosen a decurio, under the emperors, was 100,000 sestertii.]

DECUMATES AGRI, lands in Germany, [lying along the Danube, in the vicinity of Mons Abnoba,] which paid the 10th part of their value to the Romans. Hence the name. Tacit. G. 29.

DEJANIRA, a daughter of Æneus, king of Ætolia. Her beauty procured her many admirers, and her father promised to give her in marriage to him only who proved to be the strongest of all his competitors. Hercules obtained the prize, and married Dejanira, by whom he had three children, the most known of whom is Hyllus. As Dejanira was once travelling with her husband, they were stopped by the swollen streams of the Evenus, and the centaur Nessus offered Hercules to convey her safe to the opposite shore. The hero consented; but no sooner had Nessus gained the bank, than he attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, and to carry her away in the sight of her husband. Hercules, upon this, aimed from the other shore a poisoned arrow at the seducer, and mortally wounded him. Nessus, as he expired, wished to avenge his death upon his murderer; and he gave Dejanira his tunic, which was covered with blood, poisoned and infected by the arrow, observing, that it had the power of reclaiming a husband from unlawful loves. Dejanira accepted the present; and when Hercules proved faithless to her bed, she sent him the centaur's tunic, which instantly caused his death. (vid. Hercules.) Dejanira was so disconsolate at the death of her husband, which she had ignorantly occasioned, that she destroyed herself. Ovid. Met. 8 and 9 — Diod. 4. — Senec. in Hercul. — Hygin. fab. 34.

DEIDAMIA, a daughter of Lycomedes, king of Scyros. She bore a son called Pyrrhus, or Neoptolemus, to Achilles, who was disguised at her father's court in women's clothes, under the name of Pyrrha. Propert. 2, el. 9. — Apollod. 3, c. 13.

DEIŌCES, a son of Phraortes, by whose means the Medes delivered themselves from the yoke of the Assyrians. He presided as judge among his countrymen, and his great popularity and love of equity, raised him to the throne, and he made himself absolute, B. C. 700. He was succeeded by his son Phraortes, after a reign of 53 years. He built Ecbatana, according to Herodotus, and surrounded it with seven different walls, in the middle of which was the royal palace. [He reigned 43 years, and at his death was succeeded by his son Phraortes.] Herodot. 1, c. 96, &c. — Polyæn.

DEIOTĀRUS, [was first distinguished as tetrarch of Galatia, and on account of the eminent services which he performed in that station, and of the figure which he made in the Mithridatic war, was afterwards appointed to the throne of Armenia Minor by Pompey, which appointment was confirmed by the senate. In the civil wars he sided with Pompey, and on that account was deprived of his Armenian possessions by Cæsar, but allowed to retain the title of king and the other favours conferred upon him by the Romans. Shortly after this he was accused by his grandson, with whom he was at open variance, of having made an attempt on the life of Cæsar, when the latter was in Asia. Cicero ably and successfully defended him before Cæsar, in whose presence the cause was tried. After Cæsar's death, he recovered by bribery his fortified territories. He intended also to join Brutus, but the general to whom he committed his troops went over to Antony, which saved him his kingdom.] Strab. 12. — Lucan. 5, v. 55.

DEIPHŌBE, a sibyl of Cumæ, daughter of Glaucus. It is supposed that she led Æneas to the infernal regions. (vid. Sibyllæ.) Virg. Æn. 6, v. 36.

DEIPHŌBUS, a son of Priam and Hecuba, who, after the death of his brother Paris, married Helen. His wife unworthily betrayed him, and introduced into his chamber her old husband Menelaus, to whom she wished to reconcile herself. He was shamefully mutilated and killed by Menelaus. He had highly distinguished himself during the war, especially in his two combats with Merion, and in that in which he slew Ascalaphus son of Mars. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 495. — Homer. Il. 13.

DEIPHON, a brother of Triptolemus, son of Celeus and Metanira. When Ceres travelled over the world, she stopped at his father's court, and undertook to nurse him and bring him up. To reward the hospitality of Celeus, the goddess began to make his son immortal; and every evening she placed him on burning coals to purify him from whatever mortal particles he still possessed. The uncommon growth of Deiphon astonished Metanira, who wished to see what Ceres did to make him so vigorous. She was frightened to see her son on burning coals, and the shrieks that she uttered disturbed the mysterious operations of the goddess, and Deiphon perished in the flames. Apollod. 1, c. 5.

DELIA, a festival celebrated every fifth year in the island of Delos, in honour of Apollo. It was first instituted by Theseus, who, at his return from Crete, placed a statue there, which he had received from Ariadne. At the celebration, they crowned the statue of the goddess with garlands, appointed a choir of music, and exhibited horse-races. They afterwards led a dance, [called γαργαρος, i. e. the crane,] in which they imitated, by their motions, the various windings of the Cretan labyrinth from which Theseus had extricated himself by Ariadne's assistance. — There was also another festival of the same name, yearly celebrated by the Athenians in Delos. It was also instituted by Theseus, who, when he was going to Crete, made a vow that if he returned victorious, he would yearly visit, in a solemn manner, the temple of Delos. [Thucydides, however, gives a different account. vid. Delos.] The persons employed in this annual procession were called Deliaestæ and Theori. The ship, the same which carried Theseus, was called Theoria and Delias. When the ship was ready for the voyage, the priest of Apollo solemnly adorned the stern with garlands, and an universal lustration was made all over the city. The Theori were crowned with laurel, and before them proceeded men armed with axes, in commemoration of Theseus, who had cleared the way from Trœzene to Athens, and delivered the country from robbers. When the ship arrived at Delos, they offered solemn sacrifices to the god of the island, and celebrated a festival in his honour. After this, they retired to their ship, and sailed back to Athens, where all the people of the city ran in crowds to meet them. Every appearance of festivity prevailed at their approach, and the citizens opened their doors, and prostrated themselves before the Deliaestæ, as they walked in procession. [The beginning of the voyage was computed from the time that the priest of Apollo first adorned the stern of the ship with garlands, according to Plato, and from that time they began to cleanse and lustrate the city. During this period, up to the time of the vessel's return, it was held unlawful to put any condemned person to death, which was the reason that Socrates was reprieved for thirty days after his condemnation, as we learn from Plato and Xenophon. With regard to the sacred vessel itself, it was preserved by the Athenians to the time of Demetrius Phalereus, they restoring always what was decayed, and changing the old rotten planks for others that were new and entire; so that it furnished the philosophers with matter of dispute, whether, after so many repairs and alterations, it still remained the same identical ship, and served as an instance to illustrate the opinion of those who held that the body still remained the same numerical substance, notwithstanding the continual decay of old parts and acquisition of new ones, through these several stages of life. For this reason Callimachus calls its tackle (αιζωνοτρα) ever living.] Xenophon, Memor. & in Conv.—Plut. in Phad.—Senec. ep. 70.

DELIA, a surname for Diana, because she was born in Delos. Virg Ecl 3, v. 67.

DELÏUM, [a town of Eœotia, situate on the sea-coast, on the frontiers of the territory of Tanagra and Attica, north of the mouth of the Asopus. The Athenians were defeated here by the Bœotians in the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 421. Thucyd. 4. c. 100.]

DELÏUS, a surname of Apollo, because he was born in Delos.—Quint. an officer of Antony, who, when he was sent to cite Cleopatra before his master, advised her to make her appearance in the most captivating attire. The plan succeeded. He afterwards abandoned his friend, and fled to Augustus, who received him with great kindness. Horace has addressed 2 od. 3, to him. Plat. in Anton.

DELMATIUS, Fl. Jul. a nephew of Constantine the Great, honoured with the title of Cæsar, and put in possession of Thrace, Macedonia, and Achaia. His great virtues were unable to save him from a violent death, and he was assassinated by his own soldiers, &c.

DELMINIUM, [the ancient capital of Dalmatia, situate inland, to the east of the river Naro.]

DELOS, [an island of the Ægean, situate nearly in the centre of the Cyclades. This island was called also Asteria, Pelasgia, Chlamydis, Lagia, Pyrpilis, Scythias, Mydia, and Ortygia. It was named Ortygia from ορτυξ, a quail, and Lagia from λαγας a hare, the island formerly abounding with both these animals. On this account, according to Strabo, it was not allowed to have dogs at Delos, because they destroyed the quails and hares. The name Delos is commonly derived from δηλος, manifest, in allusion to the island having floated under the surface of the sea until made to appear and stand firm by order of Neptune. This was done for the purpose of receiving Latona, who was on the eve of delivery, and could find no asylum on the earth, it having been bound by an oath by Juno not to receive her: as Delos at the time was floating beneath the waters it was not considered to be bound by this oath. Pliny quotes among others Aristotle, who pretends that the name was given to it because it rose unexpectedly out of the sea, and appeared to view. Many other opinions have been advanced respecting its origin. According, however, to Olivier, it is at the present day everywhere schistous or granitical, exhibiting no trace of a volcano, and nothing that can explain by the laws of physics the wonders which the Greeks have transmitted to us respecting it.] The island is celebrated for the nativity of Apollo and Diana; and the solemnity with which the festivals of these deities were celebrated there by the inhabitants of the neighbouring islands, and of the continent, is well known. One of the altars of Apollo in the island was reckoned among the seven wonders of the world. It had been erected by Apollo, when only four years old, and made with the horns of goats killed by Diana on mount Cynthus. It was unlawful to sacrifice any living creature upon that altar, which was religiously kept pure from blood and every pollution. The whole island of Delos was held in such veneration, that the Persians, who had pillaged and profaned all the temples of Greece, never offered violence to the temple of Apollo, but respected it with the most awful reverence. Apollo delivered there oracles during the summer, in a plain manner, without any ambiguity or obscure meaning, from which circumstance some will have the name of the island to be derived. [The winter residence of the God was at Patara in Lycia. The Athenians were commanded by an oracle, in the time of Pisistratus, to purify Delos, which they did by causing all the dead bodies to be taken up which had been buried there, and removed from all places within view of the temple. In the 6th year of the Peloponnesian war they, by the advice of an oracle, purified it anew, by carrying all the dead bodies to the neighbouring island of Rhenæa, where they were interred. After having done this, in order to prevent its being polluted for the time to come, they published an edict, that for the future no person should be suffered to die, nor any woman to be brought to bed in the island, but that when death or parturition approached, they should be carried over into Rhenæa. In memory of this purification, it is said, the Athenians instituted a solemn quinquennial festival. vid. Delia. The Athenians afterwards drove out all the ancient inhabitants, but were themselves subsequently expelled by Mithridates, who lost it to the Romans. It is now covered with ruins and rubbish, so as to admit of little or no culture. Delos and Rhenæa are now called Sdili.] Strab. 8 and 10.—*Ovid. DELPHI, [a small but important city of Phocis in Greece, situate on the south-west side of mount Parnassus, and built in the form of an amphitheatre. It had no defence from walls, but was rendered secure by the rocky and precipitous sides of the mountain. The circuit of the city was only sixteen stadia, but there were numerous buildings scattered over different parts of the vicinity. It was called also Pytho, from the serpent Python which was slain there by Apollo, and, according to some accounts, received its name Delphi from Delphus, a son of the same deity. Others derive the name from ἀδελφοὶ, brethren, because Apollo and his brother Bacchus were both worshipped there, each having one of the two summits of Parnassus sacred to him. Others deduce it from the Arabic telb, to seek or inquire.] Some have also called it Parnassia Nape, the valley of Parnassus. It was famous for a temple of Apollo, and for an oracle celebrated in every age and country. The origin of the oracle, though fabulous, is described as something wonderful. A number of goats that were feeding on mount Parnassus came near a place which had a deep and long perforation. The steam which issued from the hole seemed to inspire the goats, and they played and frisked about in such an uncommon manner, that the goatherd was tempted to lean on the hole, and see what mysteries the place contained. He was immediately seized with a fit of enthusiasm, his expressions were wild and extravagant, and passed for prophecies. This circumstance was soon known about the country, and many experienced the same enthusiastic inspiration. The place was revered, and a temple was soon after erected in honour of Apollo, and a city built. [The Amphictyones, in after days, divided their meetings between this place and Anthela near Thermopylæ. The original temple at Delphi was a hut made of laurel boughs: afterwards, as the wealth of the oracle increased, a more commodious edifice was erected. This was destroyed by fire in the time of Cyrus, and the Amphictyones contributed 300 talents towards erecting a new one. The city of Delphi bore a fourth part of the whole expense, the remainder was obtained from private contributions. When it is said, however, by the scholiast on Pindar, (Pyth. 7, v. 9,) that the Alcæonidæ offered to rebuild it themselves, it can only mean that they intended contributing a large sum for this purpose: the cost of erecting the entire building would be far beyond the resources of a single family. This third temple was again burnt in the first year of the 58th Olympiad, and the Amphictyones again rebuilt it from the treasures which had there accumulated. This is the edifice Pausanias saw in the second century after the Christian era.] According to some accounts, Apollo was not the first who gave oracles there; but Terra, Neptune, Themis, and Phœbe, were in possession of the place before the son of Latona. The oracles were generally given in verse; but when it had been sarcastically observed that the god and patron of poetry was the most imperfect poet in the world, the priestess delivered her answers in prose. [The answers of this oracle were famed for their studied and dexterous ambiguity. vid. Cræsus and Pyrrhus.] The oracles were always delivered by a priestess called Pythia. (vid. Pythia.) It was customary for those who consulted the oracle to make rich presents to the god of Delphi; and no monarch distinguished himself more by his donations than Cræsus. This sacred repository of opulence was often the object of plunder; and the people of Phocis seized 10,000 talents from it. [This sum will equal 1,937,500 pounds sterling. Yet, notwithstanding this, there were so many materials left for the plunder of more powerful robbers, that neither Sylla, nor Nero, who at once transported 500 brazen images to Rome, could exhaust the sacred treasury. A very large collection of some of the finest specimens of ancient painting and sculpture, together with the sacred temples themselves, remained to excite the admiration of Pausanias, who must have visited Delphi nearly two hundred years after the oracle had fallen into contempt. For the power of Apollo did not long survive the Grecian confederacy to which it had owed its importance; and though the Pythia was consulted by Nero, and was once heard to speak in the days of Julian, yet her responses were disregarded long before the days of Cicero, and had begun to yield to the Sibylline books, the auspices, and the observers of omens and astrological signs, brought into repute by the prevalence of Roman superstition. It was not the sanctity of the place which preserved so many monuments of ancient art from the rapacity of the first Latin conquerors of Greece, but rather an ignorance of their true value

The gold, the silver, and even the brazen ornaments of the temple were stripped by successive plunderers, but the marbles were spared, and the greater part of them may be believed to have been crushed under the falling fragments of the mountain, or sunk into the ground. It is reserved for posterity to recover many of them, and among the rest perhaps, the famed "navel of the earth," which was shewn here, made of stone. Every nation in the infancy of their geographical knowledge, suppose themselves as placed in the centre of the earth's surface: such also was the belief of the Greeks with respect to Delphi, and Jupiter is said to have ascertained the fact by letting fly two eagles from the eastern and western limits of the world, which met here in their course. One only of the masterpieces which adorned this sacred place can be said now to remain; but that is by far the most ancient, and the best authenticated Grecian relic at present in existence. The triple-twisted serpentine column of brass, whose three heads supported the tripod dedicated by the Greeks to Apollo after the battle of Plataea, is still to be seen, though mutilated, in the spot to which it was conveyed from Delphi by Constantine, to adorn the hippodrome of his new capital. The column, as much of it as appears above ground, is now about seven feet in height, and of a proportionate thickness. Its hollow, and the cavity, have been filled with stones by the Turks. The Castalian fountain still exists. It is a small stream trickling down the crags of a large chasm into a stone basin, overflowing whose margin, and enlarged in its progress by other rills, it falls over the rocks into the valley beneath. In this basin the Pythia used to bathe before she ascended the sacred tripod. No traces, however, of the sacred aperture remain. Castri, a small mud town, situate a little to the east of a circular hollow in the mountain, is supposed to occupy a part of the site of ancient Delphi. Around it are the rows of seats belonging to the Pythian stadium. Delphi was attempted to be plundered by the Gauls under Brennus, as well as by the army of Xerxes, but both were repulsed, and did not dare to advance into the fastnesses of the mountains. The same object of security induced the Greeks to place their other magnificent temple of Apollo in Delos, which modern travellers represent as nothing more than one mass of rugged rocks.] Apollon, 2, v. 706.—Diod. 16.—*Plut. de Defici. DELTA, a part of Egypt, which received that name from its resemblance to the form of the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet, Δ. It lies between the Canopic and Pelusiac mouths of the Nile, and begins to be formed where the river divides itself into several streams. It has been formed totally by the mud and sand which are washed down from the upper parts of Egypt by the Nile, according to ancient tradition. [The opinion that the Delta has been formed by the accumulation of slime or soil, in consequence of the periodical inundations of the Nile, is now very generally received by naturalists, but is liable to several very strong objections from chronology. [vid. Mediterraneum Mare.] In the time of Moeris, 500 years before the Trojan war, the Delta appeared in its infancy. Eight cubits were then sufficient to overflow it in its whole extent. When Herodotus visited Egypt, 15 cubits were necessary to cover all Lower Egypt, but the Nile then overflowed the country for the space of two day's journey to the right and left of the Delta. Under the Roman empire, 15 cubits produced the same effect. In the time of the Arabian power, the favourable number was 17. At this time, 18 are the measure of abundance. But the inundation no longer extends over the Lower Egypt; its progress is stopped at Cairo. The mud which has accumulated on the Delta keeps it free from the inundation; banks being raised to oppose, or canals cut to allow a passage for the waters. It is now 90 leagues in circumference, and the most fertile part of Egypt.] Cæs. Alex. c. 27.—Strab. 15 and 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 13, &c.—Plin 3, c. 16.

DEMĀDES, an Athenian, who, from a sailor, became an eloquent orator, and obtained much influence in the state. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Cheronæa, by Philip, and ingratiated himself into the favour of that prince, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He was put to death, with his son, on suspicion of treason, B. C. 322. One of his orations is extant, Diod. 16 and 17.—Plut. in Dem.

DEMARĀTOS, the son and successor of Ariston on the throne of Sparta, B. C. 526. He was banished by the intrigues of Cleomeneus, his royal colleague, as being illegitimate. He retired into Asia, and was kindly received by Darius son of Hystaspes king of Persia. When the Persian monarch made preparations to invade Greece, Demaratus, though persecuted by the Lacedæmonians, informed them of the hostilities which hung over their head. Herodot. 5, c. 75, &c. 1. 6, c. 50, &c.—A rich citizen of Corinth, of the family of the Bacchiadae. When Cypselus had usurped the sovereign power of Corinth, Demaratus, with all his family, migrated to Italy, and settled at Tarquinii, 658 years before Christ. called by the Greeks Demeter. It was then customary for the votaries of the goddess to lash themselves with whips made with the bark of trees. The Athenians had a solemnity of the same name in honour of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

DĒMĒTRĪAS, [a town of Thessaly, on the Pelagicus or Pagæus Sinus, at the mouth of the river Onchestus. It was built by Demetrius Poliorcetes, and is now called Volo.—A town of Syria, near the coast, south-east of Aradus. It is now Akker.—A town of Asia, south-east of Arbelia, now Kerkourk. It is called Corcura by Ptolemy.]

DĒMĒTRĪUS, a son of Antigonus and Stratonice, surnamed Poliorcetes, destroyer of towns. At the age of 22, he was sent by his father against Ptolemy, who invaded Syria. He was defeated near Gaza; but he soon repaired his loss by a victory over one of the generals of the enemy. He afterwards sailed with a fleet of 250 ships to Athens, and restored the Athenians to liberty, by freeing them from the power of Cassander and Ptolemy, and expelling the garrison which was stationed there under Demetrius Phalereus. His reception at Athens, after these victories, was attended with the greatest servility; and the Athenians were not ashamed to raise altars to him as to a god, and to consult his oracles. [He afterwards fought a great naval battle with Ptolemy off Cyprus, in which the latter was defeated and fled with eight ships out of 150 with which he commenced the action, and all his numerous train, servants, friends, wives, money, and machines, fell into the hands of the enemy. Demetrius subsequently went to war with the Rhodians, and in pressing the siege of Rhodes, displayed his mechanical genius in the construction of new and formidable machines. The Athenians, having negotiated a peace between him and the Rhodians, called him to their aid against Cassander, whom he defeated at Thermopylæ.] This uncommon success raised the jealousy of the successors of Alexander; and Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus, united to destroy Antigonus and his son. Their hostile armies met at Ipsus, B. C. 301. Antigonus was killed in the battle; and Demetrius, after a severe loss, retired to Ephesus. His ill success raised him many enemies; and the Athenians, who had lately adored him as a god, refused to admit him into their city. He soon after ravaged the territories of Lysimachus, and reconciled himself to Seleucus, to whom he gave his daughter Stratonice in marriage. Athens now laboured under tyranny; and Demetrius relieved it, and pardoned the inhabitants. The loss of his possessions in Asia recalled him from Greece, and he established himself on the throne of Macedonia by the murder of Alexander the son of Cassander. Here he was continually at war with the neighbouring states; and the superior power of his adversaries obliged him to leave Macedonia, after he had sat on the throne for seven years. He passed into Asia and attacked some of the provinces of Lysi-machus with various success; but famine and pestilence destroyed the greatest part of his army, and he retired to the court of Seleucus for support and assistance. He met with a kind reception, but hostilities were soon begun; and after he had gained some advantages over his son-in-law, Demetrius was totally forsaken by his troops in the field of battle, and became an easy prey to the enemy. Though he was kept in confinement by his son-in-law, yet he maintained himself like a prince, and passed his time in hunting and in laborious exercise. His son Antigonus offered Seleucus all his possessions, and even his person, to procure his father's liberty; but all proved unavailing, and Demetrius died in the 54th year of his age, after a confinement of three years, 286 B. C. His remains were given to Antigonus, and honoured with a splendid funeral pomp at Corinth, and thence conveyed to Demetrius. His posterity remained in possession of the Macedonian throne till the age of Perseus, who was conquered by the Romans. Demetrius has rendered himself famous for his fondness of dissipation when among the dissolute, and his love of virtue and military glory in the field of battle. He has been commended as a great warrior; and his ingenious inventions, his warlike engines, and stupendous machines, in his war with the Rhodians, justify his claims to that perfect character. He has been blamed for his voluptuous indulgencies; and his biographer observes, that no Grecian prince had more wives and concubines than Poliorcetes. His obedience and reverence to his father have been justly admired; and it has been observed, that Antigonus ordered the ambassador of a foreign prince particularly to remark the cordiality and friendship which subsisted between him and his son. Plut. in vitâ.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 1, c. 17, &c.—A prince who succeeded his father Antigonus on the throne of Macedonia. His modesty delivered his father from a heavy accusation laid before the Roman senate. C. 180. Liv. 40, c. 20.—Justin. 32, c. 2.—A prince surnamed Soter, was son of Seleucus Philopater, the son of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. His father gave him as a hostage to the Romans. After the death of Seleucus, Antiochus Epiphanes, the deceased monarch's brother, usurped the kingdom of Syria, and was succeeded by his son Antiochus Eupator. This usurpation displeased Demetrius, who was detained at Rome; he procured his liberty on pretence of going to hunt, and fled to Syria, where the troops received him as their lawful sovereign, B. C. 162. He put to death Eupator and Lysias, and established himself on his throne by cruelty and oppression. Alexander Bala, the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, laid claim to the crown of Syria, and defeated Demetrius in a battle in the 12th year of his reign. Strab. 16.—Appian.—Justin. 34, c. 3.—The 2d, surnamed Nicator, or Conqueror, was son of Soter, to whom he succeeded by the assistance of Ptolemy Philometer, after he had driven out the usurper Alexander Bala, B. C. 146. He married Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy; who was before the wife of the expelled monarch. Demetrius gave himself up to luxury and voluptuousness, and suffered his kingdom to be governed by his favourites. At that time a pretended son of Bala, called Diodorus Tryphon, seized a part of Syria; and Demetrius, to oppose his antagonist, made an alliance with the Jews, and marched into the east, where he was taken by the Parthians. Phraates, king of Parthia, gave him his daughter Rhodogyne in marriage; and Cleopatra was so incensed at this new connexion, that she gave herself up to Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, and married him. Sidetes was killed in a battle against the Parthians, and Demetrius regained the possession of his kingdom. His pride and oppression rendered him odious, and his subjects asked a king of the house of Seleucus, from Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt; and Demetrius, unable to resist the power of his enemies, fled to Ptolemais, which was then in the hands of his wife Cleopatra. The gates were shut up against his approach by Cleopatra; and he was killed by order of the governor of Tyre, whither he had fled for protection. He was succeeded by Alexander Zebina, whom Ptolemy had raised to the throne, B. C. 127. Justin. 36, &c.—Appian. de Bell. Syr.—Joseph.—The 3d, surnamed Eucerus, was son of Antiochus Gryphus. He was taken in a battle against the Parthians, and died in captivity. Joseph. 1.—Phalereus, a disciple of Theophrastus, who gained such an influence over the Athenians, by his eloquence and the purity of his manners, that he was elected decennial archon, B. C. 317. He so embellished the city, and rendered himself so popular by his munificence, that the Athenians raised 360 brazen statues to his honour. Yet in the midst of all this popularity, his enemies raised a sedition against him, and he was condemned to death, and all his statues thrown down, after he had governed the city with great wisdom and moderation for 10 years. He fled without concern or mortification to the court of Ptolemy [Soter], where he met with kindness and cordiality. The Egyptian monarch consulted him concerning the succession of his children; and Demetrius advised him to raise to the throne the children of Eurydice, in preference to the offspring of Berenice. This counsel so irritated Philadelphus, the son of Berenice, that after his father's death he sent the philosopher into Upper Egypt, and there detained him in strict confinement. Demetrius, tired with his situation, put an end to his life by the bite of an asp. 284 B. C. [Some have affirmed, without sufficient authority, that he was librarian to Ptolemy Philadelphus, and that by his advice this prince gave orders for a version of the Jewish Scriptures from the Hebrew into the Greek language. He was author of a vast number of books, in prose and verse, on philosophy, history, politics, criticism, and rhetoric; but time has destroyed them all. The elegant piece, "De Interpretatione," which some have ascribed to him, is properly the work of a later age.] Diog. in vitâ.—Cic. in Brut. & de Offic. 1.—Plut. in Erit.—[A Cynic philosopher, who flourished at Corinth in the first century. After the death of this emperor, he returned to Rome; but the boldness of his language soon offended Vespasian, and again subjected him to the punishment of exile. Apollonius, with whom he had contracted a friendship, prevailed on Titus to recall him; but under Domitian he shared the common fate of philosophers, and withdrew to Puteoli. Stopping at Tarentum, the Persians were seized as spies, and Democedes escaped to Crotona, whither the Persians followed him, and demanded, but in vain, that he should be restored. DEMOCRITUS, a celebrated philosopher of Abdera, disciple to Leucippus. He travelled over the greatest part of Asia and Africa, in quest of knowledge, and returned home in the greatest poverty. There was a law at Abdera, which deprived of the honour of a funeral the man who had reduced himself to indigence; and Democritus, to avoid ignominy, repeated before his countrymen one of his compositions called Diacosmos. It was received with such uncommon applause, that he was presented with 500 talents; statues were erected in his honour; and a decree passed that the expenses of his funeral should be paid from the public treasury. [This story about the 500 talents is related by Diogenes Laertius, but it is wholly incredible that a sum which few royal treasuries were at that time able to furnish, should have been raised in an obscure town as a gratuity to any individual.] He retired to a garden near the city, where he dedicated his time to study and solitude; and, according to some authors, he put out his eyes, to apply himself more closely to philosophical inquiries. He was accused of insanity, and Hippocrates was ordered to inquire into the nature of his disorder. The physician had a conference with the philosopher, and declared that not Democritus, but his enemies were insane. He continually laughed at the follies and vanity of mankind, who distract themselves with care, and are at once a prey to hope and to anxiety. He told Darius, who was inconsolable for the loss of his wife, that he would raise her from the dead, if he could find three persons who had gone through life without adversity, whose names he might engrave on the queen's monument. The king's inquiries to find such persons proved unavailing, and the philosopher in some manner soothed the sorrow of his sovereign. He taught his disciples that the soul died with the body; and therefore, as he gave no credit to the existence of ghosts, some youths, to try his fortitude, dressed themselves in a hideous and deformed habit, and approached his cave in the dead of night, with whatever could create terror and astonishment. The philosopher received them unmoved; and without even looking at them, he desired them to cease making themselves such objects of ridicule and folly. He died in the 109th year of his age, B. C. 361. His father was so rich that he entertained Xerxes, with all his army, as he was marching against Greece. All the works of Democritus are lost. He was the author of the doctrine of atoms, and first taught that the milky way was occasioned by a confused light from a multitude of stars. He may be considered as the parent of experimental philosophy, in the prosecution of which he shewed himself so ardent that he declared he would prefer the discovery of one of the causes of the works of nature, to the diadem of Persia. He made artificial emeralds, and tinged them with various colours; he likewise dissolved stones, and softened ivory. [The only reasonable conclusion which can be drawn from the many marvels which were propagated respecting this philosopher is that he was, what he is commonly represented to have been, a man of sublime genius and penetrating judgment, who by a long course of study and observation, became an eminent master of speculative and physical science. The natural consequence of this was that, like Roger Bacon, in a later period, he astonished and imposed upon the ignorance and credulity of his countrymen. Democritus has been commonly known under the appellation of the Laughing Philosopher, and among his fellow-citizens he obtained the title of γλαστρινος, or derider] *Euseb. 14, c. 27.—Diog. in vitâ.—Ælian. DÉMOSTHÈNES, a celebrated Athenian, [son of a respectable citizen of Athens who was the proprietor of large iron forges, and kept a number of slaves manufacturing sword-blades, by which he amassed considerable wealth. His father's name was Demosthenes. He was born B. C. 381, and was but seven years old when his parent died. His patrimony was 14 talents, about £3150 sterling.] His guardians negligently managed his affairs, and embezzled the greatest part of his possessions. His education was totally neglected; and for whatever advances he made in learning, he was indebted to his own industry and application. He became the pupil of Isæus and Plato, and applied himself to study the orations of Isocrates. At the age of 17 he gave an early proof of his eloquence and abilities against his guardians, from whom he obtained the retribution of the greatest part of his estate. His rising talents were, however, impeded by weak lungs, and a difficulty of pronunciation, especially of the letter ρ, but these obstacles were soon conquered by unwearied application. To correct the stammering of his voice, he spoke with pebbles in his mouth; and removed the distortion of his features, which accompanied his utterance, by watching the motions of his countenance in a looking-glass. That his pronunciation might be loud and full of emphasis, he frequently ran up the steepest and most uneven walks, where his voice acquired force and energy; and on the sea-shore, when the waves were violently agitated, he declaimed aloud, to accustom himself to the noise and tumults of a public assembly. He also confined himself in a subterraneous cave, to devote himself more closely to studious pursuits; and, to eradicate all curiosity of appearing in public, he shaved one half of his head. In this solitary retirement, by the help of a glimmering lamp, he composed the greatest part of his orations, which have ever been the admiration of every age, though his contemporaries and rivals severely inveighed against them, and observed that they smelt of oil. His abilities as an orator raised him to consequence at Athens, and he was soon placed at the head of the government. In this public capacity he roused his countrymen from their indolence, and animated them against the encroachments of Philip of Macedonia. In the battle of Cheronæa, however, Demosthenes betrayed his pusillanimity, and saved his life by flight. After the death of Philip, he declared himself warmly against his son and successor Alexander, whom he branded with the appellation of boy : and when the Macedonians demanded of the Athenians their orators, Demosthenes reminded his countrymen of the fable of the sheep which delivered their dogs to the wolves. Though he had boasted that all the gold of Macedonia could not tempt him, yet he suffered himself to be bribed by a small golden cup from Harpalus. The tumults which this occasioned, forced him to retire from Athens ; and in his banishment, which he passed at Trœzene and Ægina, he lived with more effeminacy than true heroism. When Antipater made war against Greece, after the death of Alexander, Demosthenes was publicly recalled from his exile, and a galley was sent to fetch him from Ægina. His return was attended with much splendour, and all the citizens crowded at the Piræus to see him land. His triumph and popularity, however, were short. Antipater and Craterus were near Athens, and demanded all the orators to be delivered up into their hands. Demosthenes with all his adherents fled to the temple of Neptune in Calauria, [a small island off Trœzene in Argolis, in the Sinus Saronicus ;] and when he saw that all hopes of safety were banished, he took a dose of poison, which he always carried in a quill, and expired on the day that the Thesmophoria were celebrated, in the 60th year of his age, B. C. 322. The Athenians raised a brazen statue to his honour with an inscription translated into this distich :

Demosthenes has been deservedly called the prince of orators ; and Cicero, his successful rival among the Romans, calls him a perfect model, and such as he wished to be. These two great princes of eloquence have often been compared together ; but the judgment hesitates to which to give the preference. They both arrived at perfection ; but the measures by which they obtained it were diametrically opposite. Demosthenes has been compared, and with propriety, by his rival Æschines, to a Siren, from the melody of his expressions. No orator can be said to have expressed the various passions of hatred, resentment, or indignation, with more energy than he ; and as a proof of his uncon-mon application, it need only be mentioned, that he transcribed eight, or even 10 times, the history of Thucydides, that he might not only imitate, but possess the force and energy of the great historian. The best editions of his works are that of Wolfius, fol. Frankof. 160 ; that left unfinished by Taylor, Cantab. 4to. ; [and that by Reiske, in the Corpus Oratorum Græcorum, 12 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1770, &c. A new edition of the works of Demosthenes by Reiske, separate from the rest, was published in London 1822-23, in 3 vols. 8vo. edited by Schæfer.] Many of the orations of Demosthenes have been published separately. *Phut. in vitâ.—Diod. 16.—Cic. in Orat. &c.—Paus. 1, c. 8, l. 2, c. 33.—*An Athenian general sent to succeed Alcibiades in Sicily. DERBE, [a city of Asia Minor, in Lycaonia, near Isauria. D'Anville places it near a small chain of mountains detached from Taurus in the country of Isauria called Antiochiana. Stephanus of Byzantium locates it in Isauria ; Strabo, however, and all other writers place it in Lycaonia. It is mentioned in the New Testament, (Acts 14, 6.) It was the residence of Antipater Derbæus and the country of Timothy. Its name is supposed to have been derived from the word Darb, "a gate" ; and here perhaps was one of the passes of Mount Taurus, as the name of Alah-dag is yet given to the spot, signifying "the pass of the high mountains."]

DERCËTO and DERCËTIS, a goddess of Syria, called also Atergatis, whom some suppose to be the same as Astarte. [vid. Atargatis and Astarte.] She was represented as a beautiful woman above the waist, and the lower part terminated in a fish's tail. According to Diodorus, Venus, whom she had offended, made her passionately fond of a young priest, remarkable for the beauty of his features. She had a daughter by him, and became so ashamed of her incontinence, that she removed her lover, exposed the fruit of her amour, and threw herself into a lake. Her body was transformed into a fish, and her child was preserved, and called Semiramis. As she was chiefly worshipped in Syria, and represented like a fish, the Syrians anciently abstained from fishes. Lucan. de Deâ Ser.—Plin. 5, c. 13.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 44.—Diod. 2.

DERCYLLIDAS, a general of Sparta, celebrated for his military exploits. He took nine different cities in eight days, and freed Chersonesus from the inroads of the Thracians by building a wall across the country. He lived B. C. 399. Diod. 14.—Zenoph. Hist. Græc. 1, &c.

DERTONA, now Tortona, a town of Liguria, [north of Genoa, on the small river Iria which runs into the Padus or Po.] A Roman colony was settled here.

DERTÓSE, now Tortosa, [a city of the Iberæones in Spain, situate on the Iberus, a short distance above its mouth. Here was a bridge over the river, and along this route led the main military road to the southern parts of Spain, and the colonies established there.]

DEVA, [a city of the Cornavii in Britain. It lay on the river Seteia, or Dee, and was the station of the 20th legion. It is now Chester.—A river of Britain, in the north, now the Dee, from which the cities of Old and New Aberdeen, the latter of which lies at its mouth, derive their name. D'Anville calls the ancient name of this river Devana.—There was another river named Deva in Britain, on the north-western coast, which is also called Dee, and flows into Wigtoun Bay, the ancient Jena Estuarium.]

DEUCALION, [a son of Prometheus, according to the common account, who married Pyrrha, the daughter of his uncle Epimetheus. Prometheus, it is said, had been banished into Scythia, to the confines of Caucasus, during the wars of the Titan princes. His son Deucalion, weary of this lonely retreat, came and settled in Thessaly, in the vicinity of Phthia. In progress of time he made himself master of all lower Thessaly, near the Peneus. Such is the account commonly given of the origin of Deucalion. His being a son of Prometheus is asserted, however, only by the later mythological writers, since the early ones are entirely silent on this head. Indeed, how could he be the offspring of one who lay for thirteen generations, up to the time of Hercules, chained to the rocks of Caucasus? And yet upon this weak foundation many have been led to erect a theory in favour of Deucalion and the Hellenes being originally derived from the regions of Caucasus. The truth is that the original seat of the Hellenes was in the vicinity of Parnassus. From Parnassus, and from Locris, Deucalion led forth his followers, the Hellenes, together with their neighbours the Leleges, into the southern part of Thessaly, where their new settlements received from them the name of Hellas. This took place about three ages after the time of Cecrops, for Xuthus, Deucalion's grandson, came to Athens in the time of Erechtheus, the sixth descendant from Cecrops. Many writers mention Hellen as the son of Deucalion. He appears, however, to have been merely a fabulous person, and the story to have arisen from Deucalion's being leader of the Hellenes. There is no mention whatever in history of any operations on the part of Hellen which tends to confirm what has just been said. His sons, as they are called, appear to have engrossed every active undertaking. vid. Æolus, Dorus, Xuthus.] In his age the whole earth was overwhelmed with a deluge. The impiety of mankind had irritated Jupiter, who resolved to destroy mankind, and immediately the earth exhibited a boundless scene of waters. The highest mountains were climbed by the frightened inhabitants of the country; but this seeming place of security was soon over-topped by the rising waters, and no hope was left of escaping the universal calamity. Deucalion made himself a ship, and by this means he saved himself and his wife Pyrrha. The vessel was tossed about during nine successive days, and at last stopped on the top of mount Parnassus, where Deucalion remained till the waters had subsided. Pindar and Ovid make no mention of a vessel, but state that Deucalion saved his life by taking refuge on the top of Parnassus. As soon as the waters had retired from the surface of the earth, Deucalion and his wife went to consult the oracle of Themis, and were directed to repair the loss of mankind by throwing behind them the bones of their grandmother. This was nothing but the stones of the earth; and after some hesitation about the meaning of the oracle, they obeyed. The stones thrown by Deucalion became men, and those of Pyrrha, women. According to Justin, Deucalion was not the only one who escaped from the universal calamity. Many saved their lives by ascending the highest mountains, or trusting themselves in small vessels to the mercy of the waters. According to Xenophon, there were no less than five deluges. The first happened under Ogyges, and lasted three months. The second, which was in the age of Hercules and Prometheus, continued but one month. During the third, which happened in the reign of another Ogyges, all Attica was laid waste by the waters. Thessaly was totally covered with the waters during the fourth, which happened in the age of Deucalion. The last was during the Trojan war, and its effects were severely felt by the inhabitants of Egypt. There prevailed a report in Attica, that the waters of Deucalion's deluge had disappeared through a small aperture about a cubit wide, near Jupiter Olympus's temple; and Pausanias, who saw it, further adds, that a yearly offering of flour and honey was thrown into it with religious ceremony. The deluge of Deucalion, so much celebrated in ancient history, is supposed to have happened 1503 years B. C. [The famous deluge of Deucalion seems to have been merely an inundation of Thessaly, and to have been caused probably by an earthquake, which stopping the course of the Peneus between Ossa and Olympus, where is the mouth of that river, caused the stream of its waters to overflow the plains of Thessaly. This inundation is thought to have been aided by a vast quantity of rain which fell during the same year. M. Malte-Brun, appears to entertain a different idea of the cause which produced this and other inundations in Greece. "The soil of Greece," observes this writer, "must from its very nature have frequently given way and sunk down, and consequently the country must frequently have experienced local inundations. The deluge of Deucalion desolated Thessaly, especially the mountainous canton named Hellas; that of Ogyges overwhelmed Bœotia. Popular tradition naturally referred to those disasters which had ravaged whole provinces, every ancient inundation, the remembrance of which was preserved in any district. Thus a single opening of inconsiderable extent was shown in Attica as the funnel by which all the waters of Deucalion's flood were drained away. Twelve or fifteen centuries after the epoch assigned to these events, historians began to collect these scattered traditions, and to compose from them highly finished descriptions of pretended universal deluges, unknown to more ancient authors." [Deucalion had two sons by Pyrrha. Hellen, called by some son of Jupiter, and Amphictyon, king of Attica, and also a daughter, Protogenea, who became mother of Æthlius by Jupiter. *Pind. 9. He attached himself also to lyric poetry, and was much distinguished for his success in this branch of the art. His name, however, has been transmitted with infamy to posterity, as that of an avowed advocate for the rejection of all religious belief. It is expressly asserted by ancient writers that when, in a particular instance, he saw a perjured person escape punishment, he publicly declared his disbelief of Divine Providence, and from that time spoke of the gods, and all religious ceremonies, with ridicule and contempt. He even attempted to lay open the sacred mysteries, and to dissuade the people from submitting to the rites of initiation. A price at last was set upon his head, and he fled to Corinth, where he died.] He lived about 416 years before Christ. *Cic. de Nat. DIAMASTIGŌSIS, a festival at Sparta in honour of Diana Orthia, which received that name απο του μαστιγου, from whipping, because boys were whipped before the altar of the goddess. These boys were called Bomonicæ. [vid. Bomonicæ.]

DIANA, was the goddess of hunting. [Her name is derived from dia, i. e. dea, and iana, i. e. luna: for iana is the same as iana, according to Varro, R. R. 1, 37, 3. From dea iana comes by contraction Diana, (vid. Voss. Art. Gramm. 2, 13.) Nigidius (ap. Macrob. Sat. 1, 9.) says that Diana comes from iana, with D added.] According to Cicero there were three of this name; a daughter of Jupiter and Proserpine, who became mother of Cupid; a daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and a daughter of Upis and Clauce. The second is the most celebrated, and to her all the ancients allude. She was born at the same birth as Apollo; and the pains which she saw her mother suffer during her labour, gave her such an aversion to marriage, that she obtained from her father the permission to live in perpetual celibacy, and to preside over the travails of women. To shun the society of men, she devoted herself to hunting, and obtained the permission of Jupiter to have for her attendants 60 of the Oceanides, and 20 other nymphs, all of whom abjured the use of marriage. She is represented with a bent bow and quiver, and attended by dogs, and sometimes drawn in a chariot by two white stags. Sometimes she appears with wings, holding a lion in one hand, and a panther in the other, with a chariot drawn by two heifers, or two horses of different colours. She is represented taller by the head than her attendant nymphs, her face has something manly, her legs are bare, well shaped, and strong, and her feet are covered with a buskin, worn by huntresses among the ancients. Diana received many surnames, particularly from the places where her worship was established, and from the functions over which she presided. She was called Lucina, Ilythia, or Juno Pronuba, when invoked by women in childbed, and Trivia when worshipped in the cross-ways where her statues were generally erected. She was supposed to be the same as the moon, or Proserpine or Hecate, and from that circumstance she was called Triformis; and some of her statues represented her with three heads, that of a horse, a dog, and a boar. Her power and functions under these three characters have been beautifully expressed in these two verses:

Terret, lustrat, agit, Proserpina, Luna, Diana,

Ima, suprema, feras, sceptro, fulgore, sagittâ.

She was also called Agrotera, Orthia, Taurica, Delia, Cynthia, Aricia, &c. She was supposed to be the same as the Isis of the Egyptians, whose worship was introduced into Greece with that of Osiris, under the name of Apollo. When Typhon waged war against the gods, Diana is said to have metamorphos-ed herself into a cat, to avoid his fury. The goddess is generally known in the figures that represent her, by the crescent on her head, by the dogs which attend her, and by her hunting habit. The most famous of her temples was that of Ephesus, which was one of the seven wonders of the world. (vid. Ephesus.) She was there represented with a great number of breasts, and other symbols, which signified the earth or Cybele; for rather nature herself, whom that goddess represented. Though she was the patroness of chastity, yet she forgot her dignity to enjoy the company of Endymion, and the very familiar favours which, according to mythology, she granted to Pan and Orion are well known. (vid. Endymion, Pan, Orion.) The inhabitants of Taurica were particularly attached to the worship of this goddess, and they cruelly offered on her altar all the strangers that were shipwrecked on their coasts. Her temple in Aricia was served by a priest who had always murdered his predecessor, and the Lacedæmonians yearly offered her human victims till the age of Lycurgus, who changed this barbarous custom for the sacrifice of flagellation. The Athenians generally offered her goats, and others a white kid, and sometimes a boar, pig, or an ox. Among plants, the poppy and the dity are sacred to her. She, as well as her brother Apollo, had some oracles, among which those of Egypt, Cilicia, and Ephesus, are the most known. *Ovid. DICÆARCHUS, a Messenian, famous for his knowledge of philosophy, history, and mathematics. He was one of Aristotle's disciples. Nothing remains of his numerous compositions. He had composed an history of the Spartan republic, which was publicly read over every year by order of the magistrates, for the improvement and instruction of youth. [His map of Greece was highly prized by Cicero and Atticus, on account of its accuracy. Theophrastus ordered by his will that the map of the world which he appears to have obtained from Dicæarchus should be hung up in public.]

DICENÆUS, an Egyptian philosopher in the age of Augustus, who travelled into Scythia, where he ingratiated himself with the king of the country, and by his instructions softened the wildness and rusticity of his manners. He also gained such an influence over the multitude, that they destroyed all the vines which grew in their country, to prevent the riot and dissipation which the wine occasioned among them. He wrote all his maxims and his laws in a book, that they might not lose the benefit of them after his death.

DICTÆUS MONS, [vid. Dictæ.]

[DICTAMNUM promontorium, vid. Dictynæum promontorium.]

DICTATOR, a magistrate at Rome invested with supreme authority. This officer, whose magistracy seems to have been borrowed from the customs of the Albans or Latins, was first chosen during the Roman wars against the Latins. The consuls being unable to raise forces for the defence of the state, because the plebeians refused to enlist if they were not discharged from all the debts they had contracted with the patricians, the senate found it necessary to elect a new magistrate with absolute and uncontrollable power to take care of the state. [His power, however, continued only for the space of six months, even although the business for which he had been created was not finished, and was never prolonged beyond that time except in extreme necessity; as in the case of Camillus, for Sylla and Cæsar usurped their perpetual dictatorship, in contempt of the laws of their country. But the dictator usually resigned his command whenever he had effected the business for which he had been created; thus, Q. Cincinnatus and Mæmercus Æmilius abdicated the dictatorship on the 16th day. Q. Servilius on the 8th day. Another check on the dictator's power was, that he could lay out none of the public money without the authority of the senate or the order of the people. He could not, moreover, leave Italy, a law which was only once violated, and that on account of the most urgent necessity. (Liv. epit. 19.) Neither was he allowed to ride on horseback without the permission of the people. The principal check, however, against a dictator's abuse of power was, that he might be called to an account for his conduct when he resigned his office.] He knew no superior in the republic, and even the laws were subjected to him. He was called dictator, because dictus, named by the consul, or quoniam dictis ejus parebat populus, because the people implicitly obeyed his command. [The dictator was not created by the suffrages of the people, as the other magistrates, but one of the consuls, by order of the senate, named as dictator whatever person of consular dignity he thought proper; and this he did, after having taken the auspices, usually in the dead of night. Sometimes the people gave directions whom the consul should name.] As his power was absolute, he could proclaim war, levy forces, conduct them against an enemy, and disband them at pleasure. He punished as he pleased; and from his decisions there was no appeal, at least till later times. During his administration, all other officers, except the tribunes of the people, were suspended, and he was the master of the republic [The writers on Roman antiquities, and especially Dr. Adam, assert that the dictator was attended by 24 lictors with the fascies and sicuris, even in the city. In this they appear to have erred. Plutarch indeed tells us, in his life of Fabius, that the dictator was attended by 24 lictors; but, as Justus Lipsius observes, this statement is contradicted by higher authority; for we are told in the epitome of the 89th Book of Livy, that Sylla, in assuming to himself 24 lictors, had done a thing entirely unprecedented. "Sylla, dictator factus, quod nemo quidem unquam fecerat, cum fascibus viginti quatuor processit." A dictator was chosen only when the state was in imminent dangers from foreign enemies or inward seditions. In the time of a pestilence a dictator was sometimes elected, as also to hold the comitia, or to celebrate the public festivals, to hold trials, to choose senators, or drive a nail in the capitol, by which superstitious ceremony the Romans believed that a plague could be averted or the progress of an enemy stopped. [For 120 years before Sylla the creation of a dictator was disused, but in dangerous emergencies the consuls were armed with dictatorial power.] This office, so respectable and illustrious in the first ages of the republic, became odious by the perpetual usurpations of Sylla and J. Cæsar; and after the death of the latter, the Roman senate, on the motion of the consul Antony, passed a decree, which for ever after forbade a dictator to exist in Rome. The dictator, as soon as elected, chose a subordinate officer, called his master of horse, magister equitum. [Sometimes a master of the horse was pitched upon for the dictator by the senate, or by the order of the people.] This officer was respectable, but he was totally subservient to the will of the dictator, and could do nothing without his express order, though he enjoyed the privilege of using a horse, and had the same insignia as the prætors. This subordination, however, was some time after removed; and during the second Punic war the master of the horse [Minucius] was invested with a power equal to that of the dictator [Fabius Maximus]. A second dictator was also chosen for the election of magistrates at Rome, after the battle of Cannæ. The dictatorship was originally confined to the patricians, but the plebeians were afterwards admitted to share it. Titus Lartius Flavius was the first dictator, A. U. C. 253. *Dionys. [DICTE, a mountain of the island of Crete, now called Sethi and also Lasthi, next in height to mount Ida, and covered throughout a great part of the year with snow; whence it is denominated by Strabo, Pliny, and Ptolemy, "the White Mountain." It obtained its name from Dictynna, a nymph of Crete, who is supposed first to have invented hunting-nets (δικτυα), and to have been called Dictynna on that account, having been before named Brito-martis. According to another account, she plunged into the sea, in order to avoid Minos, who pursued her, and was caught in a fisherman's net. This mountain was consecrated to Jupiter, and hence he was called Dictæus, as well as from a cave which was there, in which he had been concealed from Saturn. Crete was sometimes also styled by the poets Dictæa arva.]

DICTYS, a Cretan, who went with Idomeneus to the Trojan war. It is supposed that he wrote an history of this celebrated war, and that at his death he ordered it to be laid in his tomb, where it remained till a violent earthquake in the reign of Nero opened the monument where he had been buried. This convulsion of the earth threw out his history of the Trojan war, which was found by some shepherds, and afterwards carried to Rome. This mysterious tradition is deservedly deemed fabulous; and the history of the Trojan war, which is now extant as the composition of Dictys of Crete, was composed in the 15th century, or, according to others, in the age of Constantine, and falsely attributed to one of the followers of Idomeneus. The best edition of Dictys is by Masellus Venia, 4to. Mediol. 1477.

DIDIA LEX, de Sumptibus, by Didius, A. U. C. 606, to restrain the expenses that attended public festivals and entertainments, and limit the number of guests which generally attended them, not only at Rome, but in all the provinces of Italy. By it, not only those who received guests in these festive meetings, but the guests themselves, were liable to be fined. It was an extension of the Oppian and Fannian laws.

DIDIUS JULIANUS, a rich Roman, who, after the murder of Pertinax, bought the empire which the Pretorians had exposed to sale, A. D. 192. His great luxury and extravagance rendered him odious; and when he refused to pay the money which he had promised for the imperial purple, the soldiers revolted against him, and put him to death, after a short reign. Severus was made emperor after him.

DIDO, called also Elissa, a daughter of Belus king of Tyre, who married Sichæus, or Sicharbas, her uncle, who was priest of Hercules. Pygmalion, who succeeded to the throne of Tyre after Belus, murdered Sichæus, to get possession of the immense riches which he possessed; and Dido, disconsolate for the loss of a husband whom she tenderly loved, and by whom she was equally esteemed, set sail in quest of a settlement, with a number of Tyrians, to whom the cruelty of the tyrant became odious. According to some accounts, she threw into the sea the riches of her husband, which Pygmalion so greatly desired; and by that artifice compelled the ships to fly with her, that had come by order of the tyrant to obtain the riches of Sichæus. During her voyage, Dido visited the coast of Cyprus, where she carried away 50 women, who prostituted themselves on the sea-shore, and gave them as wives to her Tyrian followers. A storm drove her fleet on the African coast, and she bought of the inhabitants as much land as could be covered by a bull's hide cut into thongs. Upon this piece of land she built a citadel, called Byrsa. [A different account from the common one, of the origin of the name Byrsa, is given under that term.] The increase of population, and the rising commerce among her subjects, soon obliged her to enlarge her city and the boundaries of her dominions. Her beauty, as well as the fame of her enterprise, gained her many admirers; and her subjects wished to compel her to marry Iarbas, king of Mauritania, who threatened them with a dreadful war. Dido begged three months to give her decisive answer; and during that time she erected a funeral pile, as if wishing, by a solemn sacrifice, to appease the manes of Sichæus, to whom she had promised eternal fidelity. When all was prepared, she stabbed herself on the pile in presence of her people, and by this uncommon action, obtained the name of Dido, valiant woman, instead of Elissa. According to Virgil and Ovid, the death of Dido was caused by the sudden departure of Æneas, of whom she was deeply enamoured, and whom she could not obtain as a husband. This poetical fiction represents Æneas as living in the age of Dido, and introduces an anachronism of near 300 years. Dido left Phœnicia 247 years after the Trojan war, or the age of Æneas, that is, about 953 years B. C. This chronological error proceeds not from the ignorance of the poets, but it is supported by the authority of Horace,

“*Aut famam sequere, aut sibi convenientia
finge.*”

[Sir Isaac Newtown, however, makes Æneas

and Dido contemporaries, in the year 883 B. C. when, as he says, Dido built Carthage; and he states the capture of Troy to have happened in the year 904 B. C. which others refer to 1184 B. C.] While Virgil describes, in a beautiful episode, the desperate love of Dido, and the submission of Æneas to the will of the gods, he at the same time gives an explanation of the hatred which existed between the republics of Rome and Carthage, and informs his readers that their mutual enmity originated in their very first foundation, and was apparently kindled by a more remote cause than the jealousy and rivalry of two flourishing empires. Dido, after her death, was honoured as a deity by her subjects. [But the landing of Æneas in Italy, and the origin of the Romans from the Trojans is a mere fable. *vid. DIDŪMA, [a fountain of Greece in Thessaly.—Also two small islands near that of Scyros.—One of the Æoliae insule, near Sicily.]

DIDŪMUS, a scholiast on Homer, surnamed ΧΑΛΚΕΥΤΗΣ, [or brazen entrails, from the number of his productions. He is said to have composed nearly 4000 volumes, none which have come down to us. Seneca speaks of the subjects which Didymus discussed as trifling in themselves, or, as he says, subjects which are forgotten, or which ought to be forgotten if they were known.] He flourished B. C. 40. The best editions of his commentaries are, that in 2 vols. 8vo. Venet. apud Ald. 1523, and that of Paris, 8vo. 1530.—[A mountain of Phrygia, vid. Dindymus.]

DI, the divinities of the ancient inhabitants of the earth, were very numerous. Every object which caused terror, inspired gratitude, or bestowed affluence, received the tribute of veneration. Man saw a superior agent in the stars, the elements, or the trees, and supposed that the waters which communicated fertility to his fields and possessions were under the influence and direction of some invisible power, inclined to favour and to benefit mankind. Thus arose a train of divinities, which imagination arrayed in different forms, and armed with different powers. They were endowed with understanding, and were actuated by the same passions which daily afflict the human race, and those children of superstition were appeased or provoked as the imperfect being which gave them birth. Their wrath was mitigated by sacrifices and incense, and sometimes human victims bled to expiate a crime which superstition alone supposed to exist. The sun, from his powerful influence and animating nature, first attracted the notice and claimed the adoration of the uncivilized inhabitants of the earth. The moon also was honoured with sacrifices, and addressed in prayers; and after immortality had been liberally bestowed on all the heavenly bodies, mankind classed among their deities the brute creation, and the cat and sow shared equally with Jupiter himself, the father of gods and men, the devout veneration of their votaries. This immense number of deities have been divided into different classes, according to the will and pleasure of the mythologists. The Romans, generally speaking, reckoned two classes of the gods, the dii majorum gentium, or dii consulentes, and the dii minorum gentium. The former were twelve in number, six males and six females. (vid. Consentes.) In the class of the latter were ranked all the gods which were worshipped in different parts of the earth. Besides these, there were some called dii selecti, sometimes classed with the twelve greater gods; these were Janus, Saturn, the Genius, the Moon, Pluto, and Bacchus. There were also some called demi-gods, that is, who deserved immortality by the greatness of their exploits, and for their uncommon services to mankind. Among these were Priapus, Vertumnus, Hercules, and those whose parents were some of the immortal gods. Besides these, there were some called topici, whose worship was established at particular places, such as Isis in Egypt, Astarte in Syria, Uranus at Carthage, &c. In process of time, also, all the passions, and the moral virtues, were reckoned as powerful deities, and temples were raised to a goddess of concord, peace, &c. According to the authority of Hesiod, there were no less than 30,000 gods that inhabited the earth, and were guardians of men, all subservient to the power of Jupiter. To these succeeding ages added an almost equal number; and indeed they were so numerous, and their functions so various, that we find temples erected, and sacrifices offered to unknown gods. It is observable, that all the gods of the ancients have lived upon earth as mere mortals; and even Jupiter, who was the ruler of heaven, is represented by the mythologists as a helpless child; and we are acquainted with all the particulars that attended the birth and education of Juno. In process of time, not only good and virtuous men, who had been the patrons of learning and the supporters of liberty, but also thieves and pirates, were admitted among the gods; and the Roman senate courteously granted immortality to the most cruel and abandoned of their emperors.

DINARCHUS, a Greek orator, son of Sotratius, and disciple to Theophrastus, at Athens. He acquired much money by his compositions, and suffered himself to be bribed by the enemies of the Athenians, 307 B. C. Of 64 of his orations, only three remain. Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 53.

DINDYMUS or A, (orum), [a mountain of Galatia in Asia Minor, placed by Ptolemy south-east of Pessinus, while Strabo says that the city lay upon it. The latter writer names it Dindymus, which is generally followed by subsequent geographers. Mannert, however, considers the true name to have been Didymus, from the Greek, ἰδύμωσ. (twins.) and supposes this appellation to have been given to it from its double summit. One of these summits had the name of Agdistis; and on this, according to Pausanias, Atys was buried. Mannert makes Dindymus to have been at the northern extremity of a chain of mountains known by the name of Olympus, not to be confounded, however, with the mountain named Olympus near Prusa in Bithynia, nor with another Olympus in Galatia, on which the Tolistoboi collected their forces to resist the proconsul Manlius. The whole march of the Roman army, as described by Livy, shows that the last-mentioned mountain lay about 10 geographical miles north-west of Ancyra. The goddess Cybele was worshipped at Pessinus and on mount Dindymus; and hence was called Dindymene. Mannert. *Anc. DINIA, [a town of Gallia Narbonensis, and the capital of the Bodiontici. Its name is said to be of Celtic origin, being derived from din, water, and ia, hot, so called from the thermal waters at the distance of a quarter of a league from it. It is now Digne.]

DINOCRATES, an architect of Macedonia, [who proposed to Alexander to cut mount Athos into the form of a man having in his left hand the walls of a great city, and all the rivers of the mountain flowing through his right hand into the sea; or, according to another account, holding a spacious basin in the right, to receive all the waters which flowed from the mountain. (vid. Athos.) Alexander declined the offer, but took him to Egypt and employed him in beautifying Alexandria. He was also employed by the Ephesians to superintend the rebuilding of the temple of Diana.] He began to build a temple in honour of Arsinoë, by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, in which he intended to suspend a statue of the queen, by means of loadstones. His death, and that of his royal patron, prevented the execution of a work which would have been the admiration of future ages. Plin. 7, c. 37.—Marcell. 22, c. 40.—Plut. in Alex.

DINON, the father of Clitarachus, who wrote an history of Persia in Alexander's age. He is esteemed a very authentic historian by C. Nep. in Conon.—Plut. in Alex.—Diog.

DINOSTRATES. [a famous mathematician of the Platonic school, the brother of Menechmus, and disciple of Plato. Pursuing the steps of his brother, who amplified the theory of the conic sections, Dinostrates is said to have made many mathematical discoveries; but he is particularly distinguished as the inventor of the quadratrix. Montucla, however, observes, that there is some reason for ascribing the original invention of this curve to Hippias of Elea, an ingenious philosopher and geometer contemporary with Socrates.]

DIÓCLĒA. [a town of Illyricum, in Dalmaua, the native place of Diocletian. This town is now ruined. It was not far from Narona, now Narenza.]

DIOCLETIANOPOLIS, a town of Thessaly, called so in honour of Diocletian.

DIOCLETIANUS, (Caius Valerius Jovius,) a celebrated Roman emperor, born of an obscure family in Dalmatia, [at the town of Dioclea, or Doclea, from which town he derived his first name, which was probably Docles, afterwards lengthened to the more harmonious Greek form of Diocles, and at length, after his accession to the empire, to the Roman form of Diocletianus, or Dioclesianus. He likewise, on this occasion, assumed the patrician name of Valerius.] He was first a common soldier, and by merit and success he gradually rose to the office of a general, and at the death of Numerian, he was invested with the imperial purple. [At the commencement of his career, and whilst he occupied some inferior post, it is said that a Druid woman, in whose house he lodged, upbraided him with covetousness, to whom he jocosely replied, "I shall be more generous when I am emperor," "You are joking," replied the Druidess; "but I tell you in good earnest, that you will attain to the empire after you have killed a boar." This circumstance is said to have occurred in the city of Tongres, and present bishoprick of Liege.] In his high station he rewarded the virtues and fidelity of Maximian, who had shared with him all the subordinate offices in the army, by making him his colleague on the throne. He created two subordinate emperors, Constantius and Galerius, whom he called Cesars, whilst he claimed for himself and his colleague, the superior title of Augustus. Diocletian has been celebrated for his military virtues; and though he was naturally unpolished by education and study, yet he was the friend and patron of learning and true genius. He was bold and resolute, active and diligent, and well acquainted with the arts which endear a sovereign to his people, and make him respectable even in the eyes of his enemies. His cruelty, however, against the followers of christianity, has been deservedly branded with the appellation of unbounded tyranny, and insolent wantonness. After he had reigned 21 years in the greatest prosperity, he publicly abdicated the crown at Nicomedia, on the first of May, A. D. 304, and retired to a private station at Salona. Maximian, his colleague, followed his example, but not from voluntary choice; and when he some time after endeavoured to rouse the ambition of Diocletian, and persuade him to reassume the imperial purple, he received for answer, that Diocletian took now more delight in cultivating his little garden than he formerly enjoyed in a palace, when his power was extended over all the earth. He lived nine years after his abdication in the greatest security and enjoyment at Salona, and died in the 68th year of his age. Diocletian is the first sovereign who voluntarily resigned his power; a philosophical resolution, which, in a later age, was imitated by the emperor Charles the fifth of Germany. [All history reproaches him, notwithstanding the philosophical indifference which caused him to resign the Roman diadem, with pride, ostentation, and arrogance. Aurelius Victor observes, that no connection with him justified confidence, and that those whom he called his friends, could not depend upon any sincere affection on his part. He was greatly addicted to building. His baths at Rome were a vast collection of buildings, containing, besides baths, places for exercise, others for study, porticoes, halls, libraries, &c. The city of Nicomedia, in particular, felt his bounty, and he vainly endeavoured to make it equal to Rome.]

DIODORUS, an historian, surnamed Siculus, because he was born at Argyra in Sicily. He wrote an history of Egypt, Persia, Syria, Media, Greece, Rome, and Carthage, which was divided into 40 books, of which only 15 are extant, with some few fragments. This valuable composition was the work of an accurate inquirer, and it is said that he visited all the places of which he has made mention in his history. It was the labour of 30 years, though the greater part may be considered as nothing more than a judicious compilation from Berosus, Timæus, Theopompus, Callisthenes, and others. The author, however, is too credulous in some of his narrations, and often wanders far from the truth. His style is neither elegant, nor too laboured; but it contains great simplicity and unaffected correctness. He often dwells too long upon fabulous reports and trifling incidents, whilst events of the greatest importance to history are treated with brevity, and sometimes passed over in silence. His manner of reckoning, by the Olympiads and the Roman consuls, will be found very erroneous. The historian flourished about 44 years B. C. He spent much time at Rome to procure information, and authenticate his historical narrations: The best edition of his works, is that of Wesseling, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1746.—[A native of Caria, and disciple of the Megaric school. He was a great adept in that species of verbal combat which prevailed among the philosophers of his sect. It is said that a question was proposed to him in the presence of Ptolemy Soter, by Stilpo one of his fraternity, which he required time to answer, and on this account was ridiculed by Ptolemy and denominated Chronus ($\chi\rho\nu\sigma$ - $\nu\epsilon\sigma$.) Mortified at this defeat, he wrote a book on the question, but nevertheless died of vexation. He is the reputed author of the famous sophism against motion. "If any body be moved, it is moved either in the place where it is, or in a place where it is not, for nothing can act or suffer where it is not, and therefore there is no such thing as motion." Diodorus was suitably rewarded for this brilliant discovery: having dislocated his shoulder, the surgeon who was sent for, kept him for some time in torture, while he proved from the philosopher's own mode of reasoning that the bone could not have moved out of its place.—A peripatetic philosopher, with whom the uninterrupted succession of the peripatetic school terminated. — A bishop of Tarsus in Cilicia. A few fragments of his writings remain in the Catena Patrum Græcorum. He was ordained A. D. 378, and died A. D. 394.] — A stoic philosopher, preceptor to Cicero. He lived and died in the house of his pupil, whom he instructed in the various branches of Greek literature. Cic. in Brut.

DIOGÈNES, a celebrated Cynic philosopher of Sinope. [His father, who was a banker, was convicted of debasing the public coin, and was obliged to leave the country. This circumstance gave the son an opportunity of visiting Athens.] At Athens he became the disciple of Antisthenes, who was at the head of the Cynics. Antisthenes, having been mortified by neglect, was in a peevish humour, and at first refused to admit him into his house, and even struck him with a stick. Diogenes calmly bore the rebuke, and said, "strike me, Antisthenes, as you please; I will be your scholar." Antisthenes, overcome by his perseverance, received him, and afterwards made him his intimate companion and friend. [Diogenes perfectly adopted the principles and character of his master. Renouncing every other object of ambition, he determined to distinguish himself by his contempt of riches and honours, and by his indignation against luxury. He wore a coarse cloak; carried a wallet and a staff; made the porticoes, and other public places, his habitation; and depended upon casual contributions for his daily bread. A friend, whom he had desired to procure him a cell, not executing his order so soon as was expected, he took up his abode in a tub, or large vessel, in the Metroum. It is probable, however, that this was only a temporary expression of indignation and contempt, and that he did not make a tub the settled place of his residence. This famous tub is indeed celebrated by Juvenal; it is also ridiculed by Lucian, and mentioned by Seneca. But no notice is taken of so singular a circumstance by other ancient writers who have mentioned this philosopher; not even by Epictetus, who discourses at large concerning Diogenes, and relates many particulars respecting his manner of life. It may therefore be questioned, whether this whole story is not to be ranked among the numerous tales which have been invented to expose the sect of the Cynics to ridicule. It cannot be doubted, however, that Diogenes practised the most hardy self-control, and the most rigid abstinence; exposing himself to the utmost extremes of heat and cold, and living upon the simplest diet, casually supplied by the hand of charity. In his old age, sailing to Ægina, he was taken by pirates and carried to Crete, where he was exposed to sale in the public market. When the auctioneer asked him what he could do, he said, "I can govern men, therefore sell me to one who wants a master." Xenaiades, a wealthy Corinthian, happening at that instant to pass by, was struck with the singularity of his reply, and purchased him. On their arrival at Corinth, Xenaiades gave him his freedom, and, at length committed to him the education of his children, and the direction of his domestic concerns. Diogenes executed this trust with so much judgment and fidelity, that Xenaiades used to say that the gods had sent a good genius to his house. During his residence at Corinth, the interview between him and Alexander is said to have taken place. Plutarch relates, that Alexander, when at Corinth receiving the congratulations of all ranks on being appointed to command the army of the Greeks against the Persians, missed Diogenes among the number, with whose character he was not unacquainted. Curious to see one who had given so signal an instance of his haughty independence of spirit, Alexander went in search of him, and found him sitting in his tub in the sun. "I am Alexander the Great," said the monarch, "and I am Diogenes the Cynic," replied the philosopher. Alexander then requested that he would inform him what service he could render him, "Stand away between me and the sun," said the Cynic. Alexander, struck with the reply, said to his friends who were ridiculing the whimsical singularity of the philosopher, "If I were not Alexander, I would wish to be Diogenes." If his story is too good to be omitted, but there are several circumstances which in some degree diminish its credibility. It supposes Diogenes to have lived in his tub at Corinth, whereas it appears that he lived there in the house of Xenaiades, and that if he ever dwelt in a tub, he left it behind him at Athens. Alexander, moreover, was at this time scarcely 20 years old, and could not call himself Alexander the Great, for he did not receive this title till his Persian and Indian expedition, after which he never returned to Greece; yet the whole transaction supposes him elated with the pride of conquest. Diogenes, probably, was visited by Alexander, when the latter held the general assembly of the Greeks at Corinth, and was received by him with rudeness and incivility, which may have given rise to the whole story. The philosopher at this time would be about 70 years of age.] After a life spent in the greatest indigence, he died B. C. 324, in the 96th year of his age. He ordered his body to be carelessly thrown into a ditch, and some dust to be sprinkled over it. His orders were, however, disobeyed in this particular, and his friends honoured his remains with a magnificent funeral at Corinth. The inhabitants of Sinope raised statues to his memory; and the marble figure of a dog was placed on a high column erected on his tomb. His biographer has transmitted to posterity a number of sayings, remarkable for their simplicity and moral tendency. The life of Diogenes, however, shrinks from the eye of a strict examination; he boasted of his poverty, and was so arrogant that many have observed that the virtues of Diogenes arose from pride and vanity, not from wisdom or sound philosophy. His morals were corrupted, he gave way to the most vicious indulgences, and his unbounded wantonness has given occasion to some to observe, that the bottom of his tub would not bear too close an examination. [It is wholly incredible that a man who is universally celebrated for his sobriety and contempt of pleasure, and who, for his vehement indignation against vice, and his bold attempts to reform the age in which he lived, has been represented by some of the most eminent philosophers, as one endued with divine wisdom, should have been capable of committing the grossest indecencies. The tale which is related of him and the courtesan Lais is wholly inconsistent with chronology, for Lais must have been fourscore years old, and Diogenes seventy, when the circumstance is related to have taken place. The truth is, we are chiefly indebted for these stories to Athenæus, a writer who seems to have ransacked every corner of antiquity, and of his own invention too, for tales to the discredit of philosophy.] Diog. in vitâ.—Plut. in Apoph.—*Cic. de Nat. This work contains an accurate account of the ancient philosophers, and is replete with all their anecdotes and particular opinions. It is compiled, however, without any plan, method, or precision, though much neatness and conciseness are observable through the whole. In this multifarious biography the author does not seem particularly partial to any sect, except perhaps it be that of Potamon of Alexandria. Diogenes died A. D. 222. The best editions of his works are that of Meibomius, 2 vols. 4to. Amst. 1692, and that of Lips. 8vo. 1759. DIOMÈDES, son of Tydeus and Deiphyle, was king of Ætolia, and one of the bravest of the Grecian chiefs in the Trojan war. He engaged Hector and Aeneas, and by repeated acts of valour obtained much military glory. He went with Ulysses to steal the Palladium from the temple of Minerva at Troy; and assisted in murdering Rhesus, king of Thrace, and carrying away his horses. At his return from the siege of Troy, he lost his way in the darkness of the night, and landed in Attica, where his companions plundered the country, and lost the Trojan Palladium. During his long absence, his wife Ægiale forgot her marriage vows, and prostituted herself to Cometes, one of her servants. This lasciviousness of the queen was attributed by some to the resentment of Venus, whom Diomedes had severely wounded in the arm in a battle before Troy. The infidelity of Ægiale was highly displeasing to Diomedes. He resolved to abandon his native country which was the seat of his dis race, and the attempts of his wife to take away his life, according to some accounts, did not a little contribute to hasten his departure. He came to that part of Italy which has been called Magna Græcia, where he built a city called Argyrippa, and married the daughter of Daunus, the king of the country. He died there in extreme old age, or, according to a certain tradition, he perished by the hand of his father-in-law. His death was greatly lamented by his companions, who in the excess of their grief were changed into birds resembling swans. These birds took flight into neighbouring islands in the Adriatic, [vid. Diomedæ Insulæ.] and became remarkable for the tameness with which they approached the Greeks, and for the horror with which they shunned all other nations. They are called the birds of Diomedes. Altars were raised to Diomedes as to a god, one of which Strabo mentions at Timavus. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 756, l. 11, v. 243, &c.—*Ovid. DION, [an illustrious inhabitant of Syracuse, who, deriving an ample inheritance from his father Hipparinus, became a disciple of Plato, invited to the court of Syracuse by the elder Dionysius. In consequence of the instructions of his master, he escaped being infected with the licentiousness of the capital, and attaching himself to the cause of liberty, took part with his preceptor in the persecutions which he underwent from the tyrant.

He was nearly connected with Dionysius by having married his daughter, and by his sister being one of his wives; and he was also much esteemed by him, so as to be employed on several embassies. At the accession of the younger Dionysius, Plato was again, at Dion's request, invited to Syracuse. In order, however, to counteract his influence, the courtiers obtained the recall of Philistus, a man notorious for his adherence to arbitrary principles. This faction determined to supplant Dion, and availed themselves of a real or supposititious letter to fix on him the charge of treason. Dion, precluded from defence, was transported to Italy, and from thence proceeded to Greece, where he was received with great honour. Dionysius became jealous of his popularity in Greece, especially at Athens, stopped his remittances, confiscated his estates, and compelled his wife, who had been left at Syracuse as a hostage, to marry another person. Dion, incensed at this treatment, determined to expel the tyrant. Plato resisted his intentions; but encouraged by other friends, he assembled a body of troops, and with a small force sailed to Sicily, took advantage of the absence of Dionysius in Italy, and freed the people from his controul. Dionysius returned; but after some conflicts was compelled to escape to Italy. The austere and philosophic manners of Dion, however, soon lost him the favour of his fickle countrymen, and he was supplanted by Heraclides, a Syracusan exile, and obliged to make his retreat to Leontium. He afterwards regained the ascendancy, and in a rash moment caused Heraclides to be assassinated. This robbed him ever after of his peace of mind. An Athenian, an intimate friend, formed a conspiracy against his life, and Dion was assassinated in the 55th year of his age, B. C. 354. His death was universally lamented by the Syracusans, and a monument was raised to his memory. Diod. 16.—C. Nep. in vitâ.]—Cassius, a native of Nicæa in Bithynia. His father's name was Apronianus. He was raised to the greatest offices of state in the Roman empire by Pertinax and his three successors. Naturally fond of study, he improved himself by unwearied application, and was ten years in collecting materials for an history of Rome, which he made public in 80 books, after a laborious employment of 12 years in composing it. This valuable history began with the arrival of Æneas in Italy, and was continued down to the reign of the emperor Alexander Severus. The 34 first books are totally lost, the 20 following are mutilated, and fragments are all that we possess of the last 20. In the compilation of his extensive history, Dion proposed to himself Thucydides for a model; but he is not perfectly happy in his imitation. His style is pure and elegant, and his narrations are judiciously managed, and his reflections learned; but upon the whole he is credulous, and the bigotted slave of partiality, satire, and flattery. He inveighs against the republican principles of Brutus and Cicero, and extols the cause of Cæsar. Seneca is the object of his satire, and he represents him as debauched and licentious in his morals. Dion flourished about the 230th year of the christian era. The best edition of his works is that of Reimarus, 2 vols. fol. Hamb. 1750.

DIŌNĒA, a surname of Venus, supposed to be the daughter of Jupiter and Dione.

DIŌNE, a nymph, daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was mother of Venus, by Jupiter, according to Homer and others. Hesiod, however, gives Venus a different origin. [vid. Venus.] Venus is herself sometimes called Dione. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 19.—Homer. Il. 5, v. 381.—Stat. 1, Sylv. 1, v. 86.

DIŌNŪSĪA, festivals in honour of Διονυσος, or Bacchus, [sometimes called by the general name of Ογγια, which word, though sometimes applied to the mysteries of other gods, more peculiarly belongs to that of Bacchus.] Their form and solemnity were first introduced into Greece from Egypt by a certain Melampus, and if we admit that Bacchus is the same as Isis, the Dionysia of the Greeks are the same as the festivals celebrated by the Egyptians in honour of Isis. [The worship of Bacchus is rather of Indian origin. vid. Bacchus.] They were observed at Athens with more splendour and ceremonious superstition than in any other part of Greece. The years were numbered by their celebration, the archon assisted at the solemnity, and the priests that officiated were honoured with the most dignified seats at the public games. At first they were celebrated with great simplicity, and the time was consecrated to mirth. It was then usual to bring a vessel of wine adorned as with a vine branch, after which followed a goat, a basket of figs, and the φαλλοι. The worshippers imitated in their dress and actions the poetical fictions concerning Bacchus. They clothed themselves in fawn's skins, fine linen, and mitres, they carried thyrsi, drums, pipes, and flutes, and crowned themselves with garlands of ivy, vine, fir, &c. Some imitated Silenus, Pan, and the Satyrs, by the uncouth manner of their dress, and their fantastical motions. Some rode upon asses, and others drove the goats to slaughter for the sacrifice. In this manner both sexes joined in the solemnity, and ran about the hills and country, nodding their heads, dancing in ridiculous postures, and filling the air with hideous shrieks and shouts, and crying aloud, Evœe Bacche! Io! Io! Evœe! Iacche! Iobacche! Evohe! With such solemnities were the festivals of Bacchus celebrated by the Greeks, particularly the Athenians. In one of these there followed a number of persons carrying sacred vessels, one of which contained water. After these came a select number of noble virgins carrying little baskets of gold filled with all sorts of fruits. This was the most mysterious part of the solemnity. Serpents were sometimes put in the baskets, and by their wreathing and crawling out they amused and astonished the beholders. After the virgins followed a company of men carrying poles, at the end of which were fastened φαλλοι. The heads of these men, who were called φαλλοφοροι, were crowned with ivy and violets, and their faces covered with other herbs. They marched singing songs upon the occasion of the festivals called Φαλλικα ασματα. Next to the φαλλοφοροι followed the εθουαλλοι in women's apparel, with white striped garments reaching to the ground; their heads were decked with garlands, and on their hands they wore gloves composed of flowers. Their gestures and actions were like those of a drunken man. Besides these, there were a number of persons, called λικνυροροι, who carried the λικνον or musical van of Bacchus; without their attendance none of the festivals of Bacchus were celebrated with due solemnity, and on that account the god is often called λικνυτη. The festivals of Bacchus were almost innumerable. The name of the most celebrated was the Dionysia αρχαιοστρα, at Limnæ in Attica. The chief persons that officiated were fourteen women, called γρηραι, venerable. They were appointed by one of the archons, and before their appointment they solemnly took an oath, before the archon or his wife, that their body was free from all pollution.—The greater Dionysia, sometimes called ασικα or τα κατ' αυ, as being celebrated within the city, were the most famous. They were supposed to be the same as the preceding, [and were celebrated in the month Elaphebolion.] The less Dionysia, sometimes called τα κατ' αγρους, because celebrated in the country; ληναια from ληνος, a wine-press, were to all appearance a preparation for the greater festivals. They were celebrated in autumn.—The Dionysia βραυρωνια, observed at Brauron in Attica, were a scene of lewdness, extravagance, and debauchery.—The Dionysia νυκτιλια were observed by the Athenians in honour of Bacchus Nyctelius. It was unlawful to reveal whatever was seen or done during the celebration.—The Dionysia called αμοφαγια, because human victims were offered to the god, or because the priests imitated the eating of raw flesh, were celebrated with much solemnity. The priests put serpents in their hair, and by the wildness of their looks, and the oddity of their actions, they feigned insanity.—The Dionysia αρκαδικα were yearly observed in Arcadia, and the children who had been instructed in the music of Philoxenus and Timotheus, were introduced in a theatre, where they celebrated the festivals of Bacchus by entertaining the spectators with songs, dances, and different exhibitions. There were besides these, others of inferior note. There was also one observed every three years, called Dionysia τετρηνηικα, and it is said that Bacchus instituted it himself in commemoration of his Indian expedition, in which he spent three years. There is also another celebrated every fifth year, as mentioned by the scholiast of Aristophanes.—All these festivals in honour of the god of wine, were celebrated by the Greeks with great licentiousness, and they contributed much to the corruption of morals among all ranks of people. They were also introduced into Tuscany, and from thence to Rome. Among the Romans both sexes promiscuously joined in the celebration during the darkness of night. The drunkenness, the debauchery, and impure actions and indulgences, which soon prevailed at the solemnity, called aloud for the interference of the senate, and the consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Martius Philippus, made a strict examination concerning the propriety and superstitious forms of the Bacchanalia. The disorder and pollution which was practised with impunity by no less than 7,000 votaries of either sex, was beheld with horror and astonishment by the consuls, and the Bacchanalia were forever banished from Rome by a decree of the senate. They were again reinstated there in length of time, but not with such licentiousness as before. Eurip. in Bacc.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 737.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 533, l. 4, v. 391, l. 6, v. 557.

DIONYSIUS 1st, or the elder, a tyrant of Syracuse, [raised to that high rank from the station of a simple citizen. He was son-in-law to Hermocrates, who, having been banished by an adverse party, attempted to return by force of arms, and was killed in the action. Dionysius was dangerously wounded, but he recovered, and was afterwards recalled. In time he procured himself to be nominated one of the generals, and under pretence of raising a force sufficient to resist the Carthaginians, he obtained a decree for recalling all the exiles. He was soon called to take the chief command. His first act was to double the soldiers' pay, and, pretending that his life was in danger, he was allowed a body guard. These he made the instruments for accomplishing his ambitious views, and became tyrant of Syracuse in the 25th year of his age, B. C. 404.] He vowed eternal enmity against Carthage, and experienced various success in his wars against that republic. He was ambitious of being thought a poet, and his brother Theodorus was commissioned to go to Olympia, and repeat there some verses in his name, with other competitors, for the poetical prizes. His expectations were frustrated, and his poetry was received with groans and hisses. He was not, however, so unsuccessful at Athens, where a poetical prize was publicly adjudged to one of his compositions. This victory gave him more pleasure than all the victories he had ever obtained in the field of battle. His tyranny and cruelty at home rendered him odious in the eyes of his subjects, and he became so suspicious, that he never admitted his wife or children to his private apartments without a previous examination of their garments. He never trusted his head to a barber, but always burnt his beard. [The cave which he caused to be constructed is well known. It still exists, and is a large cavern cut horizontally in a rock, 72 feet high, 27 broad, and 219 deep. The entrance resembles the shape of an ear, and the interior has somewhat the form of the letter S. On the top of the cave there is a groove, which runs from one end to the other, and has communication with a small room at the entrance, now inaccessible by reason of the height and steepness of the rock. This is imagined to have been a guard-room, where the tyrant placed a sentinel, who, by hearing the least whisper of the prisoners within, made his report accordingly to his master. Some modern travellers deny the resemblance to the human ear, and deride the idea of such a design in its original formation. Lord Sandwich supposes the cavern to be the remains of the Lautumia Syracusana, mentioned by Cicero, but most other travellers agree that the immense cavern which has been converted into a subterranean garden, and belongs to the convent of the Capuchins, was the Lautumia to which Cicero alluded.] The artists that had been employed in making this cave were all put to death by order of the tyrant, for fear of their revealing to what purposes a work of such uncommon construction was to be appropriated. His impiety and sacrilege were as conspicuous as his suspicious credulity. He took a golden mantle from the statue of Jupiter, observing that the son of Saturn had too warm a covering for the summer, and too cold for the winter, and he placed one of wool instead. He also robbed Æsculapius of his golden beard, and plundered the temple of Proserpine. [In the year 366 B. C. a tragedy of his was acted, and gained the prize. This so elated the king, that he offered a solemn sacrifice, feasted all his subjects, and drank to such excess as to cause his death, which happened in the 38th year of his reign.] Some suppose that the tyrant invented the catapulta, an engine which proved of infinite service for the discharging of showers of darts and stones in the time of a siege. [Dionysius, in the course of his reign, invited over to his court the philosopher Plato, at the instance of Dion, who thought that the conversation of the philosopher might prove of service to the tyrant. Plato's discourse, however, only had the effect of irritating him, and the philosopher was compelled to fly from the island. Before he departed, however, Dionysius, suspecting his design, made the captain of the vessel promise that he would either put Plato to death, or sell him on the passage. The latter was done, and Plato was sold as a slave in the island of Ægina. vid. Plato.] Diod. 13, 14, &c.—Justin. 20, c. 1, &c. Xenoph. Hist. Græc.—C. Nep. Timol.—Plut. in Diod.—The second of that name, surnamed the younger, was son of Dionysius the 1st, by Doris. [He succeeded his father as tyrant of Sicily, and invited Plato to revisit Sicily. The philosopher consented to come, being led to this step, by a promise on the part of Dionysius, that he would adopt his form of government. Little, however, resulted from this visit; Dion was in banishment, and Dionysius on the commencement of a war sent Plato back to his own country; not, however, without a promise that Dion should be restored on the return of peace. A third invitation to Sicily was given to Plato after this, the particulars of which the reader will find detailed in the biographical sketch given of that philosopher. (vid. Plato.) The treatment of Dionysius towards Dion eventually cost him his kingdom, (vid. Dion.) and he was driven out of Sicily. He afterwards re-ascended the throne. B. C. 350; but uninstructed by past misfortunes, and entering anew on the same course of lawless tyranny, he was driven out by Timoleon, and retired to Corinth, where he kept low company and indulged in gross debauchery. Some writers assert that he was obliged for a maintenance to open a school at Corinth, but this is not mentioned by Plutarch, and is not entitled to credit. Neither the time nor the place of his death is known.] Dionysius, was as cruel as his father, but he did not, like him, possess the art of retaining his power. This was seen and remarked by the old man, who, when he saw his son attempting to debauch the wives of some of his subjects, asked him with the greatest indignation, whether he had ever heard of his having acted so brutal a part in his younger days? No, answered the son, because you were not the son of a king. Well, my son, replied the old man, never shalt thou be the father of a king. Justin. 21, c. 1, 2, &c.—Diod. 15, &c.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 3.—Quintil. 8, c. 6.—C. Nep. in Diom.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 2.—An historian of Halicarnassus, who left his country and came to reside at Rome, that he might carefully study all the Greek and Latin writers whose compositions treated of the Roman history. He formed an acquaintance with all the learned of the age, and derived much information from their company and conversation. After an unremitting application, during 24 years, he gave to the world his Roman Antiquities in 20 books, of which only the 11 first are now extant, nearly containing the account of 312 years. [The style of this writer is flat and languid, but he is regarded as an accurate historian, and judicious in his narratives.] Like a faithful historian, he never mentioned any thing but what was authenticated, and totally disregarded the fabulous traditions which fill and disgrace the pages of both his predecessors and followers. To the merits of the historian, Dionysius, as may be seen in his treatises, has also added the equally respectable character of the eloquent orator, the critic, and the politician. He lived during the Augustan age, and came to Rome about thirty years before the Christian era. The best editions of his works are that of Oxford, 2 vols. fol. 1704, and that of Reiske, 6 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1774.—A tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus, in the age of Alexander the Great. After the death of the conqueror and of Perdicas, he married Amestris, the niece of king Darius, and assumed the title of king. He was of such an uncommon corpulence that he never exposed his person in public, and when he gave audience to foreign ambassadors he always placed himself in a chair which was conveniently made to hide his face and person from the eyes of the spectators. When he was asleep it was impossible to awake him without boring his flesh with pins. He died in the 55th year of his age. As his reign was remarkable for mildness and popularity, his death was severely lamented by his subjects. He left two sons and a daughter, and appointed his widow queen-regent.—A native of Chalcis, who wrote a book entitled πρωτος, or, the origin of cities.—A philosopher of Heraclea, disciple to Zeno. He starved himself to death, B. C. 279, in the 81st year of his age. Diog.—A writer in the Augustan age called Periegetes. He wrote a very valuable geographical treatise in Greek hexameters, still extant. [He follows, in general, the system of Eratosthenes; in such a way, however, as to interweave with it all the subsequent improvements in geographical science down to his own time; while, as a poet, he occasionally digresses into the regions of mythological fiction.] The best edition of his treatise is that of Henry Stephens, 4to. 1577, with the scholia, [and that of Wells, Oxon. 1709, in 8vo.]—A Christian writer, A. D. 492, called Areopagita, [so termed because a member of the Areopagus. He was converted to Christianity by St. Paul's preaching. (Acts 17, 34.) He is reported to have been the first bishop of Athens appointed to that office by the apostle Paul, and to have suffered martyrdom under Domitian. The best edition of his works is that of Antwerp, 2 vols. fol. 1634. It is now, however, the general opinion of the learned that these writings are spurious, though they differ in opinion concerning the time when they were written.]—A celebrated critic. (vid. Longinus.)—A native of Thrace, generally called the Rhodian, because he lived there. He wrote some grammatical treatises and commentaries, B. C. 64. Strab. 14.

DIOPHANTUS, a Greek orator of Mitylene, preceptor to Tib. Gracchus. Cic in Brut.—[A celebrated mathematician of Alexandria, who flourished at a period which has not been precisely ascertained. According to Abulpharagius, he lived under the emperor Julian, or towards the year 366 of the Christian era. His reputation was so great among the ancients that they ranked him with Pythagoras and Euclid. From his epitaph in the Anthologia, which furnishes a kind of arithmetical problem, the following particulars of his life have been collected, viz. that he was married when 33 years old, and had a son 5 years after; that his son died at the age of 42, and that his father did not survive him above four years; whence it appears that Diophantus was 84 years old when he died. The problem amounts to this, viz. to find a number such that its 6th, 12th, and 7th parts, with 5, its half and 4, amount to the whole number; which is evidently 84. Diophantus introduced the use of various symbols into the science of Algebra; but his more important service is the method of applying the algebraic analysis to indeterminate problems. He wrote 13 books of arithmetic or algebra, of which only 6 remain. The best edition is that of Bachet, republished with additional notes of M. de Fermat, by the son of the latter, at Toulouse, 1670, in folio.]

DIOSPÖLIS, [a town of Armenia Minor, previously called Cabira. Pompey gave it the name of Diospolis. It was afterwards called Sebaste, in honour of Augustus.]

DIORYCTUS, a place of Acarnania, where a canal was cut (διὰ ὀρύσσας) to make Leucadia an island. [vid. Leucadia.] Plin. 4, c. 1.

DIOSCORIDES, a native of [Anazarbus in] Cilicia, who lived, as some suppose, in the age of Nero. He was originally a soldier, but afterwards applied himself to study, and wrote a book upon medicinal herbs, of which the best edition is that of Saracenus, fol. Francof. 1593. [His knowledge of plants has been reckoned superior to that of any other ancient writer; but Theophrastus must always be excepted as by far the more philosophical botanist, and one by whose information Dioscorides profited, as Pliny subsequently did from them both.]

DIOSCORIDIS INSULA, an island situate at the entrance of the Arabic Gulf, and now called Socotora. [The aloe here produced are held in more estimation than those of Hadramaüt. If we believe the Arabian writers, Alexander settled here a colony of Iouanion, that is to say, of Greeks. Becoming christians, they remained such, according to Marco Polo, at the close of the 13th century.]

DIOSCŪRI, or sons of Jupiter, a name given to Castor and Pollux. There were festivals in their honour, called Dioscuria, celebrated by the people of Corcyra, and chiefly by the Lacedæmonians. They were observed with much jovial festivity. The people made a free use of the gifts of Bacchus, and diverted themselves with sports, of which wrestling-matches always made a part.

DIOSCURIAS, [a maritime town of Colchis, at the mouth of the small river Charus. It was afterwards called Sebastopolis, and was in the earliest ages the port most frequented in Colchis by distant as well as neighbouring nations, speaking different languages; a circumstance which still distinguishes Iskuriah, whose name is only a corruption of the ancient one. Arrian makes it to have been established by a colony of Milesians. Pomponius Mela, however, says that it was founded by Castor and Pollux, who made a voyage to Colchis, along with Jason, in the Argonautic expedition.] Plin. 6, c. 28.

DIOSPOLIS [Magna, a famous city of Egypt. vid. Thebæ.—Parva, a city of Egypt, west of Tentyra, and on the western side of the Nile.—A town of Asia Minor in Bithynia, on the coast of the Euxine, north-east of Prusa.—A city of Palestine, called also Lydda, and now Lod. It was situate in an extensive plain, and is placed by the itinerary of Antonine 32 miles from Jerusalem, and 36 miles from Cæsarea. It lay east of Joppa. This town suffered much during the civil wars of the second triumvirate. Cassius exposed the inhabitants to public sale, but Antony afterwards restored them to their country.]

DIPOLIS, a name given to Lemnos, as having two cities, Hephæstia and Myrina.

DIPAS, (antis.) a river of Cilicia, flowing from mount Taurus. Lucan. 8, v. 255.—[A species of serpent, whose bite is said to produce a most excessive thirst, and consequently to prove mortal. Hence the Greeks called it διψας, or, thirsty. In Latin it is called situla, a pail. Moses speaks of it in Deut. 3, 15. The Hebrew name is tzimaon, answering to the Greek in meaning.]

DIRÆ, the daughters of Acheron and Nox, who persecuted the souls of the guilty. They are the same as the Furies, and some suppose that they are called Furies in hell, Harpies on earth, and Diræ in heaven. They were represented as standing near the throne of Jupiter, in an attitude which expressed their eagerness to receive his orders, and the power of tormenting the guilty on earth with the most execrating punishments. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 473, l. 8, v. 701.

[DIRÆ, called also Dire and Dira, now the straits of Bab-el-mandeb. The Greek name expresses a passage straitened in the manner of a throat; the modern appellation is Arabic, and means "the port of mourning, or affliction," from apprehensions of the risk of venturing beyond, into the expanse of a vast ocean.]

DIRCE, a woman whom Lycus, king of Thebes, married after he had divorced Antiope. When Antiope became pregnant by Jupiter, Dirce suspected her husband of infidelity to her bed, and imprisoned Antiope, whom she tormented with the greatest cruelty. Antiope escaped from her confinement, and brought forth Amphion and Zethus on mount Cithæron. When these children were informed of the cruelties to which their mother had been exposed, they besieged Thebes, put Lycus to death, and tied the cruel Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her over rocks and precipices, and exposed her to the most poignant pains, till the gods, pitying her fate, changed her into a fountain, in the neighbourhood of Thebes. [The fountain Dirce is said by Pausanias to have emptied into the Ismenus. Near it Pindar had his house.] According to some accounts, Antiope was mother of Amphion and Zethus, before she was confined and exposed to the tyranny of Dirce. vid. Amphion, Antiope. Propert. 3, el. 15, v. 37.—Paus. 9, c. 26.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 57.—Lucan. 3, v. 175, l. 4, v. 550.

DIRPHYA, a surname of Juno, from Dirphya, a mountain of Bœotia, where the goddess had a temple.

DIS, a god of the Gauls, the same as Pluto, the god of hell. The inhabitants of Gaul supposed themselves descended from that deity. [Cæsar states that the Gauls believed themselves descended from father Dis, (Pluto.) The fact most probably was this, that the Gauls told Cæsar they were sprung from the earth, an expression which he, adapting it to the Roman form of speech, renders by the words a patre Dite.] Cæs. Bell. G. 6.—Tacul. 4, Hist. c. 34.

DISCORDIA, a malevolent deity, daughter of Nox, and sister to Nemesis, the Parcæ and Death. She was driven from heaven by Jupiter, because she sowed dissensions among the gods, and was the cause of continual quarrels. When the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis were celebrated, the goddess of discord was not invited, and this seeming neglect so irritated her, that she threw an apple into the midst of the assembly of the gods with the inscription of detur pulchriori. This apple was the cause of the ruin of Troy, and of infinite misfortunes to the Greeks. (vid. Paris.) She is represented with a pale ghastly look, her garment is torn, her eyes sparkle with fire, and in her bosom she holds a dagger concealed. Her head is generally entwined with serpents, and she is attended by Bellona. She is supposed to be the cause of all the dissensions, murders, wars, and quarrels, which arise upon earth, public as well as private. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 702.—Hesiod. Theogn. 225. Petronius.

DITHYRAMBUS, a surname of Bacchus, whence the hymns sung in his honour were called dithyrambs. [The measure, which is what distinguishes this kind of poetry, is said to have been invented by Dithyrambus a Theban. Pindar, however, and his scholiast, seem to consider this species of poetry as so very ancient that its original inventor cannot be ascertained. Herodotus ascribes it to Arion. Clemens of Alexandria makes the inventor to have been one Lassus or Lassus of Hermione. The ancients gave the name of dithyrambs to those verses where none of the common rules or measures were observed; much like those called by the French, vers libres, by the Italians, versi sciolti. The measure of the Greek dithyrambs was very bold and irregular, the poets not only coined new words for the purpose, but assumed a great license in the use of compounds. The words ιαμβος, θγιαμβος, and διθόγραμμος, seem to be related to one another. Perhaps they are corruptions of Sanscrit terms, for the worship of Bacchus was unquestionably of Indian origin. Διδύχαμος was an ancient title of that deity, as Παιάν was of Apollo; and both terms were afterwards applied to songs in honour of their respective possessors. It is very remarkable that the Hindoos apply the term Triampo to Baghessa, who almost exactly coincides with the Grecian Bacchus, as the Greeks did the term βγίχαμος to the latter deity. The common derivation of διδύχαμος from διδυχοσ is erroneous, as the first syllable of the latter word is uniformly short.]

DIUI, a name chiefly appropriated to those who were made gods after death, such as heroes, and warriors.

DIVITIACUS, [a nobleman of the Æduli, who had great influence with Cæsar in consequence of his steady attachment to the Romans.] Cic. 1, de Div.

DIUM, [vid. Dion.]

DIVODURUM, [the capital of the Mediomatrici, a people of Belgic Gaul, who were located along the Mosella or Moselle. Its name was afterwards changed to that of the people itself, and is now Metz.]

DŌDŌNA, [a famous city of Epirus, placed by some writers in Thesprotia, and by others in Molossis; but Strabo reconciles these discordant opinions, by informing us that anciently it belonged to Thesprotia, and afterwards to Molossis, for it stood on the confines of these two provinces. It was situate near the sources of the Acheron.] There was in its neighbourhood, upon a small hill called Tomarus, a celebrated oracle of Jupiter. The town and temple of the god were first built by Deucalion after the universal deluge. It was supposed to be the most ancient oracle of all Greece, and, according to the traditions of the Egyptians mentioned by Herodotus, it was founded by a dove. Two black doves, as he relates, took their flight from the city of Thebes in Egypt, one of which flew to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and the other to Dodona, where with a human voice they acquainted the inhabitants of the country that Jupiter had consecrated the ground, which in future would give oracles. The extensive grove which surrounded Jupiter's temple was endowed with the gift of prophecy, and oracles were frequently delivered by the sacred oaks, and the doves which inhabited the place. This fabulous tradition of the oracular power of the doves is explained by Herodotus, who observes that some Phœnicians carried away two priestesses from Egypt, one of which went to fix her residence at Dodona, where the oracle was established. It may further be observed, that the fable might have been founded upon the double meaning of the word πελειαι, which signifies doves in most parts of Greece, while in the dialect of the Epirots it implies old women. [The truth appears to be, however, that the oracle was of Pelasgic, not Egyptian, origin. The story about the doves merely alludes to the early mode of giving oracles by means of tame doves, from an oak tree.] In ancient times the oracles were delivered by the murmuring of a neighbouring fountain, but the custom was afterwards changed. Large kettles were suspended in the air near a brazen statue, which held a lash in its hand. When the wind blew strong the statue was agitated and struck against one of the kettles, which communicated the motion to all the rest, and raised that clattering and discordant din which continued for awhile, and from which the artifice of the priests drew their predictions. Some suppose that the noise was occasioned by the shaking of the leaves and boughs of an old oak, which the superstition of the people frequently consulted, and from which they pretended to receive oracles. It may be observed with more probability that the oracles were delivered by the priests, who, by artfully concealing themselves behind the oaks, gave occasion to the superstitious multitude to believe that the trees were endowed with the power of prophecy. As the ship Argo was built with some of the oaks of the forest of Dodona, there were some beams which gave oracles to the Argonauts, and warned them against the approach of calamity. [Within the forest of Dodona there was a famous fountain, the peculiar properties of whose waters are mentioned below, in the article Dodone.] The oracles of Dodona were originally delivered by men, but afterwards by women. (vid. Dodonides.) Plin. 2, c. 103.—Herodot. 2, c. 57.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Homer. Od. 14, ll. —Paus. 7, c. 21.—Strab. 17.—Plut. in Pyrrh. —Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Lucan. 6, v. 427.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 8, v. 23.

DŌDŌNÆUS, a surname of Jupiter from Dodona.

DŌDŌNE, a fountain in the forest of Dodona. [Ancient naturalists state that it had a property of rekindling torches, &c. when newly extinguished; which it is supposed to have done by means of some sulphureous fumes exhaling from it, as we still find to be the case with a fountain in France, called the burning fountain. It is also said to have extinguished torches, in which respect its powers do not seem to have been very miraculous, since plunging them into a place where the sulphur was dense, or into the water, would produce that effect.]

DŌDŌNIDES, the priestesses who gave oracles in the temple of Jupiter in Dodona. According to some traditions the temple was originally inhabited by seven daughters of Atlas, who nursed Bacchus. Their names were Ambrosia, Eudora, Pasithoe, Pytho, Plexaure, Coronis, Tythe or Tyche. In the latter ages the oracles were always delivered by three old women, which custom was first established when Jupiter enjoyed the company of Dione, whom he permitted to receive divine honours in his temple at Dodona. The Bœotians were the only people of Greece who received their oracles at Dodona from men, for reasons which Strabo l. 9. fully explains.

DOLABELLA P. CORN. a Roman who married the daughter of Cicero. During the civil wars he warmly espoused the interest of J. Cæsar, whom he accompanied in the famous battles at Pharsalia, Thapsus and Munda. He was made consul by his patron, though M. Antony his colleague opposed it. After the death of J. Cæsar, he received the government of Syria as his province. Cassius opposed his views, and Dolabella, for violence, and for the assassination of Trebonius, one of Cæsar's murderers, was declared an enemy to the republic of Rome. He was besieged by Cassius in Laodicea, and when he saw that all was lost, he killed himself in the 27th year of his age. He was of a small stature, which gave occasion to his father-in-law to ask him once when he entered his house, who had tied him so cleverly to his sword.—Another, who conquered the Gauls, Etrurians, and Boii at the lake Vadimonis, B. C. 283.—The family of the Dolabellæ distinguished themselves at Rome, and one of them, L. Corn. conquered Lusitania, B. C. 99.

[DOLICHA, a town of Macedonia in the district Pelasgiotis.—A town of Syria, situate in the district Euphratensis, and north-west of Zeugmâ. The ancient name is preserved in that of Doluc, a castle on a chain of mountains, which, detached from Amanus, are prolonged towards the Euphrates.]

DOLON, a Trojan, son of Eumedes, famous for his swiftness. Being sent by Hector to spy the Grecian camp by night, he was seized by Diomedes and Ulysses, to whom he revealed the situation, schemes, and resolutions of his countrymen, with the hopes of escaping with his life. He was put to death by Diomedes as a traitor. Homer. Il. 10, v. 314.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 349, &c.

DŌLŌPES, [a people of Thessaly, situate to the south of the districts Thessaliotis and Aperantia, and amid the range of Mount Pindus. They are supposed to have formed one of the twelve nations or districts which sent deputies to the council of the Amphyctions, These people possessed the isle of Scyros, and they are said to have been a body of corsairs who infested the Ægean Sea. When Cimon took possession of their island he expelled them from it. Their country was named Dolopia.] Virg. Æn. 2, v. 7.—Flacc. 2, v. 10.—Liv. 36, c. 33.—Strab. 9.—Plut. in Cimon.

DOMIDŪCUS, a god who presided over marriage. Juno also was called Domiduca, from the power she was supposed to have in marriages.

DOMITIUS LEX de Religione, was enacted by Domitius Ahenobarbus, the tribune, A. U. C. 650. It transferred the right of electing priests from the college to the people. [The Pontifex Maximus and Curio Maximus were, in the first ages of the republic, always chosen by the people.]

DOMITIĀNUS, Titus Flavius, a Roman emperor, [the second son of Vespasian, and born at Rome A. D. 51. Vespasian, well aware of his natural disposition, reposed no confidence in him during his whole reign. Domitian, however, accompanied his father and brother Titus in their triumph at the close of the Jewish war. Upon the death of Vespasian he endeavoured to foment troubles in the empire, and share the succession with Titus. The latter, however, generously forgave him, treated him with great kindness, and made him his colleague in the consulship, always declaring to him that he intended him for his successor. Domitian is accused of hastening the death of Titus by poison, a charge, however, not warranted by the circumstances of Titus's death. vid. Titus.] The beginning of his reign promised tranquillity to the people, but their expectations were soon frustrated. Domitian became cruel, and gave way to incestuous and unnatural indulgences. He commanded himself to be called God and Lord in all the papers which were presented to him. He passed the greatest part of the day in catching flies and killing them with a bodkin, so that it was wittily answered by Vibius to a person who asked him who was with the emperor, nobody, not even a fly. In the latter part of his reign Domitian became suspicious, and his anxieties were increased by the predictions of astrologers, but still more poignantly by the stings of remorse. He was so distrustful, even when alone, that round the terrace, where he usually walked, he built a wall with shining stone, that from thence he might perceive as in a looking-glass whether any body followed him. All these precautions were unavailing, he perished by the hand of an assassin the 18th of September A. D. 96, in the 45th year of his age, and the 15th of his reign. After his death he was publicly deprived by the senate of all the honours which had been profusely heaped upon him, and even his body was left in the open air without the honours of a funeral. This disgrace might proceed from the resentment of the senators, whom he had exposed to terror as well as to ridicule. He once assembled that august body to know in what vessel a turbot might be most conveniently dressed. At another time they received a formal invitation to a feast, and when they arrived at the palace, they were introduced into a large gloomy hall hung with black, and lighted with a few glimmering tapers. In the middle were placed a number of coffins, on each of which was inscribed the name of some one of the invited senators. On a sudden a number of men burst into the room clothed in black, with drawn swords and flaming torches, and after they had for some time terrified the guests, they permitted them to retire. [Domitian's reign was marked among other excesses by a persecution of the Christians. Confounding Christianity with Judaism, and feigning some defalcation in the tributes due by his exactions to the imperial treasury, he commenced a violent persecution. Another reason is said to have been his fear that some of the posterity of David remained, and that at one period or other, they would excite the Jews, whom he did not distinguish from the Christians, to break out into rebellion. This persecution took place A. D. 95, and continued till the emperor's death. Some have said that at this time St. John was thrown into a cauldron of boiling oil.] Subt. in vitâ.—Eutrop. 7.

DOMITIUS DOMITIÂNUS, a general of Diocletian in Egypt. He assumed the imperial purple at Alexandria, A. D. 283, and supported the dignity of emperor for about two years. He died a violent death.—Lucius. vid. Enobarbus.—Afer, an orator, who was preceptor to Quintilian. He disgraced his talents by his adulation, and by practising the arts of an informer under Tiberius and his successors. He was made a consul by Nero, and died A. D. 59.

ÆLIUS DONATUS, [a grammarian who flourished in the time of Constantine, and was one of the preceptors of St. Jerome. He was a commentator on the works of Virgil and Terence, and the author of some grammatical pieces which are still remaining]—A bishop of Numidia, a promoter of the Donatists. A. D. 311.

DONÛSA, [an island of the Icarian Sea, one of the Sporades. It lay south-east of Icaria, and east of Patmos. The marble obtained from this island was green. Virgil and Mela call it Dionysa, others Dionusa. It is now Donussa.] Virg. Æn. 6, v. 125.

DÔRES, the inhabitants of Doris. vid. Doris.

[DORIAS, a river of India extra Gangem. Mannert makes it to correspond with the small river Pegu. Others, however, are in favour of the modern Zanjan, the mouth of which is in the kingdom of Tonquin.]

DORION, a town of Thrace, where Thamyris the musician challenged the Muses to a trial of skill. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 132.—Propert. 2, el. 22, v. 19.—Lucan. 6, v. 352.

DÔRIS, [a country of Greece, situate to the south of Thessaly and separated from it by the range of Mount Oeta. On the south it had the Locri Ozolæ. On the east it was parted from the Locri Epicnemidii by the Pindus, a branch of the Cephissus, and on the west from Ætolia by a part of the chain of Oeta. Its territory was of small size, extending only about 40 miles in length. The country, though mountainous, had still several beautiful plains, and was very fruitful. It was called Doris, and the people Dores, from Dorus, the son of Hellen, and grandson of Deucalion, who is said to have peopled or conquered it, at least that part which lay between the ranges of Oeta and Pindus. It was also called Tetrapolis from its four cities, viz. Pindus, Erineus, Cytineum, and Boiæum. The Dorians were a stout and warlike race, and formed a part of the nation of the Hellenes. Under Deucalion, the Hellenes inhabited the territory of Phthiotis; under Dorus they first inhabited the territory of Histiæotis. They were driven thence by the Cadmæans, according to Herodotus, but more probably by the Pelasgi, and moving south, finally settled in Doris. From this, as a central point, emigrated the various Doric colonies, one of which settled in the isle of Rhodes. After the Trojan war, the Dorians founded Megara, on the confines of Attica, A. C. 1131. Others migrated to the shores of Asia Minor, and established the famous colony of Doris, in Asia Minor, on the coast of Caria. In process of time another stream of emigration directed its course towards southern Italy and Sicily. vid. Græcia magna. But the country which may be regarded as the principal seat of their power was the Peloponnesus, of which they took possession under the conduct of the Heraclidæ, about 80 years after the taking of Troy. The Heraclidæ divided among themselves the territories of the Peloponnesus, reserving some few towns to the Ionians upon the borders of Achaia.]—[A colony of the Dorians in Asia Minor, on the coast of Caria. On the arrival of the Dorians in Asia, they formed themselves into six independent states or small republics, which were confined within the bounds of as many cities. These were Lindus, Jalyssus, Camirus, Cos, Chidus, and Halicarnassus. Other cities in the tract, called from them Doris, belonged to their confederacy, but the inhabitants of these six alone, as true and genuine Dorians, were admitted into the temple at Triopie, where they exhibited solemn games in honour of Apollo Triopius. The prizes were tripods of brass, which the victors were obliged to consecrate to Apollo, and leave in the temple. When Agasicles of Halicarnassus won the prize, he transgressed this custom, and carried the tripod to his own house, on which account the city of Halicarnassus was ever afterwards excluded from the Dorian confederacy. The Dorians were from that time known by the name of the five cities or Pentapolis, and no longer by that of Hexapolis.]—A goddess of the sea, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married her brother Nereus, by whom she had 50 daughters called Nereides. Her name is often used to express the sea itself. Propert. 1, el. 17, v. 25.—Virg. Ecl. 10.—Hesiod. Theog. 240.

DORISCUS, a plain of Thrace near the sea, and mouth of the Hebrus, on which, according to Herodotus, was a royal fortress. Here Xerxes reviewed his army. [The mode of ascertaining the number of the forces was this. They drew up in one place a body of 10,000 men; making these stand together as compactly as possible, they drew a circle around them. Dismissing these, they enclosed the circle with a wall breast high; into this they introduced the army by bodies of 10,000 men each time. vid. Xerxes.]

DORSO, C. Fabius, a Roman, who, when Rome was in the possession of the Gauls, issued from the capitol, which was then besieged, to go and offer a sacrifice which was to be offered on Mount Quirinalis. He dressed himself in sacerdotal robes, and carrying on his shoulders the statues of his country gods, passed through the guards of the enemy without betraying the least signs of fear. When he had finished his sacrifice, he returned to the capitol unmolested by the enemy, who were astonished at his boldness, and did not obstruct his passage or molest his sacrifice. Liv. 3, c. 46.

DORUS, a son of Hellen. [vid. Doris.]
DORYLÆUM and DORYLÆUS, [a city of Phrygia, now Eski Shehr, at the junction of the Bathys and Thymbriis, two branches of the Sangarius, and on the confines of Bithynia. Plin. 5, c. 29—Cic. Flacc. 17.]

DOSON, a surname of Antigonos, because he promised and never gave; [δοσαν in Greek, i. e. about to give.]

DRACO, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens, [who succeeded Triptolemus as legislator, B. C. 623.] When he exercised the office of archon, he made a code of laws for the use of the citizens, which, on account of their severity, were said to be written in letters of blood. By them, idleness was punished with as much severity as murder, and death was denounced against the one as well as the other. Such a code of rigorous laws gave occasion to a certain Athenian to ask of the legislator, why he was so severe in his punishments, and Draco gave for answer, that as the smallest transgression had appeared to him deserving of death, he could not find any punishment more rigorous for more atrocious crimes. These laws were at first enforced, but they were often neglected on account of their extreme severity, and so on totally abolished them, except that one which punished murder with death. [The Athenians could not endure the rigour of his laws, and the legislator himself was obliged to withdraw to the island of Ægina. Here he was actually suffocated in the theatre, beneath the number of cloaks and garments which the people of the island, according to the usual mode of expressing approbation among the Greeks, showered upon him. He was buried in the theatre.] Plut. in Sol.—A man who instructed Plato in music. Id. de Music.

DRANCES, a friend of Lælius. Some have imagined that the poet wished to delineate the character and the eloquence of Cicero under this name.] Virg. Æn. 11, v. 122.

[DRANCEÆ. vid. Zaranææ.]

DRAVUS, [a river of Germany, rising in the Norican Alps. It traverses the southern parts of Noricum, and Pannonia, running from west to east, and falls into the Danube near the city of Comacum, or Erdent. It is now the Drave. Ptolemy calls it the Darus. The Greek copyists frequently allowed themselves the license of altering names and adding remarks, which only tended to shew their own ignorance. So, in the present instance, they state that this river, which Ptolemy calls Darus, is the same with that named Daris by the barbarians, or the modern Drin. The truth is, Ptolemy means the Dravus and no other.]

DREPANE, [an ancient name of Corcyra.]

DREPANUM, [a town of Sicily, north of Lilybæum, and in the vicinity of Mount Eryx. Here Æneas, according to Virgil, lost his father Anchises. The more correct form of the name is Drepana. This place was founded in the beginning of the first Punic war by the Carthaginian commander Hamilcar, who removed hither the inhabitants of Eryx, and other places adjacent. Drepanum and Lilybæum formed the two most important maritime cities held by the Carthaginians in Sicily. Of this place, near the Ægates Insulæ, was fought the famous naval battle between the Romans commanded by Lucius Catulus, and the Carthaginians under Hannibal. The Romans gained a decisive victory, which put an end to the first Punic war. Drepanum was so called from the curvature of the shore in its vicinity, resembling a scythe, (δρεπανος.) It is now Trapani.]— [A town of Bithynia, on the Sinus Astacenus, called by Constantine the Great, Hellenopolis.—A promontory on the Sinus Arabicus, below Arsinoe: it is now Ras-Zafra-né. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 707.—Cic. Ver. 2, c. 57.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 474.]

DRILLO, a river [of Illyricum,] which falls into the Adriatic at Lissus.

[DRŌMUS ACHILLIS, a promontory near the mouth of the Borysthenes. According to the old geographers, Achilles, having entered the Euxine with a hostile fleet, after ravaging the coast, landed on this promontory, and exercised himself and his followers in running and other gymnastic sports. It is a low, sandy, and uninhabited neck of land, resembling somewhat a sword in its shape. Strabo evidently exceeds the true measurement when he states it to be 1000 stadia. Pliny only makes it 80 miles. Its modern name is said to be Rossa-Oschari-gatsh. vid. Leuce.]

DRUENTIUS and DRUENTIA, [a river of Gaul, rising among the Alpes Cottix, north of Brigantio, or Briançon. It falls into the Rhodanus, or Rhone, about three miles below Avenio, or Avignon, after a course of 180 miles, and is now called the Durance. It is an extremely rapid river, and below the modern town of Sisteron; it has been found impracticable to throw a bridge over it. Its inundations are frequent and very destructive. Sil. Ital. 3, v. 468.—Strab. 4.]

DRUIDÆ, the ministers of religion among the ancient Gauls and Britons. [Britain, according to Cæsar, was the great school of the Druids, and their chief settlement was in the island called Mona by Tacitus, now Anglesey. The natives of Gaul and Germany, who wished to be thoroughly versed in the mysteries of Druidism, resorted to this island to complete their studies. Many opinions have been formed respecting the origin of their name. The common derivation is from δρυς, an oak, either from their inhabiting and teaching in forests, or, as Pliny states, because they never sacrificed but under an oak. But it is hard to imagine how the Druids should come to speak Greek. Some deduce the name from the old British word dru, or drew, an oak, whence they take δρυς to be derived. This last derivation derives considerable support from a passage in Diodorus Siculus, 5, c. 31, who, speaking of the philosophers and priests of Gaul, the same with the Druids, says that they were called Σαγῳιδαι, a term which some of the commentators trace to the old Greek form, δαρδρις, etc. an hollow oak. Wesseling, however, it must be acknowledged, condemns this reading, and is in favour of receiving into the text, the form Δαρδριαι, where others read Σαρδριαι. Among the many Oriental derivations which have been given, the best is that from the Sanscreeet term Druwidh, signifying poor, indigent. In historical conformity with this derivation, it has been urged that among the Hindoos, we may observe in the Sanniassi, the professional mendicant, while among the Druids, poverty was rather a merit than a disgrace. The arguments in favour of the Oriental origin of the Druids are deserving of great attention, although too numerous to be here all detailed. Diogenes Laërtius and Aristotle class the Druids with the Chaldeans, Persian Magi, and Indians, in which they are followed by other writers. The deities of the Sanscreeet school are closely to be traced in the names of the Druidical gods. The importance which the Druids attached to bulls and oxen forms another very striking mark of coincidence. The Druidical mysteries also are said by Davies to have been nearly parallel to the rites of Bhawanee and Eleusis. In the magic rod of the Druids we likewise discern the sacred staff of the Brahmins; both possessed consecrated beads, both made almost endless lustrations, both wore linen tiaras: and Maurice remarks, that the circle, Brahma's symbol, and the crescent, that of Siva, were both Druidical ornaments. So also there was a striking resemblance between the notion entertained by the Druids of a Supreme Being, and that found in the sacred writings of the Hindoos.] They were divided into different classes, called the Bardi, Eubages, the Vates, the Semothei, the Saronides, and the Samothei. They were held in the greatest veneration by the people. Their life was austere and recluse from the world, their dress was peculiar to themselves, and they generally appeared with a tunic which reached a little below the knee. As the chief power was lodged in their hands, they punished as they pleased, and could declare war and make peace at their option. Their power was extended not only to private families, but they could depose magistrates, and even kings, if their actions in any manner deviated from the laws of the state. They had the privilege of naming the magistrates which annually presided over the cities, and the kings were created only with their approbation. They were entrusted with the education of youth, and all religious ceremonies, festivals, and sacrifices, were under their peculiar care. They taught the doctrine of the metempsychosis, and believed the immortality of the soul. They were professionally acquainted with the art of magic, and from their knowledge of astrology, they drew omens and saw futurity revealed before their eyes. In their sacrifices they often immolated human victims to their gods, a barbarous custom which continued long among them, and which the Roman emperors attempted to abolish to little purpose. The power and privileges which they enjoyed were beheld with admiration by their countrymen, and as their office was open to every rank and every station, there were many who daily proposed themselves as candidates to enter upon this important function. The rigour, however, and severity of a long noviciate deterred many, and few were willing to attempt a labour, which enjoined them, during 15 or 20 years, to load their memory with the long and tedious maxims of druidical religion. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 13.—Plin. 16, c. 44.—Diod. 5.

DRUNA, the Drome, a river of Gaul, falling into the Rhone.

DRUSILLA LIVIA, a daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, famous for her debaucheries and licentiousness. She committed incest with her brother Caligula, who was so tenderly attached to her, that in a dangerous illness he made her heiress of all his possessions, and commanded that she should succeed him in the Roman empire. She died A. D. 38, in the 23d year of her age, and was deified by her brother Caligula, who survived her for some time.

DRUSUS, a son of Tiberius and Vipsania, who made himself famous by his intrepidity and courage in the provinces of Illyricum and Pannonia. He was raised to the greatest honours of the state by his father, but a blow which he gave Sejanus, an audacious libertine, proved his ruin. Sejanus corrupted Livia, the wife of Drusus, and in conjunction with her he caused him to be poisoned by an eunuch, A. D. 23.—A son of Germanicus and Agrippina, who enjoyed offices of the greatest trust under Tiberius. His enemy Sejanus, however, effected his ruin by his insinuations; Drusus was confined by Tiberius, and deprived of all aliment. He was found dead nine days after the confinement, A. D. 33.—A son of the emperor Claudius, who died by swallowing a pear thrown in the air.

—An ambitious Roman, grandfather to Cato. He was killed for his seditious conduct. Patere. 1, c. 13.—Livius, father of Julia Augusta, was intimate with Brutus, and killed himself with him after the battle of Philippi. Patere. 2, c. 71.—M. Livius, a celebrated Roman, who renewed the proposals of the Agrarian laws, which had proved fatal to the Gracchi. He was murdered as he entered his house, though he was attended with a number of clients and Latins, to whom he had proposed the privileges of Roman citizens, B. C. 190. Cic. ad Her. 4, c. 12.—Nero Claudius, a son of Tiberius Nero and Livia, adopted by Augustus. He was brother of Tiberius, who was afterwards made emperor. He greatly signalized himself in his wars in Germany and Gaul, against the Rheti and Vindelici, and was honoured with a triumph. He died of a fall from his horse in the 30th year of his age, B. C. 9. He left three children, Germanicus, Livia, and Claudius, by his wife Antonia. Dion.—M. Livius Salinator, a consul who conquered Adrubal with his colleague Claudius Nero. Horat. 4, od. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 824.—Caius, an historian, who being one day missed from his cradle, was found the next on the highest part of the house, with his face turned towards the sun.—The plebeian family of the Drusi, produced eight consuls, two censors, and one dictator. The surname of Drusus was given to the family of the Livii, as some suppose, because one of them killed a Gaulish leader of that name. Virg. in 6 Æn. v. 824, mentions the Drusi among the illustrious Romans, and that perhaps more particularly because the wife of Augustus was of that family.

DRYADES, nymphs that presided over the woods. [The Dryades differed from the Hamadryades, in that these latter were attached to some particular tree with which they were born, and with which they died; whereas the Dryades were the goddesses of the trees and woods in general, and lived at large in the midst of them. For though δρυς properly signifies an oak, it was also used for a tree in general. Oblations of milk, oil, and honey, were offered to them, and sometimes the votaries sacrificed a goat. The derivation of the name Hamadryades is from ἄμια simul, and δρυς arbor quævis. The reason of the derivation has been already mentioned above. vid. Nymphæ.]—Virg. G. 1, v. 11.

DRYMÆA, a town of Phocis, [on the banks of the Cephissus, north-east of Elatia.] Paus. 10, c. 33.

DRYŌPES, [a people of Greece, in the vicinity of Mount Oeta, and Parnassus, so called, it is supposed, from Dryope, the daughter of Eurypylos, or, according to the poets, from a nymph violated by Apollo. Others derive the name, however, from δρυς, an oak, and οἶ, a voice, on account of the number of oaks which grew about the mountains, and the rustling of their leaves. The inhabitants themselves, however, advocated their fabulous origin, and claimed to be the descendants of Apollo; and therefore Hercules, having overcome this people, carried them prisoners to Delphi, where he presented them to their divine progenitor, who commanded the hero to take them with him to the Peloponnesus. Hercules obeyed and gave them a settlement there, near the Asinean and Hermionian territories; hence the Asineans came to be blended with, and to call themselves, Dryopes.] Herodot. 1, c. 146, l. 8, c. 31.—Paus. 4, c. 34.—Strab. 7, 8, 13.—Plin. 4, c. 1.—*Virg. DUBIS, [a river of Gallia, rising at the foot of Mount Jura, and after a course of 50 miles, falling into the Arar, or Saone, near Cabillonum, the modern Chalons. It is now the Doubs, or Doux.]

DUBRIS, a town of Britain, supposed to be Dover.

DUILLIA LEX, was enacted by M. Duillius, a tribune, A. U. C. 304. It made it a capital crime to leave the Roman people without its tribunes, or to create any new magistrate [from whom there was no appeal. The punishment was scourging and beheading.] Liv. 3, c. 55.—Another, A. U. C. 392, to regulate what interest ought to be paid for money lent, [fixing it at one per cent.]

C. DUILLIUS NEPOS, a Roman consul, the first who obtained a victory over the naval power of Carthage, B. C. 260. [After his colleague Cn. Corn. Scipio had been taken at sea by the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, Duillius proceeded, with a newly-built Roman fleet, to Sicily, in quest of the enemy, whom he met near the Liparæ islands; and, by means of grappling-irons, so connected the ships of the Carthaginians with his own, that the contest became a sort of land-fight. By this unexpected manœuvre, he took 80 and destroyed 13 of the Carthaginian fleet, and obtained a naval triumph, the first ever enjoyed at Rome.] The senate rewarded his valour by permitting him always to have music playing and torches lighted, at the public expense, when returning from supper. There were some medals struck in commemoration of this victory, and there still exists a column at Rome which was erected on the occasion. [This column (called Columna Rostrata, because adorned with beaks of ships) was, as Livy informs us, struck down by lightning during the interval between the second and third Punic wars. A new column was erected by the emperor Claudius, and the inscription restored, though probably modernized. It was buried afterwards amid the ruins of Rome, until at length, in 1565, its base, which contained the inscription, was dug up in the vicinity of the capitol. So much, however, was defaced, that many of the letters were illegible. These have been restored, however, by the conjectures of the learned. The inscription presents a curious specimen of early Latinity.] Cic. de Senec.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 12.

DULICHIMUM, [one of the Echinades, at the mouth of the Achelous, off the coast of Ætolia and Acarnania. It was also called Dolicha, and is now Natolico. D'Anville, however, supposes it to have been near Cephallenia, and calls an island of considerable size above Cephallenia by the name of Dulichium, and makes it coincide with the ancient Ithaca. vid. Ithaca.] Trist. 1, el. 4, c. 67. Mel. 14, v. 226 R. A. 272.—Martial. 11, ep. 70, v. 8.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 76.

DUMNORIX, a powerful chief among the Ædui. Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 9.

DURIS, an historian of Samos, who flourished B. C. 257. He wrote the life of Agathocles of Syracuse, a treatise on tragedy, an history of Macedonia, &c. Strab. 1.

DURIUS, [a river of Spain. It rises in the chain of Mons Idubeda, and near its source are the ruins of ancient Numantia. It flowed to the west, through the territories of the Arevaci, and Vaccæi, and formed a dividing line between the Lusitani and Vettones on the south, and the Callaici on the north. It empties into the Atlantic after a course of nearly 300 miles. It is navigable only 70 miles from its mouth, on account of its rapid.

course. Its modern name is the Douro. At its mouth stood Calles, commonly styled Portus Calles, from a corruption of which last comes the modern name of Portugal.]

DUROCASSES, the chief residence of the Druids in Gaul, now Dreux. Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 13.

[DUROCOTŌRUM, the capital of the Remi, on the Vesle, one of the branches of the Axona, or Aisne. It is now Rheims.]

DUUMVIRI, [a general appellation among the ancient Romans given to magistrates, commissioners, and officers, where two were joined together in the same function. So that they had almost as many Duumviri as they had officers joined two by two in commission. The most considerable of the Duumviri were those called Duumviri sacrorum, sometimes by way of distinction, styled simply Duumviri. They were created by Tarquinius Superbus, for the performance of sacrifices and keeping the Sibylline books. They were chosen from among the patricians, kept the office for life, were exempt from military service and the discharge of civil offices, and could alone consult the Sibylline oracles, A. U. C. 387. The number was increased to ten, called from their number Decimviri. Sylla, A. U. C. 671, added five, upon which their name was changed to Quindecimviri. Their body was afterwards increased to 60, but still retained the appellation last mentioned. The office was abolished under Theodosius, towards the close of the 4th century.]—There were also certain magistrates at Rome called Duumviri perdullionis sive capitales. They were first created by Tullus Hostilius, for trying such as were accused of treason. This office was abolished as unnecessary; but Cicero complains of their revival by Labienus the tribune. Orat. pro Rabir. Some of the commanders of the Roman vessels were also called Duumviri, especially when there were two together. They were first created A. U. C. 542. There were also in the municipal towns in the provinces two magistrates called duumviri municipales. They were chosen from the Centurions, and their office was much the same as that of the two consuls at Rome. They were sometimes preceded by two lictors with the fasces. Their magistracy continued for five years, on which account they have been called Quinquennales magistratus. [These last were a kind of mayors.]

DŪME, a town of Achaia, [south-west of the promontory Araxum.] Liv. 27, c. 31, l. 32, c. 22.—Paus. 7, c. 17.

DYRAS, a river of Trachinia. It rises at the foot of mount Cæta, and falls into the [Sinus Maliaicus, or Gulf of Zeiton.] Herodot. 7, c. 198.

DYRRACHIUM, now Durazzo, a large city of Macedonia, bordering on the Adriatic Sea, founded by a colony from Corcyra, B. C. 623. It was anciently called Epidamnus, which the Romans, considering it of ominous meaning, changed into Dyrrachium. [Its port was much frequented in the time of the Romans by all those who had occasion to pass from Brundisium to Greece. At the mouth of the Adriatic, the shores of Italy and Greece incline towards each other, and the distance across from Dyrrachium to Brundisium, is no more than 100 miles. At the last station of Otranto, it is contracted to 50, and this narrow distance suggested to Pyrrhus, and to Varro the lieutenant of Pompey in the piratical war, the extravagant idea of a bridge.] Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 6, c. 10.—Plut.

EB

EBANUS, the name of Janus among the ancient Latins. [Cornificius, quoted by Macrobius (Sat. 1, 9,) maintains that Cicero (N. D. 2, 27,) means this appellation and not Janus, when he derives the name ab eundo.]

EBDŌME, a festival in honour of Apollo at Athens on the seventh day of every lunar month. It was usual to sing hymns in honour of the god, and to carry about boughs of laurel.—There was also another of the same name celebrated by private families the seventh day after the birth of every child.

EBŌRA, [a town of Lusitania, on a branch of the Anas, south-east of Olisippo, or, Lisbon. It is now Evora. According to Bochart, its name, in the eastern language, signified abundance; which corresponds with the appellation Cerealis, applied to it by Pliny.]

EBORACUM, [a city of Britain, in the territories of the Brigantes, now York. Eboracum was next to Londinium or London, the most important city in the whole island. It formed a convenient post and place of arms for the Romans during the continual wars waged by them against the northern nations of Britain. Alexander Severus died here. The modern city still can shew many vestiges of Roman power and magnificence.]

EBUDÆ, the western isles of Britain, now Hebrides. [Ptolemy places them to the north of Hibernia, and makes them 5 in number. The name Ebudæ was borrowed by the Romans from the Greek appellation Ἐβουδᾶς. Two of the 5 properly bear the name of Ebudæ; the remaining three were called Maleus, Epidium, and Ricina. Pliny calls them all Hebrides Insulæ.]

EBURŌNES, a people of Belgium, now the county of Liège. Cæs. B. G. 2, c. 4, l. 6, c. 5.—The Eburovices Auleri were the people of Evereux in Normandy. Cæs. ib. 3, c. 17.

EBUSUS, [one of the Pityusæ, or Pine Islands, so named by the Greeks from the number of pine trees which grew in them, (πινυ pinus.) The island of Ebusus was the largest of the number, and very fertile in the production of vines, olives, and large figs which were exported to Rome and elsewhere. It was famed also for its wool: but that no poi sonous animal existed here is a mere fable of the ancients. It is about 40 miles from the Mediterranean coast of Spain, and is now named by a slight corruption, Irica. It still produces abundance of corn, wine, oil, fruit, &c. and a great deal of salt is made in it by natural evaporation. Its size is 190 square miles; the population about 15,000.] Plin. 3, c. 5.

ECBATANA (orūm), [the capital of Media, situate, according to Diodorus, about 12 stadia from Mount Orontes. It was the residence of the first Median kings, and the summer place of abode, in after times, to the Persian monarchs, whose winter residence was Susa. The Parthian kings also, after them, retired to it in the summer to avoid the excessive heat of Ctesiphon. It was built by Dejoces the first. In the book of Judith, however, it is said to have been built by Arphaxad, supposed by some to be Dejoces, but by others Phraortes, his successor, who might have repaired the city or made some additions to it. It was surrounded with seven walls, which rose in gradual ascent, and were painted in seven different colours. The most distant was the lowest; and the innermost, which was the most celebrated, contained the royal palace. The situation of the grounds, which gently ascended, favoured, says Herodotus, the mode of building which was adopted. It would seem rather to have suggested it. The same historian states that the outer, and of course largest wall, was nearly equal in extent to the circumference of Athens. This was of a white colour, the next to it was black, the next purple, the fourth blue, the fifth orange. The two innermost walls were differently ornamented, one having its battlements plated with silver, the other with gold. The mode of ornamenting walls is said to be still used at the present day in many towns of China and of India. The account which Herodotus gives us, however, of these very walls, must be taken evidently with much allowance. Diodorus Siculus expressly states, (10, 27,) that the city had no walls; and in fact we find it offering no resistance to any conqueror who appeared before it. Parmenio was put to death there by Alexander's orders; and Hephæstion died there also, and received a most magnificent burial. The site of Ecbatana has given rise to much discussion. Mr. Gibbon and Sir W. Jones are in favour of the modern Tauris. D'Auville and Major Rennell declare for Hammedan, which is also a plural term. ECHIDNA, a celebrated monster, sprung from the union of Chrysaor with Callirhoe the daughter of Oceanus. She is represented as a beautiful woman in the upper parts of the body, but as a serpent below the waist. She was mother, by Typhon, of Orthos, Geryon, Cerberus, the Hydra, &c. According to Herodotus, Hercules had three children by her, Agathyrus, Gelonus, and Scythia. Herodot. 3, c. 108.—Hesiod. Theog.—Japollod. 2.—Paus. 8, c. 18.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 158.

ECHINÆDES or ECHINÆ, five small islands near Acarnania, at the mouth of the river Achelous. They have been formed by the inundations of that river, and by the sand and mud which its waters carry down. [They are said by some geographers to be now called Curzolari; but this name belongs to some small pointed isles near them, called from that circumstance Oxiæ. ECHION, one of those men who sprang from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus. He was one of the five who survived the fate of his brothers and assisted Cadmus in building the city of Thebes. Cadmus rewarded his services by giving him his daughter Agave in marriage. He was father of Pentheus by Agave. He succeeded his father-in-law on the throne of Thebes, as some have imagined, and from that circumstance Thebes has been called Echionia, and the inhabitants Echionida. *Ovid. ECHO, a daughter of the Air and Tellus, who chiefly resided in the vicinity of the Ciphisus. She was one of Juno's attendants, and became the confidant of Jupiter's amours. Her loquacity, however, displeased Jupiter; and she was deprived of the power of speech by Juno, and only permitted to answer to the questions which were put to her. Pan had formerly been one of her admirers, but he never enjoyed her favours. Echo, after she had been punished by Juno, fell in love with Narcissus, and on being despised by him, she pined away and was changed into a stone, which still retained the power of voice. [This is a physical fable, invented, without doubt, to explain in an ingenious way the phenomenon of the echo: or, perhaps, some nymph having lost herself in the woods, they who sought for her, hearing only the voice of echo answering to their demands, gave out that she had been changed into a voice.] Ovid. Met. 3, v. 358.

[ECTENES, a people who, according to Pausanias, first inhabited the territory of Thebes in Bœotia. Ogyges is said to have been their first king. They were exterminated by a plague, and succeeded by the Hyantes. vid. Jones.]

EDESSA, [a city of Mesopotamia, in the district of Osroene, on the banks of a small river called Scirtus. It lay north-east of Zeug-land and south-east of Samosata. Edessa is said to have been one of those numerous cities which were built by Seleucus Nicator. It was once a place of great celebrity, and famous for a temple of the Syrian goddess, which was one of the richest in the world. During the intestine broils which greatly weakened the kingdom of Syria, Augurus or Abgarus seized on this city and its adjacent territory, which he erected into a kingdom, and transmitted the royal title to his posterity. We learn from St. Austin, that our Saviour promised Abgarus that the city should be impregnable, and Evagrius (Hist. Eccles. 4, 27.) observes, that although this circumstance was not mentioned in our Lord's letter, still it was the common belief; which was much confirmed when Chosroes, king of Persia, after having set down before it, was obliged to raise the siege. This is all, however, a pious fable. Edessa was called Callirhoe, from a fountain contained within it. In later times it was termed Roha, or, with the article of the Arabs, Orrhoa, and by abbreviation Orna. It is now called Orfa.—A town of Macedonia. vid. Adessa.]

[EDETANI, a people of Spain, south of the Iberus. They occupied what corresponds with the northern half of Valencia, and the south-western corner of Arragon.]

EDON, a mountain of Thrace, called also Edonus. From this mountain that part of Thrace is often called Edonia which lies between the Strymon and the Nessus, and the epithet is generally applied not only to Thrace but to a cold northern climate. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 325.—Plin. 4, c. 11.—Lucan. 1, v. 674.

EDŌNI or EDŌNES, a people of Thrace, near the Strymon. Apollod. 3, c. 5.

EDONIDES, a name given to the priestesses of Bacchus, because they celebrated the festivals of the god on Mount Edon. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 69.

EETION, the father of Andromache and of seven sons, was king of Thebes in Mysia. He was killed by Achilles. From him the word Eetioneus is applied to his relations or descendants. Homer. Il. 12.

EGERIA, a nymph of Aricia in Italy, where Diana was particularly worshipped. Egeria was courted by Numa, and, according to Ovid, she became his wife. This prince pretended frequently to visit her, and that he might more successfully introduce his laws and new regulations into the state, he solemnly declared before the Roman people, that they were previously sanctified and approved by the nymph Egeria. Ovid says that Egeria was so disconsolate at the death of Numa that she melted into tears, and was changed into a fountain by Diana. She is reckoned by many as a goddess who presided over the pregnancy of women; and some maintain that she is the same as Lucina, or Diana. Juv. 1, c. 19.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 547.—*Virg. ELAGĀBALUS, the surname of the sun at Emessa. [vid. Emessa and Heliogabalus.]

ELAPHĒBOLIA, a festival in honour of Diana the Huntress. In the celebration a cake was made in the form of a deer, ελαφε, and offered to the goddess. It owed its institution to the following circumstance: when the Phocians had been severely beaten by the Thes-salians, they resolved, by the persuasion of a certain Deiphantus, to raise a pile of combustible materials, and burn their wives, children, and effects, rather than submit to the enemy. This resolution was unanimously approved by the women, who decreed Deiphantus a crown for his magnanimity. When every thing was prepared, before they fired the pile, they engaged their enemies, and fought with such desperate fury, that they totally routed them and obtained a complete victory. In commemoration of this unexpected success this festival was instituted to Diana, and observed with the greatest solemnity; so that even one of the months of the year, March, was called Elaphebolion from this circumstance.

ELATĒA, the largest town of Phocis, near the Cephissus. [It was next only to Delphi, and was situate in the valley of the Cephissus, on an eminence to the left of the stream. To the north, in its rear, lay the range of Mount Cnemis. An enemy who wished to pass from Thermopylæ into southern Greece would be compelled to make himself master first of the mountain-pass to the north of the city, and next of Elatea itself; after which all Phocis and Bœotia stood open to him.] It lay north-east of Delphi. This city is said to have been founded by Elatus, who came from Arcadia to assist the Delphians against the Phlegians, when the latter attempted to plunder the temple. It was one of the towns burned by the Persians. Its surprise in after days by king Philip, and the consequent alarm of the Athenians, is beautifully alluded to by Demosthenes in his oration "De Corona." It is now called Turco-corio.] Paus. 10, c. 34.

ELĀVER, a river in Gaul, falling into the Loire, now the Allier.

ELĒA, [called also Velia, a town of Lucania in Magna Græcia, situate on the coast of the Mare Tyrrhenum, south-east of Paestum. It is said to have been built by a colony of Phocians in the time of Cyrus. A sect of philosophy, which flourished here, has hence been called the Eleatic. It must be divided into two classes; one of which treated concerning the nature and origin of things upon metaphysical, the other upon physical principles. To the former class belongs Xenophanes, Parmenides, Melissus, and Zeno of Elea; to the latter Leucippus, Democritus, Protagoras, Diagoras, and Anaxarchus.]

ELECTRA, a daughter of Agamemnon king of Argos. She first incited her brother Orestes to revenge his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra. Orestes gave her in marriage to his friend Pylades, and she became mother of two sons, Strophius and Medon. Her adventures and misfortunes form one of the interesting tragedies of the poet Sophocles. Hygin. fab. 122.—Paus. 2, c. 16.—Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 26, &c.

[ELEPHANTINE, an island of Egypt on the Nile, with a town of the same name, about a semi-stadium distant from Syene. The town described by Strabo no longer exists; but a small village is built upon its ruins, near which is a superb gate of granite, which formed the entrance of one of the porticoes of the temple of Cnept. A building surrounded by thick walls and rubbish, formerly made part of it, and an elevated rampart at the point of the island, served to defend it against the inundation of the river. The nilometer, formed of a block of marble, so favourably situated in this place for discovering the first appearance of the increase of the waters, and for regulating the labours of the husbandman, is no more; a part of it being probably buried under the mud and sand of the Nile.]

ELEPHANTOPHĀGI, a people of Æthiopia.

ELEUSINIA, a great festival observed every fourth year by the Cæleas, Phliasiens, as also by the Pheneatæ, Lacedæmonians, Parrhasians, and Cretans; but more particularly by the people of Athens, every fifth year, at Eleusis in Attica, where it was introduced by Eumolpus, B. C. 1356. [vid. the end of this article, where an explanation is given of the object of these mysteries.] It was the most celebrated of all the religious ceremonies of Greece, whence it is often called by way of eminence μυστηρια, the mysteries. It was so superstitiously observed, that if any one ever revealed it, it was supposed that he had called divine vengeance upon his head, and it was unsafe to live in the same house with him. Such a wretch was publicly put to an ignominious death. This festival was sacred to Ceres and Proserpine, every thing contained a mystery, and Ceres herself was known only by the name of αχθια, from the sorrow and grief (αχθῖς) which she suffered for the loss of her daughter. This mysterious secrecy was solemnly observed and enjoined on all the votaries of the goddess; and if any one ever appeared at the celebration, either intentionally or through ignorance, without proper introduction, he was immediately punished with death. Persons of both sexes and of all ages were initiated at this solemnity, and it was looked upon as so heinous a crime to neglect this sacred part of religion, that it was one of the heaviest accusations which contributed to the condemnation of Socrates. The initiated were under the more particular care of the deities, and therefore their life was supposed to be attended with more happiness and real security than that of other men. This benefit was not only granted during life, but it extended beyond the grave, and they were honoured with the first places in the Elysian fields, while others were left to wallow in perpetual filth and ignominy. As the benefits of expiation were so extensive, particular care was taken in examining the character of such as were presented for initiation. Such as were guilty of murder, though against their will, and such as were convicted of witchcraft, or any heinous crime, were not admitted; and the Athenians suffered none to be initiated but such as were members of their city. This regulation, which compelled Hercules, Castor, and Pollux, to become citizens of Athens, was strictly observed in the first ages of the institution, but afterwards all persons, barbarians excepted, were freely initiated. The festivals were divided into greater and less mysteries. The less were instituted from the following circumstance. Hercules passed near Eleusis while the Athenians were celebrating the mysteries, and desired to be initiated. As this could not be done, because he was a stranger, and as Eumolpus was unwilling to displease him on account of his great power, and the services which he had done to the Athenians, another festival was instituted without violating the laws. It was called μικρα, and Hercules was solemnly admitted to the celebration and initiated. These less mysteries were observed at Agræ near the Ilissus, The greater were celebrated at Eleusis, from which place Ceres has been called Eleusinia. In later times the smaller festivals were preparatory to the greater, and no person could be initiated at Eleusis without a previous purification at Agræ. This purification they performed by keeping themselves pure, chaste, and unpolluted during nine days, after which they came and offered sacrifices and prayers, wearing garlands of flowers, called ισμερα, or μυρα, and having under their feet, Διός κωδιον, Jupiter's skin, which was the skin of a victim offered to that god. The person who assisted was called ὕδρανος from ὕδωρ, water, which was used at the purification, and they themselves were called μυσται, the initiated. A year after the initiation at the less mysteries they sacrificed a sow to Ceres, and were admitted in the greater, and the secrets of the festivals were solemnly revealed to them, from which they were called εφοροι, and εσποπται, inspectors. The institution was performed in the following manner. The candidates, crowned with myrtle, were admitted by night into a place called μυστικος σπιος, the mystical temple, a vast and stupendous building. As they entered the temple they purified themselves by washing their hands in holy water, and received for admonition that they were to come with a mind pure and undefiled, without which the cleanness of the body would be unacceptable. After this the holy mysteries were read to them from a large book called πετραμα, because made of two stones, πετρα, fitly cemented together. After this the priest, called Ἱεροφαντης, proposed to them certain questions to which they readily answered. After this, strange and amazing objects presented themselves to their sight, the place often seemed to quake, and to appear suddenly resplendent with fire, and immediately covered with a gloomy darkness and horror. Sometimes thunders were heard, or flashes of lightning appeared on every side. At other times hideous noises and howlings were heard, and the trembling spectators were alarmed by sudden and dreadful apparitions. This was called αυτοψια, intuition. After this the initiated were dismissed with the barbarous words of κοιξ ομπαξ. The garments in which they were initiated were held sacred, and of no less efficacy to avert evils than charms and incantations. From this circumstance, therefore, they were never left off before they were totally unfit for wear, after which they were appropriated for children, or dedicated to the goddess. The chief person that attended at the initiation was called Ἱεροφαντης, the revealer of sacred things. He was a citizen of Athens, and held his office during life, though among the Cereans and Phliasians it was limited to the period of four years. He was obliged to devote himself totally to the service of the deities; his life was chaste and single, and he usually anointed his body with the juice of hemlock, which is said, by its extreme coldness, to extinguish, in a great degree, the natural heat. The Hierophantes had three attendants; the first was called Δαδουχος, torch-bearer, and was permitted to marry. The second was called κρηξ, a cryer. The third administered at the altar, and was called ο επι βωμω. The Hierophantes is said to have been a type of the powerful creator of all things, Δαδουχος of the sun, Κρηξ of Mercury, and ο επι βωμω of the moon. There were besides these other inferior officers, who took particular care that every thing was performed according to custom. The first of these, called βασιλευς, was one of the archons; he offered prayers and sacrifices, and took care that there was no indecency or irregularity during the celebration. Besides him there were four others, called επιμεληται, curators, elected by the people. One of them was chosen from the sacred family of the Eumolpidae, the other was one of the Ceryces, and the rest were from among the citizens. There were also ten persons who assisted at this and every other festival, called Ἱεροποιοι, because they offered sacrifices. This festival was observed in the month Boedromion or September, and continued nine days, from the 15th to the 23d. During that time it was unlawful to arrest any man, or present any petition on pain of forfeiting a thousand drachmas, or, according to others, on pain of death. It was also unlawful for those who were initiated to sit upon the cover of a well, to eat beans, mullets, or weazels. If any woman rode to Eleusis in a chariot, she was obliged by an edict of Lycurgus to pay 6000 drachmas. The design of this law was to destroy all distinction between the richer and poorer sort of citizens. The first day of the celebration was called αγυμος, assembly, as it might be said that the worshippers first met together. The second day was called αγα δε μυσται, to the sea, you that are initiated, because they were commanded to purify themselves by bathing in the sea. On the third day, sacrifices, and chiefly a mullet, were offered; as also barley from a field of Eleusis. These oblations were called Θυα, and held so sacred that the priests themselves were not, as in other sacrifices, permitted to partake of them. On the fourth day they made a solemn procession, in which the καλαθιον, holy basket of Ceres, whose carried about in a consecrated cart, while on every side the people shouted Χαιρε Δημητηρ, Hail Ceres! After these followed women, called μεσφοροι, who carried baskets, in which were sesamum, carded wool, grains of salt, a serpent, pomegranates, reeds, ivy boughs, certain cakes, &c. The fifth was called Η των λαμπραδων ημερα, the torch-day, because on the following night the people ran about with torches in their hands. It was usual to dedicate torches to Ceres, and contend which should offer the biggest in commemoration of the travels of the goddess, and of her lighting a torch in the flames of Mount Ætna. The sixth day was called Ιακχος, from Iacchus, the son of Jupiter and Ceres, who accompanied his mother in her search of Proserpine, with a torch in his hand. From that circumstance his statue had a torch in its hand, and was carried in solemn procession from the Ceramicus to Eleusis. The statue, with those that accompanied it, called Ιακχαγαγοροι, were crowned with myrtle. In the way nothing was heard but singing and the noise of brazen kettles, as the votaries danced along. The way through which they issued from the city was called Ἱερα οδος, the sacred way; the resting-place Ἱερα σπηνη, from a fig-tree which grew in the neighbourhood. They also stopped on a bridge over the Cephissus, where they derided those that passed by. After they had passed this bridge, they entered Eleusis by a place called μυσ-

Την ἑβδόμη, the mystical entrance. On the seventh day were sports, in which victors were rewarded with a measure of barley, as that grain had been first sown in Eleusis. The eighth day was called Ἐπιδαυρία ἡμέρα, because once Æsculapius, at his return from Epidaurus to Athens, was initiated by the repetition of the less mysteries. It became customary, therefore, to celebrate them a second time upon this, that such as had not hitherto been initiated might be lawfully admitted. The ninth and last day of the festival was called Πλημμοχοαί, earthen vessels, because it was usual to fill two such vessels with wine, one of which being placed towards the west, which, after the repetition of some mystical words, were both thrown down, and the wine being spilt on the ground, was offered as a libation. Such was the manner of celebrating the Eleusian mysteries, which have been deemed the most sacred and solemn of all the festivals observed by the Greeks. Some have supposed them to be obscene and abominable, and that from thence proceeded all the mysterious secrecy. They were carried from Eleusis to Rome in the reign of Adrian, where they were observed with the same ceremonies as before, though perhaps with more freedom and licentiousness. They lasted about 1800 years, and were at last abolished by Theodosius the Great. [After all that has been said on the nature and design of the mysteries which were celebrated over the greater part of the ancient world, the learned are not even now wholly agreed in their opinions on this subject. The obscene rites which formed a part of these ceremonies, and the excesses to which they are said to have given occasion, are frequently spoken of with reprobation by the Fathers of the church, who constantly regard the mysteries with horror and detestation. On the other hand, they are spoken of with high encomiums by the Pagan philosophers, especially by those of the later Platonic school, as Porphyry, Iamblichus, Proclus, and Apuleius, who profess to explain the intention of these sacred solemnities, and to interpret the strange and unpromising symbols which were exhibited in them, in a mystical sense, favourable to piety and virtue. It is probable that the truth lies between these opposite representations. It would appear that the intention with which the mysteries were first instituted was the promotion of social order and piety, such as heathen piety was; but that they had, in the course of many ages, become greatly corrupted, and that the secret and nocturnal assemblies which were held at their celebration gave occasion to many excesses. Meursius has very diligently collected the passages of the ancient writers in which the mysteries are treated of, or casually mentioned; but it was Warburton who first attempted, with any degree of success, to systematise these scattered facts, and to deduce from them any luminous conclusion; and it must be allowed, that although this writer carries some of his speculations to an undue extent, and assumes a more dogmatical tone in his assertions than his authorities warrant, yet that his view of the subject appears to be essentially correct. Mr. Gibbon attacked the bishop with some warmth, and seems to have succeeded in showing that Warburton's account of the sixth book of the Æneid is without foundation; but he has not invalidated the conclusions which relate to the purport of the mysteries. Amidst the obscurity which prevails on the subject of the mysteries, the following facts may be considered as tolerably well ascertained. First. The mysteries were of two kinds. The more public exhibition was intended to produce an effect on the minds of the people favourable to civil order, and tending to inspire veneration for the laws. It seems that this was one of the means adopted by the primitive legislators of mankind for reclaiming barbarians, and forming the inhabitants of the different countries, whither the mysteries were conveyed, to the practice of social duties. They are represented as celebrating the adoption of agriculture, and the invention of the arts of life. Diodorus Siculus informs us that the Sicilian feasts of Ceres, which lasted ten days, represented the ancient manner of living before men had learned the use and culture of bread-corn. From Varro, Claudian, and Arnobius, it appears that the Eleusinian rites represented the life of Ceres, and her wanderings in quest of her daughter Proserpine, and her legislation of Sicily and Africa, where she taught the inhabitants agriculture, and reclaimed them from barbarism. In accordance with this is the authority of Cicero. The learned commentator Turnebus observes, that the mysteries were called "ἐπιτιμία," because they were celebrated in commemoration of the "beginnings" of civilized life, when Ceres taught agriculture, and invented laws to restrain men hitherto barbarians. Secondly. The injunctions to morality were sanctioned by the doctrine of future rewards and punishments. A remarkable passage from Cicero is strongly in proof of this assertion, in which, speaking of the advantages to be derived from the mysteries, he observes, "neque solum cum lætitiâ vivendi rationem accepimus, sed etiam cum spe meliøre moriendi." (D^e Leg. c. 14.) The initiated and those who should lead a virtuous life were promised an abode in the islands of the blessed, where they were to enjoy a happy immortality, while the profane wallowed in a black pool of mud. How the fiction of the Metempsychosis was connected with these doctrines does not appear very clearly, but it seems to have formed a prominent feature in the mystical solemnities, especially in the East. Thirdly. Concerning the nature of the ἀποργητι, or inviolable mysteries, which were only divulged to a few favoured individuals, it is not easy to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. Thus far, however, we may consider as tolerably clear, that although there is no sufficient evidence for Warburton's opinion, that the object was to expose the falsehood of the vulgar polytheism, and to declare the unity of God, yet some secret doctrines were taught concerning the nature of the gods, which it was held the most unpardonable offence to divulge. Hence we may infer that they were of such a kind that the publication of them was considered as dangerous to the popular belief in the mythology. From the writings of Varro, of which fragments are preserved by St. Augustine, from numerous observations of Clemens, and of Proclus, from some mystical passages of Euripides and of Virgil, and from the first book of the Saturnalia of Macrobius, it would appear that the explanations of the mythology, which were delivered in the mysteries, were chiefly physical, and that the most celebrated of the ancient theosophists were not very remote in their dogmas from the notions of Spinoza. Müller's Universal History. ELEUSIS, or ELEUSIN, [a town of Attica, equally distant from Megara and the Piræus, celebrated for the festivals of Ceres. [Harporation derives the name of the city from Eleusinus, a son of Mercury, and writes it Eleusinia; others, who write it Eleusis, suppose it to have been thus called, because Ceres, after running over the world in search of her daughter, came here, (ελευθα, venio), and put an end to her pursuit. Diodorus Siculus makes the name Eleusis to have been given this city, as a monument to posterity that corn, and the art of cultivating it, were brought from abroad into Attica, or, to use the words of the historian, "that the person who brought thither the seed of corn came from foreign parts." Pausanias makes Eleusin the founder, a son-in-law of Ogyges. At all events the city appears to have been very ancient, and at one period very powerful, since it contended, under Eumolpus, with Athens for the sovereignty of Attica. The controversy was ended by a treaty, wherein it was stipulated that Eleusis should yield to the controul of Athens, but that the sacred rites of Ceres should be celebrated at the former city. Ceres and Triptolemus were both worshipped here with peculiar solemnity, and here also was shewn the field of Rharium, where barley was said to have been first sown: Eleusis is now called Lepisina. On account of its exposure to pirates the place is uninhabited. The statue of the Eleusinian Ceres, the work of Phidias, after having suffered many mutilations, was brought over to England by Dr. Clark and Mr. Cripps in 1801, and now stands in the vestibule of the University Library at Cambridge. The temple itself was subsequently cleared by Mr. Gell.] (vid Eleusinia.) Ovid. 4, Fast. 5, v. 507.—Paus. 9, c. 24.

ELEUTHERÆ, [an ancient city of Bœotia, south-east of Platæa, and near the confines of Attica. It was afterwards transferred to the Athenians.]

ELEUTHERIA, a festival celebrated at Platæa in honour of Jupiter Eleutherius, or the asserter of liberty, by delegates from almost all the cities of Greece. Its institution originated in this; after the victory obtained by the Grecians under Pausanias over Mardonius the Persian general, in the country of Platæa, an altar and statue were erected to Jupiter Eleutherius, who had freed the Greeks from the tyranny of the barbarians. It was further agreed upon in a general assembly, by the advice of Aristides the Athenian, that deputies should be sent every fifth year from the different cities of Greece, to celebrate Eleutheria festivals of liberty. The Platæans celebrated also an anniversary festival in memory of those who had lost their lives in that famous battle. The celebration was thus: at break of day a procession was made with a trumpeter at the head sounding a signal for battle. After him followed chariots loaded with myrtle, garlands, and a black bull, and certain free young men, as no signs of servility were to appear during the solemnity, because they in whose honour the festival was instituted had died in the defence of their country. They carried libations of wine and milk in large eared vessels, with jars of oil and precious ointments. Last of all appeared the chief magistrate, who, though not permitted at other times to touch iron, or wear garments of any other colour than white, yet appeared clad in purple; and taking a water-pot out of the city chamber, proceeded through the middle of the town with a sword in his hand, towards the sepulchres: There he drew water from a neighbouring spring, and washed and anointed the monuments; after which he sacrificed a bull upon a pile of wood, invoking Jupiter and infernal Mercury, and inviting to the entertainment the souls of those happy heroes who had perished in the defence of their country. After this he filled a bowl with wine, saying, I drink to those who lost their lives in the defence of the liberties of Greece. There was also a festival of the same name observed by the Samians in honour of the god of Love. Slaves, also, when they obtained their liberty, kept a holiday, which they called Eleutheria.

ELEUTHO, a surname of Juno Lucina, [from her coming, when invoked, to the aid of women in labour.] Pindar. Olymp. 6.

[ELEUTHEROPOLIS, a city of Palestine, at the distance of 6 miles south of Diospolis, 20 miles south-west from Jerusalem, and 24 miles north-west from Ascalon, according to the itinerary of Antonine.]

ELICIVS, a surname of Jupiter, worshipped on mount Aventine. [The Romans gave him this name, according to Ovid, because they believed that they could, by a setform of words, draw him down (elicere) from the sky to inform them how to expiate prodigies, &c.] Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 328.

ELIS, [a country of Greece, on the western shore of the Peloponnesus, north of Messenia. The length from north to south was about 20 leagues, and the breadth from west to east from 6 to 7. It was watered by a great number of small rivers, which rendered it very fertile. By ancient authors, however, it is chiefly distinguished for its groves of olive-trees. Here the Olympic games were celebrated on the banks of the Alpheus. vid. Olympia. Besides its olives, it produced abundance of hemp, flax, and silk. Elis was divided into three districts, Coelo, (Κολλοι), or the hollow, in the north, Pisatis, so called from the ancient city of Pisa, in the middle, and Triphylia, to the south. This last, according to Strabo, obtained its name from the union of three separate tribes, the Epei, or original inhabitants, the Minyæ, who migrated thither, and the Elei.]—[The capital city of the above district, situate in the northern part, on the river Peneus. This city in fact gave name to the country, and was founded soon after the Trojan war. It was famed for a temple and statue of Venus. The latter was the work of Phidias, and was made of gold and ivory; the feet of the goddess rested on a tortoise. It is thought that a place called Gastouni occupies the site of this city.] Strab. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Paus. 5.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 494.—*Cic. ELISSA, a queen of Tyre, more commonly known by the name of Dido. vid. Dido.

ELLOPIA, a town of Eubœa.—An ancient name of that island. [It derived its name from Ellops, the son of Ion, who settled in this island.]

ELPINICE, a daughter of Miltiades. [vid. Callias, and Cimob.]

[ELYMIOTIS, a district of Macedonia, to the south-west, bordering on Thessaly and Epirus.]

ELYMAÏS, [a province of Persia, lying to the south of Media, and forming the northern part of the larger district of Susiana. It derived its name from the Elymæi. These were originally seated in the north, but in process of time spread themselves over all the rest of Susiana, to the shores of the Persian Gulf. Elymais, the metropolis of the province, was famed for a rich temple which Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to plunder; he was beaten off, however, by the inhabitants. The temple was afterwards plundered by one of the Parthian kings, who found in it, according to Strabo, 10,000 talents.]

ELYSIUM, and ELYSII CAMPI, a region in the lower world, where, according to the mythology of the ancients, the souls of the virtuous were placed after death. Their happiness was complete, the pleasures were innocent and refined. Bowers, for ever green, delightful meadows, with pleasant streams, were the most striking objects. The air was wholesome, serene, and temperate: the birds continually warbled in the groves, and the inhabitants were blessed with another sun and other stars. The employment of the heroes who dwelt in these regions of bliss were various; the manes of Achilles are represented as waging war with the wild beasts, while the Trojan chiefs are innocently exercising themselves in managing horses, or in handling arms. To these innocent amusements some poets have added continual feasting and revelry, and they suppose that the Elysian fields were filled with all the incontinence and voluptuousness which could gratify the low desires of the debauchee. [According to Diodorus Siculus, the whole fable of the infernal regions was borrowed from the funeral rites of the Egyptians, and introduced into Greece by Orpheus. From this source Homer is said to have borrowed his ideas and descriptions which occur in various parts of the Odyssey. Succeeding poets and philosophers copied from Homer. Some placed the Elysian fields in the middle region of the air, some in the moon, others in the sun, and others again in the centre of the earth adjoining to Tartarus. The most common opinion was that they lay in one of the isles of the ocean, called the Fortunate Islands, the modern Canaries. [vid. Tartarus.] Virg. Æn. 6, v. 638.—*Homer. EMESSA, [an ancient city of Syria, situate near the eastern bank of the Orontes, south-east of Epiphania. It was the birth-place of the emperor Heliogabalus, and was one of the cities in which the Romans planted colonies. It is now called Hems, and is merely a large ruinous town containing about 2000 inhabitants, though formerly a strong and populous city.]

EMODI MONTES, [part of a chain of mountains in Asia. Pliny states that the Emodi montes, and those of Imaus, Paropamisus, and Caucasus were connected together. That part of the chain which Alexander crossed in order to invade Bactriana was called Paropamisus, the more easterly continuation of the range was termed Emodi montes, and its still farther continuation, even to the eastern ocean, was styled Imaus.]

EMPEDOCLES, a philosopher, poet, and historian of Agrigentum in Sicily, who flourished 444 B. C. [vid. end of this article.] He was the disciple of Telanges the Pythagorean, and warmly adopted the doctrine of transmigration. He wrote a poem upon the opinions of Pythagoras, very much commended, in which he spoke of the various bodies which nature had given him. He was first a girl, afterwards a boy, a shrub, a bird, a fish, and lastly Empedocles. His poetry was bold and animated, and his verses were so universally esteemed, that they were publicly recited at the Olympic games with those of Homer and Hesiod. Empedocles was no less remarkable for his humanity and social virtues than for his learning. He showed himself an inveterate enemy to tyranny, and refused to become the sovereign of his country. He taught rhetoric in Sicily, and often alleviated the anxieties of his mind as well as the pains of his body with music. It is reported that his curiosity to visit the flames of the crater of Ætna proved fatal to him. Some maintain that he wished it to be believed that he was a god, and that his death might be unknown he threw himself into the crater and perished in the flames. His expectations, however, were frustrated; and the volcano, by throwing up one of his sandals, discovered to the world that Empedocles had perished by fire. Others report that he lived to an extreme old age, and that he was drowned in the sea. [The skill which Empedocles possessed in medicine and natural philosophy enabled him to perform many wonders which he passed upon the superstitious and credulous minds of the multitude for miracles. He pretended to drive away noxious winds from his country, and thereby put a stop to epidemical diseases. He is said to have checked by the power of music the madness of a young man who was threatening his enemy with instant death; to have restored a woman to life; and to have done many other things, equally astonishing, after the manner of Pythagoras, on account of which, he became an object of universal admiration, so that at the Olympic games the eyes of all the people were fixed upon him when he appeared. With regard to his poetical productions, it is the opinion of some that he was the real author of the ancient fragments which bears the name of the "Golden Verses of Pythagoras." He must not, however, be confounded with a tragedian of the same name. Gorgias of Leontium was his pupil, whence it may be inferred that he was an eminent master of the art of eloquence. As to his death, Strabo and other judicious writers reject as fictitious the story about Ætna. Another account, equally fabulous, states that during the night, after a sacred festival, he was conveyed away towards the heavens amid the splendour of celestial night. The truth appears to be, as Timæus relates, that, towards the close of his life he went to Greece, and never returned, whence the exact time and manner of his death remain unknown. According to Aristotle he died at 60 years of age. A statue was erected to him at Agrigentum, which was afterwards carried to Rome. Lucretius gives a high character of him in his poem.] Horat. 1, ep. 12, v. 20.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 50, &c.—Diog. in vitâ.

EMPORIÆ, [a country of Africa propria, called also Byzacium, situate to the north of the Syrtis minor. In it stood Leptis minor, below Hadrumetum. This city is said to have paid to the Carthaginians a talent each day. It was in fact a very fruitful district, and Polybius says that almost all the hopes of the Carthaginians depended on the revenue they drew from it. To this were owing the anxiety and state jealousy of the Carthaginians, that the Romans should not sail beyond the Fair promontory that lay before Carthage, and become acquainted with a region which they might be tempted to conquer.]

ENCĒLĀDUS, a son of Titan and Terra, the most powerful of all the giants who conspired against Jupiter. He was struck with Jupiter's thunders, and overwhelmed under mount Ætna. Some suppose that he is the same as Typhon. According to the poets, the flames of Ætna proceeded from the breath of Enceladus; and as often as he turned his weary side, the whole island of Sicily felt the motion, and shook from its very foundations. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 578, &c.—A son of Ægyptus.

ENDYMĪON, a shepherd, son of Æthlius and Calyce. It is said that he required of Jupiter to grant to him to be always young, and to sleep as much as he would; whence came the proverb of Endymionis somnum dormire, to express a long sleep. Diana saw him naked as he slept on mount Latmos, and was so struck with his beauty that she came down from heaven every night to enjoy his company. Endymion married Chromia, daughter of Ite-nus, or, according to some, Hyperipna, daughter of Arcas, by whom he had three sons, Pæon, Epeus, and Æolus, and a daughter called Eurydice; and so little ambitious did he show himself of sovereignty, that he made his crown the prize of the best racer among his sons, an honourable distinction which was gained by Epeus. The fable of Endymion's amours with Diana, or the moon, arises from his knowledge of astronomy, and as he passed the night on some high mountain to observe the heavenly bodies, it has been reported that he was courted by the moon. Some suppose that there were two of that name, the son of a king of Elis, and the shepherd or astronomer of Caria. The people of Heraclea maintained that Endymion died on mount Latmos, and the Eleans pretended to show his tomb at Olympia in Peloponnesus. Propert. 2, el. 15.—*Cic. ENNA, [a city of Sicily, situate on an eminence in the middle of the island, whence, according to Diodorus, it was called the navel of Sicily. It was one of the strongest places in the island, and remarkable for its beautiful plains, fruitful soil, and the numerous lakes and springs which watered its territory. Prosperpine was carried away by Pluto in the vicinity of Enna, while she was gathering flowers in an adjacent meadow. The plains of Enna are now called Castro Janni.] Mela, 2, c. 7.—*Cic. Q. ENNIUS, an ancient poet, born at Rudizæ in Calabria, [about A. U. C. 514, B. C. 237, and flourished towards the close of the first Punic war. In his early youth he went to Sardinia; and, if Silius Italicus may be believed, he served in the Calabrian levies, which, in the year 538, followed Titus Man- thus to the war which he waged in that island against the favourers of the Carthaginian cause. After the termination of the campaign he continued to live for twelve years in Sardinia. He was at length brought to Rome by Cato the Censor, who, in 550, visited Sardinia, on returning as quæstor from Africa. At Rome he fixed his residence on the Aventine hill, where he lived in a very frugal manner. He instructed, however, the patrician youth in Greek, and soon acquired the friendship of many of the most illustrious men of the state. He followed M. Fulvius Nobilior during his expedition to Ætolia in 564; and in 569 he obtained the freedom of the city. He was also protected by the elder Africanus, whom he is said to have accompanied on most of his campaigns. In his old age he obtained the friendship of Scipio Nasica.] His style is rough and unpolished, but his defects, which are more particularly attributed to the age in which he lived, have been fully compensated by the energy of his expressions, and the fire of his poetry. Quintilian warmly commends him, and Virgil has shown his merit, by introducing many whole lines from his poetry into his own compositions, which he calls pearls gathered from the dunghill. Ennius wrote in heroic verse 18 books of the annals of the Roman republic, and displayed much knowledge of the world, in some dramatical and satirical compositions. He died of the gout, contracted by frequent intoxication, about 169 years before the Christian era, in the 70th year of his age. He was buried in the tomb of the Scipios; and there is still extant an epitaph reported to have been written by the poet for himself: as follows,

*Aspicite, o cives, senis Enni imaginis formam!
Hic vestrum panxit maxima facta patrum.
Nemo me lacrymis decoret, neque funera fletu
Faxit; cur? volito vivus, per ora virum.*

[The tomb was discovered in 1780, on a farm situate between the Via Appia, and Via Latina. The slabs, which have since been removed to the Vatican, contained several inscriptions commemorating different persons of the Scipio family. A laurelled bust was also found in it, supposed to be that of Ennius.] Of the tragedies, comedies, annals, and satires which he wrote, nothing remains but fragments happily collected from the quotations of ancient authors. The best edition of these is by Hesselius, 4to. Amst. 1707. [To judge by the fragments of his works which remain, Ennius greatly surpassed all his predecessors, not only in poetical genius, but in the art of versification. By his time, indeed, the best models of Greek composition had begun to be studied at Rome. Ennius particularly professed to have imitated Homer, and tried to persuade his countrymen that the soul and genius of that great poet had revived in him through the medium of a peacock, according to the process of Pythagorean transmigration, a fantastic genealogy to which Persius alludes in his sixth satire. Accordingly we find in the works of Ennius, innumerable imitations of the Iliad and Odyssey. It is, however, the Greek tragic writers from whom he has most largely borrowed; and indeed, it appears from the fragments which remain, that all his plays were rather translations from the dramas of Sophocles and Euripides than original tragedies. Nor, although Ennius was the first writer who introduced satiric composition into Rome, are his pretensions to originality, in this respect, very distinguished. He adapted the ancient satires of the Tuscan and Oscan stage to the closet, by refining their grossness, and introducing railleries from the Grecian poets. His satires were thus a species of cento, made up of passages from various poems. The fragments which remain of them are too short to allow us even to divine their subject. His great work was the Annals, of which we have still considerable remains. It commenced with the earliest times and ended with the Istrian war. The Annals of Ennius were always highly relished by the Romans. They were recited in the theatres as low down as the time of Marcus Aurelius, and the Romans were so formed on his style that Seneca called them populus Ennianus, an Ennian race.] *Ovid. 2, Trist. v. 424.—Cic. de Finib. 1, c. 4. de Offic. 2, c. 18.—Quintil. 10. c. 1.—Lauret. 1, v. 117, &c.—C. EPAMINONDAS, a famous Theban, descended from the ancient kings of Bœotia. His father's name was Polymnus. He has been celebrated for his private virtues and military accomplishments. His love of truth was so great that he never disgraced himself by falsehood. He formed a most sacred and inviolable friendship with Pelopidas, whose life he saved in a battle. By his advice Pelopidas delivered Thebes from the power of Lacedæmon. This was the signal of war. Epaminondas was set at the head of the Theban armies, and defeated the Spartans at the celebrated battle of Leuctra, about 371 years B.C. [Two years after this famous victory, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, being appointed Bœotarchs, or chiefs of the Bœotian league, entered the Peloponnesus. Seventy thousand men of different nations marched under their orders, and were led on by them against the city of Lacedæmon. The city was saved, however, by the skillful prudence of Agesilaus. The Theban commanders, on their return home, were accused of violating one of the rules of the Bœotian league, by having held their power over one year, which was the time fixed by law for remaining in command. Pelopidas yielded to the charge, but Epaminondas displayed so much firmness and patient resignation to his fate, that he enlisted the popular feeling in his favour, and the judges did not dare to condemn him. An unsuccessful campaign against Corinth, however, again subjected him to the loss of popular favour, and he was degraded to the rank of a private citizen. He afterwards served as a common soldier in an army sent to rescue Pelopidas from Alexander, tyrant of Phœæ, and having, even in that humble rank, saved the Theban forces from being totally destroyed, was reinstated to his former office of commander. After rescuing his friend, he marched into the Peloponnesus, succeeded almost in making himself master of Sparta, and at last ended his glorious career at the battle of Mantinea in Arcadia, where he fell in the arms of victory. The Spartan army and their allies consisted of 20,000 foot and 2,000 horse; that of the Thebans, of 30,000 infantry and 3,000 cavalry. The enemy had early betaken themselves to flight, but rallying on a sudden, attacked Epaminondas, who was pursuing them, with great ardour. He received a fatal wound in the breast, and expired exclaiming, that he died unconquered, when he heard that the Bœotians obtained the victory, in the 48th year of his age, 363 years before Christ.] The Thebans severely lamented his death; in him their power was extinguished, for only during his life they had enjoyed freedom and independence among the Grecian states. Epaminondas was frugal as well as virtuous, and he refused with indignation the rich presents which were offered to him by Artaxerxes the king of Persia. He is represented by his biographer as an elegant dancer, and a skillful musician; accomplishments highly esteemed among his countrymen. EPHËSUS, a city of Ionia. [Pliny represents it as the ornament of Asia, and Strabo describes it as the largest and most frequented emporium of that continent. The ancient city, which was originally a small village, stood about 50 miles south of Smyrna, near the mouth of the river Cayster. It was built originally on a mountain, but in time the city was extended down along the plain which reached to the sea, and it became gradually a commercial place. Some ancient writers ascribe its foundation to the Amazons, and state that it was called Ephesus (Ἐφεσός) from the Greek word ἔπις, permission, because Hercules permitted the Amazons to live, and build a city in this place. Others allege that Ephesus was named after the Amazon who founded it. A third account ascribes its origin to Ephesus, a son of the Cayster. However this may be, it is certain that the city, which in the Roman times was the metropolis of Asia, was founded by Lysimachus. The modern name of the place, which is now merely a village, is Aiosoluck, a corruption of Agios Theologos, from the circumstance of a famous church of St. John the Theologian having stood near the spot. Ephesus, however, was chiefly famous for its temple of Diana, which was so splendid an edifice as to be styled one of the seven wonders of the world. Its erection occupied, according to Pliny, 220 years. The building was 425 feet long, and 220 broad; and, according to the writer just mentioned, contained 127 columns, each the gift of a king. There is reason, however, to doubt the correctness of the punctuation in the passage of Pliny where this is stated. The architect was Ctesiphon. This temple enjoyed the privileges of an asylum until the reign of Tiberius, who abolished them. The statue of Diana was a small ebony one, according to the ancient writers, and was believed to have fallen from heaven. This splendid temple was destroyed by fire: the incendiary was Erostratus, whose object in so doing was, as he himself confessed, merely to perpetuate his name. vid. Erostratus. The conflagration took place the same night that Alexander was born, and the monarch, it is said, offered to rebuild the temple at his own expense if the Ephesians would place an inscription on it recording the fact: they, however, declined the offer, adding in a style of artful adulation, that it was not right for one deity to erect a temple to another. The temple was afterwards rebuilt, and is thought to have lasted till the general overthrow of the heathen temples in the age of Constantine.] *Plin. 36, c. 14.—Strab. 12 and 14.—Mela. 1, c. 17.—Paus. 7, c. 2.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 2, c. 4.—Callim. in Dian.—Ptol. 5.—Cic. de Nat. EPHËTÆ, a number of magistrates at Athens first instituted by Demophoon, the son of Theseus. Solon lessened their power, and intrusted them only with the trial of manslaughter and conspiracy against the life of a citizen. It was required that their manners should be pure and innocent, and their behaviour austere and full of gravity.

EPHIALTES or EPHIALTUS, a giant, son of Neptune, who grew nine inches every month. (vid. Aloeus).—An Athenian, famous for his courage and strength. EPHÏRI, powerful magistrates at Sparta, who were first created by Lycurgus. They were five in number. Like censors in the state, they could check and restrain the authority of the kings, and even imprison them, if guilty of irregularities. They fined Archidamus for marrying a wife of small stature, and imprisoned Agis for his unconstitutional behaviour. They were much the same as the tribunes of the people at Rome, erected to watch with a jealous eye over the liberties and rights of the populace. They had the management of the public money, and were the arbiters of peace and war. They had the privilege of convening, proroguing, and dissolving the greater and less assemblies of the people. The former was composed of 9000 Spartans, all inhabitants of the city; the latter of 30,000 Lacedæmonians, inhabitants of the inferior towns and villages. [The term Ephorus (Ἐφορος) denotes an inspector or superintendent. These magistrates punished all offences which had escaped the other courts of judicature, and each of them had to this end a class of civil causes under his particular inspection. But they could not put any individual to death without the concurrence of the senate. In this particular, and in the mode of their election, this latter council bore much resemblance to the Athenian Areopagus. It appears that the first men of the senate, in order that they might in case of need fill the office of vicegerents, were named "peers of the king." These, together with the ephori and kings, composed the privy council, which decided on secret and important affairs, either with or without the addition of a select number of citizens.] *C. It was divided into 30 books, was held in high estimation by the ancients, and is frequently cited by Strabo and other writers.] Quintil. 10, c. 1.

EPICHRMUS, [a native of the island of Cos, who flourished in the 5th century, B. C. His father removed him at an early age to Megara, and afterwards to Syracuse, where he became a disciple in the Pythagorean school. Being prevented by the tyranny of Hiero from assuming the public profession of philosophy, he chiefly applied himself to the study of dramatic poetry, and offended the Pythagoreans by introducing the doctrines and precepts of Pythagoras on the stage. His comedies were numerous; according to Suidas, fifty-two. Only a few fragments ve-main. He taught school at Syracuse, and is said to have invented the four Greek letters, ξ, η, ψ, ω. He also wrote commentaries on physical and medical subjects. According to Lucian the life of Epicharmus was prolonged to 97 years.] Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 58.—Diog. 3 and 8.—Cic. ad Attic. 1, ep. 19.

EPICTEŦUS, [an eminent stoic philosopher, born in a servile condition at Hieropolis in Phrygia, and flourished in the first century of the Christian era. At an early age he was sold as a slave to Epaphroditus, a freedman of Nero. He acquired his freedom by some means which are not recorded, and retired to a small hut within the city of Rome, where he devoted himself to study. Notwithstanding his poverty, he became in time a popular preceptor of morals. He was banished by Domitian with the other philosophers, and retired to Nicopolis in Epirus. He is thought to have returned to Rome after the death of the tyrant, and this is rendered highly probable by the respect which Adrian entertained for him. He died about the close of Adrian's reign. Themistius and Suidas, however, assert that he lived till the time of the Antonines. The earthen lamp of which he made use, was sold some time after his death at 3000 drachmas, about £90 sterling. This little anecdote, which we have from Lucian, shews how much his name and memory was respected.] His Enchiridion is a faithful picture of the stoic philosophy, and his dissertations, which were delivered to his pupils, were collected by Arrian, who wrote an account of his life and death, which is not now extant. His style is concise and devoid of all ornament, full of energy and useful maxims. The value of his compositions is well known from the saying of the emperor Antonius, who thanked the gods he could collect from the writings of Epictetus wherewith to conduct life with honour to himself and advantage to his country. There are several good editions of the works of Epictetus, with those of Cebeas and others. [The best is that of Schweighæuser, Lips. 1798, 8vo.]

EPICŦURUS, a celebrated philosopher, son of Neocles and Cherestrata, born at Gargettus in Attica. [vid. end of this article.] Though his parents were poor, yet he was early sent to school, where he distinguished himself by the brilliancy of his genius, and at the age of 12, when his preceptor repeated to him this verse from Hesiod, Ἡτοὶ μὲν πρῶτιστ' αἰχᾶν ἔχεν, &c.

In the beginning of things the Chaos was created,

Epicurus earnestly asked him who created it? To this the teacher answered, that he knew not, but only philosophers. "Then," says the youth, "philosophers henceforth shall instruct me." After having improved himself, and enriched his mind by travelling, he visited Athens, which was then crowded by the followers of Plato, the Cynics, the Peripatetics, and the Stoics. Here he established himself and soon attracted a number of followers by the sweetness and gravity of his manners, and by his social virtues. He taught them that the happiness of mankind consisted in pleasure, not such as arises from sensual gratification, or from vice, but from the enjoyments of the mind, and the sweets of virtue. This doctrine was warmly attacked by the philosophers of the different sects, and particularly by the Stoics. They observed that he disgraced the gods by representing them as inactive, and unconcerned with the affairs of mankind. He refuted all the accusations of his adversaries by the purity of his morals; and when Leontium, one of his female pupils, was accused of prostituting herself to her master and to all his disciples, the philosopher proved the falsity of the accusation by silence and an exemplary life. His health was at last impaired by continual labour, and he died of a retention of urine, which long subjected him to the most excruciating torments, and which he bore with unparalleled fortitude. His death happened 270 years before Christ, in the 72d year of his age. His disciples showed their respect for the memory of their learned preceptor, by the unanimity which prevailed among them. While philosophers in every sect were at war with mankind and among themselves, the followers of Epicurus enjoyed perfect peace, and lived in the most solid friendship. The day of his birth was observed with universal festivity, and during a month all his admirers gave themselves up to mirth and innocent amusement. Of all the philosophers of antiquity, Epicurus is the only one whose writings deserve attention for their number. He wrote no less than 300 volumes, according to Diogenes Laertius and Chrysippus was so jealous of the fecundity of his genius, that no sooner had Epicurus published one of his volumes, than he immediately composed one, that he might not be overcome in the number of his productions. He, however, advanced truths and arguments unknown before; but Chrysippus said what others long ago had said, without showing any thing which might be called originality. The followers of Epicurus were numerous in every age and country, his doctrines were rapidly disseminated over the world, and when the gratification of the senses was substituted to the practice of virtue, the morals of mankind were undermined and destroyed. Even Rome, whose austere simplicity had happily nurtured virtue, felt the attack, and was corrupted. When Cyneas spoke of the tenets of the Epicureans in the Roman senate, Fabricius indeed intreated the gods that all the enemies of the republic might become his followers. But those were the feeble efforts of expiring virtue; and when Lucretius introduced the popular doctrine in his poetical composition, the smoothness and beauty of the numbers contributed, with the effeminacy of the Epicureans, to enervate the conquerors of the world. [Epicurus passed a part of his early life, until eighteen years of age, at Samos, to which island his parents had retired, on account of their poverty, with an Athenian colony. At the age of eighteen he came to Athens, but left it again on the death of Alexander, when commotions arose through the tyranny of Cassander. He retired to his father at Colophon, and not long after to Mitylene. Here he opened a school of philosophy, and resided one year, after which, removing to Lampsacus, he taught there for four years, and then returned to Athens. This latter city became thenceforward the place of his permanent residence. Here he purchased for his own use a pleasant garden, where he dwelt, and taught the system of philosophy. Hence the Epicureans were called the philosophers of the garden. The period in which Epicurus opened his school was peculiarly favourable. In the room of the simplicity of the Socratic doctrine, nothing now remained but the subtlety and affectation of Stoicism, the unnatural severity of the Cynics, or the debasing doctrine of indulgence taught and practised by the followers of Aristippus. The luxurious refinement which now prevailed in Athens, while it rendered every rigid scheme of philosophy as well as all grossness of manners unpopular, inclined the younger citizens to listen to a preceptor who smoothed the stern and wrinkled brow of philosophy; and under the notion of conducting his followers to enjoyment in the bower of tranquillity, led them unawares into the path of moderation and virtue. Hence the popularity of his school; and disciples flocked to him not only from different parts of Greece, but from Egypt and Asia. It cannot be denied, however, that from the time when this philosopher appeared, to the present day, an uninterrupted course of censure has fallen upon his memory; so that the name of his sect has almost become a proverbial expression for every thing corrupt in principle and infamous in character. The charges brought against Epicurus are, that he superseded all religious principles, by dismissing the gods from the care of the world; that if he acknowledged their existence it was only in conformity to popular prejudice, since, according to his system, nothing exists in nature but material atoms; that he discovered great insolence and vanity in the disrespect with which he treated the memory of former philosophers, and the characters and persons of his contemporaries; and that both he and his disciples were addicted to the grossest sensuality. These accusations too have been not only the voice of common rumour, but more or less confirmed by men distinguished for their wisdom and virtue—Zeno, Cicero, Plutarch, Galen, and a long train of Christian fathers. With respect to the first charge, its certainly admits of no refutation. The doctrine of Epicurus concerning nature militated directly against the agency of a Supreme Being in the formation and government of the world; and his misconceptions with respect to mechanical motion, and the nature of Divine happiness, led him to divest the Deity of some of his primary attributes. It does not, however, appear that he entirely denied the existence of superior powers. Cicero charges him with inconsistency in having written books concerning piety and the reverence due to the gods, and in maintaining that the gods ought to be worshipped, whilst he asserted that they had no concern in human affairs. It is evident moreover that the gods of Epicurus were destitute of many of the essential characters of divinity, and that his piety was of a kind very different from that which is inspired by just notions of Deity. Not to urge that what he taught concerning the gods, might have been artfully designed to screen him from the odium and hazard which would have attended an open avowal of atheism. The other charges against this philosopher seem scarcely compatible with his general character. Indeed, that he was distinguished by the contrary virtues, appears even from the confessions of the more respectable opponents of his doctrine, particularly Cicero, Plutarch and Seneca. Much, if not all, of the calumnies uttered against him must be ascribed to the malignity of rival sects.] Diog. in vitâ.—Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 13.—*Cic. de Nat. EPIDAMNUS, a town of Macedonia. [vid. Dyrrachium.]

EPIDAURIA, a festival at Athens in honour of Æsculapius.—A country of Peloponnesus.

EPIDAUROS, [a town of Argos in Peloponnesus, on the coast of the Sinus Saronicus, and opposite the island of Ægina. It lay south-east of Argos. This town was famed for a temple Æsculapius, whither great numbers, both from Greece and other countries, resorted for the cure of distempers. It is said to have been the birth-place of Æsculapius. It is now a small place called Pidauria.] Strab. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 44.—Paus. 3, c. 21.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—A town of Dalmatia, now Regusi Vecchio.—of Laconia.

EPIDŌTE, certain deities who presided over the birth and growth of children, and were known among the Romans by the name of Dii averrunci. They were worshipped by the Lacedæmonians, and chiefly invoked by those who were persecuted by the ghosts of the dead, &c. Paus. 3, c. 17, &c.

EPIGŌNI, the sons and descendants of the Grecian heroes who were killed in the first Theban war. The war of the Epigoni is famous in ancient history. It was undertaken ten years after the first. The sons of those who had perished in the first war, resolved to avenge the death of their fathers, and marched against Thebes, under the command of Thersander, or, according to others, of Alcmaon, the son of Amphiaraus. The Argives were assisted by the Corinthians, the people of Messenia, Arcadia, and Megara. The Thebans had engaged all their neighbours in their quarrel, as in one common cause, and the two hostile armies met and engaged on the banks of the Glissas. The fight was obstinate and bloody, but victory declared for the Epigoni, and some of the Thebans fled to Illyricum with Leodamas their general, while others retired into Thebes, where they were soon besieged, and forced to surrender. In this war Ægialeus alone was killed, and his father Adrastus was the only person who escaped alive in the first war. This whole war, as Pausanias observes, was written in verse; and Callinus, who quotes some of the verses, ascribes them to Homer, which opinion has been adopted by many writers. For my part, continues the geographer, I own that next to the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, I have never seen a finer poem. Paus. 9, c. 9 and 25.—Apollod. 1 and 3.—Diod. 4.—This name has been applied to the sons of those Macedonian veterans who in the age of Alexander formed connexions with the women of Asia.

EPIMENIDES, an epic poet of Crete, contemporary with Solon. His father's name was Agiasarchus, and his mother's Blasta. He is reckoned one of the seven wise men, by those who exclude Periander from the number. While he was tending his flocks one day, he entered into a cave, where he fell asleep. His sleep continued for 40, or 47, or according to Pliny, 57 years, and when he awoke he found every object so considerably altered, that he scarce knew where he was. His brother apprised him of the length of his sleep to his great astonishment. [It is also recorded of Epimenides, that he could dismiss his soul from the body and recall it at pleasure, and that he had familiar intercourse with the gods, and possessed the gift of prophecy. The more credible account of him is, that he was a man of superior talents, who pretended to intercourse with the gods; and, in order to justify his pretensions, lived in retirement upon the spontaneous productions of the earth and practised various arts of imposture. Such was his reputation for sanctity, and for the performance of religious rites, that during a plague in Attica, B. C. 596, the Athenians sent for him to perform a sacred lustration; in consequence of which, as it is said, the gods were appeased and the plague ceased. The Cretans paid him divine honours after death. He wrote various pieces, none of which remain. His treatise on oracles and responses, mentioned by St. Jerome, is said to have been the work from which St Paul quotes in the epistle to Titus, 1, 12.] Cic. de Div. 1, c. 34.—Diog. in vitâ.—Paus. 1, c. 14.—Plut. in Solon.—*Val. EPIMETHEUS, a son of Japetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides, who inconsiderately married Pandora, by whom he had Pyrrha the wife of Deucalion. He had the curiosity to open the box which Pandora had brought with her, (vid. Pandora,) and from thence issued a train of evils, which from that moment had never ceased to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one which remained at the bottom of the box, not having sufficient time to escape, and it is she alone which comforts men under misfortunes. Epimetheus was changed into a monkey by the gods, and sent into the island of Pithecusa. Apollod. 1, c. 2 and 7.—Hægin. fab.—Hesiod. Theog. vid. Prometheus.

EPIPHANĒA, [a town of Cilicia Campestris, south-east of Anazarbas, and situate on the small river Carus, near the range of mount Amanus. It is now Surfendkar.]—[A city of Syria, on the Orontes below Apamea. It was reckoned by the Orientals one of the most magnificent cities in the world, having been founded, as they imagined, by Hamath, one of the sons of Canaan, after whom it was called. Its name was changed by the Macedonians in honour of Antiochus Epiphanes. It is now Hama.]

EPIPHĀNES, (illustrious), a surname given to the Antiochuses, kings of Syria.—A surname of one of the Ptolemies, the fifth of the house of the Lagidæ. Strab. 17.

EPIPHANĪS, a bishop of Salamis, who was active in refuting the writings of Origen; but his compositions are more valuable for the fragments which they preserve than for their own intrinsic merit. The only edition is by Dionys. Petavius, 2 vols. Paris, 1622. The bishop died A. D. 403.

EPIPŌLĒ, a district of Syracuse, on the north side, surrounded by a wall by Dionysius, who, to complete the work expeditiously, employed 60,000 men upon it, so that in 3 days he finished a wall $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, and of great height and thickness.

EPĪRUS, [a country of Greece, to the west of Thessaly, lying along the Adriatic. It was called at first Ἐπίρουσ Δωδοναία, Epirus Dodonæa, or the continent of the Dodonæans, and afterwards simply Ἐπίρουσ, Epirus, or continent. This latter name was given to it by the inhabitants of the island Coreyra, which lay in its vicinity. It is likewise called Pelasgia by many ancient writers, as being that part of Greece where the Pelasgi first made their appearance. It was divided into Molossis, Thesprotia, Chaonia, and Orestis. This country is said to have been first peopled by Dodanim, the son of Iavan, or at least by some of his posterity. Epirus now forms a part of modern Albania. vid. Pyrrhus and Molossi.] Strab. 7.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ptol. 3, c. 14.—Plin. 4, c. 1.—Virg. G. 3, v. 121.

EPORĒDŌRIX, a powerful person among the Ædui, who commanded his countrymen in their war against the Sequani. Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 67.

EQUĪRIA, festivals established at Rome by Romulus, in honour of Mars, when horse-races and games were exhibited in the Campus Martius. [It took place on the 27th of February.] Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 859.

[EQUITES, the second order in the Roman state, forming a connecting link between the patricians and plebeians. At first they were merely a body of 300 young men, chosen by Romulus, 100 from each tribe. They were the most distinguished for rank, wealth, and other accomplishments, and their duty was to serve on horseback and attend the king as a body-guard. Their original name was Celeres. The number was increased by Tullus Hostilius, who chose 300 more from the Albans. They were afterwards raised to 1200 by Tarquinius Priscus, or perhaps to 1800. Servius Tullius made 18 centuries of Equites, choosing 12 new ones, and making 6 centuries of the original three, which had been continued up to his time, under all the additions to their number. 10,000 pounds of brass were allowed each of them for the maintenance of their horses, and a tax (the only one) was laid on widows for this purpose. They received from the state a gold ring and a horse, and were required to possess a fortune of 400 sestertia (£3229 sterling,) at least towards the end of the republic, and under the emperors. Their principal office was at first to serve in the army, but afterwards to act as judges or jurymen, and to farm the public revenues. They were reviewed every fifth year, and if an Eques had been corrupt in his morals or had diminished his fortune, or even had not taken proper care of his horse, he was ordered by the Censor to sell his horse, which was tantamount to degradation. In cases less flagrant, the name of the offender was merely left out of the list of Equites, a mode of punishment which, though it deprived the party of his rank, was, however, less disgraceful than the former.]

EQUOTURICUM, now Castel Franco, a little town of Apulia, to which, as some suppose, Horace alludes in this verse, 1. Sat. 5, v. 37.

“Mansuri oppidulo, versu quod dicere non est.”

ERASISTRĀTUS, a celebrated physician, grandson to the philosopher Aristotle. [He is generally supposed to have been a native of Ceos, and not of Cos, as some have asserted.] He discovered by the motion of the pulse the love which Antiochus had conceived for his mother-in-law Stratonice, and was rewarded with 100 talents for the cure by the father of Antiochus. He was a great enemy to bleeding and violent physic. He died B. C. 257. Val. Max. 5, c. 7.—Plut. in Demetr.

ERĀTO, one of the Muses, who presided over lyric, tender and amorous poetry. She is represented as crowned with roses and myrtle, holding in her right hand a lyre, and a lute in her left, musical instruments of which she is considered by some as the inventress. Love is sometimes placed by her side holding a lighted flambeau, while she herself appears with a thoughtful, but oftener with a gay and animated look. She was invoked by lovers, especially in the month of April, which, among the Romans, was more particularly devoted to love. Apollod. 10.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 37.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2, v. 425.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.

ERATOSTHĒNES, son of Agalaus, was a native of Cyrene, and the second intrusted with the care of the Alexandrian library. He dedicated his time to grammatical criticism and philosophy, but more particularly to poetry and mathematics. He has been called a second Plato, the cosmographer and the geometer of the world. [He was also styled νικταβλος, i. e. victorious in five contests, alluding to the five prizes of the Olympic games, and expressive of his pre-eminence in all kinds of literary pursuits.] He is supposed to be the inventor of the armillary sphere. With the instruments with which the munificence of the Ptolemies supplied the library of Alexandria he was enabled to measure the obliquity of the ecliptic, [which in the year 230 B. C. he makes $23^{\circ} 51' 20''$. He likewise first introduced into his map a regular parallel of latitude, which was a geographical outline traced over certain places whose longest day was observed to be of exactly the same length.] He also measured a degree of the meridian and determined the circumference of the earth. He starved himself after he had lived to his 82d year, B. C. 194, [being unable to bear the depression of spirits occasioned by the decay of his sight.] Some few fragments remain of his compositions. He collected the annals of the Egyptian kings by order of one of the Ptolemies. Cic. ad Attic. 2, ep. 6.—Varro de R. R. 1, c. 2.

EREBUS, a deity of hell, son of Chaos. He married Night, by whom he had Æther and the Day. [The poets often use the word Erebus for the gloomy region in the shades, distinguished both from Tartarus the place of torment, and from Elysium the region of bliss.] Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 17.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 426.

ERECHTHEUS, son of Pandion 1st, was the sixth king of Athens. He was father of Cecrops 2d, Metion, Pandorus, and four daughters, Creusa, Crithya, Procris, and Othoma, by Praxithea. [Some have referred to this reign, the arrival of Ceres in Attica after the rape of her daughter Proserpine, who taught the cultivation of corn, and the institution by her of the Eleusinian mysteries.] After death he received divine honours at Athens. He reigned 50 years, and died B. C. 1347, in a battle with the Eleusinians. Ovid. 6, v. 877.—Paus. 2, c. 25.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Cic. pro Sext. 21.—Tusc. 1, c. 48.—Nat. D. 3, c. 15.

ERECHTHIDES, a name given to the Athenians, from their king Erechtheus. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 430.

ERĒSUS, a town of Lesbos, the native place of Theophrastus.

ERĒTRĪA, [a town of the island of Eubœa, situate on the coast of the Euripus, south-east of Chalcis. It remained a flourishing city until the reign of Darius Hystaspes. This monarch had resolved to punish the Eretrians for joining with the Athenians in the expedition of the Ionians against Sardis; and he accordingly gave orders to his commanders Datis and Artaphernes, to subdue both Eretria and Athens, and bring the inhabitants captive before him. Eretria was taken after a six day's siege, and the captive inhabitants brought to Asia. They are said to have been in number only 400, among whom were ten women. The rest of the Eretrians escaped from the Persians among the rocks of the island. Darius treated the prisoners kindly, and settled them at Ardericca, in the district of Cissia. According to Philostratus, they occupied the same spot at the beginning of the Christian era. Eretria was afterwards rebuilt, and became a flourishing city. It is supposed to answer to the modern Gravlinais.] Paus. 7, c. 8, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—C. Nep. in Mill. 4.

ERICHTHONIUS, the fourth king of Athens, sprung from the seed of Vulcan which fell upon the ground when that god attempted to offer violence to Minerva. He was very deformed, and had the tails of serpents instead of legs. Minerva placed him in a basket, which she gave to the daughters of Cecrops, with strict injunctions not to examine its contents. Aglauros, one of the sisters, had the curiosity to open the basket, for which the goddess punished her indiscretion by making her jealous of her sister Herse. [vid. Herse.] [The meaning of the fable evidently is, that Erichthonius having limbs that were greatly deformed, invented chariots for the purpose of concealing this deformity. This also without doubt gave rise to the fiction that after death he was translated to the skies, and formed the constellation of the chariot.] Erichthon was young when he ascended the throne of Athens. He reigned 30 years, and died B. C. 1437. The invention of chariots is attributed to him, and the manner of harnessing horses to draw them. He was made a constellation after death under the name of Bootes. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 553.—Hygin. fab. 166.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Paus. 4, c. 2.—Virg. G. 3, v. 113.

ERIDĀNUS, [a river of Italy, in Cisalpine Gaul, called also Padus, now the Po. D'Anville states that the name Eridanus, though a term for the entire river, was specially applied to the Ostium Spineticum, or Spinetic mouth, which last received its name from a very ancient city in its vicinity, founded by the Greeks, and called Spina. Some writers consider the name Eridanus, as coming in fact from a river in the north of Europe, the modern Rhodanus, which flows into the Vistula near Dantsic. Here the Phœnicians and Carthaginians traded for amber, and their fear of rivalry in this lucrative trade induced them to keep the source of their traffic involved in so much obscurity that it became in time the subject of poetic embellishment. The Rhodanus, or Rhone, is thought by some to have received its ancient name from this circumstance, being confounded by the Greeks, in the infancy of their geographical knowledge, with the true stream. This probably arose from amber being found among the Gallic nations, to whom it may have come by an over-land trade. In like manner, amber being obtained afterwards in large quantities among the Veneti on the Adriatic, induced the Greeks to remove the Eridanus to this quarter and identify it with the Po, off the mouth of which stream they placed their imaginary amber islands, the Electrides. The Veneti obtained their amber in a similar way with the Gallic nations. Thus the true Eridanus, and the fable of Phaethon also, both refer to a northern origin; and a curious subject of discussion arises with regard to the earlier climate of the regions bordering on the Baltic, for remarks on which vid. Phaethon.] Cic. in Arat. 145.—*Claudian de Cons. ERIGONE, a daughter of Icarus, who hung herself when she heard that her father had been killed by some shepherds whom he had intoxicated. She was made a constellation, now known under the name of Virgo. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.—Stat. 11, Theb. v. 644.—Virg. G. 1, v. 33.—Apollod. 3, c. 44.—Hygin. fab. 1 and 24.

ERIGONEIUS, a name applied to the Dogstar, because looking towards Frigone, &c. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 723.

ERINNA, a poetess of Lesbos, intimate with Sappho. [The chronicle of Eusebius, however, places her 250 years later than Sappho. She was celebrated for her poetical talents, and several epigrams were written upon her, one of which speaks of her as inferior to Sappho in lyrics, but superior in hexameters. Some fragments are extant in her name in the "Carmina novem Pœtarum Fœminarum." Antv. 1568.] Piin. 34, c. 8.

ERINNYs, the Greek name of the Eumenides. The word signifies the fury of the mind, εἰς νόον, (vid. Eumenides.) ["Habent nomen," says Damm, "ab εἰ valde et αἰῶν efficio, quia sunt ἀγχι ἀνοστήμας; vel ab ἀγῆς αἰῶνι execrationes et imprecationes justas exsequi."] Virg. Æn. 2, v. 337.—A surname of Ceres, on account of her amour with Neptune, under the form of a horse. [The name is meant to express the anger of the goddess towards Neptune. The term εἰριννοῖν was used by the Arcadians, according to the Ety-mol. Mag. for εἰρηνοῖν. Why may not this be a good derivation also for the name, as applied to the furies?] Paus. 8, c. 25 and 42.

ERIPHYLE, a sister of Adrastus, king of Argos, who married Amphiarus. She was daughter of Talauus and Lysimache. When her husband concealed himself that he might not accompany the Argives in their expedition against Thebes, where he knew he was to perish, Eriphyle suffered herself to be bribed by Polynices with a golden necklace which had been formerly given to Hermione by the goddess Venus, and she discovered where Amphiarus was. This treachery of Eriphyle compelled him to go to war; but before he departed, he charged his son Alcmaeon to murder his mother as soon as he was informed of his death. Amphiarus perished in the expedition, and his death was no sooner known than his last injunctions were obeyed, and Eriphyle was murdered by the hands of her son. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 445.—Homer. Od. 11.—Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 18.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 6 and 7.—Hygin. fab. 73.—Paus. 5, c. 17.

ERIS, the goddess of discord among the Greeks. She is the same as the Discordia of the Latins. vid. Discordia.

ERISICHON, a Thessalian, son of Triops, who derided Ceres and cut down her groves. This impiety irritated the goddess, who afflicted him with continual hunger. He squandered all his possessions to gratify the cravings of his appetite, and at last he devoured his own limbs for want of food. His daughter Metra had the power of transforming herself into whatever animal she pleased, and she made use of that artifice to maintain her father, who sold her, after which she assumed another shape, and became again his property. Ovid. Met. fab. 18.

[EROS, (εἶρος), vid. Cupido].

EROSTRATUS, [the incendiary who set fire to the famous temple of Diana at Ephesus. When put to the torture, he confessed that his only object was to gain himself a name among posterity. The states-general of Asia endeavoured very foolishly to prevent this, by ordering that his name should never be mentioned; but the natural consequence was, that it is mentioned by all contemporary historians, and has reached even our own time, in full accordance with the wishes of the man who bore it.]

ERŌTIA, a festival in honour of Eros the god of love. It was celebrated by the Thespians every fifth year, with sports and games, when musicians and others contended. If any quarrels or seditions had arisen among the people, it was then usual to offer sacrifices and prayers to the god, and he would totally remove them.

ERYCINA, a surname of Venus, from mount Eryx, where she had a temple. She was also worshipped at Rome under this appellation. [The Erycinian Venus appears to have been the same with the Phœnician Astarte, whose worship was brought over by the latter people, and a temple erected to her on mount Eryx. In confirmation of this we learn from Diodorus Siculus (4, 83.) that the Carthaginians revered the Erycinian Venus equally as much as the natives themselves.] Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 874.—Horat. 1, Od. 2, v. 33.

ERYMANTHUS, [a mountain or forest in the north-western angle of Arcadia, east of a river of the same name, which had its source towards the north, on the confines of Elis and Arcadia. Here Hercules slew the famous Erymanthian boar. vid. Hercules.] Paus. 8, c. 24.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 802.—Plin. 4, c. 6.—Cic. Tusc. 2, c. 8, l. 4, c. 22.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 499.

ERYTHĒA, [an island off the coast of Iberia, in the Atlantic. It lay in the Sinus Cæditanus, or Bay of Cadiz, and was remarkable for its fertility. It was called by the inhabitants Junonis insula; and by later wri ters Aphrodisias. Here Geryon was said to have reigned; and the fertility of the island seems to have given rise to the fable of his oxen. vid. Hercules, and Geryon.] Plin. 4, c. 22.—Mela, 3, c. 6.—Propert. 4, el. 10, v. 1.—Syl. 16, v. 195.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 649.

ERYTHRÆ, a town of Ionia, opposite Chios, once the residence of a sibyl, [called from the place of her residence, the Erythræan sibyl.] It was built by Neleus, the son of Codrus. [It is now a small village called Erethir.] Paus. 10, c. 12.—Liv. 44, c. 28, l. 38, c. 39.—A town of Bœotia. Id. 6, c. 21.

ERYTHRÆUM MARE, [a name applied by the Greeks to the whole ocean, extending from the coast of Ethiopia to the island of Taprobana, when their geographical knowledge of India was in its infancy. They derived the name from an ancient monarch who reigned along these coasts, by the name of Erythras, and believed that his grave was to be found in one of the adjacent islands. Afterwards, when the Greeks learned the existence of an Indian ocean, the term Erythræan Sea was applied merely to the sea below Arabia, and to the Arabian and Persian Gulfs. In this latter sense Strabo uses the name. Herodotus follows the old acceptation of the word, according to the opinion prevalent in his age. The appellation was probably derived from Edom, (Esau), whose descendants were called Idumeans, and inhabited the northern parts of Arabia. They navigated upon the Red Sea and Persian Gulf, and also upon the Indian Ocean, and the oriental name Idumæan, signifying red, the sea of the Idumæans was called the Red Sea and the Erythræan Sea. (Ερυθρα θάλασσα.) vid. Arabicus Sinus. Curt. 8, c. 9.—Plin. 6, c. 23.—Herodot. 1, c. 180 and 189, l. 3, c. 93, l. 4, c. 37.—Mela, 3, c. 8.]

ERYX, a son of Butes and Venus, who relying upon his strength, challenged all strangers to fight with him in the combat of the cestus. Hercules accepted his challenge after many had yielded to his superior dexterity, and Eryx was killed in the combat, and buried on the mountain where he had built a temple to Venus. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 402.—An Indian, killed by his subjects for opposing Alexander. &c. Curt. 8, c. 11.—A mountain of Sicily, now San Giuliano, near Drepanum, which received its name from Eryx, who was buried there. [On its summit stood a famous temple of Venus Erycina, (vid. Erycina.) and on the western declivity was situated the town of Eryx, the approach to which from the plain was rocky and difficult. At the distance of 30 stadia stood the harbour of the same name. The Phœnicians most probably were the founders of the place, and also of the temple: and the Erycinian Venus appears to be identified with the Astarte of the latter people. The native inhabitants in this quarter were called Elymi, and Eryx is said by some to have been their king. Virgil makes Æneas to have founded the temple: in this, however, he is contradicted by other authorities. Æneas, if ever he was in Sicily, seems to have done nothing more than repair and adorn the sacred edifice. The town was destroyed by the Carthaginians in the time of Pyrrhus, who a short time previous had taken it by storm, and the inhabitants were removed to Drepanum. It soon, however, revived, owing to the celebrity of the adjacent temple. In the first Punic war it fell into the hands of the Romans, but was surprised by Barca, the Carthaginian commander, and the inhabitants who escaped the slaughter were again removed to Drepanum. The place never recovered from this blow: the sanctity of the temple drew indeed new inhabitants around, but the city was never rebuilt. No traces of the temple remain at the present day. On the summit of the mountain is now an ancient castle, supposed to have been erected by the Saracens.] *Ovid. ESQUILIA, and ESQUILINUS MONS, one of the seven hills of Rome which was joined to the city by king Tullus. [The Campus Esquilinus was granted by the senate as a burying-place for the poor, and stood without the Esquiline gate. As the vast number of bodies here deposited rendered the places adjoining very unhealthy, Augustus, with the consent of the senate and people gave part of it to his favourite Mæcenas, who built there a magnificent house with extensive gardens, whence it became one of the most healthy situations of Rome.] Liv. 2, c. 11.—Horat. 5, epod. v. 100.—*Tacit. ESULA, a town of Italy near Tibur. Horat. 3, Od. 29, v. 6.

ETEÓCLES, a son of Ædipus and Jocasta. After his father's death, it was agreed between him and his brother Polynices, that they should both share the royalty, and reign alternately each a year. Eteocles by right of seniority first ascended the throne, but after the first year of his reign was expired, he refused to give up the crown to his brother according to their mutual agreement. Polynices resolving to punish such an open violation of a solemn engagement, went to implore the assistance of Adrastus, king of Argos. He received that king's daughter in marriage, and was soon after assisted with a strong army, headed by several famous generals. These hostile preparations were watched by Eteocles, who on his part did not remain inactive. He chose seven brave chiefs to oppose the seven leaders of the Argives, and stationed them at the seven gates of the city. He placed himself against his brother Polynices, and he opposed Menalippus to Tydeus, Polyphontes to Capaneus, Megareus to Eteocles, Hyperbius to Parthenopæus, and Lathenes to Amphiarus. Much blood was shed in light and unavailing skirmishes, and it was at last agreed between the two brothers that the war should be decided by single combat. They both fell in an engagement conducted with the most inveterate fury on either side, and it is even said that the ashes of these two brothers, who had been so inimical one to the other, separated themselves on the burning pile, as if even after death, sensible of resentment, and hostile to reconciliation. Stat. Theb.—Apollod. 3, c. 5, &c.—Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Eurip. in Phœnis.—Paus. 5, c. 9, l. 9, c. 6.

ETREŒLUS, one of the seven chiefs of the army of Adrastus in his expedition against Thebes, celebrated for his valour, for his disinterestedness and magnanimity. He was killed by Megareus, the son of Creon, under the walls of Thebes. Eurip.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.

ETESLÆ, or Etesian Winds, are such as blow at stated times of the year, from what part soever of the compass they come. They derive their name from eros, year, being yearly or anniversary winds, such as the seamen call monsoons and trade winds, which in some parts of the world continue blowing for certain stated seasons of the year. Thus, the north winds, which, during the dog-days, constantly blow upon the coast of Egypt, and hinder all ships from sailing out of Alexandria for that season, are called Etesia in Cæsar's Commentaries. In other authors the west and east winds are called etesia when they continue blowing for certain seasons of the year. [According to Cellarius, however, those winds are properly etesian which blow from that part of the horizon which is between the north and the west, about the time of the summer solstice.]

ETRUSCI, }

EVADNE, a daughter of Iphis or Iphicles of Argos, who slighted the addresses of Apollo, and married Capaneus one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. When her husband had been struck with thunder by Jupiter for his blasphemies and impiety, and his ashes had been separated from those of the rest of the Argives, she threw herself on his burning pile, and perished in the flames. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447.—Propert. 1, el. 15, v. 21.—Stat. Theb. 12, v. 800.

EVĀGŒRAS, a king of Cyprus, who retook Salamis, which had been taken from his father by the Persians. He made war against Artaxerxes, the king of Persia, with the assistance of the Egyptians, Arabians, and Tyrians, and obtained some advantage over the fleet of his enemy. The Persians, however, soon repaired their losses, and Evagoras saw himself defeated by sea and land, and obliged to be tributary to the power of Artaxerxes, and to be stripped of all his dominions except the town of Salamis. He was assassinated soon after this fatal change of fortune, by an eunuch, 374. B. C. He left two sons, Nicocles, who succeeded him, and Protagoras, who deprived his nephew Evagoras of his possessions. His grandson bore the same name, and succeeded his father Nicocles. He showed himself oppressive, and his uncle Protagoras took advantage of his unpopularity to deprive him of his power. Evagoras fled to Artaxerxes Ochus, who gave him a government more extensive than that of Cyprus, but his oppression rendered him odious, and he was accused before his benefactor, and by his orders put to death. C. Nep. 12, c. 2.—Diod. 14.—Paus. 1, c. 3.—Justin. 5, c. 6.

EVANDER, a son of the prophetess Carme, king of Arcadia. An accidental murder obliged him to leave his country, and he came to Italy, where he drove the aborigines from their ancient possessions, and reigned in that part of the country where Rome was afterwards founded. He kindly received Hercules when he returned from the conquest of Geryon; and he was the first who raised him altars. He gave Æneas assistance against the Rutuli, and distinguished himself by his hospitality. It is said that he first brought the Greek alphabet into Italy, and introduced there the worship of the Greek deities. [vid. Pelasgi.] He was honoured as a god after death by his subjects, who raised him an altar on mount Aventine. Paus. 8, c. 43.—Liv. 1, c. 7.—Ital. 7, v. 18.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 500, l. v. 91.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 100, &c.—A philosopher of the second academy, who flourished B. C. 215.

EVARCHUS, [a river of Asia Minor, flowing into the Euxine, to the south-east of Sinope. The name appears to have been changed in process of time to Euechus. It formed the ancient boundary between Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, or the White Syrians, who had spread themselves to the west of the Halys.] Flac. 6, v. 102.

EUBŒA, [one of the most considerable of the Greek islands, and the largest next to Crete, formerly joined to Bœotia, according to Pliny, by an isthmus. The Euripus separates it at present, being from north-east to south-west 150 miles, but where broadest being only 40 miles, and where narrowest 20. The island is in compass 365 miles. Its appellation Eubœa is said to be derived from its excellent pastures and fine herds. It is sometimes called Macris (the long) by the ancient poets. The champaign country was very fertile, and yielded corn, wine, oil, fruits; but it was chiefly famous for its pastures. The earliest inhabitants were the Abantes, who dwelt in the southern part of the island: in the north were the Istigi. In process of time, some of the Ionians, who migrated from Athens, settled here; and carrying on a commercial intercourse with their brethren in Ionia, soon became distinguished for their wealth and prosperity. The principal commercial cities were Chalcis and Eretria. The Eubœan talent became known in almost every quarter of the ancient world, by reason of the extensive foreign relations of the inhabitants; it was equal to the Babylonian, and the double of the Attic talent.] Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 10.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 155.

EUBŒIUS, belonging to Eubœa. The epithet is also applied to the country of Cumæ, because that city was built by a colony from Chalcis, a town of Eubœa. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 257.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 2, l. 9, v. 710.

EUBŪLIDES, [a native of Miletus, and successor of Euclid in the Megaric school. He was a strong opponent of Aristotle; and seized every opportunity of censuring his writings and calumniating his character. He introduced new subtleties into the art of disputation, several of which, though often mentioned as proof of great ingenuity, deserve only to be remembered as examples of egregious trifling.]

EUBŪLUS, an Athenian orator, rival to Demosthenes.

EUCLIDES, [a native of Megara, and founder of the Megaric or Eristic sect. He was distinguished by his subtle genius. He early became the auditor and disciple of Socrates; and, notwithstanding the terror of the decree which enacted that any inhabitant of Megara who should be seen at Athens should forfeit his life, he frequently came to Athens by night, from the distance of about 20 miles, concealed in a long female cloak and veil, to visit his master. He afterwards put himself at the head of a school in Megara, where his chief employment was to teach the art of disputation.] Diog. in Socrate.—A mathematician of Alexandria, who flourished 300 B. C. He distinguished himself by his writings on music and geometry, but particularly by 15 books on the elements of mathematics, which consist of problems and theorems with demonstrations. This work has been greatly mutilated by commentators. [The "Elements" are not to be wholly attributed to Euclid, many of the valuable truths and demonstrations contained in them owe their existence to Thales, Pythagoras, Eudoxus, and others; but Euclid was the first who reduced them to order, and probably interwove many theorems of his own to render the whole a complete and connected system of geometry. The two last books of the Elements were added, it is thought, 200 years after Euclid's death, by Hypsicles of Alexandria.] Euclid was so esteemed in his life-time, that king Ptolemy became one of his pupils. [Euclid's was the first mathematical school ever instituted at Alexandria; and in this city, till its conquest by the Saracens, most of the eminent mathematicians were either born or studied. To Euclid, and those immediately educated by him, the world has been indebted for Eratosthenes, Archimedes, Apollonius, Ptolemy, &c.] He was so respected that Plato, himself a mathematician, being asked concerning the building of an altar at Athens, referred his inquiries to the mathematician of Alexandria. The best edition of Euclid's writings is that of Gregory, fol. Oxon. 1703. Val. Max. 3, c. 12.—Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 72.

EUDAMIDAS, a son of Archidamus 4th, brother to Agis 4th. He succeeded on the Spartan throne after his brother's death, B. C. 330. Paus. 3, c. 10.—A son of Archidamus, king of Sparta, who succeeded B. C. 268.

EUDOCIA, [a Roman empress, wife to Theodosius the younger. Her original name was Athenais, and she was the daughter of Leon-tius an Athenian philosopher; but on her marriage she embraced Christianity, and received the baptismal name of Eudocia. She was a female of beauty and talent. She put into verse several books of the Old Testament, and wrote several paraphrases on some of the Jewish prophets, but became suspected by her husband of conjugal infidelity, and, being degraded, was allowed to seek a refuge in the Holy Land. Here she devoted herself to religious studies, and died at the age of 67. In her last illness, she solemnly declared her innocence of the charge alleged against her.]

EUDOXUS, [a celebrated astronomer and geometrician. He went to Egypt, and was introduced to the notice of Nectanebis 2d, and by him to the Egyptian priests. He is highly celebrated for his skill in astronomy by the ancients, though none of his writings on this or any other branch are extant. The honour of bringing the celestial sphere, and the regular astronomy from Egypt to Greece, belongs to him. After his return from Egypt, he taught astronomy and philosophy with great applause at Cyzicus, and afterwards removed to Athens, where he opened a school, and was in such high repute, as to be consulted on subjects of policy as well as science, by deputies from all parts of Greece. He died, B. C. 352.] Lucan. 10, v. 187.—Diog.—Petron. 88.—A native of Cyzicus, who sailed all round the coast of Africa from the Red Sea, and entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules. [According to the account of his voyage given by Posidonius, it would appear that he never pretended to have sailed around Africa, but merely made a voyage of discovery from Gades along the coast of Africa, and, after proceeding some distance, probably not much farther than one of the Canary islands, was shipwrecked and compelled to return. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 1, p. 25.]

EVEMERUS, an ancient historian of Messenia, intimate with Cassander. He travelled over Greece and Arabia, and wrote an history of the gods, in which he proved that they all had been upon earth as mere mortal men. Ennius translated it into Latin. It is now lost.

EVENUS, an elegiac poet of Paros.—A river running through Ætolia, and falling into the Ionian Sea. It receives its name from Evenus, son of Mars and Sterope, who being unable to overcome Idas, who had promised him his daughter Marpessa in marriage if he surpassed him in running, grew so desperate, that he threw himself into the river which afterwards bore his name. [It was on the banks of the Evenus that Hercules slew the centaur Nessus. It is now the Fidari. In the immediate vicinity of its mouth is situate Missolonghi.] Ovid. Met. 9, v. 104.—Strab. 7.

EVEPHENUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, whom Dionysius condemned to death because he had alienated the people of Metapontum from his power. The philosopher begged leave of the tyrant to go and marry his sister, and promised to return in six months. Dionysius consented by receiving Eucritus, who pledged himself to die if Euephenus did not return in time. Euephenus returned at the appointed moment, to the astonishment of Dionysius, and delivered his friend Eucritus from the death which threatened him. The tyrant was so pleased with these two friends, that he pardoned Euephenus, and begged to share their friendship and confidence. Polyæn. 5.

EUEGËTÆ, [a people of Upper Asia, whose proper name was Ariaspæ. They lay south of the Zarangæ or Drangæ. The Greeks called them Euergetæ, or benefactors, translating the Persian appellation which was added to their name. This was given them from the succours which they afforded to Cyrus. The modern name of their territory is Dergasp.] Curt. 7, c. 3.

EUEGËTES, a surname signifying benefactor, given to Philip of Macedonia, and to Antigonus Dason, and Ptolemy of Egypt. It was also commonly given to the kings of Syria and Pontus, and we often see among the former an Alexander Euergetes, and among the latter a Mithridates Euergetes. Some of the Roman emperors also claimed that epithet, so expressive of benevolence and humanity.

EUGANËI, a people of Italy, on the borders of the Adriatic, who, upon being expelled from the Trojans, seized upon a part of the Alps. [The Euganei were indebted for this name, implying well descended, to the Greeks; it being most probably an ingenious corruption of the true appellation. It was the Veneti, and not the Trojans, that drove them from the coast. They are thought to have founded Patavium, and, according to Pliny, Verona. After being compelled to retire to the mountains, they assumed the general name of Rhæti, or mountaineers, but frequently changed it afterwards. They were a branch of the Umbri.] Sil. 8, v. 604.—Liv. 1, c. 1.

EUGENIUS, an usurper of the imperial title after the death of Valentinian the 2d, A. D. 392.

EVIUS, [a surname of Bacchus, given him, according to the poets, by Jupiter, whom he was aiding in the contest with the giants. Jupiter was so delighted with his valour, that he called out to him, eu vis, well done, O son!] [EULËUS, or Cheaspes, a river of Persia, flowing near the city of Susa. The kings of Persia, according to Herodotus, drank of no other; and, wherever they went, they were attended by a number of four-wheeled carriages, drawn by mules, in which the water of this river, being first boiled, was deposited in vessels of silver. Ælian relates, that Xerxes, during his march into Greece, came to a desert place, and was exceedingly thirsty; his attendants with his baggage were at some distance, and proclamation was made, that whosoever had any of the water of the Choaspes, should produce it for the use of the king. One person was found who possessed a small quantity, but it was quite putrid.

Xerxes, however, drank it, and considered the person who supplied it as his friend and benefactor, since he must otherwise have perished with thirst.]

EUMËUS, a herdsman and steward of Ulysses, who knew his master at his return home from the Trojan war after 20 years' absence, and assisted him in removing Penelope's suitors. He was originally the son of the king of Scyros, and upon being carried away by pirates, he was sold as a slave to Laertes, who rewarded his fidelity and services. Homer. od. 13, v. 403, l. 14, v. 3, l. 15, v. 268, l. 16 and 17.

EUMËLUS, a son of Admetus, king of Phœria in Thessaly. He went to the Trojan war, and had the fleetest horses in the Grecian army. He distinguished himself in the games made in honour of Patroclus. Homer. Il. 2 and 23.—A man contemporary with Trip- tolemus, of whom he learned the art of agriculture. Paus. 7, c. 18.—One of the Bacchiadæ, who wrote, among other things, a poetical history of Corinth, B.C. 750, of which a small fragment is still extant. Paus. 2, c. 1.

EUMËNES, a Greek officer in the army of Alexander, son of a charioteer. He was the most worthy of all the officers of Alexander to succeed after the death of his master. He conquered Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, of which he obtained the government, till the power and jealousy of Antigonus obliged him to retire. He joined his forces to those of Perdicas, and defeated Craterus and Neoptolemus. Neoptolemus perished by the hands of Eumenes. When Craterus had been killed during the war, his remains received an honourable funeral from the hand of the conqueror; and Eumenes, after weeping over the ashes of a man who once was his dearest friend, sent his remains to his relations in Macedonia. Eumenes fought against Antipater and conquered him, and after the death of Perdicas, his ally, his arms were directed against Antigonus, by whom he was conquered, chiefly by the treacherous conduct of his officers. This fatal battle obliged him to disband the greatest part of his army to secure himself a retreat, and he fled with only 700 faithful attendants to Nora, a fortified place on the confines of Cappadocia, where he was soon besieged by the conqueror. He supported the siege for a year with courage and resolution, but some disadvantageous skirmishes so reduced him, that his soldiers, grown desperate, and bribed by the offers of the enemy, had the infidelity to betray him into the hands of Antigonus. The conqueror, from shame or remorse, had not the courage to visit Eumenes; but when he was asked by his officers in what manner he wished him to be kept, he answered, keep him as carefully as you would keep a lion. This severe command was obeyed; but the asperity of Antigonus vanished in a few days, and Eumenes, delivered from the weight of chains, was permitted to enjoy the company of his friends. Even Antigonus hesitated whether he should not restore to his liberty a man with whom he had lived in the greatest intimacy while both were subservient to the command of Alexander, and these secret emotions of pity and humanity were not a little increased by the petitions of his son Demetrius for the release of Eumenes. But the calls of ambition prevailed; and when Antigonus recollected what an active enemy he had in his power, he ordered Eumenes to be put to death in the prison; (though some imagine he was murdered without the knowledge of his conqueror.) His bloody commands were executed B. C. 315. Such was the end of a man who raised himself to power by merit alone. His skill in public exercises first recommended him to the notice of Philip, and under Alexander his attachment and fidelity to the royal person, and particularly his military accomplishments, promoted him to the rank of a general. Even his enemies revered him; and Antigonus, by whose orders he perished, honoured his remains with a splendid funeral, and conveyed his ashes to his wife and family in Cappadocia. It has been observed, that Eumenes had such an universal influence over the successors of Alexander, that none during his life-time dared to assume the title of king; and it does not a little reflect to his honour, to consider that the wars he carried on were not from private or interested motives, but for the good and welfare of his deceased benefactor's children. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diog. 19.—Justin. 13.—Curt. 10.—Arian.—A king of Pergamus, who succeeded his uncle Philetærus on the throne, B. C. 263. He made war against Antiochus the son of Seleucus, and enlarged his possessions by seizing upon many of the cities of the kings of Syria. He lived in alliance with the Romans, and made war against Prusias, king of Bithynia. He was a great patron of learning, and given much to wine. He died of an excess in drinking, after a reign of 22 years. He was succeeded by Attalus. Strab. 15.—The second of that name succeeded his father Attalus on the throne of Asia and Pergamus. His kingdom was small and poor, but he rendered it powerful and opulent, and his alliance with the Romans did not a little contribute to the increase of his dominions after the victories obtained over Antiochus the Great. He carried his arms against Prusias and Antiochus, and died B. C. 159, after a reign of 38 years, leaving the kingdom to his son Attalus 2d. He has been admired for his benevolence and magnanimity; and his love of learning greatly enriched the famous library of Pergamus, which had been founded by his predecessors in imitation of the Alexandrian collection of the Ptolemies. His brothers were so attached to him, and devoted to his interest, that they enlisted among his body-guards to show their fraternal fidelity. Strab. 13.—Justin. 31 and 34.—Polyb.—A celebrated orator of Athens about the beginning of the fourth century. Some of his harangues and orations are extant.

EUMENIA, a city of Phrygia, built by Attalus in honour of his brother Eumenes.—A city of Thrace.—of Caria. Plin 5, c. 29.

—of Hyrcania.

EUMENIDES, a name given to the Furies by the ancients. [The name means "the benign goddesses," an appellation applied to them by an euphemism, which is a mode of expression that avoids direct mention of indecent melancholy, or disagreeable things.] They sprang from the drops of blood which flowed from the wound which Cælus received from his son Saturn. According to others, they were daughters of the Earth, and conceived from the blood of Saturn. Some make them daughters of Acheron and Night, or Pluto and Proserpine, or Chaos and Terra, according to Sophocles, or as Epimenides reports, of Saturn and Eouonyme. According to the most received opinions, they were three in number, Tisiphone, Megara, and Alecto, to which some add Nemesis. Plutarch mentions only one, called Adrasta, daughter of Jupiter and Necessity. They were supposed to be the ministers of the vengeance of the gods, and therefore appeared stern and inexorable; always employed in punishing the guilty upon earth, as well as in the infernal regions. They inflicted their vengeance upon earth by wars, pestilence, and dissensions, and by the secret stings of conscience; and in hell they punished the guilty by continual flagellation and torments. They were also called Furie, Erinyes, and Dire; and the appellation of Eumenides, which signifies benevolence and compassion, they received after they had ceased to prosecute Orestes, who in gratitude offered them sacrifices, and erected a temple in honour of their divinity. [But see above.] Their worship was almost universal, and people presumed not to mention their names or fix their eyes upon their temples. They were honoured with sacrifices and libations, and in Achaia they had a temple, which, when entered by any one guilty of crime, suddenly rendered him furious, and deprived him of the use of his reason. In their sacrifices the votaries used branches of cedar and of alder, hawthorn, saffron, and juniper, and the victims were generally turtle doves and sheep, with libations of wine and honey. They were generally represented with a grim and frightful aspect, with a black and bloody garment, and serpents wreathing round their head instead of hair. They held a burning torch in one hand, and a whip of scorpions in the other, and were always attended by terror, rage, paleness, and death. In hell they were seated around Pluto's throne, as the ministers of his vengeance. Æschyl. in Eumen.—Sophocl. in Ædip. Col.

EUMENIDIA, festivals in honour of the Eumenides, called by the Athenians σμεναι, Σται, venerable goddesses. They were celebrated once every year with sacrifices of pregnant ewes, with offerings of cakes made by the most eminent youths, and libations of honey and wine. At Athens none but free-born citizens were admitted, such as had led a life the most virtuous and unsullied. Such Only were accepted by the goddesses who punished all sorts of wickedness in a severe manner.

EUMOLPIDÆ, the priests of Ceres at the celebration of her festivals of Eleusis. All causes relating to impiety or profanation were referred to their judgment; and their decisions, though occasionally severe, were considered as generally impartial. The Eumolpidæ were descended from Eumolpus, a king of Thrace, who was made priest of Ceres by Erechtheus king of Athens. He became so powerful after his appointment to the priesthood, that he maintained a war against Erechtheus. This war proved fatal to both: Erechtheus and Eumolpus were both killed, and peace was re-established among their descendants, on condition that the priesthood should ever remain in the family of Eumolpus, and the regal power in the house of Erechtheus. The priesthood continued in the family of Eumolpus for 1200 years; and this is still more remarkable, because he who was once appointed to the holy office was obliged to remain in perpetual celibacy. Paus. 2, c. 14.

EUMOLPUS, a king of Thrace, son of Neptune and Chione. He was thrown into the sea by his mother, who wished to conceal her shame from her father. Neptune saved his life, and carried him into Ethiopia, where he was brought up by Amphitrite, and afterwards by a woman of the country, one of whose daughters he married. An act of violence to his sister-in-law obliged him to leave Ethiopia, and he fled to Thrace with his son Ismarus, where he married the daughter of Tegyrius, the king of the country. This connection with the royal family rendered him ambitious; he conspired against his father-in-law, and fled, when the conspiracy was discovered, to Attica, where he was initiated in the mysteries of Ceres of Eleusis, and made Hierophantes or high priest. He was afterwards reconciled to Tegyrius, and inherited his kingdom. He made war against Erechtheus, the king of Athens, who had appointed him to the office of high priest, and perished in battle. His descendants were also invested with the priesthood, which remained for about 1200 years in that family. vid. Eumolpidæ. Apollod. 2, c. 5, &c.—Hygin. fab. 73.—Diod. 5.—Paus. 2, c. 14.

EUNAPIUS, [a native of Sardis in Lydia. He flourished in the fourth century, and was a kinsman of the sophist Chrysanthus, at whose request he wrote the lives of the philosophers of his time. The work has been characterised by Brucker as a mass of extravagant tales, discovering a feeble understanding and an imagination prone to superstition. Besides being a sophist, he was an historian, and practised physic. He wrote a history of the Cæsars from Claudius 2d to Arcadius and Honorius, of which only a fragment remains. The lives of the philosophers was published with a Latin version by Junius, Antv. 1563, and by Commelinus in 1596.]

EUPATOR, a son of Antiochus.—The surname of Eupator was given to many of the Asiatic princes, such as Mithridates, &c. Strab. 12.

EUPATORIA, [a town of Pontus, at the confluence of the Lycus and Iris. It was begun by Mithridates under the name Eupatoria, and received from Pompey, who finished it, the title of Magnopolis. Its site appears to correspond with that of the modern Tchenikéh.] — [A town in the north-western part of the Tauric Chersonese, on the Sinus Carcinites. It was founded by one of the generals of Mithridates, and is supposed to answer to the modern Kostof or Gosleve.] Strab. 12.

EUPHEITHES, a prince of Ithaca, father to Antinous. In the former part of his life he had fled before the vengeance of the Thesprotians, whose territories he had laid waste in the pursuit of some pirates. During the absence of Ulysses, he was one of the most importuning lovers of Penelope. Homer. Od. 16.

EUPHÆES, succeeded Androcles on the throne of Messenia, and in his reign the first Messenian war began. He died B. C. 730. Paus. 4, c. 5 and 6.

EUPHORBUS, a famous Trojan, son of Panthous, the first who wounded Patroclus, whom Hector killed. He perished by the hand of Menelaus, who hung his shield in the temple of Juno at Argos. Pythagoras, the founder of the doctrine of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, affirmed that he had been once Euphorbus, and that his soul recollected many exploits which had been done while it animated that Trojan's body. As a further proof of his assertion, he shewed at first sight the shield of Euphorbus in the temple of Juno. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 160.—Paus. 2, c. 17.—Homer. Il. 16 and 17.

EUPHORIION, a Greek poet of Chalcis in Eubœa, in the age of Antiochus the Great. Tiberius took him for his model for correct writing, and was so fond of him that he hung his pictures in all the public libraries. His father's name was Polymnetus. He died in his 56th year, B. C. 220. Cicero de Nat. D. 2, c. 64, calls him Obscurum.

EUPHRATES, [a stoic philosopher who flourished in the 2d century. He was a friend of the philosopher Apollonius Tyaneus, who introduced him to Vespasian. Pliny gives a very high character of him. When he found his strength worn out by disease and old age, he voluntarily put a period to his life, by drinking hemlock, having first, for some unknown reason, obtained permission from the Emperor Adrain.] — [One of the most considerable and best known rivers of Asia. The Euphrates rises near Arze, the modern Arze-Roum. Its source is among mountains, which Strabo makes to be a part of the most northern branch of Taurus. At first it is a very inconsiderable stream, and flows to the west, until encountering the mountains of Cappadocia, it turns to the south, and after flowing a short distance receives its southern arm, a large river coming for the east, and rising in the southern declivity of the range of Mount Ararat. This southern arm of the Euphrates is the Arsanias, according to Mannert, and is the river D'Anville mentions as the Euphrates which the ten thousand crossed in their retreat, (Anab. 4, 5,) and of which mention is made by Pliny in reference to the campaigns of Corbulo. The Euphrates, upon this accession of waters, becoming a very considerable stream, descends rapidly in a bending course, nearly W. S. W. to the vicinity of Samosata. The range of Amanus here preventing its farther progress in this direction, it turns off to the S. E. a course which it next pursues with some little variation, until it reaches Circesium. To the south of this place, it enters the immense plains of Sennar, but being repelled on the Arabian side by some sandy and calcareous heights, it is forced to run again to the S. E. and approach the Tigris. In proportion as these two rivers now approximate to one another, the intermediate land loses its elevation, and is occupied by meadows and morasses. Several artificial communications, perhaps two or three which are natural, form a prelude to the approaching junction of the rivers, which finally takes place near Koma. The river formed by their junction is called Shat-al-Arab, or the river of Arabia. It has three principal mouths, besides a small outlet; these occupy the space of 36 miles. The southernmost is the deepest, and freest in its current. Bars of sand, formed by the river, and which change in their form and situation, render the approach dangerous to the mariner. The tide, which rises above Bassora, and even beyond Coma, meeting with violence the downward course of the stream, raises its waters in the form of frothy billows. Some of the ancients describe the Euphrates as losing itself in the lakes and marshes to the south of Babylon. (Arrian. 7, c. 7.—Mela, 3, c. 8.—Plin. 5, c. 26.) Others consider the river formed by the union of the two as entitled to a continuation of the name of Euphrates. (Strabo 2, p. 132, 15, p. 1060.) According to some the Euphrates originally entered the stream as a separate river, the course of which the Arabs stopped up by a mound. (Plin. 6, c. 27.) This last opinion has been in some measure revived by Niebuhr, who supposes that the canal of Naar-Sares, proceeding from the Euphrates on the north of Babylon, is continued without interruption to the sea. But uncertainty must always prevail with regard to this and other points connected with the Euphrates, both from the inundations of the river, which render this flat and moveable ground continually liable to change, as well as from the works of human labour. The whole length of the Euphrates, including the Shat-al-Arab, is 1147 English miles. Its name is the Greek form of the original appellation Phrath, which signifies fruitful, or fertilising; the Greek particle Eu, which is prefixed, denoting excellence. The oriental name is sometimes also written Perath, as in Genes. 2, c. 24* 15, c. 18, and Joshua 1, c. 4. By the Arabians the river is called Forat. The epithet fertilis is applied to it by Lucan, Sallust, Solinus, and Cicero. The modern name of the Arsanias is Morad-Siai, or, the waters of desire.]

ΕΥΦΡΟΣΥΝΑ, one of the Graces, sister to Aglaia and Thalia. Paus. 9, c. 35.

ΕΥΦΛΕΑ, an island of the Tyrrhene Sea, near Neapolis. Stat. 3, Silv. 1, 149.

ΕΥΠΟΛΙΣ, [an Athenian, who flourished B. C. 440. He was one of the writers of the old comedy, and remarkable for his severity in lashing the vices of the age. His comedies were, however, principally of a political cast, in one of which Alcibiades was so severely attacked that he is said to have hired assassins to throw him into the sea. The plot, however, did not succeed, for Eupolis wrote several comedies after the period assigned to this fact.] Horat. 1, Stat. 4, l. 2, Sat. 10.—Cic. ad Attic. 6, ep. 1.—Ælian.

ΕΥΡΙΑΝΑΣΣΑ, a town near Chios. Plin. 5, c. 31.

ΕΥΡΙΠΙΔΕΣ, a celebrated tragic poet, born at Salamis the day on which the army of Xerxes was defeated by the Greeks. [In memory of this victory, fought in the narrow channel of Euripus, which divides Salamis from the continent, he received the name of Euripides.] He studied eloquence under Prodicus, ethics under Socrates, and philosophy under Anaxagoras. He applied himself to dramatical composition; and his writings became so much the admiration of his countrymen, that the unfortunate Greeks, who had accompanied Nicias in his expedition against Syracuse, were freed from slavery only by repeating some verses from the pieces of Euripides. [This is incorrectly stated. Many of the Athenian captives perished in the quarries, while others were sold as slaves with the figure of a horse branded on their foreheads. A large number of the latter on their return from slavery went to Euripides, and thanked him in the most grateful manner for their obligations to his pen, some having been enfranchised for teaching their masters what they remembered of his poems, and others having procured refreshments when wandering about after the battle, for singing a few of his verses. Nor is this to be wondered at, observes Plutarch, from whose life of Nicias the above particulars are taken; since they relate that when a ship from Canus, which happened to be pursued by pirates, was about to take shelter in a Sicilian port, the inhabitants at first refused to admit her; but upon asking the crew, whether they knew any of the verses of Euripides, and being answered in the affirmative, they received both them and their vessel.] The talents of Sophocles were looked upon by Euripides with jealousy, and the great enmity which always reigned between the two poets, gave an opportunity to the comic muse of Aristophanes to ridicule them both on the stage with success and humour. [This is incorrect. Sophocles is decidedly a high favourite with Aristophanes. The ire of the comic poet seems to have been directed solely against Euripides, principally because the compositions of the latter savoured so strongly of the schools of philosophy. Diogenes Laertius even asserts that Euripides was aided in the composition of his tragedies by Socrates himself. Thus much, however, is certain, that the intercourse which was kept up by the poet with the philosophers of the day, and in particular with Socrates, must have had some influence upon the style and spirit of his tragic compositions. Indeed the familiar character of the Socratic school is frequently observable in his writings. Valckenær has enlarged upon this topic in his Diatribæ. Many too of the pieces that have reached us shew clearly the attachment of the poet to philosophising even in verse. In one of his tragedies, Melanippe, fragments of which still exist, Euripides discussed at large the dogmas of Anaxagoras. The grave and earnest spirit which pervades his compositions has been ascribed by some to the circumstance mentioned by Philochorus, of his having composed his tragedies in a gloomy cavern at Salamis. Gellius quotes this story from Philochorus, and adds that he himself had seen the cavern; but the whole is very probably a mere legend.] During the representation of one of the tragedies of Euripides, the audience, displeased with some lines in the composition, desired the writer to strike them off. Euripides heard the reproof with indignation; he advanced forward on the stage, and told the spectators that he came there to instruct them and not to receive instruction. Another piece, in which he called riches the summum bonum, and the admiration of gods and men, gave equal dissatisfaction; but the poet desired the audience to listen with silent attention, for the conclusion of the whole would show them the punishment which attended the lovers of opulence. The ridicule and envy to which he was continually exposed, obliged him at last to remove from Athens. He retired to the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, where he received the most conspicuous marks of royal munificence and friendship. His end was as deplorable as it was uncommon. It is said that the dogs of Archelaus met him in his solitary walks, and tore his body to pieces 407 years before the Christian era, in the 78th year of his age. Euripides wrote 75 tragedies, [more correctly, 120,] of which only 19 are extant, [more correctly, 18 tragedies, and one Satyric Drama, entitled the Cyclops.] The most approved are his Phœnissæ, Orestes, Medea, Adromache, Electra, Hippolytus, Iphigenia in Aulis, Iphigenia in Tauris, Hercules, and the Troades. [He does not appear, however, to have been very successful in his exhibitions on the stage, for no more than five of his compositions gained the prize. In private, however, they were read with avidity and greatly applauded.] He is peculiarly happy in expressing the passions of love, especially the more tender and animated. To pathos he has added sublimity, and the most common expressions have received a perfect polish from his pen. In his person, as it is reported, he was noble and majestic, and his deportment was always grave and serious. He was slow in composing, and laboured with difficulty; from which circumstance a foolish and malevolent poet once observed, that he had written 100 verses in three days, while Euripides had written only three. True, says Euripides, but there is this difference between your poetry and mine; yours will expire in three days, but mine shall live for ages to come. Euripides was such an enemy to the far sex, that some have called him μυσογυνος, woman hater, and perhaps from this aversion arise the impure and diabolical machinations which appear in his female characters; an observation, however, which he refuted by saying he had faithfully copied nature. In spite of all his antipathy he was married twice, but his connections were so injudicious, that he was compelled to divorce both his wives. [The best edition of Euripides is that recently published at Glasgow, in 9 vols. 8vo. containing select annotations from all preceding editors.] Diod. 13.—Val. Max. 3, c. 7.—*Cic. EURIPUS, [a narrow strait, dividing Eubœa from the main land of Greece. The currents were so strong in the place, that the sea was said by some of the ancient writers to ebb and flow seven times a day; and Aristotle, as the story goes, drowned himself here out of chagrin for not being able to account for so unusual a motion. From this rapid movement of its waters is derived its ancient name, (eu, bene, εὖ ῥιπτα, jacio.) Livy's account of this strait appears the most rational. "A more dangerous station for a fleet, observes this writer, can hardly be found; besides that, the winds rush down suddenly and with great fury from the high mountains on each side, the strait itself of the Euripus does not ebb and flow seven times a day at started hours, as report says; but the current changing irregularly, like the wind, from one point to another, is hurried along like a torrent tumbling from a steep mountain; so that, night or day, ships can never lie quiet." (Liv. 23, 6.) The strait is now called, by a corruption of the ancient name, the gulf of Negropont. [viz. Chalcis.] Liv. 23, c. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 2, c. 95.—Strab. 9.

EURŌPA, [one of the three main divisions of the ancient world. With the northern parts of this the ancients were very slightly acquainted, viz. what are now Prussia, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, and Russia. They applied to this part the general name of Scandinavia, and thought it consisted of a number of islands. From the Portuguese cape, denominated by mariners the rock of Lisbon, to the Uralian mountains, the length of modern Europe may be reckoned at about 3,300 British miles, and from cape Nord, in Danish Lapland, to cape Matapan, the southern extremity of the Morea, it may be about 2,350.] It is bounded on the east by the Ægean Sea, Hellespont, Euxine, Palus Mæotis, and the Tanais in a northern direction. The Mediterranean divides it from Africa on the south, and on the west and north it is washed by the Atlantic and Northern Oceans. It is supposed to receive its name from Europa, who was carried there by Jupiter. [Bochart believes that this part of the world was so called from the whiteness of its inhabitants. M. Gebelin, however, derives the name from the word Wrab, signifying Occidental, and expressing its situation with regard to Asia.] Mela, 2, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 1, &c.—Lucan. 3, v. 275.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 222.—A daughter of Agenor, king of Phœnicia and Telephassa. She was so beautiful that Jupiter became enamoured of her, and the better to seduce her he assumed the shape of a bull, and mingled with the herds of Agenor, while Europa, with her female attendants, were gathering flowers in the meadows. Europa caressed the beautiful animal, and at last had the courage to sit upon his back. The god took advantage of her situation, and with precipitate steps retired towards the shore, and crossed the sea with Europa on his back, and arrived safe in Crete. Here he assumed his original shape, and declared his love. The nymph consented, though she had once made vows of perpetual celibacy, and she became the mother of Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus. After this distinguished amour with Jupiter, she married Asterius king of Crete. This monarch, seeing himself without children by Europa, adopted the fruit of her amours with Jupiter, and always esteemed Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus as his own children. Some suppose that Europa lived about 1552 years before the Christian era. [Some have explained the story of Europa, by alleging that a captain of Crete, named Taurus, carried off that princess after he had taken the city of Tyre from Agenor; but others, with greater probability, assert that some merchants of Crete having arrived upon the coast of Phœnicia, and seen the young Europa, were so much struck with her beauty, that they carried her off for their king; and as their ship bore as an image a white bull, and this king of Crete had assumed the name of Jupiter, it was hence fabled that the god had transformed himself into a bull in order to carry off the princess. The Cretans are said to have worshipped her after death as a divinity.] Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 13.—Mosch. Idyl.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 1.—A part of Thrace, near mount Hæmus. Justin. 7, c. 1.

EURŌTAS, [a river of Laconia, and the largest in the Peloponnesus. It rises in Arcadia, a little to the S. W. of Tegea, and after running a short distance disappears under ground. On the opposite side of the mountains which separate Arcadia from Laconia, it re-appears in the latter country, and becomes a very considerable stream. Eurotas, the third king after Lelex, enlarged and regulated its bed, drew a canal from it, drained the neighbouring country, and, from feelings of gratitude on the part of his subjects, had his name given to the stream. Its banks were thickly settled, principally, however, with small towns and villages. On it also stood Sparta, the capital. It was famed for its swans, and along its banks the Spartans were fond of engaging in gymnastic exercises. The modern name is Basilipotamo, pronounced Vasilipotemo, and signifying, the royal river, in allusion to certain petty princes, dependant upon the Eastern emperors, who possessed a small kingdom in this quarter during the middle ages.] Strab. 8.—Paus. 3, c. 1.—Liv. 35, c. 29.—*Virg. EURUS, a wind blowing from the [east-south-east] parts of the world. The Latins called it Vulturinus. Ovid. Trist. 1, el. 2. Mel. 11, &c.

EURYALUS, a Trojan who came with Æneas into Italy, and rendered himself famous for his immortal friendship with Nisus. vid. Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 179.—A pleasant place of Sicily, near Syracuse. Liv. 25, c. 25.

EURIBYADES, a Spartan general of the Grecian fleet at the battles of Artemisium and Salamis against Xerxes. He has been charged with want of courage and with ambition. He offered to strike Themistocles when he wished to speak about the manner of attacking the Persians, upon which the Athenian said, strike, but hear me, [Παραγορευ, ακουσον δε.] Herodot. 8, c. 2, 7, &c.—Plut. in Them.—*C. EURYCLĒA, a beautiful daughter of Ops of Ithaca. Laertes bought her for 20 oxen, and gave her his son Ulysses to nurse, and treated her with much tenderness and attention. Homer. Od. 19.

EURYCLEA, an orator of Syracuse, who proposed to put Nicias and Demosthenes to death, and to confine to hard labour all the Athenian soldiers in the quarries. Plut.

EURYDĀMAS, a wrestler of Cyrene, who, in a combat, had his teeth dashed to pieces by his antagonist, which he swallowed without showing any signs of pain, or discontinuing the fight. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 19.

EURYDICE, the wife of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. She had by her husband, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, and one daughter called Euryone. A criminal partiality for her daughter's husband, to whom she offered her hand and the kingdom, made her conspire against Amyntas, who must have fallen a victim to her infidelity had not Euryone discovered it. Amyntas forgave her. Alexander ascended the throne after his father's death, and perished by the ambition of his mother. Perdiccas, who succeeded him, shared his fate; but Philip, who was the next in succession, secured himself against all attempts from his mother, and ascended the throne with peace and universal satisfaction. Eurydice fled to Iphicrates the Athenian general for protection. The manner of her death is unknown. C. Nep. in Iphicr. 3.—A daughter of Amyntas, who married her uncle Aridæus, the illegitimate son of Philip. After the death of Alexander the Great, Aridæus ascended the throne of Macedonia, but he was totally governed by the intrigues of his wife, who called back Cassander, and joined her forces with his to march against Polysperchon and Olympias. Eurydice was forsaken by her troops, Aridæus was pierced through with arrows by order of Olympias, who commanded Eurydice to destroy herself either by poison, the sword, or the halberd. She chose the latter. —The wife of the poet Orpheus. As she fled before Aristæus, who wished to offer her violence, she was bit by a serpent in the grass, and died of the wound. Orpheus was so disconsolate that he ventured to go to hell, where, by the melody of his lyre, he obtained from Pluto the restoration of his wife to life, provided he did not look behind before he came upon earth. He violated the conditions, as his eagerness to see his wife rendered him forgetful. He looked behind, and Eurydice was forever taken from him. [The best accounts make Orpheus to have gone to a place in Thesprotia, called Aornos, where an ancient oracle delivered responses by calling up the dead, and where he was again blessed with a sight of his beloved Eurydice. [EURYPHON, a Cnidian physician, a contemporary of Hippocrates, but probably older in years, since he is deemed the author of the Cnidian aphorisms which are quoted by Hippocrates. These two physicians are said by Soranus to have met in consultation in the presence of king Perdiccas.]

EURYPON, a king of Sparta, son of Sous. His reign was so glorious that his descendants were called Eurypontide. Paus. 3, c. 7.

EURYSTHÉNES, a son of Aristodemus, who lived in perpetual dissension with his twin brother Procles, while they both sat on the Spartan throne. It was unknown which of the two was born first, the mother, who wished to see both her sons raised on the throne, refused to declare it, and they were both appointed kings of Sparta by order of the oracle of Delphi, B. C. 1102. After the death of the two brothers, the Lacedæmonians, who knew not to what family the right of seniority and succession belonged, permitted two kings to sit on the throne, one of each family. The descendants of Eurysthenes were called Eurysthenide; and those of Procles, Procli-

dæ. It was inconsistent with the laws of Sparta for two kings of the same family to ascend the throne together, yet that law was sometimes violated by oppression and tyranny. Eurysthenes had a son, called Agis, who succeeded him. His descendants were called Agide. There sat on the throne of Sparta 31 kings of the family of Eurysthenes, and only 24 of the Proclidæ. The former were the more illustrious. Herodot. 4, c. 147, l. 6, c. 52.—Paus. 3, c. 1.—C. Nep. in Ages.

EURYSTHENIDÆ. vid. Eurysthenes.

EURYSTHEUS, a king of Argos and Mycænæ, son of Sthenelus and Nicippe the daughter of Pelops. Juno hastened his birth by two months, that he might come into the world before Hercules the son of Alcmena, as the younger of the two was doomed by order of Jupiter to be subservient to the will of the other. [vid. Alcmena.] This natural right was cruelly exercised by Eurystheus, who was jealous of the fame of Hercules, and who, to destroy so powerful a relation, imposed upon him the most dangerous and uncommon enterprises, well known by the name of the twelve labours of Hercules. The success of Hercules in achieving those perilous labours alarmed Eurystheus in a greater degree, and he furnished himself with a brazen vessel, where he might secure himself a safe retreat in case of danger. [Apollodorus says that it was an urn of brass, which he constructed secretly under ground. It appears in fact to have been a subterraneous chamber, covered within with plates of brass. The remains of the treasury of Atreus at Mycænæ indicate a building of a similar description, the nails which probably served to fasten plates of this metal to the walls still appearing. These nails consist of 88 parts of copper and 12 of tin. A similar explanation may be given to the brazen temple of Minerva at Sparta. vid. Chalcicæus. Gell's Itinerary, p. 33.] After the death of Hercules, Eurystheus renewed his cruelties against his children, and made war against Ceyx king of Trachinæ because he had given them support, and treated them with hospitality. He was killed in the prosecution of this war by Hyllus the son of Hercules. His head was sent to Alcmena, the mother of Hercules, who, mindful of the cruelties which her son had suffered, insulted it and tore out the eyes with the most inveterate fury. Eurystheus was succeeded on the throne of Argos by Atreus his nephew. Hygin. fab. 30 and 32.—Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 33, l. 3, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 292.

EURÏTHÏON and EURYTION, a centaur whose insolence to Hippodamia was the cause of a quarrel between the Lapithæ and Centaurs, at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12.—Paus. 5, c. 10.—Hesiod. Theog.

EURYTIS, (idos), a patronymic of Iole, daughter of Eurytus. Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 11.

EURÏRUS, a king of Eechalia, father to Iole. He offered his daughter to him who shot a bow better than himself. Hercules conquered him, and put him to death because he refused him his daughter as the prize of his victory. Apollod. 2, c. 4 and 7.

EUSEBIA, an empress, wife to Constantius, &c. She died A. D. 360, highly and deservedly lamented.

EUSEBIUS, [surnamed Pamphylus, was born at Cæsarea in Palestine, of which he was afterwards bishop. After having been ordained presbyter, he set up a school in his native city, and formed an intimate acquaintance with Pamphylus, a learned presbyter, who is supposed to have afforded him much aid in his studies. After the martyrdom of his friend, he removed to Tyre and thence to Egypt, where he himself was imprisoned. On his return from Egypt he succeeded Agapius in the see of Cæsarea. At the famous council of Nice in 325, he was placed by command of Constantine on the right hand of the throne, and opened the meeting with a penegyrical address.] He was concerned in the theological disputes of Arius and Athanasius, and distinguished himself by his writings, which consisted of an ecclesiastical history, the life of Constantine, Chronicon, [of which only a Latin version by Jerome has been preserved,] Evangelical preparations, and other numerous treatises, most of which are now lost. The best edition of his Præparatio et Demonstratio Evangelica, is by Vigerus, 2 vols. folio; Rothomagi, 1628; and of his ecclesiastical history by Reading, folio, Cantab. 1720.

EUSTATHIUS, [archbishop of Thessalonica, flourished in the 12th century under the emperors Manuel, Alexius, and Andronicus Comnenus. He is celebrated for his great learning as a grammarian and critic, and is especially known as a commentator on Homer, and Dionysius the geographer. His annotations on the former are copious, and abound with historical and philological descriptions. [He is largely indebted, however, to the Deipnosophists of Athenæus.] The best edition of this very valuable author, is that published at Basil, 3 vols. folio, 1560. It is to be lamented the design of Alexander Politus, begun at Florence in 1735, and published in the first five books of the Iliad, is not executed, as a Latin translation of these excellent commentaries is among the desiderata of the present day. [The commentaries on Dionysius were first printed by Robert Stephens in 1547. They are usually appended to the work of the geographer.]—A man who wrote a foolish romance in Greek, entitled de Ismerie et Ismenes amoribus, edited by Gaulmious, 8vo. Paris, 1617.

EUTERPE, one of the Muses, daughter to Jupiter and Mnemosyne. [The name is derived from eu, bene, and τρα, delecto.] She presided over music, and was looked upon as the inventress of the flute and of all wind-instruments. She is represented as crowned with flowers, and holding a flute in her hands. Some mythologists attributed to her the invention of tragedy, more commonly supposed to be the production of Melpomene. vid. Musa.

ESTHYCRATES, a sculptor of Sicyon, son of Lysippus. He was peculiarly happy in the proportions of his statues. Those of Hercules and Alexander were in general esteem, and particularly that of Medea, which was carried on a chariot by four horses. Plin. 34, c. 8.

EUTROPIUS, [a Latin historian of the 4th century. He bore arms under Julian in his expedition against the Parthians, and is thought to have risen to senatorian rank. He wrote several works, of which the only one remaining is an abridgment of the Roman History in ten books, from the founding of the city to the reign of the emperor Valerian. The best edition is that of Tzschuchke, Lips. 1797, 8vo.]—[An eunuch and minister of the emperor Arcadius, who rose by base and infamous practices from the vilest condition to the highest pitch of opulence and power. He was probably a native of Asia, was made chamberlain to the emperor in the year 395, and after the fall of Rufinus, succeeded that minister in the confidence of his master, and rose to unlimited authority. He even was created consul, a disgrace to Rome never before equalled. An insult offered to the empress was the cause of his overthrow; and he was sent into perpetual exile to Cyprus. He was soon afterwards, however, brought back on another charge; and after being condemned, was beheaded A. D. 399.]

EUXINUS PONTUS, [or Black Sea, an inland sea, situate partly in Europe and partly in Asia, and lying to the north of Asia Minor. It was originally denominated Αἴθριος, or inhospitable, on account of the barbarity of the inhabitants of its coasts; but when they became civilized by their intercourse with the Greeks, who traded thither, and Grecian colonies were planted among them, it changed its name to Εὐξείνιος, or hospitable. The remaining part of the name, viz. Pontus, (Πόντος), i. e. the sea, was given to it by the earlier Greeks, when, in the infancy of their geographical knowledge, it was deemed by them the largest sea with which they were acquainted, and was supposed to communicate with the Eastern Ocean. This appellation was retained, even in a more enlightened age, by their descendants, although they had become well aware of its incorrectness. The modern name of this sea is derived by some from its black rocks, by others from its dangerous navigation, while a third class deduce it from the dark thick fogs with which its surface is frequently covered. The Euxine is 932 miles from east to west, and on an average, 320 broad, containing about 300,000 square miles. The chief rivers that fall into it, are the Ister, the Tyras, and the Borysthenes. Some geographers make the Palus Mæotis a part of the Euxine; more commonly, however, it is considered as a distinct sea. *vid. EXAGÓNUS, the ambassador of a nation in Cyprus who came to Rome, and talked so much of the power of herbs, serpents, &c. that the consuls ordered him to be thrown into a vessel full of serpents. These venomous creatures, so far from hurting him, caressed him, and harmlessly licked him with their tongues. Plin. 28, c. 3.

[EXAMPÆUS, a fountain, which, according to Herodotus, flows into the Hypanis, where this river is four days' journey from the sea, and renders its waters bitter, which before were sweet. Herodotus places this fountain in the country of the ploughing Scythians, and of the Alazones. It takes, he adds, the name of the place where it springs, which, in the Scythian tongue, is Exampæus, corresponding in Greek, to ἱεραὶ ὁδοί, or, the sacred ways. Herod. 4, c. 52.]

FABARIA, festivals at Rome [on the Calends of June,] in honour of Carna, wife of Janus, when beans (fabe), [being then first ripe,] were presented as an oblation.

FĀBĪA LEX, de ambitu, was to circumscribe the number of Sectatores, or attendants which were allowed to candidates in canvassing for some high office. It was proposed, but did not pass. [The Sectatores, who always attended candidates, were distinguished from the Salutatores, who only waited on them at their houses in the morning, and then went away; and from the Deductores, who went down with them to the Forum, and Campus Martius.]—[There was another law of the same name, enacted against kidnapping, or stealing away and retaining freemen or slaves. The punishment of this offence, at first, was a fine, but afterwards, to be sent to the mines; and for buying or selling a free-born citizen, death.]

FABII, a noble and powerful family at Rome, who derived their name from faba, a bean, because some of their ancestors cultivated this pulse. [Others make the name to have been originally Fodii, on account of their catching wild beasts by means of "pits," a pit in Latin being fovea, from fodere, to dig. Festus writes the name Fovii, and explains the allusion to fovea differently.] They were said to be descended from Fabius, a supposed son of Hercules by an Italian nymph; and they were once so numerous that they took upon themselves to wage war with the Veientes. They came to a general engagement near the Cremera, in which all the family, consisting of 306 men, were totally slain, B. C. 477. There only remained one, whose tender age detained him at Rome, and from him arose the noble Fabii in the following ages. The family was divided into six different branches, the Ambusti, the Maximi, the Vibulani, the Buteones, the Dorsores, and the Pictores; the three first of which are frequently mentioned in Roman history, but the others seldom. Dionys. 9, c. 5.—Liv. 2, c. 46, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 2.—*Ovid. FABIVS, Maximus Rullianus, was the first of the Fabii who obtained the surname of

Maximus, for lessening the power of the populace at elections. He was master of horse, and his victories over the Samnites in that capacity nearly cost him his life, because he engaged the enemy without the command of the dictator. He was five times consul, twice dictator, and once censor. He triumphed over seven different nations in the neighbourhood of Rome, and rendered himself illustrious by his patriotism.—Rusticus, an historian in the age of Claudius and Nero. He was intimate with Seneca, and the encomiums which Tacitus passes upon his style, makes us regret the loss of his compositions.—Marcellinus, an historian in the second century.—Q. Maximus, a celebrated Roman, first surnamed Verrucosus, from a wart on his lip, and Agnicula, from his inoffensive manners. From a dull and unpromising childhood he burst into deeds of valour and heroism, and was gradually raised by merit to the highest offices of the state. In his first consulship, he obtained a victory over Liguria, and the fatal battle of Thrasymenus, occasioned his election to the dictatorship. In this important office he began to oppose Annibal, not by fighting him in the open field like his predecessors, but he continually harassed his army by counter-marches and ambuscades, for which he received the surname of Cunctator or debaier. Such operations for the commander of the Roman armies gave offence to some, and Fabius was even accused of cowardice. He, however, still pursued the same measures which prudence and reflection seemed to dictate as most salutary to Rome, and he patiently bore to see his master of horse raised to share the dictatorial dignity with himself, by means of his enemies at home. When he had laid down his office of dictator, his successors for a while followed his plan; but the rashness of Varro, and his contempt for the operations of Fabius, occasioned the fatal battle of Cannæ. Tarentum was obliged to surrender to his arms after the battle of Cannæ, and on that occasion the Carthaginian enemy observed that Fabius was the Annibal of Rome. When he had made an agreement with Annibal for the ransom of the captives, which was totally disapproved by the Roman senate, he sold all his estates to pay the money, rather than forfeit his word to the enemy. The bold proposal of young Scipio to go and carry the war from Italy to Africa, was rejected by Fabius as chimerical and dangerous. [The opposition of Fabius seems to have arisen from another cause, and to have been the result of envious feelings. Plutarch confesses this.] He did not, however, live to see the success of the Roman arms under Scipio, and the conquest of Carthage by measures which he treated with contempt and heard with indignation. He died in the 100th year of his age, after he had been five times consul, and twice honoured with a triumph. The Romans were so sensible of his great merit and services, that the expenses of his funeral were defrayed from the public treasury. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Liv.—Polyb.—His son bore the same name, and showed himself worthy of his noble father's virtues. During his consulship he received a visit from his father on horseback in the camp: the son ordered the father to dismount, and the old man cheerfully obeyed, embracing his son and saying, I wished to know whether you knew what it was to be consul. He died before his father, and the Cunctator, with the moderation of a philosopher, delivered a funeral oration over the dead body of his son. Plut. in Fabio.—Pictor, the first Roman who wrote an historical account of his country. [This historian, called by Livy Scriptorum antiquissimus, appears to have been wretchedly qualified for the labour he had undertaken either in point of judgment, fidelity, or research; and to his carelessness and inaccuracy, more than even to the loss of monuments, may be attributed the painful uncertainty which to this day hangs over the early ages of Roman history. Fabius lived in the time of the second Punic war. The family received its cognome from Caius Fabius, who, having resided in Etruria, and there acquired some knowledge of the fine arts, painted with figures the temple of Salus, in the year of the city 450. The historian was grandson of the painter. He served in the second Punic war, and was present at the battle of Thrasymene. After the defeat at Cannæ he was sent by the senate to enquire from the oracle of Delphi, what would be the issue of the war, and to learn by what supplications the wrath of the gods might be appeased. His annals commenced with the foundation of the city and the antiquities of Italy, and brought down the series of Roman affairs to the author's own time, that is, to the end of the second Punic war. We are informed by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, that for the great proportion of the events which preceded his own age, Fabius Pictor had no better authority than vulgar tradition. He probably found that if he had confined himself to what was certain in these early times, his history would have become dry, insipid, and incomplete. This may have induced him to adopt the fables which the Greek historians had invented concerning the origin of Rome, and to insert whatever he found in family traditions, however contradictory or uncertain. Dionysius has also given us many examples of his improbable narratives, his inconsistencies, his negligence in investigating the truth of what he relates as facts, and his inaccuracy in chronology. In particular, as we are told by Plutarch in his life of Romulus, Fabius followed an obscure Greek author, Diocles the Peparethian, in his account of the foundation of Rome, and from this tainted source have flowed all the stories concerning Mars, the Vestal, the Wolf, Romulus, and Remus. He is even guilty of inaccurate and prejudiced statements in relation to the affairs of his own time; and Polybius, who flourished shortly after those times, and was at pains to inform himself accurately concerning all the events of the second Punic war, apologises for quoting Fabius on one occasion, as an authority, and at the same time strongly expresses his opinion of his violations of truth and gross inconsistencies. The account here given of this writer is rather confirmed by the few fragments that remain of his work, which are trifling and childish in the extreme. *Dion. FABRICIUS, a Latin writer in the reign of Nero, who employed his pen in satirizing and defaming the senators. His works were burnt by order of Nero.—Caius Luscinius, a celebrated Roman, who, in his first consulship obtained several victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and was honoured with a triumph. The riches which were acquired in those battles were immense; the soldiers were liberally rewarded by the consul, and the treasury was enriched with 400 talents. Two years after, Fabricius went as ambassador to Pyrrhus, and refused with contempt the presents and heard with indignation the offers which might have corrupted the fidelity of a less virtuous citizen. Pyrrhus had occasion to admire the magnanimity of Fabricius; but his astonishment was more powerfully awakened when he opposed him in the field of battle, and when he saw him make a discovery of the perfidious offer of his physician, who pledged himself to the Roman general for a sum of money to poison his royal master. To this greatness of soul were added the most consummate knowledge of military affairs, and the greatest simplicity of manners. Fabricius never used rich plate at his table: a small salt-cellar, whose feet were of horn, was the only silver vessel which appeared in his house. This contempt of luxury and useless ornaments Fabricius wished to inspire among the people; and during his censorship he banished from the senate Cornelius Rufinus, who had been twice consul and dictator, because he kept in his house more than ten pounds weight of silver plate. Such were the manners of the conqueror of Pyrrhus, who observed, that he wished rather to command those that had money than possess it himself. He lived and died in the greatest poverty. His body was buried at the public charge, and the Roman people were obliged to give a dowry to his two daughters when they had arrived to marriageable years. *Val. FALERNUS, [a part of Italy famed for its wine. Few portions of the Italian peninsula were unfriendly to the vine, but it flourished most in that tract of the S. W. coast to which, from its extraordinary fertility and delightful climate, the name of Campania Felix was given. Some doubt concerning the extent of the appellation seems to exist, but Pliny and Strabo confine it to the level country reaching from Sinuessa to the promontory of Sorrento, and including the Campi Laborini, from whence the present name of Terra di Lavoro has arisen. In ancient times, indeed, the hills by which the surface is diversified seem to have been one continued vineyard. Falernus is spoken of by Florus as a mountain, and Martial describes it under the same title; but Pliny, Polybius, and others denominate it a field or territory, (ager;) and, as the best growths were styled indiscriminately Massicum, and Falernum, (vinum), it is thought that Massicus was the proper appellation of the hills which arose from the Falernian plain. The truth seems to be that the choicest wines were produced on the southern declivities of the range of hills which commence in the neighbourhood of ancient Sinuessa, and extend to a considerable distance inland, and which may have taken their general name from the town or district of Falernus: but the most conspicuous or the best exposed among them may have been the Massic, and, as in process of time several inferior growths were confounded under the common denomination of Falernian, correct writers would choose that epithet which most accurately denoted the finest vintage. If we are to judge, however, by the analogy of modern names, the question of locality will be quickly decided, as the mountain which is generally allowed to point to the site of ancient Sinuessa is still known by the name of Monte Massico. Pliny's account of the wines of Campania is the most circumstantial, (Plin. N. H. 14, 6,) "Augustus and most of the leading men of his time," observes this writer, "gave the preference to the Setine wine that was grown in the vineyards above Forum Appii, as being of all kinds the least calculated to injure the stomach. Formerly the Cæcuban wine, which came from the poplar marshes of Amyclæ, were most esteemed, but it has lost its repute through the negligence of the growers, and partly from the limited extent of the vineyards which have been nearly destroyed by the navigable canal begun by Nero from Avernus to Ostia. The second rank used to be assigned to the growths of the Falernian territory, and among them chiefly to the Faustianum. The territory of Falernus begins from the Campanian bridge, on the left hand, as you go to Urbana. The Faustian vineyards are situate about 4 miles from the village, in the vicinity of Cedjæ, which village is six miles from Sinuessa. The wines produced on this soil owe their celebrity to the great care and attention bestowed on their manufacture; but latterly they have somewhat degenerated, owing to the rapacity of the farmers, who are usually more intent upon the quantity than the quality of their vintage. They continue, however, in the greatest esteem, and are perhaps the strongest of all wines, as they burn when approached by a flame. There are three kinds, the dry, the light, and sweet Falernian. The grapes of which the wine is made are unpleasant to the taste." From this and other accounts it appears that the Falernian wine was strong and durable: so rough in its recent state as not to be drunk with pleasure, and requiring to be kept many years before it grew mellow. Horace calls it a fiery wine; Persius, indomitum, i. e. possessing very heady qualities. According to Galen, the best was that from 10 to 20 years; after this period it became bitter. Among the wines of the present day, Xeres and Madeira most closely approximate to the Falernian of old, though the difference is still very considerable, since the ancient wines of Italy and Greece were usually mixed with certain quantities of pitch, aromatic herbs, sea-water, &c. which must have communicated to them a taste that we at least would consider very unpalatable. Among the ancient, and especially the Greek wines, it was no uncommon thing for an age of more than 20 years to leave nothing in the vessel but a thick and bitter mixture, arising no doubt from the substances with which the wine had been medicated.

We have an exception, however, to this in the wine made in Italy during the consulship of Opimius, A. U. 633, which was to be met with in the time of Pliny, nearly 200 years after. This may have been owing to the peculiar qualities of that vintage, since we are informed that in consequence of the great warmth of the summer in that year, all the productions of the earth attained an extraordinary degree of perfection. *vid. FALISCI, a people of Etruria. When they were besieged by Camillus, a schoolmaster went out of the gates of the city with his pupils, and betrayed them into the hands of the Roman enemy, that by such a possession he might easily oblige the place to surrender. Camillus heard the proposal with indignation, and ordered the man to be stripped naked and whipped back to the town by those whom his perfidy wished to betray. This instance of generosity operated upon the people so powerfully that they surrendered to the Romans. Plut. in Camil.

It limited the expenses of one day, at festivals, to 100 asses, whence the law is called by Lucilius, Centussis; on ten other days every month, to 50, and on all other days to 10 asses: also that no other fowl should be served up, except one hen, and that not fattened for the purpose.]

FARFARUS, [now the Farfa, a river in the country of the Sabines, falling into the Tiber above Capena. It is called also the Farbaris.] Ovid. Met. 14, v. 330.

FAUNA, a deity among the Romans, daughter of Picus, and originally called Marica. Her marriage with Faunus procured her the name of Fauna, and her knowledge of futurity that of Fatua and Fatidica. It is said that she never saw a man after her marriage with Faunus, and that her uncommon chastity occasioned her being ranked among the gods after death. She is the same, according to some, as Bona Mater. Some mythologists accuse her of drunkenness, and say that she expired under the blows of her husband, for an immoderate use of wine. *Virg. FAUNALIA, festivals at Rome in honour of Faunus.

FAUNI, certain deities of the country, represented as having the legs, feet, and ears of goats, and the rest of the body human. They were called satyrs by the Greeks. The peasants offered them a lamb or a kid with great solemnity. [The Fauni presided over the fields, the Satyrs inhabited woody plains, the Sylvani woods on the mountains.] Virg. G. 1, v. 10.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 392.

FAUNUS, a son of Picus, who is said to have reigned in Italy about 1300 years B. C. His bravery as well as wisdom have given rise to the tradition that he was son of Mars. He raised a temple in honour of the god Pan, called by the Latins Lupercus, at the foot of the Palatine hill, and he exercised hospitality towards strangers with a liberal hand. His great popularity, and his fondness for agriculture, made his subjects revere him as one of their country deities after death. He was represented with all the equipage of the satyrs, and was consulted to give oracles. Dionys. 1, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47, l. 8, v. 314, l. 10, v. 55.—Horat. 1, od. 17.

FAVORINUS, [a celebrated Platonic philosopher who flourished under the reigns of Trajan and Adrian. He was born at Arelate in Gaul, and studied under Dio Chrysostom. He was himself profoundly skilled in philosophy, and wrote numerous works on the subject. He taught with much reputation at Rome and at Athens.]

FAUSTA, a daughter of Sylla, &c. Horat. 1, Sat. 2, v. 64.—The wife of the emperor Constantine, disgraced for her cruelties and vices.

FAUSTINA, the wife of the emperor Antoninus, famous for her debaucheries. Her daughter, of the same name, blessed with beauty, liveliness, and wit, became the most abandoned of her sex. She married M. Aurelius.

[FEBRUALIA, a feast at Rome of purification and atonement, in the month of February: it continued for 12 days. The month of February, which, together with January, was added by Numa to the 10 months constituting the year of Romulus, derived its name from this general expiatory festival, the people being then purified (februati) from the sins of the whole year.]

FECEALES, a number of priests at Rome, employed in declaring war and making peace. When the Romans thought themselves injured, one of the sacerdotal body was empowered to demand redress, and after the allowance of 33 days to consider the matter, war was declared if submissions were not made, and the Fecialis hurled a bloody spear into the territories of the enemy in proof of intended hostilities. [Afterwards, when the empire was enlarged, and wars were carried on with distant nations, this ceremony was performed in a certain field near the city, which was called Ager hostilis. Thus, Augustus declared war, professedly against Cleopatra, but in reality against Antony. So also Marcus Antoninus, before he set out to war against the Scythians, shot a bloody spear from the temple of Bellona into the ager hostilis.]

FELIX, M. ANTONIUS, a freed man of Claudius Cæsar, made governor of Judæa, Samaria, and Palestine. He is called by Suetonius the husband of three queens, as he married the two Drusillæ, one grand daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, and the other a Jewish princess, sister of Agrippa. The name of his third wife is unknown. Suet. in Cl. 18.—Tucul. Ann. 12, c. 14.

FELTRIA, a town of Italy at the north of Venice, [now Feltri. It was the capital of the small Rhetian community called Feltrini.]

FERALIA, [a festival at Rome to the Dii Manes, on the 21st of February, but, according to Ovid, on the 17th. Festus derives the word from fero, on account of a repast carried to these pulchres of relations and friends on that occasion, or from ferro, on account of the victims sacrificed. Vossius observes that the Romans termed death fera, cruel, and that the word feralia might arise thence.] It continued for 11 days, during which time presents were carried to the graves of the deceased, marriages were forbidden, and the temples of the gods were shut. [Friends and relations also kept after the celebration a feast of peace and love, for settling differences and quarrels among one another, if any such existed.] It was universally believed that the manes of their departed friends came and hovered over their graves, and feasted upon the provisions that the hand of piety and affection had procured for them. Their punishment in the infernal regions was also suspended, and during that time they enjoyed rest and liberty.

FERENTINUM, a town of the Hernici, south-east of Anagina.] Sil. 8, v. 394.—Liv. 1, c. 50, l. 9, c. 43 and 44.

FERENTUM, or FORENTUM, a town of Apulia, [south-east of Venusia,] now Forenza. Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 15.—Liv. 9, c. 16 and 20.

FERETRIUS, [an appellation of Jupiter among the Romans, who was so called from the feretrum, a frame supporting the spolia opima, dedicated to Jupiter by Romulus after the defeat of the Cænienses and death of their king. This derivation, however, is opposed by some, who think it better to derive the term from the Latin ferire, to smite. This is the opinion of Plutarch, and he adds that Romulus had prayed to Jupiter that he might have power to smite his adversary and kill him. Dacier, however, thinks that the verb ferire was not used at so early a period by the Romans. If this be so, the name might have come from ferre, to carry, because Romulus had himself carried the spoils to the temple of Jupiter, or still more probably, from the Greek φερετρον, which Livy calls in Latin fericulum, the same as feretrum. vid. Spolia Opima. Liv. 1, c. 10.—Plut. in Rom.—C. Nep. in Att. 20.]

FERIÆ LATINÆ, or Latin holidays, instituted by Tarquin the Proud. The principal magistrates of 47 towns in Latium usually assembled on the Alban mount, near Rome, where they altogether with the Roman magistrates offered a bull to Jupiter Latiælis, of which they carried home some part after the immolation, after they had sworn mutual friendship and alliance. It continued but one day originally, but in process of time four days were dedicated to its celebration. Dionys. Hal. 4, c. 49.—Cic. Ep. 6.—Liv. 21, &c. The feriæ among the Romans were certain days set apart to celebrate festivals, and during that time it was unlawful for any person to work. They were either public or private. The public were of four different kinds. The feriæ stativæ were certain immovable days always marked in the calendar, and observed by the whole city with much festivity and public rejoicing. The feriæ conceptivæ were moveable feasts, and the day appointed for the celebration was always previously fixed by the magistrates or priests. Among these were the feriæ Latiæ, which were first established by Tarquin, and observed by the consuls regularly before they set out for the provinces; the Compitalia, &c. The feriæ imperativæ were appointed only by the command of the consul, dictator, or prætor, as a public rejoicing for some important victory gained over the enemy of Rome. The feriæ Nundinæ were regular days, in which the people of the country and neighbouring towns assembled together and exposed their respective commodities to sale. They were called Nundinæ because kept every ninth day. The feriæ privatæ were observed only in families, in commemoration of birth-days, marriages, funerals, and the like. The days on which the feriæ were observed were called by the Romans festi dies, because dedicated to mirth, relaxation, and festivity. [The term feriæ is derived, according to some, from the Greek, ἱεραὶ (ἱεραὶ), dies sacri, holy days.]

FĒRŌNĪA, [according to Servius, the patroness of the enfranchised slave; to whom were presented many offerings; this goddess being held in high veneration through all Italy. The name was derived either from fero, to bring relief, or from the town Feronia, near Mount Soracte. Servius supposes her to be the same with the virgin Juno, and his supposition is countenanced by an ancient inscription, quoted by Fabretti, and expressed in these terms, "Junoni Feron." The Romans appropriated to this goddess the care of woods and orchards.] She had a temple near Mount Soracte. It was usual to make a yearly sacrifice to her, and to wash the face and hands in the waters of the sacred fountain which flowed near her temple. It is said that those who were filled with the spirit of this goddess could walk barefooted over burning coals without receiving any injury from the flames. The goddess had a temple and a grove about three miles from Anxur, and also another in the district of Capena. Liv. 33, c. 26.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 697 and 800.—*Varro de L. FESCENNIA, (iorum or ium,) a town of Etruria, [near Falerii,] now Galese, where the Fescennine verses were first invented. These verses, the name of which conveys an idea of vulgar obscenity, were a sort of rustic dialogue spoken extempore, in which the actors exposed before their audience the failings and vices of their adversaries, and by a satirical humour and merriment endeavoured to raise the laughter of the company. They were often repeated at nuptials, and many lascivious expressions were used for the general diversion, as also at harvest-home, when gestures were made adapted to the sense of the unpolished verses that were used. They were proscribed by Augustus as of immoral tendency. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 695.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 145.

FESULÆ, [vid. Fæsulæ.]

FESTUS, [Pompeius, a well known grammarian, but of what particular age has never been ascertained. He wrote an abridgment of Verrius Flaccus, De Verborum significatione. Scaliger pronounces this one of the most useful books connected with the Latin language. It has passed through many editions. One of the best is that by Dacier in Usum Delphini. Paris, 1681, 4to.]

FIBRĒNUS, a river of Italy, falling into the Liris through Cicero's farm at Arpinum. Sil. 3, v. 400.—Cic. Leg. 2, c. 1.

FICULEA or FICULNEA, a town of Latium beyond Mount Sacer at the north of Rome. Cicero had a villa there, and the road that led to the town was called Ficulnensis, afterwards Nomentana Via. Cic. 12. Att. 34.—Liv. 1, c. 38, l. 3, c. 52.

FIDĒNA, [a town of Italy, on the Tiber, in the territory of the Sabines, lying north of Rome, and south-east of Veii. It was founded by an Alban colony, and was finally reduced under the Roman power, A. U. C. 327, by the dictator, Mamercus Æmilius.] Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.—Juv. 1, v. 44.—Liv. 1, c. 14, 15, and 27, l. 2, c. 9, l. 4, c. 17 and 21.

FIDES, the goddess of faith, oaths, and honesty, worshipped by the Romans. Numa was the first who paid her divine honours.

FIDIUS DIUS, a divinity by whom the Romans generally swore. He was also called Sancus or Sanctus and Semipater, and he was solemnly addressed in prayers the 5th of June, which was yearly consecrated to his service. Some suppose him to be Hercules. [The expression Me dius fidius, which so frequently occurs in the Roman classics, has been variously explained. Festus makes dius fidius to be put for Διος, filius, the son of Jupiter, i. e. Hercules; he cites at the same time other opinions, as that is the same with swearing per divi fidem or per diurni temporis, i. e. dei fidem. It is simplest, however, to make the phrase equivalent to Deus fidei] Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 213.—Varro de L. L. 5, c. 10.—Dionys. Hal. 2 and 9.

FIRMUM, [now Fermo, a town of Picenum, below Ancona, situate near the coast. In the course of the second Punic war, it sent succours to the Romans against Hannibal. It is now Fermo. Its port was Castrum Fermanum, now Porto Fermano.] Cic. 8, Att. 12.—Plin. 7, c. 8.—Valerius, 1, c. 14.

M. FIRMUS, a powerful native of Selencia, who proclaimed himself emperor, and was at last conquered by Aurelian.

[FISCELUS, now Monte Fiscalo, a mountain of Italy, on the borders of Picenum and the country of the Sabines, above Nursia.]

FLACCUS, VALERIUS, a Roman poet who flourished in the reign of Vespasian, and died at an early age in the time of Domitian. From an epigram in Martial it would seem that he was in no affluent condition; for he advises him as a friend to quit the service of the Muses for the more lucrative pursuits of the forum. The work on which his fame as a poet rests is entitled Argonauticon, in eight books. It is an imitation of the Greek poem of Apollonius Rhodius on the same subject, and may rank among the most respectable of the Latin epics after the Æneid, the manner and style of which it aims at copying. It contains sublime and splendid passages, and is free from the bombast and extravagance of the second race of Latin poets; but it is in general deficient in poetical spirit, and is likewise wanting in plan and contrivance. The best editions are those of Burmann, Leid. 1724, 4to. and of Harles, Attenb. 1781, 8vo.]

—Verrius, a grammarian, tutor to the two grandsons of Augustus, and supposed author of the Capitoline marbles. [vid. Festus.]—A name of Horace. vid. Horatius.

FLAMINIA LEX, agraria, by C. Flaminius, the tribune, A. U. C. 525. It required that the lands of Picenum, from which the Galli Senones had been expelled, should be divided among the Roman people.

FLAMINIA VIA, a celebrated road which led from Rome to Ariminum. It received its name from Flaminius, who built it, and was killed at the battle of Thrasymenus against Annibal.—A gate of Rome opening to the same road, now del popolo.

C. FLAMINIUS, a Roman consul of a turbulent disposition, who was drawn into a battle near the lake of Thrasymenus, by the artifice of Annibal. He was killed in the engagement with an immense number of Romans, B. C. 217. The conqueror wished to give a burial to his body, but it was not found in the heaps of slain. While tribune of the people, he proposed an Agrarian law against the advice of his friends, of the senate, and of his own father. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 17.—Liv. 22, c. 3, &c.—Polyb.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.

T. Q. FLAMINIUS or FLAMININUS, a celebrated Roman, raised to the consulship,

A. U. C. 556. He was trained in the art of war against Annibal, and he showed himself capable in every respect to discharge with honour the great office with which he was intrusted. He was sent at the head of the Roman troops against Philip, king of Macedonia and in his expedition he met with uncommon success. The Greeks gradually declare themselves his firmest supporters, and he totally defeated Philip on the confines of Epirus, and made all Locris, Phocis, and Thessaly tributary to the Roman power. He granted peace to the conquered monarch, and proclaimed all Greece free and independent at the Isthmian games. This celebrated action procured the name of patrons of Greece to the Romans, and insensibly paved their way to universal dominion. Flaminius behaved among them with the greatest policy, and by his ready compliance with their national customs and prejudices, he gained uncommon popularity, and received the name of father and deliverer of Greece. He was afterwards sent ambassador to king Prusias, who had given refuge to Annibal. [He persuaded Prusias to violate the laws of hospitality in delivering up Hannibal; but the veteran soldier prevented the treachery of the monarch by taking poison.] Flaminius was found dead in his bed, after a life spent in the greatest glory, in which he had imitated with success the virtues of his model Scipio. Plut. in vita.—Flor.—Lucius, the brother of the preceding, signalized himself in the wars of Greece. He was expelled from the senate for killing a Gaul, by Cato his brother's colleague in the censorship, an action which was highly resented by Titus. Plut. in Flam.—Calp. Flamma, a tribune, who at the head of 300 men saved the Roman army in Sicily, B. C. 258, by engaging the Carthaginians and cutting them to pieces.

FLANATICUS SINUS, a bay in Liburnia, on the Adriatic, now the gulf of Carnero. Plin. 3, c. 19 and 31. [vid. Flavona.]

FLAVIA LEX, agraria, by L. Flavius, A. U. C. 693, for the distribution of a certain quantity of lands among Pompey's soldiers.

[FLAVŌNA, a considerable commercial city of Liburnia, on the Sinus Flanaticus. D'Anville thinks that the name of this gulf is borrowed from that of the city. The modern name of the place is Fianona.]

FLEVO, [a canal intersecting the country of the Frisii, made by Drusus. This in time expanded to such a degree as to form a considerable lake or lagune, whose issue to the sea was fortified by a castle bearing the same name. This lagune, having been in progress of time much increased by the sea, assumed the name of Zuyder Zee, or the Southern Sea; and of several channels which afford entrance to the ocean, that named Vlie, indicates the genuine egress of the Flevo.] Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 6, l. 4, v. 72.—Plin. 4, c. 15.—Mela, 3, c. 2.

FLŌRA, the goddess of flowers and gardens among the Romans, the same as the Chloris of the Greeks. Some suppose that she was originally a common courtesan, who left to the Romans the immense riches which she had acquired by prostitution and lasciviousness [on condition that they should celebrate the anniversary of her birth-day by games and feasts.] She was worshipped even among the Sabines long before the foundation of Rome, and likewise among the Phocæans who built Marseilles long before the existence of the capital of Italy. Tattius was the first who raised her a temple in the city of Rome. It is said that she married Zephyrus, and that she received from him the privileges of presiding over flowers, and of enjoying prepetual youth: [vid. Floralia.] She was represented as crowned with flowers, and holding in her hand the horn of plenty. [This goddess is held by some to be the same with the Chloris of the Greeks. Lactantius, Arnobius, and St. Augustin, together with Plutarch and Macrobius, advocate the opinion of Flora's being a courtesan. Vossius, however, opposes this, and makes her a Sabine goddess. His reasons are, that Varro ranks Flora among the deities to whom Tattius, king of the Sabines, offered up vows before he joined battle with the Romans, and that from another passage of the same writer it appears there were priests of Flora, with sacrifices, &c. as early as the time of Numa. To which may be added that Pliny speaks of a statue of this goddess by Praxiteles, which proves her worship to have been known also in Greece, whence it extended to Italy before the time of Romulus, who adopted it when he entered into an union with Tattius and the Sabines.] Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 195, &c.—Varro de R. R. 1.—Lactant. 1, c. 20.—A celebrated courtesan, passionately loved by Pompey the Great. She was so beautiful, that when the temple of Castor and Pollux at Rome was adorned with paintings, her picture was drawn and placed among the rest.

FLORALIA, games in honour of Flora at Rome. They were instituted about the age of Romulus, but they were not celebrated with regularity and proper attention till the year U. C. 580. They were observed yearly, and exhibited a scene of the most unbounded licentiousness. It is reported that Cato wished once to be present at the celebration, and that when he saw that the deference for his presence interrupted the feast, he retired, not choosing to be the spectator of the prostitution of naked women in a public theatre. This behaviour so captivated the degenerate Romans, that the venerable senator was treated with the most uncommon applause as he retired. Vol. Max. 2, c. 10.—Varro de L. L. 1.—Patere. c. 1.—Plin. 13, c. 29.

FLORENTIA, [a town of Etruria, on the river Arno, now Florence, or, as the Italians call the name, Fiorenze. It was a Roman colony, settled during the Ligurian war, and intended principally as a post of observation, and to serve as a check upon the adjacent mountaineers. It was subsequently enlarged by the settlement of a part of Cæsar's veterans. It was destroyed by Totila, and rebuilt by Charlemagne. It first became powerful as a commercial city in the middle ages.] Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 79.—Flor. 3, c. 21.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

FLORIĀNUS, a man who wore the imperial purple at Rome only for two months, A. D. 276.

FLORUS, L. ANNÆUS JULIUS, a Latin historian of the same family which produced Seneca and Lucan. [According to his own account he lived under Trajan. Whether he was actually of Spanish origin, or whether a native of Gaul, is not sufficiently ascertained.] He wrote an abridgment of Roman annals in four books, composed in a florid and poetical style, and rather a panegyric on many of the great actions of the Romans, than a faithful and correct recital of their history. He also wrote poetry, and entered the lists against the emperor Adrian, who satirically represented him frequenting taverns and places of dissipation. The best editions of Florus are, Duker's, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1722 and 1744, and that of J. Frid. Fischer, 8vo. Lips. 1760.—JULIUS, a friend of Horace, who accompanied Claudius Nero in his military expeditions. The poet has addressed two epistles to him.

FONS SOLIS, [vid. Ammon.]

FONTĒIUS CAPITO, an intimate friend of Horace. 1 Sat. 5, v. 32.—A Roman who raised commotions in Germany after the death of Nero. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 7.

FORMIÆ, a maritime town of Campania, at the south-east of Caieta. It was anciently the abode of the Læstrygones, and it became known for its excellent wines, and was called Mamurrarum urbs, from a family of consequence and opulence who lived there. [Its having been founded by the Læstrygones is all a fable. The place, no doubt, owed its origin to the Pelasgi or Tyrrheni. Near its ruins is the modern town of Mola.] Liv. 8, c. 14, l. 36, c. 36.—Horat. 1, od. 20, v. 11, l. 3, od. 17. Sat. 1, 5, v. 37.—Plin. 36, c. 6.

FORMIĀNUM, a villa of Cicero near Formiæ, near which the orator was assassinated. Cic. Fam. 11, ep. 27, l. 16, ep. 10.—Tacit. Ann. 16, c. 10.

FORMIO, now Risano, a river of Istria, the ancient boundary of Italy eastward, afterwards extended to the Arsia. Plin. 3, c. 13 and 19.

FORNAX, a goddess of Rome who presided over the baking of bread. Her festivals, called Fornacalia, were first instituted by Numa. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 525.

FORTŪNA, a powerful deity among the ancients, daughter of Oceanus according to Homer, or one of the Parcæ according to Pindar. She was the goddess of Fortune, and from her hand were derived riches and poverty, pleasures and misfortunes, blessings and pains. She was worshipped in different parts of Greece, and in Achaia; her statue held the horn of plenty in one hand, and had a winged cupid at its feet. In Bœotia she had a statue which represented her as holding Plutus the god of riches in her arms, to intimate that fortune is the source whence wealth and honours flow. Bupalus was the first who made a statue of Fortune for the people of Smyrna, and he represented her with the polar star upon her head, and the horn of plenty in her hand. The Romans paid particular attention to the goddess of Fortune, and had no less than eight different temples erected to her honour in their city. Tullus Hostilius was the first who built her a temple, and from that circumstance it is easily known when her worship was first introduced among the Romans. Her most famous temple in Italy was at Antium in Latium, where presents and offerings were regularly sent from every part of the country. Fortune has been called Phe-reopolis, the protectress of cities, Acrea from the temple of Corinth on an eminence, ægros. She was called Prenestine in Italy, where she had also a temple. Besides she was worshipped among the Romans under different names, such as Female fortune, Virile fortune, Equestrian, Evil, Peaceful, Virgin, &c. On the 1st of April, which was consecrated to Venus among the Romans, the Italian widows and marriageable virgins assembled in the temple of Virile fortune, and after burning incense and stripping themselves of their garments, they entreated the goddess to hide from the eyes of their husbands whatever defects there might be on their bodies. The goddess of Fortune is represented on ancient monuments with a horn of plenty, and sometimes two in her hands. She is blindfolded, and generally holds a wheel in her hand as an emblem of her inconstancy. Sometimes she appears with wings, and treads upon the prow of a ship, and holds a rudder in her hands. Dionys. Hal. 4.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 569.—Plut. de fort. Rom. and in Cor.—Cic. de Div. 2.—Liv. 10.—Augustin. de Civ. D. 4.—Flor. 1.—Val. Max. 1, c. 5.—Lucan. 2, &c.

FORTŪNĀTÆ INSULÆ, islands at the west of Mauritania in the Atlantic Sea. They are supposed to be the Canary isles of the moderns, thought to be only two in number, at a little distance one from the other, and 10,000 stadia from the shores of Lybia. They were represented as the seats of the blessed, where the souls of the virtuous were placed after death. The air was wholesome and temperate, the earth produced an immense number of various fruits without the labours of men. When they had been described to Sertorius in the most enchanting colours, that celebrated general expressed a wish to retire thither, and to remove himself from the noise of the world, and the dangers of war. [The opinion which makes the Canary islands the Insulæ Fortunatæ of the ancients, is grounded upon the situation and temperature of those islands, and from the abundance of delicious fruits which they produce. Those of them that lie nearest the continent were called Purpuraria, as Juba, king of Mauritania, intended to establish there a manufactory for purple dye. The more remote, being specially denominated the Fortunate isles, answer to Laucarota and Forteventura. Canaria has given the modern name of Canaries to these islands in general.] Strab. 1.—Plut. in Scerlor.—Horat. 4, od. 8, v. 27.—Epod. 16.—Plin. 6, c. 31 and 32.

[FORUM ROMĀNUM, Vetus, vel magnum, a large oblong open space between the Capitoline and Palatine hills, called until lately Campo Vaccino, or the Cow-field, or, market. The Italians, however, have grown ashamed of so vulgar a name, and have restored to the place its ancient appellation of Forum Romanum. It is now a mere open space, strewn for the most part with ruins. Here the assemblies of the people used generally to be held, and here also justice was administered and public business transacted. It was formed by Romulus, and surrounded with porticoes, shops, and buildings, by Tarquinius Priscus. Around the forum were built spacious halls, called Basilicae, where courts of justice might sit and other public business be transacted. There was only one forum under the Republic; J. Cæsar added another: Augustus a third. A fourth was begun by Domitian and finished by Nerva, after whom it was named. But the most splendid was that of Trajan, adorned with the spoils he had taken in war. Besides these, there were various fora or places where commodities were sold.]

FORUM-APPII, a town of Latium on the Appia via. Cic. 1, Att. 10.—Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 3.—Alleni, a town of Italy, now Ferrara. Tacit. H. 3, c. 6.—Aurelii, a town of Etruria, now Montalto. Cic. Cat. 1, c. 9.—Claudii, another in Etruria, now Oriuolo.—Cornelii, another, now Imola, in the Pope's dominions. Plin. 3, c. 16.—Cic. Fam. 12, ep. 5.—Domitii, a town of Gaul, now Frontignan, in Languedoc.—Voconii, a town of Gaul, now Gonsaron, between Antibes and Marseilles. Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 17.—Flaminii, a town of Umbria, now San Giovane. Plin. 3, c. 14.—Gallorum, a town of Gaul Togata, now Castel Franco, in the Bolognese. Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 30.—Many other places bore the name of Forum wherever there was a public market, or rather where the prætor held his court of justice, (forum vel conventus;) and thence they were called sometimes conventus as well as fora, into which provinces were generally divided under the administration of a separate governor. Cic. Verr. 2, c. 20, l. 4, c. 43, l. 5, c. 11.—Vatin. 5, Fam. 3, ep. 6 and 8.—Attic. 5, ep. 21.

FÖSTI, [a people of Germany, lying north of the Cherusci along the Visurgis or Weser. They shared the fate of the Cherusci when the Langobardi conquered the latter people. They are supposed to have been a branch of the Cherusci. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 3, p. 175, 208.]

FOSSA, the straits of Bonifacio between Corsica and Sardinia, called also Taphros. Plin. 3, c. 6.—Drusi or Drusiana, a canal, eight miles in length, opened by Drusus from the Rhine to the Issel, below the separation of the Waal. Suet. Claud. 1.—Tacit. Hist. 5, c. 23.—Mariana, a canal cut by Marius from the Rhone to Marseilles during the Cimbrian war, and now called Galejon. Sometimes the words is used in the plural, Fossæ, as if more than one canal had been formed by Marius. Plin. 3, c. 4.—Strab. 4.—Mela, 2, c. 5.

FOSSÆ PHILISTINÆ, canals near the mouths of the Po. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 9.

FRANCI, [tribes of Germans, who inhabited the districts on the Lower Rhine and Weser. They assumed the title of Franks, i. e. Freemen, from a temporary union among themselves against the Roman power. This confederacy is thought to have been formed in the reign of Gordian 3d; and the Chauci, Catti, with other tribes of inferior strength are supposed to have belonged to it. They soon acted on the offensive, crossed the Rhine, and spread their desolating bands over France, Spain, and even beyond this latter country into Mauretania. They were afterwards driven out of Gaul by the Roman arms, and from the reign of Probus A. D. 277, to that of Honorius, seem to have contented themselves with occasional irruptions. They obtained a permanent footing in Gaul during the last years of the reign of Honorius.]

FRAUS, a divinity worshipped among the Romans, daughter of Orcus and Night. She presided over treachery, &c.

FREGELLA, a town of the Volsci in Italy on the Liris, destroyed for revolting from the Romans. Ital. 5, v. 452.—Liv. 8, c. 22, l. 27, c. 10, &c.—Cic. Fam. 13, ep. 76.

FRENTĀNI, a people of Italy, [on the Adriatic coast, east of Samnium and north-west of Apulia,] who receive their name from the river Frento, now Fortore, which runs through the eastern part of their country, and falls into the Adriatic opposite the islands of Diomedæ. [Their country, together with a small part Samnium, answers to the modern Abruzzo Citra.] Plin. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 9, c. 45.—Sil. 8, v. 520.

FRISI, [a native of Germany, the ancient inhabitants of the modern Friesland. They were situate on the coast of the Oceanus Germanicus, between the Amisia or Ems, and the Rhenus or Rhine.] Tacit. A. 1, c. 60.—Hist. 4, c. 15 and 72.—G. 34.

SEX. JUL. FRONTINUS, [an eminent Roman and city Prætor, A. D. 70. He was afterwards a supplementary consul, and distinguished himself by his military talents as a commander in Britain. Under Nerva, he was appointed superintendent of the waters, and in this capacity brought the waters of the Anio to Rome by means of a splendid aqueduct. He wrote two books, on the construction of these works, by the emperor's express order, and a work also on military stratagems.] He ordered at his death that no monument should be raised to his memory, saying, memoria nostri durabit, si vilam meruimus. The best edition of Frontinus is that of Oudendorp, 8vo. L. Bat. 1779.

FRONTO, a preceptor of M. Antoninus, by whom he was greatly esteemed.—Julius, a learned Roman, who was so partial to the company of poets, that he lent them his house and gardens, which continually re-echoed the compositions of his numerous visitors. Juv. l. Sat. v. 12.

FŪCIVUS, a lake of Italy, in the country of the Marsi attempted to be drained by J. Cæsar, [but discontinued at his death,] and afterwards by Claudius, by whom 30,000 men were employed for eleven years to perforate a mountain. [Many are led to suppose from a passage in Dio Cassius, that the labour of Claudius was fruitless. According to Pliny, however, he actually succeeded in the undertaking, and that writer speaks of the perforation of the mountain as a most stupendous monument of art. The object was to lead off the waters of the lake into the Tiber. Nero is said to have neglected this work of his predecessor, and Adrian to have renewed it, but to little effect.] The lake, surrounded by a ridge of high mountains, is now called Celano, and is supposed to be 47 miles in circumference, and not more than 2 feet deep on an average. Plin. 36, c. 15.—Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 56.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 759.

FUGALIA, festivals at Rome to celebrate the flight of the Tarquins.

FULGORA, a goddess at Rome who presided over lightning. She was addressed to save her votaries from the effects of violent storms of thunder. Aug. de Civ. D. 6, c. 10.

FULVIA LEX, was proposed but rejected, A. U. C. 623, by Flaccus Fulvius. It tended to make all the people of Italy citizens of Rome.

FULVIA, a bold and ambitious woman who married the tribune Clodius, and afterwards Curio, and at last M. Antony. She took a part in all the intrigues of her husband's triumvirate, and showed herself cruel as well as revengeful. When Cicero's head had been cut off by order of Antony, Fulvia ordered it to be brought to her, and with all the insolence of barbarity, she bored the orator's tongue with her golden bodkin. Antony divorced her to marry Cleopatra, upon which she attempted to avenge her wrongs, by persuading Augustus to take up arms against her husband. When this scheme did not succeed, she raised a faction against Augustus, in which she engaged L. Antonius her brother-in-law; and when all her attempts proved fruitless, she retired into the east, where her husband received her with great coldness and indifference. This unkindness totally broke her heart, and she soon after died, about 40 years before the Christian era. *Plut. in Cic. & Anton.—*A woman who discovered to Cicero the designs of Catiline upon his life. Plut. in Cic.

FULVIUS FLACCUS, a friend of C. Gracchus who was killed in a sedition of his son. His body was thrown into the river, and his widow was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. *Plut. in Gracch.—*Ser. Nobilior, a Roman consul who went to Africa after the defeat of Regulus. After he had acquired much glory against the Carthaginians, he was shipwrecked at his return with 200 Roman ships. His grandson Marcus was sent to Spain, where he greatly signalized himself.

He was afterwards rewarded with the consulship.

FUNDANUS, a lake near Fundi in Italy which discharges itself into the Mediterranean. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 69.

FUNDI, [now Fondi,] a town of Italy near Caieta, on the Appian road, at the bottom of a small deep bay called Lacus Fundanus. Horat. l. Sat. 5, v. 34.—Liv. 3, c. 14 and 19, l. 38, c. 36.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Cic. Rull. 2, c. 25.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 59.—Strab. 5.

FURĪÆ, the three daughters of Nox and Acheron, or of Pluto and Proserpine, according to some. vid. Eumendæ.

FURĪI, a family which migrated from Medullia in Latium, and came to settle at Rome under Romulus, and was admitted among the patricians. Camillus was of this family, and it was he who first raised it to distinction. Plut. in Camill.

FURĪA LEX, de Testamentis, by C. Furius the tribune. It forbade any person to leave as a legacy more than a thousand asses, [and that he who took more, should pay fourfold. By the laws of the twelve tables, one might leave what legacies he pleased.] Cic. 1.—Verr. 42.—Liv. 35.

FURĪNÆ, the goddess of robbers, worshipped at Rome. Some say that she is the same as the Furies. Her festivals were called Furinalia. Cic. de Nat. 3, c. 8.—Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

FURIUS, M. Bibaculus, a Latin poet of Cremona, who wrote annals in iambic verse, and was universally celebrated for the wit and humour of his expressions. It is said that Virgil imitated his poetry, and even borrowed some of his lines. Horace, however, has not failed to ridicule his verses. Quintil. 8, c. 6. &c.—Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 40.

FURNIUS, a friend of Horace, who was consul, and distinguished himself by his elegant historical writings. 1 Sat. 10, v. 36.

ARIST. FUSCUS, a friend of Horace, as conspicuous for the integrity and propriety of his manners, as for his learning and abilities. The poet addressed his 22d Od. Lib. 4, and 1 Ep. 10, to him.

FUSIA LEX, de Comitibus, A. U. C. 527, forbade any business to be transacted at the public assemblies on certain days, though among the fasti.—[Another, A. U. C. 690, which ordained, that in the Comitia Tributa, the different kinds of people in each tribe should vote separately, that thus the sentiments of each rank might be known.]—Caninia, another by Camillus and C. Caunius Galbus, A. U. C. 751, to check the manumission of slaves; [limiting the manumission of slaves to a certain number, proportioned to the whole amount of slaves which one possessed: from two to ten, the half; from ten to thirty, the third; from thirty to a hundred, the fourth part; but not above a hundred whatever was the number.]

FUSIUS, a Roman actor, whom Horace ridicules. 2 Sat. v. 60. When on the stage, he fell asleep whilst he personated Ilium, where he ought to have been roused and moved by the cries of a ghost; but in vain.

GABÆ, [a city of Persia, in the province of Persis, located by Ptolemy south-east of Pargada, on the confines of Carmania. Mannert makes it to coincide with the modern Darabgherd.]—[A city of Sogdiana, south-west of Cyreschata. D'Anville supposes it to be the modern Kauos: Mannert, on the contrary, is in favour of the modern Rabas, on the river Kressel, north of Samarchand. Gabæ was one of the first places to which the exploits of Alexander gave celebrity in this country. It is the same with the Gabazæ of Curtius.]

GABELLUS, now La Secchia, a river falling in a northern direction into the Po, opposite the Mincius. Plin. 3, c. 16.

GABII, a city of Volsci, built by the kings of Alba, but now no longer in existence. It was taken by the artifice of Sextus, the son of Tarquin, who gained the confidence of the inhabitants by deserting to them, and pretending that his father had ill treated him. Romulus and Remus were educated there, as it was the custom at that time to send there the young nobility, and Juno was the chief deity of the place. The inhabitants had a peculiar mode of tucking up their dress, whence Gabinus cinctus. [In this mode of wearing the toga, the lappet of it was thrown back over the left shoulder and brought round under the right arm to the breast; so that it girded the individual and made the toga shorter and closer. According to Servius, the inhabitants of Gabii, while engaged in sacrificing, were suddenly attacked by the enemy, whereupon, not having time to array themselves in arms, they tucked up their togas in this manner, and advanced to meet the foe. Virgil represents the Roman consul thus arrayed when he opens the gates of the temple of Janus, and in this garb the Decii devoted themselves to death.] *Virg. GABINIA LEX DE Comitibus, by A. Gabinius, the tribune, A. U. C. 614. It required that in the public assemblies for electing magistrates, the votes should be given by tablets, and not vivâ voce.—Another for convening daily the senate from the calends of February to those of March.—Another de Comitibus, which made it a capital punishment to convene any clandestine assembly, agreeable to the old law of the twelve tables. [This law is mentioned by Porcius Latro in his declamation against Catiline. This author, however, is thought to be supposititious.]—Another de Militiâ, by A. Gabinius the tribune, A. U. C. 685. It granted Pompey the power of carrying on the war against the pirates, during three years, and of obliging all kings, governors, and states, to supply him with all the necessaries he wanted, over all the Mediterranean Sea, and in the maritime provinces as far as 400 stadia from the sea.—Another de Usurâ, by Aul. Gabinius the tribune, A. U. C. 685. It ordained that no action should be granted for the recovery of any money borrowed upon small interest, to be lent upon larger. This was an usual practice at Rome, which obtained the name of versuram facere.

GABINIUS Aulius, a Roman consul, who made war in Judæa, and re-established tranquillity there. He suffered himself to be bribed, and replaced Ptolemy Auletes on the throne of Egypt. He was accused, at his return, of receiving bribes. Cicero, at the request of Pompey, ably defended him. He was banished, and died about 40 years before Christ, at Salona.

GADÉS (ium), GADIS (is), and GADIRA, [a flourishing commercial city of Spain, at the mouth of one of the arms of the Bætis, now Cádiz. It was founded by a Phœnician colony about 1500 B. C. according to some; others, however, make its foundation coeval with that of Utica, and this last to have been 287 years before Carthage. Its name in Phœnician was Gaddir, and signified a hedge, or limit, as it was thought that here were the western limits of the world. It was situate on a small island of the same name, which was separated from the main land by a strait only one stadium wide. This island is said to have abounded at an early period with wild olive trees, and to have been hence named Cotinusa, (Κοτινούσα), not by the early inhabitants of the land, however, as some of the ancient writers thought, but by the Greeks; for the appellation is a Grecian one. Near it lay the small island Erythia, called by the inhabitants Juno's island. vid. Erythia. Gades came into the power of the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, and in the second surrendered itself voluntarily to the Romans. From Julius Cæsar it received the name and privileges of a Roman colony; and in a later age it was styled Augusta Julia Geditana. The Greek name for Gades was Gadûga. vid. Tartessus.] Hercules, surnamed Gaditanus, had here a celebrated temple, in which all his labours were engraved with excellent workmanship. Horat. 2, od. 2, v. 11.—Stat. 3, Sylv. 1, v. 183.—Liv. 21, c. 21, l. 24, c. 49, l. 26, c. 45.—Plin. 4, c. 23.—Strab. 3.—Cic. pro Gab.—Justin. 44, c. 4.—Paus. 1, c. 35.—Ptol. 2, c. 4.—Paterc. 1, c. 2.

GETÛLIA, [a country of Africa, south of Numidia, and now answering in some degree to Biledulgerid, or the region of locusts. Its situation and limits are not properly ascertained, and indeed do not seem to have been always the same.] Sallust. in Jug.—Sil. 3, v. 287.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

GALANTHIS, a servant maid of Alcmena, whose sagacity eased the labours of her mistress. When Juno resolved to retard the birth of Hercules, and hasten the labours of the wife of Sthenelus, she solicited the aid of Lucina, who immediately repaired to the house of Alcmena, and, in the form of an old woman, sat near the door with her legs crossed, and her fingers joined. In this posture she uttered some magical words, which served to prolong the labours of Alcmena, and render her state the more miserable. Alcmena had already passed some days in the most excruciating torments, when Galanthis began to suspect the jealousy of Juno; and concluded that the old woman, who continued at the door always in the same unchanged posture, was the instrument of the anger of the goddess. With such suspicions Galanthis ran out of the house, and with a countenance expressive of joy, she informed the old woman that her mistress had just brought forth. Lucina, at the words, rose from her posture, and that instant Alcmena was safely delivered. The uncommon laugh which Galanthis raised upon this, made Lucina suspect that she had been deceived. She seized Galanthis by the hair, and threw her on the ground; and while she attempted to resist, she was changed into a weazel, and condemned to bring forth her young in the most agonizing pains, by the mouth, by which she had uttered falsehood. This transformation alludes to a vulgar notion among the ancients, who believed this of the weazel, because she carries her young in her mouth, and continually shifts from place to place. The Bœotians paid great veneration to the weazel, which, as they supposed, facilitated the labours of Alcmena. Ælian. H. Anim. 2.—Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 6.

GĀLĀTĒ, the inhabitants of Galatia. vid. Galatia.

GĀLĀTĒA and GALATHĒA, a sea-nymph, daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was passionately loved by the Cyclops Polyphemus, whom she treated with coldness and disdain; while Acis, a shepherd of Sicily, enjoyed her unbounded affection. The happiness of these two lovers was disturbed by the jealousy of the Cyclops, who crushed his rival to pieces with a piece of broken rock, while he lay on the bosom of Galatæa. Galatæa was inconsolable for the loss of Acis, and as she could not restore him to life, she changed him into a fountain. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 789.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 103.

GALATĪA, or GALLOGRÆGIA, [a country of Asia Minor, lying south of Paphlagonia, west of Pontus, and north-east of Phrygia. It derived its name of Galatia from the Gauls or Celtæ, who, having invaded Asia Minor in several bodies, conquered and settled in this country. This seems to have occurred subsequent to the invasion of Greece by the same people. (vid. Delphi.) These Gauls or Celtæ are said to have been composed of those Celtic tribes who dwelt originally between the Danube and the Alps. The Greeks gave the new settlements of this people in Asia a double name; Galatia, from the nation itself, and Gallo-Græcia, from the Greek colonies which became subsequently intermingled with them. It is very singular that the Celtic language was spoken here, even in the days of St. Jerome, more than 600 years after their emigration.] Strab. 12.—Justin. 37, c. 4.—Liv. 33, c. 12, 40.—Lucan. 7, v. 540.—Cic. 6, Att. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 32.—Ptol. 5, c. 4.—A name of ancient Gaul among the Greeks.

GALAXIA, a festival, in which they boiled a mixture of barley, pulse, and milk, called Γαλαξία by the Greeks.

GALBA, a surname of the first of the Sulpitii, from the smallness of his stature. The word signifies a small worm, or, according to some, it implies, in the language of Gaul, fatness, for which the founder of the Sulpitian family was remarkable.—Servius Sulpicius, a Roman, who rose gradually to the greatest offices of the state, and exercised his power in the provinces with equity and unremitting diligence. He dedicated the greatest part of his time to solitary pursuits, chiefly to avoid the suspicions of Nero. His disapprobation of the emperor's oppressive command in the provinces, was the cause of new disturbances. Nero ordered him to be put to death, but he escaped from the hands of the executioner, and was publicly saluted emperor. When he was seated on the throne, he suffered himself to be governed by favourites, who exposed to sale the goods of the citizens to gratify their avarice. Exemptions were sold at a high price, and the crime of murder was blotted out, and impunity purchased with a large sum of money. Such irregularities in the emperor's ministers greatly displeased the people; and when Galba refused to pay the soldiers the money which he had promised them when he was raised to the throne, they assassinated him in the 73d year of his age, and in the 8th of his reign, and proclaimed Otho emperor in his room January 16th, A. D. 69. The virtues which had shone so bright in Galba, when a private man, totally disappeared when he ascended the throne; and he who showed himself the most impartial judge, forgot the duties of an emperor, and of a father of his people. Sueton. & Plut. in vitâ.—Tacit.—A learned man, grandfather to the emperor of the same name. Suet. in Galb. 4.

GALĒNUS CLAUDIUS, a celebrated physician in the age of M. Antoninus and his successors, born at Pergamus. [He has himself informed us, that his father, whose name was Nicon, was an honourable and wealthy man, and possessed of considerable knowledge in belles lettres, philosophy, astronomy, geometry, and architecture.] He applied himself with unremitting labour to the study of philosophy, mathematics, and chiefly of physic. He visited the most learned seminaries of Greece and Egypt, and at last came to Rome. [The physicians of Rome adhered to the principles of the methodic sect, and hence they stigmatised him as a theorist, and even as a dealer in magic. He wanted temper and experience necessary to contend against a numerous and popular party, and after a residence of five years returned to Pergamus. He was soon after, however, summoned to attend the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus, who were then at Aquileia.

The appearance of the plague at this place compelled them to return to Rome, whither Galen followed. Here a successful treatment of Commodus and Sextus, sons of Aurelius, who had been seized with fever, established his reputation on a basis which was not to be shaken by the power of his enemies. It is not known how long he resided at Rome this second time, or whether he ever returned to Asia. He is said to have died at the age of 70.] He wrote no less than 500 volumes, the greatest part of which were burnt in the temple of Peace at Rome, where they had been deposited. Galen confessed himself greatly indebted to the writings of Hippocrates, for his medical knowledge, and bestowed great encomiums upon him. To the diligence, application, and experiments of those two celebrated physicians, the moderns are indebted for many useful discoveries; yet, often their opinions are ill-grounded, their conclusions hasty, and their reasoning false. What remains of the works of Galen has been published without a Latin translation, in 5 vols. fol. Basil. 1533. Galen was likewise edited, together with Hippocrates, by Charterius, 13 vols. fol. Paris, 1679. [The learned Coray published a French version of the medical works of Hippocrates, in 4 vols. 8vo, at Toulouse, in the year 1801; and in the same year from the Paris press, a version of the treatise on "airs, waters, and places," with a valuable critical, historical, and medical commentary, in 2 vols. 8vo.]

GALERIUS, a native of Dacia, made emperor of Rome by Diocletian. vid. Maximianus.

GALĒSUS, now Galeso, a river of Calabria flowing into the bay of Tarentum. The poets have celebrated it for the shady groves in its neighbourhood, and the fine sheep which feed on its fertile banks, and whose fleeces were said to be rendered soft when they bathed in the stream. Martial. 2, ep. 43, l. 4, ep. 28.—Virg. G. 4, v. 126.—Horat. 2, od. 6, v. 10.

GALILĒA, [a celebrated country of Palestine, forming the northern division. Josephus divides it into Upper and Lower, and he states that the limits of Galilee were on the south Samaris and Scythopolis to the flood of Jordan. It contained four tribes, Issachar, Zebulon, Naphthali, and Asher; a part also of Dan, and part of Peræa, or the country beyond Jordan. Upper Galilee was mountainous, and was called Galilee of the Gentiles, from the heathen nations established there, and who were enabled by the mountainous nature of the country to maintain themselves against all invaders. Lower Galilee, which contained the tribes of Zebulon and Asher, was adjacent to the Sea of Tiberias or Lake of Gennesareth. Galilee, according to Josephus, was very populous, contained 204 cities and towns, and paid 200 talents in tribute. As Nazareth was situate in Galilee, our Saviour was termed a Galilean. The Galileans seem to have had a dialect different from that of the Jews in general, for Peter was hence denominated a Galilean.]

GALLI, a nation of Europe, naturally fierce, and inclined to war. [The word Galli is supposed to be the native term Gaeli latinised. The Celtæ were the most extensive and indigenous of the Gallic tribes, and their name (Κελται) is that under which the whole nation was commonly known to the Greeks. Dr. Murray maintains that the names of Gael and Celtæ are clearly derived from Celyddon and Gwiddel in Welsh. This may perhaps have been the case. What he adds, however, seems very questionable, namely, that the Romans pronounced Gwiddeli, Galli. The same author derives the name of the Belgæ from Belg, fierce or warlike.] They were very superstitious; and in their sacrifices they often immolated human victims. In some places, they had large statues made with twigs, which they filled with men, and reduced to ashes. They believed themselves descended from Pluto; and from that circumstance they always reckoned their time not by the days, as other nations, but by the nights. Their obsequies were splendid, and not only the most precious things, but even slaves and oxen, were burnt on the funeral pile. Children, among them, never appeared in the presence of their fathers before they were able to bear arms in the defence of their country. Cæs. Bell. G.—Strab. 4.—Tacit. vid. Gallia.

[A name given in Phrygia to the eunuch-priests of the goddess Cybele. Some derive the name from the river Gallus, because these priests drank of its waters, which inspired them with a kind of religious fury to such a degree that they mutilated themselves. Others maintain that the first priest of Cybele, having been named Gallus, this name became appropriated to all his successors. Ovid, in his Fasti, and Herodian, favour the former derivation.] They mutilated themselves before they were admitted to the priesthood, in imitation of Atys, the favourite of Cybele. (vid. Atys.) The chief among them was called Archigallus, who in his dress resembled a woman, and carried, suspended to his neck, a large collar with two representations of the head of Atys. vid. Corybantæ, Daetyli, &c. Diod. 4.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 36.—Lucan. 1, v. 466.—Lucan. de Dea Syria.

GALLIA, [an extensive and populous country of Europe, bounded on the west by the Atlantic, on the North by the Insula Batavorum and part of the Rhenus or Rhine, on the east by the Rhenus and the Alps, and on the south by the Pyrenees. The greatest breadth was 600 English miles, but much diminished towards each extremity, and its length was from 480 to 620 miles. It was therefore more extensive than modern France before the revolution, though inferior to the kingdom at the present day, which is 650 miles long from E. to W. and 560 broad from N. to S. Gaul was originally divided among the three great nations of the Belgæ, the Celtæ, and the Aquitani. The Romans called the inhabitants of this country by one general name, Galli, while the Greeks styled them Celtæ. The origin of these two appellations is stated in the preceding article. The Greeks called the country itself Galatia, Celtice (Καταλία), and Celto-Galatia; the last for distinction sake from Galatia in Asia Minor. Of the three great nations of Gaul, the Celtæ were the most extensive and indigenous, and the Belgæ the bravest. The Celtæ extended from the Sequana or Seine in the north to the Garumna or Garonne in the south. Above the Celtæ lay the Belgæ, between the Seine and Lower Rhine. They were intermixed with Germanic tribes. The Aquitani lay between the Garonne and Pyrenees, and were intermingled with Spanish tribes. These three great divisions, however, were subsequently altered by Augustus, B. C. 27, who extended Aquitania into Celtica, as far as the Liger or Loire; the remainder of Celtica above the Liger was called Gallia Lugdunensis, from the colony of Lugdunum, Lyons; and the remainder of Celtica towards the Rhine was added to the Belgæ under the title of Belgica: lastly, the south of Gaul, which from having been the first provinces possessed by the Romans had been styled Gallia Provincia, was distinguished by the name of Narbonensis from the city of Narbo, or Narbonne. This province was anciently called also Gallia Braccata, from the braccæ or breeches worn by the inhabitants; while Gallia Celtica was styled Comata from the long hair worn by the natives. These four great provinces, in later ages were called the four Gauls, and subdivided into 17 others.] Besides these divisions, there is often mention made of Gallia Cisalpina, or Citerior; Transalpina or Ulterior, which refers to that part of Italy which was conquered by some of the Gauls who crossed the Alps. By Gallia Cisalpina the Romans understood that part of Gaul which lies in Italy; and by Transalpina, that which lies beyond the Alps, in regard only to the inhabitants of Rome. Gallia Cispadana and Transpadana is applied to a part of Italy conquered by some of the Gauls, and then it means the country on this side of the Po, or beyond the Po, with respect to Rome. By Gallia Togata the Romans understood Cisalpine Gaul, where the Roman gowns, togæ, were usually worn, after the inhabitants had been admitted to the rank of citizenship at Rome. The Gauls were great warriors, and their valour overcame the Roman armies, took the city of Rome, and invaded Greece in different ages. They were very superstitious in their religious ceremonies, and revered the sacerdotal order, as if they had been gods. (vid. Druidæ.) They long maintained a bloody war against the Romans, and Cæsar spent nearly 10 years in their country before he could totally subdue them. Cæs. Bell. Gall.—Paus. 7, c. 6.—Strab. 5, &c.

GALLICUS AGER, was applied to the country between Picenum and Ariminum, whence the Galli Senones were banished, and which was divided among the Roman citizens. Liv. 23, c. 14, l. 39, c. 44.—Cic. Cat. 2.—Cæs. Civ.

GALLIENUS, Publ. Lucinius, a son of the emperor Valerian. He reigned conjointly with his father for seven years, and ascended the throne as sole emperor, A. D. 260. In his youth he showed his activity and military character, in an expedition against the Germans and Sarmatæ; but when he came to the purple, he delivered himself up to pleasure and indolence. His time was spent in the greatest debauchery; and he indulged himself in the grossest and most lascivious manner, and his palace displayed a scene at once of effeminacy and shame, voluptuousness and immorality. He often appeared with his hair powdered with golden dust; and enjoyed tranquillity at home, while his provinces abroad were torn by civil quarrels and seditions. He heard of the loss of a rich province and of the execution of a malefactor, with the same indifference; and when he was apprized that Egypt had revolted, he only observed that he could live without the produce of Egypt. He was of a disposition naturally inclined to raillery and the ridicule of others. When his wife had been deceived by a jeweller, Gallienus ordered the malefactor to be placed in the circus, in expectation of being exposed to the ferocity of a lion. While the wretch trembled at the expectation of instant death, the executioner, by order of the emperor, let loose a capon upon him. An uncommon laugh was raised upon this, and the emperor observed, that he who had deceived others should expect to be deceived himself. In the midst of these ridiculous diversions, Gallienus was alarmed by the revolt of two of his officers, who had assumed the imperial purple. This intelligence roused him from his lethargy; he marched against his antagonists, and put all the rebels to the sword without showing the least favour either to rank, sex, or age. These cruelties irritated the people and the army; emperors were elected, and no less than thirty tyrants aspired to the imperial purple. Gallienus resolved boldly to oppose his adversaries; but in the midst of his preparations he was assassinated at Milan by some of his officers, in the 50th year of his age, A. D. 268.

GALLUS, vid. Alectryon.—Caius, a friend of the great Africanus, famous for his knowledge of astronomy, and his exact calculations of eclipses. [Livy states, that when a tribune in the army of Paulus Æmilius in Macedonia, he foretold an eclipse of the moon, first to the consul, and then with his leave to the Roman army. The eclipse took place on the evening before the great battle of Pydna, and the Romans, being prepared for it, were under no alarm, while their opponents were terrified and deemed it an omen of the fall of their king Perses.] Cic. de Senec.—Cornelius, a Roman knight, who rendered himself famous by his poetical, as well as military talents. He was passionately fond of the slave Lycoris or Cytheris, and celebrated her beauty in his poetry. She proved ungrateful, and forsook him to follow M. Antonv, which gave occasion to Virgil to write his tenth eclogue. Gallus, as well as the other poets of his age, was in the favour of Augustus, by whom he was appointed over Egypt. He became forgetful of the favour he received; he pillaged the province, and even conspired against his benefactor, according to some accounts, for which he was banished by the emperor. This disgrace operated so powerfully upon him, that he killed himself in despair, A. D. 26. Some few fragments remain of his poetry, and it seems that he particularly excelled in elegiac composition. It is said that Virgil wrote an eulogium on his poetical friend, and inserted it at the end of his Georgics; but that he totally suppressed it, for fear of offending his imperial patron, of whose favours Gallus had shown himself so undeserving; and instead of that he substituted the beautiful episode about Aristæus and Eurydice. This eulogium, according to some, was suppressed at the particular desire of Augustus. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 6 and 10.—Ovid. Amal. 3, el. 15, v. 29.—Vibius Gallus, a celebrated orator of Gaul, in the age of Augustus, of whose orations Seneca has preserved some fragments.—A Roman who assassinated Decius the emperor, and raised himself to the throne. He showed himself indolent and cruel, and beheld with the greatest indifference the revolt of his provinces, and the invasion of his empire by the barbarians. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, A. D. 253.—Flavius Claudius Constantinus, a brother of the emperor Julian, raised to the imperial throne under the title of Cæsar, by Constantius his relation. He conspired against his benefactor, and was publicly condemned to be beheaded, A. GAMELIA, a surname of Juno, as Gameilius was of Jupiter, on account of their presiding over marriages. [The name is Greek, (γαμηλιος,) and comes from γαμος, nuptiæ.]—A festival privately observed at three different times. The first was the celebration of a marriage, the second was in commemoration of a birth-day, and the third was an anniversary of the death of a person. As it was observed generally on the 1st day of January, marriages on that day were considered as of a good omen, and the month was called Gamelion among the Athenians. Cic. de Fin. 2, c. 31.

GANGARIDÆ, a people near the mouth of the Ganges. [Ptolemy assigns them a capital, called Ganga Regia, on the western side of the Ganges, which D'Anville places in lat. 24° 50', and whose site he makes to coincide with that of Raji-mohol. The Gagaridæ were allies of the Prasii, who lay nearer the Indus towards the north-west. The united forces of these two nations, awaited the army of Alexander on the other side the Hyphasis; but report made them so formidable for numbers and valour, that the wearied and alarmed Macedonians refused to cross the stream in spite of all the efforts and remonstrances of their king.] Justin. 12, c. 8—Curt. 9, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 27.—Flacc. 6, v. 67.

GANGES, [a famous river of India, which, in the language of Hindoostan is called Padda; and is also named Burra Gonga, or the Great River, and Gonga, or the river, by way of eminence; and hence the European name of the river is derived. The Sanscrit name of the Ganges (Padda) signifies foot, because the Brahmins, in their fabulous legends, make the river to flow from the foot of Beschan, who is the same with Vischnou or the preserving deity. This great stream, together with the Burrampooter, whose twin-sister it has not unaptly been denominated, has its source in the vast mountains of Thibet. It seeks the plains of Hindoostan by the west, and pursues the early part of its course through rugged vallies and defiles. After wandering about 300 miles through these mountainous regions, it issues forth a deity to the superstitious, yet gladdened, Hindoo. This river was unknown to Herodotus, as he does not mention it, though it became famous in a century afterward. Its source was for a long period involved in obscurity. A survey, however, has been recently made by the British-Indian government, and it has been found to issue in a small stream, under the name of Bhagirathi, from under a mass of perpetual snow accumulated on the southern side of the Himmaleh mountains, between 31° and 32° N. lat. and 78° and 79° E. long. It is computed to be 1500 miles in length, and at 500 miles from its mouth is, during the rainy season, 4 miles broad and 60 feet deep. Its principal tributaries are the Jumna, the Gogra, and the Burrampooter. The whole number of streams which flow into it are 11. About 200 miles from the sea the Delta of the Ganges commences by the dividing of the river. Two branches, the Cossimbazzar, and the Iellinghy, are given off to the west. These unite to form the Hoogley, or Bhagirathy, on which the port of Calcutta is situated. It is the only branch commonly navigated by ships, and in some years it is not navigable for two or three months. The only secondary branch which is at all navigable for boats, is the Chandah river. That part of the Delta which borders on the sea is composed of a labyrinth of creeks and rivers, called the Sunderbunds, with numerous islands, covered with the profuse and rank vegetation called jungle, affording haunts to numerous tigers. These branches occupy an extent of 200 miles along shore. The Ganges rises fifteen feet by the end of June, owing to the heavy rains. The remainder of its rise, which is in all thirty-two feet, is occasioned by the rains which fall in Bengal. By the end of July, all the lower parts of the country, adjoining the Ganges, as well as the Brahmapootra, are overflowed for a width of 100 miles, nothing appearing but villages, trees, and the sites of some villages which have been deserted. The line of the Ganges which lies between Gangotree, or the source of the leading stream, and Sagor island, below Calcutta, is held particularly sacred. The main body, which goes east to join the Brahmapootra, is not regarded with equal veneration. Wherever the river happens to run from south to north, contrary to its usual direction, it is considered peculiarly holy. The places most superstitiously revered are the junctions of rivers, called Prayags, the principal of which is that of the Jumna with the Ganges at Allohabad. In the British courts of justice, the water of the Ganges is used for swearing Hindoos, as the Koran is for Mahometans, and the Gospel for Christians.] Lucan. 3, v. 230.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 6, c. 87.—Curt. 8, c. 9.—Mela, 3, c. 7.—*Virg. [GANGETICUS sinus, now the Bay of Bengal, into which the Ganges falls.]

GANYMÈDES, a beautiful youth of Phrygia, son of Tros, and brother to Illus and Assaracus. According to Lucian, he was son of Dardanus. He was taken up to heaven by Jupiter as he was hunting, or rather tending his father's flock on Mount Ida, and he became the cup-bearer of the gods in the place of Hebe. Some say that he was carried away by an eagle. He is generally represented sitting on the back of a flying eagle in the air [The story of Ganymede, as here represented, is a mere fable. The true narrative is as follows. Tros, king of Troy, having made several conquests over the neighbouring nations, sent his son Ganymede, accompanied by some of his friends, into Lydia, to offer sacrifices in a temple consecrated to Jupiter. Tantalus, not knowing the king of Troy's intention, took these persons for spies, and having seized the young Ganymede, imprisoned him. He is said to have died in prison of grief at the insult offered him. Another account makes Tantalus to have kept him at his court to officiate as cup-bearer, and as Tantalus was reputed the son of Jupiter, he may have taken the surname of Jupiter himself. The eagle may denote the untimely death of the young prince, and the swiftness with which the short course of his life had passed away. Herodian, however, says that Ganymede was slain by his brother in some remote place, who afterwards decreed divine honours to him, giving out that Jupiter had carried him away. Banier's Mythology, vol. 3, p. 213.] Paus. 5, c. 24.—*Homer. GARAMANTES, [a people of Africa, south of Fazaania, deriving their name from the city of Garama, now Garmes. They were faintly known to the Romans under Augustus, in whose time some claim was made to a triumph over them, on which account they are mentioned by Virgil.] Æn. 6, v. 791.

GARGĀNUS, now St. Angelo, a lofty mountain of Apulia, which advances in the form of a promontory into the Adriatic Sea. [The promontory was called Garganum promontorium. Garganus was celebrated by the poets for its groves of oak.] Virg. Æn. 11, v. 257.—Lucan. 5, v. 830.

GARGĀPHIA, a valley near Platæa, with a fountain of the same name, where Actæon was torn to pieces by his dogs. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 156.

GARGĀRUS, (plur. a, orum), [a town of Troas, south-west of Antandros, on the shores of the Gulf of Adramyttium. It was situate on the mountain of the same name, which appears to have been the highest of the chain of Mount Ida. In Ptolemy, the name is erroneously given as Jarganon. By a similar error, we have it written Gadara in Hierocles. The country adjacent to Gargara was extremely productive.] Virg. G. 1, v. 103.—Macrob. 5, c. 20.—Strab. 13.—Plin. 5, c. 30.

GARUMNA, [now the Garonne, a river of Gaul which rises in the valley of Arran, to the south of Bertrand among the Pyrenees, and falls into the Oceanus Cantabricus, or Bay of Biscay. The general course of this river, which extends to about 250 miles, is north-west. After its junction with the Duranius, or Dordogne, below Burdegala, or Bordeaux, it assumes the name of Gironde. According to Julius Cæsar's division of Gallia, the Garumna was the boundary of Aquitania, and separated that district from Gallia Celtica. This river is navigable to Tolosa, or Toulouse; and communicates with the Mediterranean by means of the canal of Louis 14th, about 180 miles long, made through Languedoc.] Mela, 3, c. 2.

GAUGAMÈLA, a village near Arbela beyond the Tigris, where Alexander obtained his 3d victory over Darius. [But as Gaugamela was only a village, and as Arbela, a considerable town, stood near it, (Strabo and Arrian, however, say, at a considerable distance,) the Macedonians chose to distinguish the battle by the name of the latter place. Gaugamela is said to have signified in Persian, the house of the dromedary, so called because Darius the son of Hystaspes, escaped upon his dromedary across the deserts of Scythia, when retreating from the latter country; and having placed the animal here, appointed the revenue of certain villages for its maintenance. *Plut. GAULUS, [a small island, adjacent to Melite, or Malta, now called Gozo.]—[Another below the south shore of Crete, now called Gozo of Candia, for distinction sake from Gozo of Malta.]

GAURUS, a mountain of Campania, famous for its wines. Lucan. 2, v. 667.—Sil. 12, v. 160.—Stat. 3, Sylv. 5, v. 99.

GAZA, [one of the five Philistine satrapies or principalities, situate towards the southern extremity of Canaan, about 15 miles south of Ascalon, and a small distance from the Mediterranean. Its port was called Gazarum Portus. As the name of the city of Gaza appears in the first book of Moses, (10, c. 18,) Mela must of course be mistaken, who makes the name of Persian origin, and states that Cambyses made this place his chief magazine in the expedition against Egypt. It was, however, an important and strongly fortified place, as being situate so near the borders of that country. Alexander took and destroyed it, after it had made a powerful resistance for the space of two months. Antiochus the Great sacked it, and it was several times taken from the Syrians by the Maccabees. It was afterwards subjected to new losses, so that St. Luke states (Acts 8, 26,) that it was, in his time, a desert place. [Eras. Schmid, Beza, and Le Moyne, however, following the Syriac version, refer the word εγνωτος in the original, not to Gaza, but to the way leading towards it. They are refuted by Reland. Strabo notices "Gaza, the desert," which agrees with the Acts. The place was called Constantia afterwards. It is now termed by the Arabs Rassa, with a strong guttural expression. The ancient name in Hebrew signifies strong.]

GĒDRŌSIA, a barren province of Persia, [south and south-east of Carmania, and lying along the Mare Erythræum. It is now called Mekran. In passing through this country, the army of Alexander underwent very great hardships, from want of water and provisions, and from columns of moving sand, which had previously destroyed the forces of Semiramis and Cyrus. Its principal city was Pura, now Fohrea.] Strab. 2.

GĒLA, a town on the southern parts of Sicily, about 10 miles from the sea, according to Ptolemy, which received its name from a small river in the neighbourhood, called Gelas. It was built by a Rhodian and Cretan colony, 713 years before the Christian era. After it had continued in existence 404 years, Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, carried the inhabitants to Phintias, a town in the neighbourhood, which he had founded, and he employed the stones of Gela to beautify his own city. Phintias was also called Gela. The inhabitants were called Galenses, Geloi, and Gelani. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 702.—Paus. 8, c. 46.

GĒLLIA CORNELIA LEX, de Civitate, by L. Gellius and Cn. Cornel. Lentulus, A. U. C. 681. It enacted that all those who had been presented with the privilege of citizens of Rome by Pompey, should remain in the possession of that liberty.

AULUS GĒLLIUS, a Roman grammarian in the age of M. Antonius, about 130 A. D. He published a work which he called Noctes Atticæ, because he composed it at Athens during the long nights of winter. It is a collection of incongruous matter, which contains many fragments from the ancient writers, and often serves to explain antique monuments. It was originally composed for the improvement of his children, and abounds with many grammatical remarks. The best editions of A. Gellius are, that of Gronovius, 4to. L. Bat. 1706, and that of Conrad, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1762.

GĒLO and GĒLON, a son of Dinomenes, who made himself absolute at Syracuse, 491 years before the Christian era. He conquered the Carthaginians at Himera, and made his oppression popular by his great equity and moderation. He reigned seven years, and his death was universally lamented at Syracuse. He was called the father of his people, and the patron of liberty, and honoured as a demi-god. His brother Hiero succeeded him. Paus. 8, c. 42.—Herodot. 7, c. 153, &c.—Diod. 11.

GĒLŌNES and GĒLŌNI, a people of Scythia, inured from their youth to labour and fatigue. They painted themselves to appear more terrible in battle. They were descended from Gelonus, son of Hercules. Virg. G. 2, v. 15. Æn. 8, v. 725.—Mela, 1, c. 1.—Claudian in Ruf. 1, v. 315.

GĒMINI, a sign of the zodiac which represents Castor and Pollux, the twin sons of Leda.

GĒMONIÆ, a place at Rome where the carcasses of criminals were thrown. Suet. Tib. 53 and 61.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 74.

GĒNĀBUM, [a town of the Aureliani, on the Ligeris or Loire, which ran through it. It was afterwards called Aureliani, from the name of the people, and is now Orleans.] Cæs. B. C. 7, c. 3.—Lucan. 1, v. 440

GĒNAUNI, a people of Vindelicia. [vid. Brenni.] Horat. 4, od. 14, v. 10.

GĒNĒVA, a city of the Allobroges, at the western extremity of the Lacus Lemanus, or Lake of Geneva, on the south bank of the Rhodanus or Rhone. The modern name of Geneva is the same as the ancient.]

GĒNIUS, a spirit or dæmon, which, according to the ancients, presided over the birth and life of every man. vid. Dæmon.

GĒNSĒRIC, a famous Vandal prince, who passed from Spain to Africa, where he took Carthage. He laid the foundation of the Vandal kingdom in Africa, and in the course of his military expeditions, invaded Italy, and sacked Rome in July 455.

GĒNTIUS, a king of Illyricum, who imprisoned the Roman ambassadors at the request of Perseus king of Macedonia. This offence was highly resented by the Romans, and Gentius was conquered by Anicius and led in triumph with his family, B. C. 169. Liv. 43, c. 19, &c.

GĒNUA, now Genoa, a celebrated town of Liguria. [In the second punic war, Genua, then a celebrated emporium, took part with the Romans, and was, in consequence, plundered and burnt by Mago the Carthaginian. It was afterwards rebuilt by the Romans, and continued, with the rest of Italy, under their dominion, until the fall of their empire.] Liv. 21, c. 32, l. 23, c. 46, l. 30, c. 1.

GĒNŪSUS, now Semo, a river of Macedonia, falling into the Adriatic above Apollonia. Lucan. 5, v. 462.

GĒNŪTIA LEX, de magistratibus, by J. J.

Gentius the tribune, A. U. C. 411. It ordained that no person should exercise the same magistracy within ten years, or be invested with two offices in one year.

GEORGICA, a poem of Virgil in four books. The first treats of ploughing the ground, the second of sowing it; the third speaks of the management of cattle, &c. and in the fourth, the poet gives an account of bees, and of the manner of keeping them among the Romans. The word is derived from γῆς τέρατα, and ἔργον ὄπυς, because it particularly treats of husbandry. The work is dedicated to Mæcenas, the great patron of poetry in the age of Virgil. The author was seven years in writing and polishing it, and in that composition he showed how much he excelled all other writers. He imitated Hesiod, who wrote a poem nearly on the same subject, called Opera & Dies.

GERGOVIA, [a strong town and fortress of Gaul, belonging to the Arverni. It was situate on a very high mountain, and of difficult access on all sides. It is now Gergoie.]

GERMANIA, an extensive country of Europe, at the east of Gaul. [The name of the inhabitants is derived from wer, war, and man, a man, denoting warlike or brave men. The Roman alphabet, like the French, affording no w, this letter was converted into a soft g; and hence, with a Latin termination, we have the name Germani, and that of their country Germania. The Tungri first assumed this name on crossing the Rhine. It was afterwards applied by the Gauls to the other Germanic tribes, as they successively appeared, until at last it became an appellation for the whole of the natives of Germany. Their true name was Teutones.] Its inhabitants were warlike, fierce, and uncivilized, and always proved a watchful enemy against the Romans. Cæsar first entered their country, but he rather checked their fury than conquered them. His example was followed by his imperial successors, or their generals, who sometimes entered the country to chastise the insolence of the inhabitants. The ancient Germans were very superstitious, and in many instances, their religion was the same as that of their neighbours the Gauls, whence some have concluded that these two nations were of the same origin. They paid uncommon respect to their women, who, as they believed, were endowed with something more than human. They built no temples to their gods, and paid great attention to the heroes and warriors which their country had produced. Their rude institutions gradually gave rise to the laws and manners which still prevail in the countries of Europe, which their arms invaded or conquered. Tacitus, in whose age even letters were unknown among them, observed their customs with nicety, and has delineated them with the genius of an historian and the reflection of a philosopher. Tacit. de Morib. Germ.—Mela, 1, c. 3, l. 3, c. 3.—Cæs. Bell. G.—Strab. 4.

GERMANICUS CÆSAR, a son of Drusus and Antonia, the niece of Augustus. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius, and raised to the most important offices of the state. When his grandfather Augustus died, he was employed in a war in Germany, and the affection of the soldiers unanimously saluted him emperor. He refused the unseasonable honour, and appeased the tumult which his indifference occasioned. He continued his wars in Germany, and defeated the celebrated Arminius, and was rewarded with a triumph at his return to Rome. Tiberius declared him emperor of the east, and sent him to appease the seditions of the Armenians. But the success of Germanicus in the east was soon looked upon with an envious eye by Tiberius, and his death was meditated. He was secretly poisoned at Daphne near Antioch, by Piso, A. D. 19, in the 34th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greatest grief and the most bitter lamentations; and Tiberius seemed to be the only one who rejoiced in the fall of Germanicus. He had married Agrippina, by whom he had nine children, one of whom, Caligula, disgraced the name of his illustrious father. Germanicus has been commended, not only for his military accomplishments, but also for his learning, humanity, and extensive benevolence. In the midst of war he devoted some moments to study, and he favoured the world with two Greek comedies, some epigrams, and a translation of Aratus in Latin verse. Sueton.—

This name was common in the age of the emperors, not only to those who had obtained victories over the Germans, but even to those who had entered the borders of their country at the head of an army. Domitian applied the name of Germanicus, which he himself had vainly assumed, to the month of September, in honour of himself. Suet. in Dom. 13.—Martial. 9, ep. 2, v. 4.

GERMANII, a people of Persia. [These Germani are, according to Larcher, the same as the Germanii. "Some authors affirm," adds the French critic, "that the ancient Germans were descended from these people. Cluvier has with much politeness explained their mistake. But, observes Wesseling, there are some individuals of such wayward tempers, who since the discovery of corn still prefer feeding on acorns."] Herodot. 1, c. 125.

[GERRA, a city of Arabia Deserta, on the Sinus Persicus. It was enriched by commerce, and the principal articles of trade were the perfumes brought from the Sabæi, sent up the Euphrates to Thapsacus, and across the desert to Petra. This city, for the construction of whose houses and ramparts, stones of salt were used, appears to be represented by that now named El-Katif.]

GERRHÆ, a people of Scythia, in whose country the Borysthenes rises. The kings of Scythia were generally buried in their territories. Id. 4, c. 71.

GERRHUS, a river of Scythia. [D'Anville makes it the same with the Molosnijawodi.] Id. 1, c. 56.

GERONTHRE, a town of Laconia, where a yearly festival, called Geronthræa, was observed in honour of Mars. The god had there a temple with a grove, into which no woman was permitted to enter during the time of the solemnity. Puns. Lacon.

GÉRYON and GÉRYONES, a celebrated monster, born from the union of Chrysaor with Callirhoë, and represented by the poets as having three bodies and three heads. He lived in the island of Erythia, near Gades, where he kept numerous flocks, which were guarded by a two-headed dog, called Orthos, and by Eurythion. [The meaning of the fable appears to be this: Geryon was a prince who reigned over three places, Tartessus, Gades, and Erythia. Or else there were three princes in close alliance, who were considered as one person, so closely were they united. According to Bochart, Geryon did not reign in Spain, but in Epirus, and there it was that Hercules defeated him. For, observes this learned writer, besides that Hercules never was in Spain, it was not so much as known in his time.] Hercules, by order of Eurystheus, went to Erythia, and destroyed Geryon, Orthos, and Eurythion, and carried away all his flocks and herds to Tirynthus. Hesiod. Theog. 187.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 661, l. 8, v. 202.—Ital. 1, v. 277.—Apolod. 2.—Lucret. 5, v. 28.

GESSORIACUM, [a town of the Morini, in Gaul; it was afterwards named Bononia, and is now Boulogne.]

GETA, Septimus, a son of the emperor Severus, brother to Caracalla. In the eighth year of his age he was moved with compassion at the fate of some of the partisans of Niger and Albinus, who had been ordered to be executed; and his father, struck with his humanity, retracted his sentence. After his father's death he reigned at Rome conjointly with his brother; but Caracalla, who envied his virtues, and was jealous of his popularity, ordered him to be poisoned; and when this could not be effected, he murdered him in the arms of his mother Julia, who, in the attempt of defending the fatal blows from his body, received a wound in her arm from the hand of her son, the 28th of March, A. D. 212. Geta had not reached the 23d year of his age, and the Romans had reason to lament the death of so virtuous a prince, while they groaned under the cruelties and oppression of Caracalla.

GETÆ, (Geta, sing.) [a tribe of Scythians, who, according to Strabo, inhabited the arid and uncultivated plains lying between the mouths of the Ister and that of the Tyras, in which the army of Darius had nearly perished. They were first reduced under the Roman dominion in the reign of Trajan. To the strength and fierceness of barbarians, they added a contempt for life, which was derived from a persuasion of the immortality of the soul. This doctrine was taught them by Zamolxis, their early legislator. They are represented as the most daring and ferocious of mankind by all the classic writers. Arrian calls them Dacians; this name, however, more properly belongs to those of them who dwell in the interior, for their territory extended inwards to a considerable distance. The Getæ we undoubtedly the same people with those who were called Goths, and whose migrations were so extensive.] Ovid. de Pont. Trist. 5, el. 7, v. 111.—Strab. 7, Stat. 2.—Sylv. 2, v. 61, l. 3, f. 1, v. 17.—Lucan. 2, v. 54, l. 3, v. 95.

GIGANTES, the sons of Cœlus and Terra, who, according to Hesiod, sprang from the blood of the wound which Cœlus received from his son Saturn; whilst Hyginus calls them sons of Tartarus and Terra. [vid. the end of this article.] They are represented as men of uncommon stature, with strength proportioned to their gigantic size. Some of them, as Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges, had 50 heads and 100 arms, and serpents instead of legs. They were of a terrible aspect, their hair hung loose about their shoulders, and their beard was suffered to grow untouched. Pallene and its neighbourhood was the place of their residence. The defeat of the Titans, with whom they are often ignorantly confounded, and to whom they were nearly related, incensed them against Jupiter, and they all conspired to dethrone him. The god was alarmed, and called all the deities to assist him against a powerful enemy, who made use of rocks, oaks, and burning woods for their weapons, and who had already heaped mount Ossa upon Pelion to scale with more facility the walls of heaven. At the sight of such dreadful adversaries, the gods fled with the greatest consternation into Egypt, where they assumed the shape of different animals, to screen themselves from their pursuers. Jupiter, however, remembered that they were not invincible, provided he called a mortal to his assistance; and by the advice of Pallas, he armed his son Hercules in his cause. With the aid of this celebrated hero, the giants were soon put to flight and defeated. Some were crushed to pieces under mountains, or buried in the sea; and others were flayed alive, or beaten to death with clubs. (vid. Enceladus, Aloides, Porphyriion, Typhon, Otus, Titanes, &c.) The existence of giants has been supported by all the writers of antiquity, and received as an undeniable truth. Homer tells us that Tityus, when extended on the ground, covered nine acres; and that Polyphemus ate two of the companions of Ulysses at once, and walked along the shores of Sicily leaning on a staff which might have served for the mast of a ship. The Grecian heroes, during the Trojan war, and Turnus in Italy, attacked their enemies by throwing stones, which four men of the succeeding ages would be unable to move. Plutarch also mentions, in support of the gigantic stature, that Sertorius opened the grave of Antæus in Africa, and found a skeleton which measured six cubits in length. [The Giants appear to have been nothing more than the energies of nature personified, and the conflict between them and the gods, must allude to some tremendous convulsion of nature in very early times. vid. Lectonia. As regards the general question respecting the possible existence in former days of a gigantic race, it need only be observed, that if their structure be supposed to have been similar to that of the rest of our species, they must have been mere creatures of poetic imagination: they could not have existed. It is found that the bones of the human body are invariably hollow, and consequently well calculated to resist external violence. Had they been solid, they would have proved too heavy a burthen for man to bear. But this hollowness, while it is admirably well fitted for the purpose which has just been mentioned, and likewise subserves many other important ends in the animal economy, is not by any means well adapted for supporting a heavy superincumbent weight; on the contrary, it renders the bone weaker in this respect, than if the latter had been solid. The inference from all this is very plain. Man never was intended by his maker for a gigantic being, since his limbs could not in that event have supported him, and if giants ever did exist, they must necessarily have been crushed by their own weight. Or, had their bones been made solid, the weight of their limbs would have been so enormous, that these lofty beings must have remained as immovable as statues. That many of our species have attained a very large size is indisputable, but the world has never seen giants. A simple mode of life, abundance of nutritious food, and a salubrious atmosphere, give to all organic beings large and graceful forms. The term Giant, as used in Scripture, originates in an error of translation. In our version of holy writ six different Hebrew words are rendered by the same term giants, whereas they merely mean in general, persons of great courage, wickedness, &c., and not men of enormous stature, as is commonly supposed. Thus, too, when Nimrod is styled in the Greek version a giant before the Lord, nothing more is meant than that he was a man of extensive power.] Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Paus. 3, c. 2, &c.—*Ovid. GYNDES, [vid. Gyndes.]

[GIR, a river of Africa, which Ptolemy delineates as equal in length to the Niger, the course of each being probably about 1000 British miles. It ran from east to west, until lost in the same lake, marsh, or desert as the Niger. The Arabian geographer Edrisi seems to indicate the Ghir, when he speaks of the Nile of the negroes as running to the west, and being lost in an inland sea, in which was the island Ulil. Some have supposed the Gir of Ptolemy to be the river of Bornou, or Wadal-Gazel, which, joining another considerable river flowing from Kuku, discharges itself into the Nubia Palus, or Kangra, and it is so delineated in Rennel's map; but others, seemingly with better reason, apprehend the Gir of Ptolemy to be the Bahr-Kulla of Browne, in his history of Africa.]

GRACO, son of Himilco the Carthaginian general, was banished from his country by the influence of his enemies. He was afterwards recalled, and empowered by the Carthaginians to punish, in what manner he pleased, those who had occasioned his banishment. He was satisfied to see them prostrate on the ground, and to place his foot on their neck, showing that independence and forgiveness are two of the most brilliant virtues of a great mind. He was made a general soon after in Sicily, against the Corinthians, about 309 years before the Christian era; and by his success and intrepidity, he obliged the enemies of his country to sue for peace.

GLADIATORII LUDI, combats originally exhibited on the grave of deceased persons at Rome. They were first introduced at Rome by the Bruti, upon the death of their father, A. U. C. 488. It was supposed that the ghosts of the dead were rendered propitious by human blood; therefore at funerals, it was usual to murder slaves in cool blood. In succeeding ages, it was reckoned less cruel to oblige them to kill one another like men, than to slaughter them like brutes, therefore the barbarity was covered by the specious show of pleasure and voluntary combat. Originally captives, criminals, or disobedient slaves, were trained up for combat; but when the diversion became more frequent, and was exhibited on the smallest occasion, to procure esteem and popularity, many of the Roman citizens enlisted themselves among the gladiators, and Nero at one show exhibited no less than 400 senators and 600 knights. The people were treated with these combats not only by the great and opulent, but the very priests had their Ludi pontificales and Ludi sacerdotales. It is supposed that there were no more than three pair of gladiators exhibited by the Bruti. Their numbers, however, increased with the luxury and power of the city; and the gladiators became so formidable, that Spartacus, one of their body, had courage to take up arms, and the success to defeat the Roman armies, only with a train of his fellow-sufferers. The more prudent of the Romans were sensible of the dangers which threatened the state, by keeping such a number of desperate men in arms, and therefore, many salutary laws were proposed to limit their number as well as to settle the time in which the show could be exhibited with safety and convenience. Under the emperors, not only senators and knights, but even women engaged among the gladiators, and seemed to forget the inferiority of their sex. When there were to be any shows, hand-bills were circulated to give notice to the people, and to mention the place, number, time, and every circumstance requisite to be known. When they were first brought upon the arena, they walked round the place with great pomp and solemnity, and after that they were matched in equal pairs with great necity. They first had a skirmish with wooden files, called rudes or arma lusoria. After this the effective weapons, such as swords, daggers, &c. called arma decretoria, were given them, and the signal for the engagement was given by the sound of a trumpet. As they had all previously sworn to fight till death, or suffer death in the most excruciating torments, the fight was bloody and obstinate, and when one signified his submission by surrendering his arms, the victor was not permitted to grant him his life without the leave and approbation of the multitude. This was done by clenching the fingers of both hands between each other, and holding the thumbs upright close together, or by bending back their thumbs. The first of these was called pollicem premere, and signified the wish of the people to spare the life of the conquered. The other sign, called pollicem vertere, signified their disapprobation, and ordered the victor to put his antagonist to death. The victor was generally rewarded with a palm, and other expressive marks of the people's favour. He was most commonly presented with a pileus and rudis. When one of the combatants received a remarkable wound, the people exclaimed habet, and expressed their concern by shouts. The combats of gladiators were sometimes different, either in weapons or dress, whence they were generally distinguished into the following orders: The secutores were armed with a sword and buckler, to keep off the net of their antagonists, the retiarii. These last endeavoured to throw their net over the head of their antagonist, and in that manner entangle him, and prevent him from striking. If this did not succeed, they betook themselves to flight. Their dress was a short coat, with a hat tied under the chin with a broad ribbon. They wore a trident in their left hand. The thraeces, originally Thracians, were armed with a faulchion, and small round shield. The myrmillones, called also galli, from their Gallic dress, were much the same as the secutores. They were, like them, armed with a sword, and, on the top of their head-piece, they wore the figure of a fish embossed, called μορμυγος, whence their name. The hoplomachi, were completely armed from head to foot, as their name implies. The samnitæ, armed after the manner of Samnites, wore a large shield, broad at the top, and growing more narrow at the bottom, more conveniently to defend the upper parts of the body. The essedarii, generally fought from the essedum, or chariot used by the ancient Gauls and Britons. The andabata, ανδαραται, fought on horseback, with a helmet that covered and defended their faces and eyes. Hence andabatarum more pugnare, is to fight blindfolded. The meridiani, engaged in the afternoon. The postulatii were men of great skill and experience, and such as were generally produced by the emperors. The fiscales were maintained out of the emperor's treasury, fisculus. The dimacharii fought with two swords in their hands, whence their name. After these cruel exhibitions had been continued for the amusement of the Roman populace, they were abolished by Constantine the Great, near 600 years after their first institution. They were, however, revived under the reign of Constantius and his two successors, but Honorius for ever put an end to these cruel barbarities.

GLAPHÏRE and GLAPHÏRA, a daughter of Archelaus the high-priest of Bellona in Cappadocia, celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. She obtained the kingdom of Cappadocia for her two sons from M. Antony, whom she corrupted by defiling the bed of her husband. This amour of Antony with Glaphyra highly displeased his wife Fulvia, who wished Augustus to avenge his infidelity, by receiving from her the same favours which Glaphyra received from Antony.—Her grand-daughter bore the same name. She was a daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and married Alexander, a son of Herod, by whom she had two sons. After the death of Alexander, she married her brother-in-law Archelaus.

GLAUCÏPIS, a surname of Minerva, from the blueness of her eyes. [The term conveys at the same time the idea of brightness, and is said to refer more properly to a light-blue eye, with a bright and piercing expression, like what the Germans style a bluish-grey. Damm supposes this title applied to Minerva, from her seeing, like the owl, (to which bird a similar-coloured eye is given,) τα εν σκοτει ορατα, the things that are hid in darkness; that is, discovering by her wisdom what is concealed from the duller optics of man. Besides the owl, and Minerva, this epithet is applied also to serpents and lions.] Homer.—Hesiod.

GLAUCUS, a son of Hippolochus, the son of Bellerophon. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and had the simplicity to exchange his golden suit of armour with Diomedes for an iron one, whence came the proverb of Glauci et Diomedis permutatio, to express a foolish exchange. He behaved with much courage, and was killed by Ajax. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.—Martial. 9, ep. 96.—Hom. Il. 6.—A fisherman of Anthedon in Bœotia, son of Neptune and Nais, or, according to others, of Polybius the son of Mercury. As he was fishing he observed that all the fishes which he laid on the grass received fresh vigour as they touched the ground, and immediately escaped from him by leaping into the sea. He attributed the cause of it to the grass, and by tasting it, he found himself suddenly moved with a desire of living in the sea. Upon this he leaped into the water, and was made a sea-deity by Oceanus and Tethys, at the request of the gods. After this transformation he became enamoured of the Nereid Scylla, whose ingratitude was severely punished by Circe. [vid. Scylla.] He is represented like the other sea-deities with a long beard, dishevelled hair, and shaggy eyebrows, and with the tail of a fish. He received the gift of prophecy from Apollo, and, according to some accounts, he was the interpreter of Nereus. He assisted the Argonauts in their expedition, and foretold them, that Hercules and the two sons of Leda, would one day receive immortal honours. The fable of his metamorphosis has been explained by some authors, who observe that he was an excellent diver, who was devoured by fishes as he was swimming in the sea. *Ovid. He prevented his mares from having any commerce with the stallions, in the expectation that they would become swifter in running; upon which Venus inspired the mares with such fury, that they tore his body to pieces as he returned from the games which Adrastus had celebrated in honour of his father. He was buried at Potnia. Hygin. fab. 250.—Virg. G. 3, v. 367.—Apollod. 1 and 2.—A son of Minos the 2d, and Pasiphae, who was smothered in a cask of honey. His father, ignorant of his fate, consulted the oracle to know where he was, and received for answer, that the soothsayer who best described him an ox, which was of three different colours among his flocks, would best give him intelligence of his son's situation. Polyidus was found superior to all the other soothsayers, and was commanded by the king to find the young prince. When he had found him, Minos confined him with the dead body, and told him that he never would restore his liberty, if he did not restore him to life. Polyidus was struck with the king's severity; but while he stood in astonishment, a serpent suddenly came towards the body and touched it. Polyidus killed the serpent, and immediately a second came, who seeing the other without motion or signs of life, disappeared, and soon after returned with a certain herb in his mouth. This herb he laid on the body of the dead serpent, who was immediately restored to life. Polyidus, who had attentively considered what passed, seized the herb, and with it he rubbed the body of the dead prince, who was instantly raised to life. Minos received Glaucus with gratitude, but he refused to restore Polyidus to liberty before he taught his son the art of divination and prophecy. He consented with great reluctance, and when he was at last permitted to return to Argolis, his native country, he desired his pupil to spit in his mouth. Glaucus willingly consented, and from that moment he forgot all the knowledge of divination and healing which he had received from the instructions of Polyidus. Hyginus ascribes the recovery of Glaucus to Æsculapius. Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Hygin. 136 and 251, &c.—A son of Epytus, who succeeded his father on the throne of Messenia, about 10 centuries before the Augustan age. GORDIANUS, M. Antonius Africanus, a son of Metius Marcellus, descended from Trajan by his mother's side. In the greatest affluence he cultivated learning, and was an example of piety and virtue. He applied himself to the study of poetry, and composed a poem in 30 books upon the virtues of Titus Antoninus, and M. Aurelius. He was such an advocate for good breeding and politeness, that he never sat down in the presence of his father-in-law, Annius Severus, who paid him daily visits before he was promoted to the prætorship. He was some time after elected consul, and went to take the government of Africa in the capacity of proconsul. After he had attained his 80th year in the greatest splendour and domestic tranquillity, he was roused from his peaceful occupations by the tyrannical reign of the Maximini, and he was proclaimed emperor by the rebellious troops of his province. He long declined to accept the imperial purple, but the threats of immediate death gained his compliance. Maximinus marched against him with the greatest indignation; and Gordian sent his son, with whom he shared the imperial dignity, to oppose the enemy. Young Gordian was killed; and the father, worn out by age, and grown desperate on account of his misfortunes, strangled himself at Carthage, before he had been six weeks at the head of the empire, A. D. 236. He was universally lamented by the army and people.—M. Antonius Africanus, son of Gordianus, was instructed by Serenus Samonicus, who left him his library, which consisted of 62,000 volumes. His enlightened understanding and his peaceful disposition recommended him to the favour of the emperor Heliogabalus. He was made prefect of Rome, and afterwards consul, by the emperor Alexander Severus. He passed into Africa, in the character of lieutenant to his father, who had obtained that province, and seven years after he was elected emperor, in conjunction with him. He marched against the partisans of Maximianus, his antagonist in Mauritania, and was killed in a bloody battle on the 25th of June, A. D. 236, after a reign of about six weeks. He was of an amiable disposition, but he has been justly blamed by his biographers, on account of his lascivious propensities, which reduced him to the weakness and infirmities of old age, though he was but in his 46th year at the time of his death.—M. Antonius Pius, grandson of the first Gordian, was but 12 years old when he was honoured with the title of Cæsar. He was proclaimed emperor in the 16th year of his age, and his election was attended with universal marks of approbation. In the 18th year of his age he married Furia Sabina Tranquillina, daughter of Mithreus, a man celebrated for his eloquence and public virtues. Mithreus was intrusted with the most important offices of the state by his son-in-law; and his administration proved how deserving he was of the confidence and affection of his imperial master. He corrected the various abuses which prevailed in the state, and restored the ancient discipline among the soldiers. By his prudence and political sagacity, all the chief towns in the empire were stored with provisions, which could maintain the emperor and a large army during 15 days upon any emergency. Gordian was not less active than his father-in-law; and when Sapor, the king of Persia, had invaded the Roman provinces in the east, he boldly marched to meet him, and in his way defeated a large body of Goths in Mœsia. He conquered Sapor, and took many flourishing cities in the east from his adversary. In this success the senate decreed him a triumph, and saluted Mithreus as the guardian of the republic. Gordian was assassinated in the east, A. D. 244, by the means of Philip, who had succeeded to the virtuous Mithreus, and who usurped the sovereign power by murdering a warlike and amiable prince. The senate, sensible of his merit, honoured him with a most splendid funeral on the confines of Persia, and ordered that the descendants of the Gordians should ever be free, at Rome, from all the heavy taxes and burdens of the state. During the reign of Gordianus there was an uncommon eclipse of the sun, in which the stars appeared in the middle of the day.

GORDIUM, [a city of Galatia in Asia Minor, on the river Sangarius, a little to the east of Pessinus. Here was preserved the famous Gordian knot which Alexander cut, vid. Gordius. It changed its name in the reign of Augustus to Juliotopolis, which was given it by Cleo, a leader of some prædatory bands in this quarter. After the battle of Actium he declared for Augustus, and being thus left in safe possession of this city, which was his birth-place, changed its name out of compliment to the memory of Cæsar.] Justin. 11, c. 7.—Liv. 38, c. 18.—Curt. 3, c. 1.

GORDIUS, a Phrygian, who, though originally a peasant, was raised to the throne. During a sedition, the Phrygians consulted the oracle, and were told that all their troubles would cease as soon as they chose for their king the first man they met going to the temple of Jupiter mounted on a chariot. Gordius was the object of their choice, and he immediately consecrated his chariot in the temple of Jupiter. The knot which tied the yoke to the draught tree, was made in such an artful manner that the ends of the cord could not be perceived. From this circumstance a report was soon spread that the empire of Asia was promised by the oracle to him that could untie the Gordian knot. Alexander, in his conquest of Asia, passed by Gordium; and as he wished to leave nothing undone which might inspire his soldiers with courage, and make his enemies believe that he was born to conquer Asia, he cut the knot with his sword; and from that circumstance asserted that the oracle was really fulfilled, and that his claims to universal empire were fully justified. Justin. 11, c. 7.—Curt. 3, c. 1.—Arrian. 1.—A tyrant of Corinth. Aristot.

[GORGO, now Urgheng, the capital of the Chorasmii. vid. Chorasmii.]

GORGIAS, [a celebrated orator and sophist, born at Leontium in Sicily, whence he was surnamed Leontinus. He flourished in the 5th century before the Christian era, and was a disciple of Empedocles. He is reckoned one of the earliest writers on the art of rhetoric, and is thought to have introduced numbers into prose, treated of common places, and showed the use of them for the invention of arguments. Hence Plato gave the name of Gorgias to his elegant dialogue on this subject, which is still extant. He was so great an orator that in public assemblies he would undertake to declaim extempore on any subject proposed to him. In the war between Syracuse and Leontium, the citizens of the latter applied to the Athenians for succour, and sent as ambassadors Gorgias and Tisias, The eloquence of Gorgias so captivated the Athenians, that they ruined blindly into what proved for them so ruinous a contest. Gorgias afterwards made a display of his eloquence at the Olympic and Pythian games, on account of which a golden statue was erected to him at Delphi. Diodorus Siculus informs us that he received no less than 100 mina from each of his scholars, that is, £322 18s. 4d. sterling. The same historian informs us that he was the inventor of the art of Rhetoric, and the first who made use of studied figures and laboured antitheses of equal length and the same termination. This manner of speaking, Diodorus observes, pleased at first from its novelty, but was afterwards looked upon as affected, and, if frequently practised, ridiculous. He lived to his 108th year, and died B. C. 400. Only two fragments of his compositions are extant.] Paus. 6, c. 17.—Cic. in Orat. 22, &c.—Senect. 5, in Brut. 15.—Quintil. 3 and 12.

GORGO, the wife of Leonidas king of Sparta, &c.—The name of the ship which carried Perseus after he had conquered Medusa.

GORGONES, three celebrated sisters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whose names were Stheno, Euryale, and Medusa, all immortal except Medusa. According to the mythologists, their hairs were entwined with serpents, their hands were of brass, their wings of the colour of gold, their body was covered with impenetrable scales, and their teeth were as long as the tusks of a wild boar, and they turned to stones all those on whom they fixed their eyes. Medusa alone had serpents in her hair, according to Ovid, and this proceeded from the resentment of Minerva, in whose temple Medusa had gratified the passion of Neptune, who was enamoured of the beautiful colour of her locks which the goddess changed into serpents. Æschylus says, that they had only one tooth and one eye between them, of which they had the use each in her turn; and accordingly it was at the time that they were exchanging the eye that Perseus attacked them, and cut off Medusa's head. According to some authors, Perseus, when he went to the conquest of the Gorgons, was armed with an instrument like a scythe by Mercury, and provided with a looking-glass by Minerva, besides winged shoes, and a helmet of Pluto, which rendered all objects clearly visible and open to the view, while the person who wore it remained totally invisible. With weapons like these, Perseus obtained an easy victory; and after his conquest returned his arms to the different deities whose favours and assistance he had so recently experienced. The head of Medusa remained in his hands; and after he had finished all his laborious expeditions, he gave it to Minerva, who placed it on her ægis, with which she turned into stones all such as fixed their eyes upon it. It is said, that after the conquest of the Gorgons, Perseus took his flight in the air towards Æthiopia; and that the drops of blood which fell to the ground from Medusa's head were changed into serpents, which have ever since infested the sandy deserts of Libya. The horse Pegasus also arose from the blood of Medusa, as well as Chrysaor with his golden sword. The residence of the Gorgons was beyond the ocean towards the west, according to Hesiod. Æschylus makes them inhabit the eastern parts of Scythia; and Ovid, as the most received opinion, supports that they lived in the inland parts of Libya, near the lake of Triton, or the gardens of the Hesperides. Diodorus and others explain the fable of the Gorgons, by supposing that they were a warlike race of women near the Amazons, whom Perseus, with the help of a large army, totally destroyed. [The Abbe Baanier is of opinion that the Gorgons dwelt in that part of Lybia which was afterwards called Cyrenaica. He makes their father Phorcys to have been a rich and powerful prince, and engaged in a lucrative commerce. Perseus, he supposes, made himself master of some of his ships and riches. These ships were named Medusa, Stheno, and Euryale; and being laden with the teeth of elephants, the horns of fishes, and the eyes of hyenas, which Phorcys bartered for other goods, gave occasion to the particulars of the fable. This, it is said, is the mystery of the tooth, horn, and eye, which the Gorgons borrowed by turns; that is, the ships, in the course of the traffic above mentioned, when arrived in port, took each of them goods proper for the place to which they were bound.] *Hesiod. GORTYNA, [an inland city of Crete, being, according to Strabo, near 90 furlongs distant from the Lybicum Pelagus or African Sea. Its origin is obscure: some ascribe it to Gortyn, the son of Rhadamanthus, and others to Taurus, who carried off Europa. In process of time, however, it eclipsed all the cities of Crete, especially after the island was reduced under the Romans. Its ancient splendour is still attested at the present day by its numerous and extensive ruins. It was famed for the temples of Apollo, Diana, and Jupiter Hecatombæus, so called because Menelaus there sacrificed to Jupiter 100 oxen, when he received information of Helen's elopement. Its walls were washed by the river Lethe. Theophrastus, Varro, and Pliny, speak of a plane-tree near Gortyna, which never shed its leaves till new ones sprouted forth.] *C. GOTHI, [the Goths, Vandals, Burgundians, Gepidae, and Longobardi, were divisions of one people. From Scandinavia, where they left two considerable districts, which inherit their name at this day, the Goths crossed the Baltic, pursued for some time an eastward course along the shore, until they multiplied or confederated with other tribes, into a force which was adequate to the opposition they encountered. They afterwards ascended the Vistula, to that point where its most eastern stream runs at no great distance from the western branch of the Dnieper. They had nearly perished in the marshes of that dreary district. A part of the nation, and of the large droves of cattle, which constituted their only wealth, was left on the banks of the Przypiec. The most adventurous penetrated through the wilderness, and dispersed the Spali, a Sarmatic tribe, which opposed their passage. Filimer, the Gothic king, conducted his nation to the coast of the Euxine, where it afterwards increased into a numerous and formidable people, under the names of Visigoths and Ostrogoths. This distinction, which had been produced by local situations, was continued in their new settlements, though the ancient union of the Gothic tribes was remembered and acknowledged by themselves at the latest periods. The empire of Hermanuo, their greatest prince, extended to the Baltic, over all the Sarmatian, Finnish, and Vandalic stems; but was at length dissolved by the Huns. The Visigoths crossed the Danube, obtained a settlement within the Roman empire, and at length plundered Rome and Italy. They fixed their lasting residence in Spain, while their kindred, the Ostrogoths, took possession of Italy, at that time abandoned by the courage, freedom, and wisdom, which had formerly given it the sovereignty of Europe.]

GRACCHUS, T. Sempronius, father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, twice consul, and once censor, was distinguished by his integrity as well as his prudence and superior ability, either in the senate or at the head of the armies. He made war in Gaul, and met with much success in Spain. He married Sempronia, of the family of the Scipios, a woman of great virtue, piety, and learning. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48. Their children, Tiberius and Caius, who had been educated under the watchful eye of their mother, rendered themselves famous for their eloquence, seditions, and an obstinate attachment to the interests of the populace, which at last proved fatal to them. With a winning eloquence, affected moderation, and uncommon popularity, Tiberius began to renew the Agrarian law, which had already caused such dissensions at Rome. (vid. Agraria.) By the means of violence, his proposition passed into a law, and he was appointed commissioner, with his father-in-law Appius Claudius, and his brother Caius, to make an equal division of the lands among the people. The riches of Attalus, which were left to the Roman people by will, were distributed without opposition; and Tiberius enjoyed the triumph of his successful enterprise, when he was assassinated in the midst of his adherents by P. Nasica, while the populace were all unanimous to re-elect him to serve the office of tribune the following year. The death of Tiberius checked for a while the friends of the people; but Caius, spurred by ambition and furious zeal, attempted to remove every obstacle which stood in his way by force and violence. He supported the cause of the people with more vehemence, but less moderation, than Tiberius; and his success served only to awaken his ambition, and animate his resentment against the nobles. With the privileges of a tribune, he soon became the arbiter of the republic, and treated the patricians with contempt. This behaviour hastened the ruin of Caius, and in the tumult he fled to the temple of Diana, where his friends prevented him from committing suicide. This increased the sedition, and he was murdered by order of the consul Opimius, B. C. 121, about 13 years after the unfortunate end of Tiberius. His body was thrown into the Tiber, and his wife was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Caius has been accused of having stained his hands in the blood of Scipio Africanus the younger, who was found murdered in his bed. Plut. in vitâ.—Cic. in Cat. 1.—Lucan. 6, v. 796.—Flor. 2, c. 17, l. 3, c. 14, &c.—Sempronius, a Roman, banished to the coast of Africa for his adulteries with Julia the daughter of Augustus. GRADIVUS, a surname of Mars among the Romans, perhaps from αγδαίβιον, brandishing a spear. Though he had a temple without the walls of Rome, and though Numa had established the Salii, yet his favourite residence was supposed to be among the fierce and savage Thracians and Getæ, over whom he particularly presided. *Virg. GRÆCIA, [vid. remarks at the end of this article,] a celebrated country of Europe, bounded on the west by the Ionian Sea, south by the Mediterranean Sea, east by the Ægean, and north by Thrace and Dalmatia. It is generally divided into four large provinces: Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia or Hellas, and Peloponnesus. This country has been reckoned superior to every other part of the earth, on account of the salubrity of the air, the temperature of the climate, the fertility of the soil, and above all, the fame, learning, and arts of its inhabitants. The Greeks have severally been called Achæans, Argians, Danaï, Dolopes, Hellenians, Ionians, Myrmidons, and Pelasgians. The most celebrated of their cities were Athens, Sparta, Argos, Corinth, Thebes, Sicyon, Mycenæ, Delphi, Træzene, Salamis, Megara, Pylos, &c. The inhabitants, whose history is darkened in its primitive ages with fabulous accounts and traditions, supported that they were the original inhabitants of the country, and born from the earth where they dwelt; and they heard with contempt the probable conjectures which traced their origin among the first inhabitants of Asia, and the colonies of Egypt. In the first periods of their history, the Greeks were governed by monarchs, and there were as many kings as there were cities. The monarchical power gradually decreased; the love of liberty established the republican government; and no part of Greece, except Macedonia, remained in the hands of an absolute sovereign. The expedition of the Argonauts first rendered the Greeks respectable among their neighbours; and in the succeeding age the wars of Thebes and Troy gave opportunity to their heroes and demi-gods to display their valour in the field of battle. The simplicity of the ancient Greeks rendered them virtuous; and the establishment of the Olympic games in particular, where the noble reward of the conqueror was an olive crown, contributed to their aggrandizement, and made them ambitious of fame, and not the slaves of riches. The austerity of their laws, and the education of their youth, particularly at Lacedæmon, rendered them brave and active, insensible to bodily pain, fearless and intrepid in the time of danger. The celebrated battles of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis, Plataea, and Mycale, sufficiently show what superiority the courage of a little army can obtain over millions of undisciplined barbarians. After many signal victories over the Persians, they became elated with their success; and when they found no one able to dispute their power abroad, they turned their arms one against the other, and leagued with foreign states to destroy the most flourishing of their cities. The Messenian and Peloponnesian wars are examples of the dreadful calamities which arise from civil discord and long prosperity; and the success with which the gold and the sword of Philip and of his son corrupted and enslaved Greece, fatally proved that when a nation becomes indolent and dissipated at home, it ceases to be respectable in the eyes of the neighbouring states. The annals of Greece, however, abound with singular proofs of heroism and resolution. The bold retreat of the 10,000, who had assisted Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes reminded their countrymen of their superiority over all other nations; and taught Alexander that the conquest of the east might be effected with a handful of Grecian soldiers. While the Greeks rendered themselves so illustrious by their military exploits, the arts and sciences were assisted by conquest, and received fresh lustre from the application and industry of their professors. The labours of the learned were received with admiration, and the merit of a composition was determined by the applause or disapprobation of a multitude. Their generals were orators; and eloquence seemed to be so nearly connected with the military profession, that he was despised by his soldiers who could not address them upon any emergency with a spirited and well delivered oration. The bearing, as well as the virtues of Socrates, procured him a name; and the writings of Aristotle have, perhaps, gained him a more lasting fame than all the conquests and trophies of his royal pupil. Such were the occupations and accomplishments of the Greeks, their language became almost universal, and their country was the receptacle of youths of the neighbouring states, where they imbibed the principles of liberty and moral virtue. The Greeks planted several colonies, and totally peopled the western coasts of Asia Minor. In the eastern parts of Italy there were also many settlements made; and the country received from its Greek inhabitants the name of Magna Græcia. For some time Greece submitted to the yoke of Alexander and his successors; and at last, after a spirited, though ineffectual struggle in the Achæan league, it fell under the power of Rome, and became one of its independent provinces governed by a proconsul. [The Romans made two provinces of Greece. Upon the overthrow of the Achæan confederacy they reduced the Peloponnesus, together with all Greece Proper, except Macedonia, Thessaly, and Epirus, into a province called Achaia. Subsequently, upon the defeat and capture of Perses, they formed Macedonia, Thessaly, and Epirus into the proconsular province of Macedonia. The most general name for Greece among the natives was Hellas, (Ἑλλάς.) This was at first a specific name for a district in the south-eastern part of Thessaly, where Hellen was said to have reigned, and from whom it derived its name. The term was subsequently applied to the whole of Thessaly, and at last to all Greece, Thessaly excluded. The word Græcia was not legally recognised by the Romans, though sufficiently familiar to them in writing and conversation. The early inhabitants of Greece may be divided into three classes. 1. The Graici, (Γραικοί), afterwards named Hellenes, (Ἑλληνες). 2. The Leleges, including the Curetes. 3. The Pelasgi. According to the best authorities the first inhabitants of Greece were a rude and barbarous race, living in forests and caves, ignorant of agriculture, without cities or social regulations of any kind, and unacquainted even with the use of fire. Their general name was Graici. In confirmation of this last remark we have nothing but a few scattered passages in the ancient writers; but which, however, are fully to the point. Aleman, and after him, Sophocles, speak of the Graici as the progenitors of the Hellenes. To the same purport are, Aristotle; (Meteor. 1, 14,) the Parian Marble, (lin. 11,) and Eusebius, (Chron. l. 1, p. 14,) as also Apollonius, (1, 7, §3.) These authorities, at first view, may seem to relate only to the Hellenes, as a portion of the main race, but it must be recollected that the authors cited use the term Hellenes in the meaning it bore in a later age, when it designated the whole Grecian community; to say nothing of the manifest traces of a common origin in the different dialects throughout the land. Graici, therefore, was a general appellation for the original inhabitants. In Greece, however, it gradually disappeared, and was succeeded by the name of Hellenes; but in Italy, remained during every subsequent period in the mouths of the Latins, as the appellation by which they characterised their eastern neighbours. This admits of a very easy solution if we suppose, as the facts themselves fully warrant, that the inhabitants of Italy were indebted to the Pelasgi for the first knowledge they received of the inhabitants of Greece. At the period of the Pelasgic emigration to the west, the Hellenic branch had but just begun to spread their name and sway over Greece, and hence the Pelasgi brought with them into Italy the original name Graici, as the most general appellation of the people whom they had just left; which, being shortened after the Æolic manner, became also Graii. This name of Graeci and Graii remained for ever after in current use among the Latins, even though they subsequently received more correct information on the subject, and knew that the appellation had become obsolete in the parent country, and was superseded by another. The original stem of the Graici divided itself into the two branches of Hellenes and Iones. The former occupied the northern, the latter the southern portion of Greece, and in Bœotia they bordered upon each other. The Hellenes received the first rudiments of civilization from the Pelasgi, and subsequently became more and more improved by wanderers from the east, who settled among them, such as Cadmus and others. The Hellenes were led from their original settlements in the vicinity of Parnassus, under the conduct of Deucalion, into the south-eastern part of Thessaly. By some they have been derived from the regions of Caucasus, principally on the strength of a later mythology which makes Deucalion a son of the Titan Prometheus. The earlier mythology, however, is silent on this head, and indeed, how could Deucalion be thus descended, when Prometheus had lain already 13 generations before the time of Hercules on the rocks of Caucasus? By the ancient writers Hellen is spoken of as a son of Deucalion, and king of the Hellenes, but it would rather seem that he was merely an imaginary personage, as we read of no enterprise achieved by him, and that the origin of the name Hellenes is in fact lost in obscurity. Of the sons of this Hellen, or more properly perhaps of Deucalion, Æolus maintained possession of the conquests made in the south-eastern part of Thessaly, while Dorus retired into northern Thessaly and established himself there after driving out the Pelasgi. Here his descendants remained until after the Trojan war, when necessity compelled them, as is mentioned below, to move towards the southern parts of Greece. The third son Xuthus, however, acted a more important part. Wishing to appropriate to himself his father's treasures, he was driven out by Æolus, and appears to have moved southward with a band of Achæi. His history is involved in obscurity and fable. According to the common account, he proceeded to Attica, where he married the daughter of Erechtheus king of Athens, and became the father of two sons, Achæus and Ion, the latter of whom gave name to the Ionic race. The old Athenian traditions, however, contradict all this. According to them Ion was a son of Apollo, and Xuthus an Achæan, and son of Æolus. The meaning of this evidently is, that Xuthus, of Æolian origin, came with a band of Achæi to Attica, and having strengthened his forces by the addition of Ionians, proceeded to make conquests in the Peloponnesus. Hence he was fabled to have been the father of Achæus and Ion. As regards his Æolic origin, it must be remarked that the Hellenes were subdivided into Dorians and Æolians, and that the Achæi were a branch of the latter. A portion of these Achæi so led into the Peloponnesus by Xuthus, regretting their original seats in Thessaly, separated from him, and moved back to the north. In Bœotia they formed an union with several other tribes, and entering southern Thessaly, not only regained their ancient possessions, but having driven before them the Pelasgi, and having taken the Pelasgic city of Larissa on the river Peneus, they became in the end the most powerful branch of the Æolic race. From them the whole southern part of Thessaly received the name of Achæia. They forgot not, however, their brethren whom they had left behind in the Peloponnesus, and whenever any overflow of population required to be diminished by a colony, or any quarrel between contending leaders drove any portion of their number to seek new settlements elsewhere, they invariably moved southward to the Peloponnesus. In this way Pelops with his Achæan followers seems to have passed even from Phrygia to the Peloponnesus, and to have given it his name. The Achæi in this latter country soon became as powerful as their brethren of Thessaly, the kingdoms of Argos, Elis, Messeni, and Lacedæmonia successively arose, among which Argos was the most powerful, and exercised a direct controul over the rest. The Achæi thus became the most important of the Grecian tribes, and none other dared to withstand the mandates of the house of Pelops, which, as it reigned in Argos, stood consequently at the head of the Achæan race. Hence the power of Agamemnon in the war of Troy, and the claim which he asserted, and which no one dared to oppose, of being the leader of the combined forces of the Greeks in that well known expedition. And hence too the reason why Homer so often sings of the mighty Achæi, the Danai, and their subdivisions, and makes so little mention of the Hellenes, who were merely the main stem in fact to which they all belonged. The Trojan war ended the power and supremacy of the Achæi. In every part of Greece, owing to the absence of the leaders and the warlike part of the population, weakness and disorder ensued. The Pelasgi, who had been driven into Epirus, re-entered and established themselves in Thessaly. The old inhabitants were compelled in a great measure to fly. The Æolians and Achæi in southern Thessaly retired in part to the range of Mount Oeta; the Magnesians kept possession of their old abodes; but the main body wandered into Bœotia, Locris, Eubœa, and finally to the coast of Asia, where, 60 years before, their forefathers had fought against Troy. The Dorians at first retired to the vicinity of Oeta and Parnassus, where a part of them remained for ever after, but the greater number migrated in like manner to the east. A third part, however, led on by the descendants of Hercules, after many ineffectual attempts to enter the Peloponnesus, at last succeeded in the 80th year after the Trojan war. The Achæi were defeated, and the Dorians thenceforward became masters of the Peloponnesus. In Elis only, through the apparent consent of the conquerors, an Achæan race seems to have retained its authority. The main body of the Achæi were compelled to find new settlements by driving out the Ionians who had settled along the coast of the Corinthian gulf, which tract of country received thereafter the appellation of Achaia. The Ionians thus driven out sought refuge among their brethren in Attica, but were compelled eventually, in consequence of their overflowing numbers, to form emigration, like the Æolians and Dorians, to the shores of Asia. Greece, after these commotions, began to enjoy comparative tranquillity, and the name Hellenes to be gradually used as a common term for the different members of the Grecian family, especially as they were all the descendants of one common race, the Graici; and hence too appears the reason why Thessaly, which at first meant Hellas alone, was excluded from the meaning of the term when it now began to be applied to the whole of Greece, for the Pelasgi had re-conquered Thessaly, it was become a Pelasgic land, and the Pelasgi, as Herodotus informs us, were a people of different origin from the Greeks. It must be confessed, however, that Homer, who in general uses the terms Hellenes and Hellas with reference to a small part of Thessaly, on one occasion speaks of the Panhellenes, indicating the whole Greek nation; but the line in which it occurs has been pronounced to be corrupt, and the term Panhellenes appears to have been first used by the poet Hesiod. The length of the present article precludes any remarks in this place upon the Iones, Leleges, and Pelasgi, they will be treated of under their respective heads.]

GRÆCIA MAGNA, [a name given to the southern part of Italy, comprising Apulia, Messapia or Japygia, called also Calabria, Lucania, and the country of the Bruttii. It derived the name of Græcia from the number of Greek colonies which migrated thither at different periods, and the epithet magna or great, from mere ostentation, according to Pliny. The Greeks who settled here were principally Dorians, and the emigration is said to have taken place at a very early period, about 1055 B. C. Magna Græcia was famed for the Pythagorean philosophy, which flourished throughout a great part of it, especially in the cities along the Sinus Tarentinus.] Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 64.—Strab. &c.

GRAMPIUS MONS, [a mountain of Caledonia, forming one of a large range of mountains extending from east to west through almost the whole breadth of modern Scotland, from Loch Lomond to Stonehaven. The range is now called the Grampian hills, and the name is derived from the Mons Grampius, which is mentioned by Tacitus, and was the spot where Galgacus waited the approach of Agricola, and where was fought the battle so fatal to the brave Caledonians. To the Grampian chain belong Ben Lomond, 3262 feet high; Ben Ledy, 3009; Ben More, 3903; Ben Laureis, the chief summit, 4015, &c.] Tacit. Agric. 29.

GRANICUS, a river of Bithynia [a little to the west of Cyzicus,] famous for the battle fought between the armies of Alexander and Darius, 22d of May, B. C. 334, when 600,000 Persians were defeated by 30,000 Macedonians. [It is now a torrent called Ousvold.] Diod. 17.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin.—Curt. 4, c. 1.

GRATIE, three goddesses. vid. Charites.

GRATIUS, [a Roman emperor, son of Valentinian 1st, born at Sirmium in Pannonia, A. D. 359. He was appointed by his father to a share of the empire, when he was but eight years old; and was in his seventeenth year when his father died. At this time Gratian was keeping his court at Treves, and was ignorant of what had happened, till he was informed that the officers of the army had appointed as his partner on the throne, Valentinian 2d, the younger son of the late emperor by his wife Justina. Gratian, though hurt at the assumption of authority on the part of the army, yet readily ratified the election, and ever treated his brother with affection and kindness. The western empire was nominally divided between them, but the superior age of Gratian gave him all the power. He is praised for recalling his mother to court, who had been divorced and banished by his father, and for the punishment of many officers of state who had abused their power by cruelty and injustice; but he is blamed for putting to death the renowned general Theodosius, who fell a victim to the jealousy of some rival courtiers.] His courage in the field was as remarkable as his love of learning and fondness of philosophy. He slaughtered 30,000 Germans in a battle, and supported the tottering state by his prudence and intrepidity. [He gave himself up afterwards to unmanly pleasures, and gradually lost the affections of his subjects. Maximinus was declared emperor by the legions in Britain; and Gratian, deserted by nearly all his troops, fled into Gaul. Here he took refuge at Lyons, but was betrayed into the hands of a commander of Maximinus by the governor of the town, and put to death in the 8th year of his reign.]

GRATIUS FALISCUS, a Latin poet contemporary with Ovid, and mentioned only by him among the more ancient authors. He wrote a poem on coursing, called Cynegeticon, much commended for its elegance and perspicuity. It may be compared to the Georgics of Virgil, to which it is nearly equal in the number of verses. [The best edition is that given by Wernsdorff in the Poetæ Latini Minores. Alten. 1780-8, 10 vols. 12mo.] Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 16, v. 34.

GREGORIUS, [surnamed Thaumaturgus, or Wonder-worker, from the miracles which he pretended to perform. Before his conversion to Christianity he was known by the name of Theodorus. He was born at Neo-Cæsarea, and was a disciple of Origen, from whom he imbibed the principles of the Christian faith. He was afterwards made bishop of his native city, and is said to have left only seventeen idolaters in his diocese, where he had found only seventeen Christians.] Of his works, are extant his gratulatory oration to Origen, a canonical epistle, and other treatises in Greek, the best edition of which is that of Paris, fol. 1622.—Nanzianzen, [born near Nazianzus in Cappadocia,] surnamed the Divine, was bishop of Constantinople, which he resigned on its being disputed. His writings rival those of the most celebrated orators of Greece in eloquence, sublimity, and variety. His sermons are more for philosophers than common hearers, but replete with seriousness and devotion. Erasmus said that he was afraid to translate his works, from the apprehension of not translating into another language the smartness and acumen of his style, and the stateliness and happy diction of the whole. He died A. D. 339. The best edition is that of the Benedictines, the first volume of which, in fol. was published at Paris, 1778.—A bishop of Nyssa, author of the Nicene creed. His style is represented as allegorical and affected; and he has been accused of mixing philosophy too much with theology. His writings consist of commentaries on Scripture, moral discourses, sermons on mysteries, dogmatical treatises, panegyrics on saints; the best edition of which is that of Morell, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1615. The bishop died A. D. 396.—Another Christian writer, whose works were edited by the Benedictines, in four vols. fol. Paris, 1705.

GRUDII, a people tributary to the Nervii, supposed to have inhabited the country near Tournay or Bruges in Flanders. Cæs. G. 5, c. 38.

GRYLLUS, a son of Xenophon, who killed Epaminondas, and was himself slain at the battle of Mantinea, B. C. 363. His father was offering a sacrifice when he received the news of his death, and he threw down the garland which was on his head; but he replaced it, when he heard that the enemy's general had fallen by his hands; and he observed that his death ought to be celebrated with every demonstration of joy rather than of lamentation. Aristot.—Paris. 8, c. 11, &c.

GRYNÆUM and GRYNIUM, [a town of Æolia, on the coast of Lydia, and near the northern confines. It lay north-west of Cumæ.] Apollo had here a temple with an oracle, on account of which he is called Grynæus. Strab. 13.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 72. JEn. 4, v. 345.

GYÆRUS and GYÆROS, [a small island of the Archipelago, classed by Stephanus Byzantinus among the Sporades, but belonging rather to the Cyclades. It lay south-west of Andros, off the coast of Attica. The Romans, in the time of the emperors, made it a place of exile.] Juv. 1, 73.—Ovid. 7, Met. 407.

GYGES or GYES, a son of Cælus and Terra, represented as having 50 heads and a hundred hands. He with his brothers, made war against the gods, and was afterwards punished in Tartarus. Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 7, v. 18.—The minister and favourite of Candaules, king of Lydia, to whom, according to some accounts, the latter, ardently attached to his queen, and believing her beauty beyond all competition, showed her naked. This he did in order that Gyges, to whom he frequently extolled her charms, might be able to judge for himself. The queen discovered the affair, and was so incensed at this instance of imprudence and infirmity in her husband, that she ordered Gyges either to prepare for death himself, or murder Candaules. He chose the latter, and married the queen, and ascended the vacant throne about 718 years before the Christian era. He was the first of the Mermaidæ who reigned in Lydia. He reigned thirty-eight years, and distinguished himself by the immense presents which he made to the oracle of Delphi. [The wife of Candaules above mentioned was called Nyssia according to Hephæstion. The story of Rosamund, queen of the Lombards, as related by Gibbon, bears an exact resemblance to this of Candaules.] According to Plato, Gyges was a shepherd in the service of the Lydian king, and descended into a chasm of the earth, where he found a brazen horse, whose sides he opened, and saw within the body, the carcass of a man of uncommon size, from whose finger he took a famous brazen ring. This ring, when put on his finger, rendered him invisible; and by means of its virtue, he introduced himself to the queen, murdered her husband and married her, and usurped the crown of Lydia. [Xenophon says that he was a slave. Plutarch states that Gyges took up arms against Candaules, assisted by the Milesians. The opinion of Herodotus, which is that first given by Lempriere, seems preferable to the rest. Born in a city contiguous to Lydia, no person could be better qualified to represent the affairs of that kingdom than he was.] Herodot. 1, c. 3.—Plat. dial. 10, de rep.

GYLIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian, sent B. C. 414, by his countrymen to assist Syracuse against the Athenians. He obtained a celebrated victory over Nicias and Demosthenes, the enemy's generals, and obliged them to surrender. He accompanied Lysander in his expedition against Athens, and was present at the taking of that celebrated town. After the fall of Athens, he was intrusted by the conqueror with the money which had been taken in the plunder, which amounted to 1500 talents. As he conveyed it to Sparta, he had the meanness to unsew the bottom of the bags which contained it, and secreted about three hundred talents. His theft was discovered; and to avoid the punishment which he deserved, he fled from his country, and by this act of meanness tarnished the glory of his victorious actions. Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 199.—Plut. in Nicias.—An Arcadian in the Rutulian war. Ving. Æn. 12, v. 272.

GYMNASIUM, a place among the Greeks, where all the public exercises were performed, and where not only wrestlers and dancers exhibited, but also philosophers, poets, and rhetoricians repeated their compositions. The room was high and spacious, and could contain many thousands of spectators. The laborious exercises of the Gymnasium were running, leaping, throwing the quoit, wrestling, and boxing, which was called by the Greeks πενταθλον, and by the Romans quinqertium. In riding, the athlete led a horse, on which he was sometimes mounted, conducting another by the bridle, and jumping from the one upon the other. Whoever came first to the goal, and jumped with the greatest agility, obtained the prize. In running a-foot, the athletes were sometimes armed, and he who came first was declared victorious. Leaping was an useful exercise: its primary object was to teach the soldiers to jump over ditches, and pass over eminences during a siege, or in the field of battle. In throwing the quoit, the prize was adjudged to him who threw it farthest. The quoits were made either of wood, stone, or metal. The wrestlers employed all their dexterity to bring their adversary to the ground, and the boxers had their hands armed with gauntlets, called also cestus. Their blows were dangerous, and often ended in the death of one of the combatants. In wrestling and boxing, the athletes were often naked, whence the word Gymnasium, γυμνος, nudus. They anointed themselves with oil to brace their limbs, and render their bodies slippery and more difficult to be grasped. Plin. 2, ep. 17.—C. Nep. 20, c. 5.

GYMNESIÆ, [vid. Balaeres.]

GYMNOSOPHISTÆ, a class of Indian philosophers, who were called gymnosophists, (γυμνοσοφισταί), or naked philosophers, by the Greeks, from their going naked. [vid. the end of this article.] For 37 years they exposed themselves in the open air to the heat of the sun, the inclemency of the seasons, and the coldness of the night. They were often seen in the fields fixing their eyes full upon the disk of the sun from the time of its rising till the hour of its setting. Sometimes they stood whole days upon one foot in burning sand, without moving or showing any concern for what surrounded them. Alexander was astonished at the sight of a sect of men who seemed to despise bodily pain, and who injured themselves to suffer the greatest tortures without uttering a groan, or expressing any marks of fear. The conqueror condescended to visit them, and his astonishment was increased when he saw one of them ascended a burning pile with firmness and unconcern, to avoid the infirmities of old age, and stand upright on one leg and unmoved, while the flames surrounded him on every side. Æt. Calanus. [The Gymnosophists are of ten confounded with the Brachmani: but this latter is properly the name of only one class of these philosophers, who were divided into several sects. The Brachmans were all of one tribe, and as they grew up, had a succession of instructors. They were in a state of pupillage until thirty-six years of age; after which they were allowed to live more at large, to wear fine linen and gold rings, to live upon the flesh of animals not employed in labour, and to marry as many wives as they pleased. Others submitted, through their whole lives, to a stricter discipline, and passed their days upon the banks of the Ganges with no other food than fruit, herbs, and milk. The Samanæans were a society formed of those who voluntarily devoted themselves to the study of divine wisdom. They gave up all private property, and committed their children to the care of the state, and their wives to the protection of their relations. They were supported at the public expense. It is of this sect in particular that the wonderful circumstance is related, of their throwing themselves into a fire which they had prepared for the occasion, when from ill health or misfortunes they had grown tired of the world. There was another sect, called Hylobians, who lived entirely in forests, upon leaves and wild fruits, wore no other clothing than the bark of trees, and practised the severest abstinence of every kind. From this account, it is easy to perceive that the Indian Gymnosophists were more distinguished for severity of manners than for the cultivation of science, and that they more resembled modern monks than any ancient philosophers.] Strab. 15, &c.—Plin. 7, c. 2.—*Cic. GYMNEOTHENAS, a name of Mars at Tegea, on account of a sacrifice offered by the women without the assistance of the men, who were not permitted to appear at this religious ceremony. Paus. 8, c. 43.

GYNDES, now Zeindeh, a river of Assyria, falling into the Tigris. When Cyrus marched against Babylon, his army was stopped by this river, in which one of his favourite horses was drowned. This so irritated the monarch that he ordered the river to be conveyed into 360 different channels by his army, so that after this division it hardly reached the knee. [This portrait of Cyrus seems a little overcharged. The hatred which the Greeks bore the Persians is sufficiently known. The motive of Cyrus for thus treating the Gyndes could not be such as is described by Herodotus. That which happened to the sacred horse might make him apprehend a similar fate for the rest of his army, and compel him to divert the river into a great number of canals in order to render it fordable. The Gyndes, at the present day, has re-assumed its course to the Tigris, and its entrance into that river is called Foum-el-Saleh, or the river of peace, in Arabic. The name given it by the Turks in the place whence it issues, is Kara-Sou, or the black river.] Herodot. 1, c. 189 and 202.

GYTHIUM, a sea-port town of Laconia, at the mouth of the Eurotas, in Peloponnesus, built by Hercules and Apollo, who had there desisted from their quarrels. The inhabitants were called Gytheatae. [Livy (34, 29.) speaking of the wars in Greece, in the time of T. Quinctius Flaminius, describes it as very strong and well peopled. Gythium was at the same time the arsenal and harbour of Sparta, though the town itself did not lie exactly upon the sea. The distance, however, was very short. The harbour of Gythium was about 30 stadia to the east of the town, and was more a work of art than of nature. It was strongly fortified, as has already been observed. The earlier name was Trinasus, (three islands,) from some small islands lying in front. The modern city Colochina is situate more to the east, near the mouth of the Eurotas.] Cic. Offic. 3, c. 11.

HÆMUS, [a chain of mountains forming the northern boundary of Thrace, and separating it from Mœsia. This chain has been much celebrated by the ancients, on account of its great elevation and extent, as they inferred from the numerous and large rivers which issued from its sides. Dr. Brown, however, who visited parts of this chain, states that the elevation cannot be considerable, because no summit of it is covered with perpetual snow. The middle parts of this chain were called by the ancients Scomius and Orbalus, while the Scardus may be considered as its farthest branch to the west. The farthest eastern point is Hæmi Extrema, jutting out into the Euxine, now called Eminch-borum. The chain to the west of this is called Eminsh Dag; in the middle, it is styled Bulkan and Samoco, farther on, Joan, while the Despoto Dag branches off to the south-east, and may be the Rhodope of the ancients. The whole length of the chain is about 400 miles.] It receives its name from Hæmus, son of Boreas and Orithyia, who married Rhodope, and was changed into this mountain for aspiring to divine honours. Strab. 7, p. 313.—Plin. 4, c. 11.—*Ovid. HALCYONE. vid. Alcyone.

HALIARTUS, a town of Bœotia, [on the southern shore of the Lacus Copais, and north-west of Thebes.] It was founded by Haliartus, the son of Thersander. The monuments of Pandion king of Athens, and of Ly-sander the Lacedæmonian general, were seen in that town. [It was destroyed by the army of Xerxes because it favoured the Athenians. Reviving soon from this blow, it became a flourishing place, until, in the first Ma-

It had a fine port, excellent fortifications, and great riches. Here the mausoleum, one of the seven wonders of the world, was erected. It was celebrated for having given birth to Herodotus, Dionysius, Herachus, &c. and is also memorable for the long siege it maintained against Alexander, under the skilful command of Memnon, the general of Darius. vid. Memnon, and Mausoleum.] *Maxim. The cause was tried at Athens, in a place which has been called from thence Areopagus, (ἀρειος, Mars, and παρος, a hill), and the murderer was acquitted. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Paus. 1, c. 21.

HALYZIA, a town of Epirus near the Ache-lous, where the Athenians obtained a naval victory over the Lacedæmonians.

HALYS, [a celebrated river of Asia Minor, rising on the confines of Pontus and Armenia Minor, and which, after flowing westwardly through Cappadocia to the borders of Phrygia, turns to the north-west, and enters the Euxine some distance to the north-west of Amisus. Herodotus and Strabo both speak of its rising in the region we have mentioned, and pursuing the route described. Arrian and Pliny, however, make it rise in a far different quarter, viz. in the southern parts of Cataonia, near Tyana, at the foot of the chain of Mount Taurus. Rennell and others seek to reconcile these opposite statements, by giving the Halys two branches, an eastern and a southern one, and by supposing that Herodotus knew only the eastern, and Arrian only the southern one. This, however, merely increases the difficulty; for why would Strabo, a native of Amisus, be ignorant of the course of a river so near his native city; and why does he make no mention of the southern Halys, when he describes the very ground over which it is supposed to have flowed? Maunert thinks that this southern arm is the river which Tavernier calls the Jekel Ermak, or green river, which D'Anville, on the contrary, makes the modern name of the ancient Iris. The modern name of the Halys is the Kizil Ermak, or red river. According to Strabo, the ancient name of the river is owing to the circumstance of its passing in its course by some salt works. It is, however, a mere arbitrary derivation. This Eustathius evinces, who states that the river is called Halys by those who derive its name from salt; by others, however, Alys. This river formed the western boundary of the dominions of Cræsus, with which was connected a famous oracle. vid. Cræsus.

HARMONIA, or HERMIONEÆ, (vid. Hermione), a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. It is said that Vulcan, to avenge the infidelity of her mother, made her a present of a vestment dyed in all sorts of crimes, which in some measure, inspired all the children of Cadmus with wickedness and impiety. Paus. 9, c. 16, &c.

HARPAGUS, a general of Cyrus. He conquered Asia Minor after he had revolted from Astyages, who had cruelly made him eat the flesh of his son, because he had disobeyed his orders in not putting to death the infant Cyrus, Herodot. 1, c. 103.—Justin. 1, c. 5 and 6.

HARPALICE. vid. Harpalyce.

HARPALUS, a man intrusted with the treasures of Babylon by Alexander. His hopes that Alexander would perish in his expedition rendered him dissipated, negligent, and vicious. When he heard that the conqueror was returning with great resentment, he fled to Athens, where, with his money, he corrupted the orators, among was Demosthenes. When brought to justice, he escaped with impunity to Crete, where he was at last assassinated by Thimbro, B. C. 325. Plut. in Phoc.—Diod. 17.—A celebrated astronomer of Greece, 480 years B. C.

HARPALÝCÆ, the daughter of Harpalycus, king of Thrace. Her mother died when she was but a child, and her father fed her with the milk of cows and mares, and inured her early to sustain the fatigues of hunting. When her father's kingdom was invaded by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, she repelled and defeated the enemy with manly courage. The death of her father, which happened soon after in a sedition, rendered her disconsolate; she fled the society of mankind, and lived in the forests upon plunder and rapine. Every attempt to secure her proved fruitless, till her great swiftness was overcome by intercepting her with a net. After her death, the people of the country disputed their respective right to the possessions she had acquired by rapine, and they soon after appeased her manes by proper oblations on her tomb. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 21.—Hygin. fab. 193 and 252.

HARPOCRATES, a divinity supposed to be the same as Orus the son of Isis, among the Egyptians. He is represented as holding one of his fingers on his mouth, and from thence he is called the god of silence, and intimates, that the mysteries of religion and philosophy ought never to be revealed to the people. The Romans placed his statues at the entrance of their temples. [In like manner the Sphinxes at the entrances of the Egyptian temples were put there as emblems of silence. The Egyptians were accustomed to hang from the neck, or wear in a ring upon the finger, as an amulet, a small image of Harpocrates. He was represented under the form of a young infant, and appears to have been an astronomical divinity, and to have personified the return of the sun at the winter solstice.] Catull. 75.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 10.

HARPOCRATION, a Platonic philosopher of Argos, from whom Stobæus compiled his eclogues.—Valerius, a rhetorician of Alexandria, author of a Lexicon on ten orators.

HARPYIÆ, winged monsters, who had the face of a woman, the body of a vulture, and had their feet and fingers armed with sharp claws. They were three in number, Aello, Ocypete, and Celæno, daughters of Neptune and Terra. They were sent by Juno to plunder the tables of Phineus, whence they were driven to the islands called Strophades by Zethes and Calais. They emitted an infectious smell, and spoiled whatever they touched by their filth and excrements. They plundered Æneas during his voyage towards Italy, and predicted many of the calamities which attended him. [According to Damm, the term Harpya (ἀρπυία) signifies properly a violent wind, carrying off what is exposed to its fury; in other words, a furious whirlwind. Hence the fable of the Harpies. To the vivid imagination of the Greek, the terrors of the storm were intimately associated with the idea of powerful and active demons directing its fury. The names given to the Harpies indicate this, viz. Ocypeta, rapid, Celæno, obscurity, and Aello, a storm. In the earlier mythology of Greece they were represented merely as female demons: the mixed form commonly assigned them was the addition of a later age. M. Le Clerc has a curious though unfounded theory respecting the Harpies. He supposes them to have been a swarm of locusts, which, after they had laid waste Bithynia and Paphlagonia, produced a famine there. According to him, the word Arbē, of which he maintains that of Harpē is formed, signifies a locust; and as the northwind rid the country of them, having driven them as far as the Ionian Sea, where they perished, hence it was fabled that the sons of Boreas had put them to flight. Among many other objections to this explanation, it may suffice to urge but one here, namely, that the scene of the adventure of king Phineus is placed by the poets in Thrace, never in Asia.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 212, l. 6, v. 289.—Hesiod. Theog. 265.

HARŪDES, a people of Germany. Cæs. G. 1, c. 31.

HARUSPEX, a soothsayer at Rome, who drew omens by consulting the entrails of beasts that were sacrificed. He received the name of Aruspex, ab aris aspiciendis, and that of Extispex, ab extis inspiciendis. [Donatus, in his commentary on Terence's Phormio, (4, 28), assigns another derivation for Haruspex, namely, from haruga (the same as hostia, a victim,) and the old verb specio.] The order of Aruspices was first established at Rome by Romulus, and the first Aruspices were Tuscans by origin, as they were particularly famous in that branch of divination. They had received all their knowledge from a boy named Tages, who, as was commonly reported, sprung from a clod of earth. (vid. Tages.) They were originally three, but the Roman senate yearly sent six noble youths, or, according to others, twelve, to Etruria, to be instructed in all the mysteries of the art. The office of the Haruspices consisted in observing these four particulars: the beast before it was sacrificed; its entrails; the flames which consumed the sacrifice; and the flour, frankincense, &c. which was used. If the beast was led up to the altar with difficulty, if it escaped from the conductor's hands, roared when it received the blow, or died in agonies, the omen was unfortunate. But, on the contrary, if it followed without compulsion, received the blow without resistance, and died without groaning, and after much effusion of blood, the haruspex foretold prosperity. When the body of the victim was opened, each part was scrupulously examined. If any thing was wanting, if it had a double liver, or a lean heart, the omen was unfortunate. If the entrails fell from the hands of the haruspex, or seemed besmeared with too much blood, or if no heart appeared, as for instance it happened in the two victims which J. Cæsar offered a little before his death, the omen was equally unlucky. When the flame was quickly kindled, and when it violently consumed the sacrifice, and arose pure and bright, and like a pyramid, without any paleness, smoke, sparkling, or cracking, the omen was favourable. But the contrary augury was drawn when the fire was kindled with difficulty, and was extinguished before the sacrifice was totally consumed, or when it rolled in circles round the victim with intermediate spaces between the flames. In regard to the frankincense, meal, water, and wine, if there was any deficiency in the quantity, if the colour was different, or the quality was changed, or if any thing was done with irregularity, it was deemed inauspicious. This custom of consulting the entrails of victims did not originate in Tuscany, but it was in use among the Chaldeans, Greeks, Egyptians, &c. and the more enlightened part of mankind well knew how to render it subservient to their wishes or tyranny. Agesilaus, when in Egypt, raised the drooping spirits of his soldiers by a superstitious artifice. He secretly wrote in his hand the word victoria, in large characters, and holding the entrails of a victim in his hand till the impression was communicated to the flesh, he showed it to the soldiers, and animated them by observing, that the gods signified their approaching victories even by marking it in the body of the sacrificed animals. Cic. de Div.

HASDRUBAL. vid. Asdrubal.

HEBE, a daughter of Jupiter and Juno. According to some, she was the daughter of Juno only, who conceived her after eating lettuces. As she was fair, and always in the bloom of youth, she was called the goddess of youth, and made by her mother cup-bearer to all the gods. She was dismissed from her office by Jupiter, because she fell down in an indecent posture as she was pouring nectar to the gods at a grand festival, and Ganymedes, the favourite of Jupiter, succeeded her as cup-bearer. She was employed by her mother to prepare her chariot, and to harness her peacocks whenever requisite. When Hercules was raised to the rank of a god, he was reconciled to Juno by marrying her daughter Hebe, by whom he had two sons, Alexiades and Anicetus. As Hebe had the power of restoring gods and men to the vigour of youth, she, at the instance of her husband, performed that kind of office to Iolas his friend. Hebe was worshipped at Sicyon, under the name of Dia, and at Rome under the name of Juventas. She is represented as a young virgin crowned with flowers, and arrayed in a variegated garment. Paus. 1, c. 19, l. 2, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 400. Fast. 6, v. 76.—Apollod. 1, c. 3, l. 2, c. 7.

HEBRUS, now Maritsa, [the largest river of Thrace, rising from Mons Scœnius, and running in two channels till it comes to Philippopolis, where they unite. It empties by two mouths into the Ægean.] It was supposed to roll its waters upon golden sands. The head of Orpheus was thrown into it after it had been cut off by the Ciconian women, [and, being carried down to the sea, was borne on the waves, together with his lyre, to the island of Lesbos.] It received its name from Hebrus, son of Cassander, a king of Thrace, who was said to have drowned himself there. [At the junction of the Hebrus with the rivers Tonsus and Ardiscus, Orestes purified himself from his mother's blood. vid. Orestias.] Meia, 2, c. 2.—Strab. 7.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 463.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 50.

HECALËSIA, a festival in honour of Jupiter of Hecale, instituted by Theseus, or in commemoration of the kindness of Hecale, which Theseus had experienced when he went against the bull of Marathon, &c.

HECATÆ FANUM, a celebrated temple sacred to Hecate at Stratonice in Caria. Strab. 14.

HECATÆUS, an historian of Miletus, born 549 years before Christ, in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. [Antiquity mentions several authors by the name of Hecatæus. The one here spoken of is distinguished from Hecatæus of Abdera, &c. by the name of Milesian.] Herodot. 2, c. 143.

HECATE, a daughter of Perses and Asteria, the same as Proserpine, or Diana. [Some make the name (ἠκᾶτη) a feminine derivative from ἠκτος, which last was an epithet applied to Apollo, the brother of Diana, from his darting afar, ἠκας.] She was called Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate or Proserpine in hell, whence her name of Diva triformis, tergemina, triceps. She was supposed to preside over magic and enchantments, and was generally represented like a woman with three heads, that of a horse, a dog, or a boar, and sometimes she appeared with three different bodies, and three different faces only with one neck. Dogs, lambs, and honey, were generally offered to her, especially in high ways and cross roads, whence she obtained the name of Trivia. Her power was extended over heaven, the earth, sea, and hell; and to her, kings and nations supposed themselves indebted for their prosperity. Ovid. 7. Met. v. 94.—Hesiod. Theog.—Horat. 3, od. 22.—Paus. 2, c. 22.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 511.

HECATËSIA, a yearly festival observed by the Stratonicensians in honour of Hecate. The Athenians paid also particular worship to this goddess, who was deemed the patroness of families and of children. From this circumstance the statues of the goddess were erected before the doors of the houses, and upon every new moon a public supper was always provided at the expense of the richest people, and set in the streets where the poorest of the citizens were permitted to retire and feast upon it, while they reported that Hecate had devoured it. [This public supper was always held in a place where three ways met, in allusion to the triple nature of the goddess.] There were also expiatory offerings to supplicate the goddess to remove whatever evils might impend on the head of the public, &c.

HECATOMBOIA, a festival celebrated in honour of Juno by the Argians and people of Ægina. It receives its name from ἠκτος, and βοῦς, a sacrifice of a hundred oxen, which were always offered to the goddess, and the flesh distributed among the poorest citizens.

There were also public games first instituted by Archinus, a king of Argos, in which the prize was a shield of brass with a crown of myrtle. [There was also an anniversary sacrifice called by this name in Laconia, and offered for the preservation of the 100 cities which once flourished in that country.]

HECATOMPHONIA, [from ἠκτος, centum, and φονεῖν, occido], a solemn sacrifice offered by the Messenians to Jupiter, when any of them had killed an hundred enemies. [Aristomenes is said to have offered up this sacrifice three times in the course of the Messenian wars against Sparta.] Paus. 4, c. 19.

HECATOMPOLIS, an epithet given to Crete, from the hundred cities which it once contained. [The same epithet was also applied to Laconia.]

HECATOMPŪLOS, an epithet applied to Thebes in Egypt on account of its hundred gates. Ammian. 22, c. 16.—[The metropolis of Parthia, and royal residence of the Arsacidæ, situate in the district of Comisene, and south-west part of the province of Parthiène. The name is of Grecian origin, probably a translation of the native term, and has a figurative allusion to the numerous routes which diverge from this place to the adjacent country. D'Anville makes it correspond with the modern Demegau.] Plol. 6, c. 5.—Strab. 11.—Plin. 6, c. 15 and 25.

HECATONNËSI, small islands between Lesbos and Asia. [They derived their name from ἠκτος, an epithet of Apollo, according to Strabo, that deity being particularly worshipped along the continent of Asia, off which they lay. It seems more probable, however, that they had their name from ἠκτος, centum, and were called so from their great number. The modern name is Muco-nis, or the isles of mice.] Strab. 13.

HECTOR, son of king Priam and Hecuba, was the most valiant of all the Trojan chiefs that fought against the Greeks. He married Andromache, the daughter of Eetion, by whom he had Astyanax. He was appointed captain of all the Trojan forces, when Troy was besieged by the Greeks; and the valour with which he behaved showed how well qualified he was to discharge that important office. He engaged with the bravest of the Greeks, and, according to Hyginus, no less than 31 of the most valiant of the enemy perished by his hand. When Achilles had driven back the Trojans towards the city, Hector, too great to fly, waited the approach of his enemy near the Scaengates, though his father and mother, with tears in their eyes, blamed his rashness and entreated him to retire. The sight of Achilles terrified him, and he fled before him in the plain. The Greek pursued and Hector was killed, and his body was dragged in cruel triumph by the conqueror round the tomb of Patroclus whom Hector had killed. The body, after it had received the grossest insults, was ransomed by old Priam, and the Trojans obtained from the Greeks a truce of some days to pay the last offices to the greatest of their leaders. The Thebans boasted in the age of the geographer Pausanias that they had the ashes of Hector preserved in an urn, by order of an oracle; which promised them undisturbed felicity if they were in possession of that hero's remains. The epithet of Hectoreus is applied by the poets to the Trojans, as best expressive of valour and intrepidity. Hom. r. Il. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Ovid. Met. 12 and 13.—*Dictys. HECUBA, a daughter of Dymas, a Phrygian prince, or, according to others, of Cisseis, a Thracian king, was the second wife of Priam king of Troy, and proved the chastest of women, and the most tender and unfortunate of mothers. When she was pregnant of Paris, she dreamed that she had brought into the world a burning torch which had reduced her husband's palace and all Troy to ashes. So alarming a dream was explained by the soothsayers, who declared that the son she should bring into the world would prove the ruin of his country. When Paris was born she exposed him on Mount Ida to avert the calamities which threatened her family; but her attempts to destroy him were fruitless, and the prediction of the soothsayers was fulfilled. [vid. Paris.] During the Trojan war she saw the greatest part of her children perish by the hands of the enemy, and like a mother, she confessed her grief by her tears and lamentations, particularly at the death of Hector her eldest son. When Troy was taken, Hecuba, as one of the captives, fell to the lot of Ulysses, a man whom she hated for his perfidy and avarice, and she embarked with the conquerors for Greece. The Greeks landed in the Thracian Chersonesus to load with fresh honours the grave of Achilles. During their stay the hero's ghost appeared to them and demanded, to ensure the safety of their return, the sacrifice of Polyxena, Hecuba's daughter. They complied, and Polyxena was torn from her mother to be sacrificed. Hecuba was inconsolable, and her grief was still more increased at the sight of the body of her son Polydorus washed on the shore, who had been recommended by his father to the care and humanity of Polymnestor king of the country. [vid. Polydorus.] She determined to revenge the death of her son, and with the greatest indignation went to the house of his murderer, and tore his eyes, and attempted to deprive him of his life. She was hindered from executing her bloody purpose by the arrival of some Thracians, and she fled with the female companions of her captivity. She was pursued, and when she ran after the stones that were thrown at her, she found herself suddenly changed into a bitch, and when she attempted to speak, found that she could only bark. After this metamorphosis she threw herself into the sea, according to Hyginus, and that place was, from that circumstance, called Cyneum. [vid. Cynosema.] Hecuba had a great number of children by Priam, among whom were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Pammon, Helenus, Polytes, Antiphon, Hipponous, Polydorus, Troilus; and among the daughters, Creusa, Ilione, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. *Ovid. HEGEMON, a Thasian poet in the age of Alcibiades. He wrote a poem called Gigantomachia, besides other works. Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 11.

HEGESIUS, a philosopher who so eloquently convinced his auditors of their failings and follies, and persuaded them that there were no dangers after death, that many were guilty of suicide. Ptolemy forbade him to continue his doctrines. Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 34.—A famous orator of Magnesia, who corrupted the elegant diction of Attica, by the introduction of Asiatic idioms. *Cic. HEGESIPPUS, [was by birth a Jew, and educated in the religion of his fathers. He afterwards was converted to Christianity, and became bishop of Rome about the year 177, where he died in the reign of the emperor Commodus, about the year 180. He was the author of an ecclesiastical history from the period of our Saviour's death down to his own time, which, according to Eusebius, contained a faithful relation of the apostolic preaching written in a very simple style. The principal value of the existing fragments arises from the testimony which may be deduced from Scriptural passages quoted in them in favour of the genuineness of the books of the New Testament.]

HEGESISTRATUS, an Ephesian who consulted the oracle to know in what particular place he should fix his residence. He was directed to settle where he found peasants dancing with crowns of olives. This was in Asia, where he founded Elea, &c.

HELËNA, the most beautiful woman of her age, sprung from one of the eggs which Leda, the wife of king Tyndarus, brought forth after her amour with Jupiter metamorphosed into a swan. [vid. Leda, and also Clytemnestra, where an explanation is given of this fable of the egg: see also the remarks appended respectively to the articles Græcia, Paris, and Troja.] According to some authors, Helen was daughter of Nemesis by Jupiter, and Leda was only her nurse; and to reconcile this variety of opinions, some imagine that Nemesis and Leda are the same persons. Her beauty was so universally admired, even in her infancy, that Theseus, with his friend Pirithous, carried her away before she had attained her tenth year, and concealed her at Aphidnæ, under the care of his mother Æthra. Her brothers, Castor and Pollux, recovered her by force of arms, and she returned safe and unpolluted to Sparta, her native country. There existed, however, a tradition recorded by Pausanias, that Helen was of nubile years when carried away by Theseus, and that she had a daughter by her ravisher, who was intrusted to the care of Clytemnestra. This violence offered to her virtue did not in the least diminish, but it rather augmented, her fame, and her hand was eagerly solicited by the young princes of Greece. The most celebrated of her suitors were Ulysses son of Laertes, Antilochus son of Nestor, Sthenelus son of Capaneus, Diomedes son of Tydeus, Amphilochus son of Cteatus, Meges son of Phileus, Agapenor son of Ancaeus, Thalpius son of Eurytus, Mnestheus son of Peteus, Schedius son of Epistrophus, Polyxenus son of Agasthenes, Amphilochus son of Amphiaras, Ascalaphus and Ialmus sons of the god Mars, Ajax son of Oileus, Eumelus son of Admetus, Polypœtes son of Pirithous, Elphenor son of Chalcodon, Podalirius and Machaon sons of Æsculapius, Leonteus son of Coronus, Philoctetes son of Pœan, Protesilaus son of Iphiclus, Eurypilus son of Evemon, Ajax and Teucer sons of Telamon, Patroclus son of Menœtius, Menelaus son of Atreus, Thoas, Idomeneus, and Merion. Tyndarus was rather alarmed than pleased at the sight of such a number of illustrious princes, who eagerly solicited each to become his son-in-law. He knew that he could not prefer one without displeasing all the rest, and from this perplexity he was at last drawn by the artifice of Ulysses, who began to be already known in Greece by his prudence and sagacity. This prince, who clearly saw that his pretensions to Helen would not probably meet with success in opposition to so many rivals, proposed to extricate Tyndarus from all his difficulties, if he would promise him his niece Penelope in marriage. Tyndarus consented, and Ulysses advised the king to bind, by a solemn oath, all the suitors, that they would approve of the uninfluenced choice which Helen should make of one among them; and engage to unite together to defend her person and character if ever any attempts were made to ravish her from the arms of her husband. The advice of Ulysses was followed, the princes consented, and Helen fixed her choice upon Menelaus and married him. Hermione was the early fruit of this union, which continued for three years with mutual happiness. After this, Paris, son of Priam king of Troy, came to Lacedæmon on pretence of sacrificing to Apollo. He was kindly received by Menelaus, but shamefully abused his favours, and in his absence in Crete he corrupted the fidelity of his wife Helen, and persuaded her to follow him to Troy, B. C. 1198. At his return Menelaus, highly sensible of the injury he had received, assembled the Grecian princes, and reminded them of their solemn promises. They resolved to make war against the Trojans; but they previously sent ambassadors to Priam to demand the restitution of Helen. The influence of Paris at his father's court prevented the restoration, and the Greeks returned home without receiving the satisfaction they required. Soon after their return their combined forces assembled and sailed for the coast of Asia. The behaviour of Helen during the Trojan war is not clearly known. Some assert that she had willingly followed Paris, and that she warmly supported the cause of the Trojans; while others believe that she always sighed after her husband and cursed the day in which she had proved faithless to his bed. Homer represents her as in the last instance, and some have added that she often betrayed the schemes and resolutions of the Trojans, and secretly favoured the cause of Greece. When Paris was killed, in the ninth year of the war, she voluntarily married Deiphobus, one of Priam's sons, and when Troy was taken she made no scruple to betray him and to introduce the Greeks into his chamber, to ingratiate herself with Menelaus. She returned to Sparta, and the love of Menelaus forgave the errors which she had committed. Some, however, say that she obtained her life even with difficulty from her husband, whose resentment she had kindled by her infidelity. After she had lived for some years at Sparta Menelaus died, and she was driven from Peloponnesus by Magapenthes and Nicostratus, the illegitimate sons of her husband, and she retired to Rhodes, where at that time Polyxo, a native of Argos, reigned over the country. Polyxo remembered that her widowhood originated in Helen, and that her husband Tlepolemus had been killed in the Trojan war which had been caused by the infidelity of Helen, therefore she meditated revenge. While Helen one day retired to bathe in the river, Polyxo disguised her attendants in the habits of furies, and sent them with orders to murder her enemy. Helen was tied to a tree and strangled, and her misfortunes were afterwards remembered, and the crimes of Polyxo expiated, by the temple which the Rhodians raised to Helen Dendritis. There is a tradition mentioned by Herodotus, which says that Paris was driven, as he returned from Sparta, upon the coast of Egypt, where Proteus, king of the country, expelled him from his dominions for his ingratitude to Menelaus, and confined Helen. From that circumstance, therefore, Priam informed the Grecian ambassadors, that neither Helen nor her possessions were in Troy, but in the hands of the king of Egypt. In spite of this assertion the Greeks besieged the town, and took it after ten years' siege, and Menelaus, by visiting Egypt, as he returned home, recovered Helen at the court of Proteus, and was convinced that the Trojan war had been undertaken on very unjust and unpardonable grounds. Helen was honoured after death as a goddess, and the Spartans built her a temple at Therapne, which had the power of giving beauty to all the deformed women that entered it. Helen, according to some, was carried into the island of Leuce after death, where she married Achilles, who had been one of her warmest admirers. The age of Helen has been a matter of deep inquiry among the chronologists. If she was born of the same eggs as Castor and Pollux, who ac-compared the Argonauts in their expedition against Colchis about 35 years before the Trojan war, according to some, she was no less than 60 years old when Troy was reduced to ashes, supposing that her brothers were only 15 when they embarked with the Argonauts. But she is represented by Homer so incomparably beautiful during the siege of Troy, that though seen at a distance she influenced the counsellors of Priam by the brightness of her charms; therefore we must suppose with others that her beauty remained long undiminished, and was extinguished only at her death. Paus. 3, c. 19, &c.—Apolod. 3, c. 10, &c.—Hygin. fab. 77.—Herodot. 2, c. 112.—Plut. in Thes. &c.—Cic. de Offic. 3.—Horat. 3, od. 3.—*Dictys. HELÉNIA, a festival in Laconia in honour of Helen, who received there divine honours. It was celebrated by virgins riding upon mules, and in chariots made of reeds and bull-rushes.

HELÉNUS, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Priam and Hecuba, greatly respected by all the Trojans. When Deiphobus was given in marriage to Helen in preference to himself, he resolved to leave his country, and he retired to Mount Ida, where Ulysses took him prisoner by the advice of Calchas. As he was well acquainted with futurity, the Greeks made use of prayers, threats, and promises, to induce him to reveal the secrets of the Trojans, and either the fear of death or gratification of resentment, seduced him to disclose to the enemies of his country, that Troy could not be taken whilst it was in possession of the Palladium, nor before Philoctetes came from his retreat to Lemnos, and assisted to support the siege. After the ruin of his country, he fell to the share of Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, and saved his life by warning him to avoid a dangerous tempest, which in reality proved fatal to all those who set sail. This endeared him to Pyrrhus, and he received from his hand Andromache, the widow of his brother Hector, by whom he had a son called Cestrinus. This marriage, according to some, was consummated after the death of Pyrrhus, who lived with Andromache as his wife. Helenus was the only one of Priam's sons who survived the ruin of his country. After the death of Pyrrhus, he reigned over part of Epirus, which he called Chaonia in memory of his brother Chaon, whom he had inadvertently killed. Helenus received Æneas as he voyaged towards Italy, and foretold him some of the calamities which attended his fleet. The manner in which he received the gift of prophecy is doubtful. *vid. HELIADES, the daughters of the Sun and Clymene. They were three in number, Lampetie, Phaëtusa, and Lampethusa, or seven according to Hyginus, Merope, Helie, Ægle, Lampetie, Phœbe, Ætheria, and Dioxippe. They were so afflicted at the death of their brother Phaeton, [vid. Phaeton,] that they were changed by the gods into poplars, and their tears into precious amber, on the banks of the river Po. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 340.—Hygin. fab. 154.—The first inhabitants of Rhodes. This island, being covered with mud when the world was first created, was warmed by the cherishing beams of the sun, and from thence sprang seven men, which were called Heliades, ἀπο τοῦ ἡλίου, from the sun. The eldest of these, called Ochimus, married Hegetoria, one of the nymphs of the island, and his brothers fled from the country, for having put to death, through jealousy, one of their number. Diod. 5.

HELIASTE, a name given to the judges of the most numerous tribunal at Athens. [Of all the courts which took cognizance of civil affairs the Ἡλιαία was the most celebrated and frequented. It derived its name ἀπο τοῦ ἀλιζισθαί, from the thronging of the people, or, according to others, ἀπο τοῦ ἡλίου, from the sun, because it was in an open place and exposed to the sun's rays. The judges that sat in this court were at least 50, and sometimes 2 or 500. Sometimes 1000 were called in, and then two courts were joined; sometimes 1500 or 2000, and then three or four courts met. They took cognizance of affairs of the highest importance. They were summoned by the Thesmothetæ, before whom they took a solemn oath which is preserved in the oration of Demosthenes against Timocrates. They sat from sun-rise to sun-set.] Demosth. contr. Tim.—Diog. in Sat.

HELICE, a star near the north pole, generally called Ursa Major. It is supposed to receive its name from the town of Helice, of which Calisto, who was changed into the Great Bear, was an inhabitant. Lucan. 2, v. 237.

HELICON, [a famous mountain in Bœotia, near the gulf of Corinth. It was sacred to Apollo and the Muses, who were thence called Heliconiades. This mountain was famed for the pureness of its air, the abundance of its waters, its fertile valleys, the goodness of its shades, and the beauty of the venerable trees which clothed its sides. The nine muses had here their statues of wood; and here also were statues of Apollo and Mercury, of Bacchus by Lysippus, of Orpheus, and of famous poets and musicians. The fountain Hippocrene, that of Narcissus, and a small river, named Permessus, flowed at the foot of this mountain; and here also was shown the sepulchre of Orpheus. It is now called Zagura, or Zagaro Vouini.] Strab. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 219.—Paus. 9, c. 23, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 641.—[A river of Macedonia near Dium; after having pursued a course of 65 stadia, it sank under ground and assumed the name of Baphyrus.] Paus. 9, c. 30.

HĒLĪCŌNIĀDES, a name given to the Muses, because they lived upon Mount Helicon, which was sacred to them.

HELIODŌRUS [was born at Emesa in Phœnicia, and flourished under the emperors Theodosius and Arcadius at the close of the fourth century. He was raised to the dignity of a bishop of Tricca in Thessaly. He composed in early life an ingenious romance relating the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea, the best editions of which are that of Bourdelot, Paris, 1619, 8vo.; that of Mitscherlich, Argent. 1793, in 2 vols. 8vo.; and that of Coray, Paris, 1804. It was first printed at Basil in 1534; the copy from which it was taken having been saved by a common soldier at the sack of Buda.]—[A mathematician of Larissa, in the reign of Tiberius, author of a treatise on optics, the best edition of which is that of Bertholin. He is supposed to have been the author of a treatise on weights and measures, found among the MSS. of Isaac Vossius.]

HELIOGABĀLUS, a deity among the Phœnicians. [This deity, according to Capitolinus and Aurelius Victor, was the same with the Sun. Lampridius, however, fluctuates between the Sun and Jupiter, while Spartianus, in the life of Caracalla, leaves it uncertain. The orthography of the name is also disputed, some writing it Elagabalus, others Eleagabalus and Alagabalus. The principal seat of his worship was at Emesa in Syria, although Capitolinus terms the name of the god a Phœnician one. His image was a large black stone of a conical shape.]—M. Aurelius Antoninus, a Roman emperor, son of Varius Marcellus, called Heliogabalus, because he had been priest of that divinity in Phœnicia. After the death of Maximian he was invested with the imperial purple, and the senate, however unwilling to submit to a youth only 14 years of age, approved of his election, and bestowed upon him the title of Augustus. Heliogabalus made his grandmother Mœsa, and his mother Sœmias, his colleagues on the throne; and to bestow more dignity upon the sex, he chose a senate of women, over which his mother presided, and prescribed all the modes and fashions which prevailed in the empire. Rome, however, soon displayed a scene of cruelty and debauchery; the imperial palace was full of prostitution, and the most infamous of the populace became the favourites of the prince. He raised his horse to the honours of the consulship, and obliged his subjects to pay adoration to the god Heliogabalus, which was no other than a large black stone, whose figure resembled that of a cone. To this ridiculous deity temples were raised at Rome, and the altars of the gods plundered to deck those of the new divinity. In the midst of his extravagances, Heliogabalus married four wives, and not satisfied with following the plain laws of nature, he professed himself to be a woman, and gave himself up to one of his officers, called Hierocles. In this ridiculous farce he suffered the greatest indignities from his pretended husband without dissatisfaction; and Hierocles, by stooping to infamy, became the most powerful of the favourites, and enriched himself by selling favours and offices to the people. Such licentiousness soon displeased the populace, and Heliogabalus, unable to appease the seditions of the soldiers, whom his rapacity and debaucheries had irritated, hid himself in the filth and excrements of the camp, where he was found in the arms of his mother. His head was severed from his body the 10th of March, A. D. 222, in the 18th year of his age, after a reign of three years nine months and four days. He was succeeded by Alexander Severus. His cruelties were as conspicuous as his licentiousness. He burdened his subjects with the most oppressive taxes, his halls were covered with carpets of gold and silver tissue, and his mats were made with the down of hares, and with the soft feathers which were found under the wings of partridges. He was fond of covering his shoes with precious stones to draw the admiration of the people as he walked along the streets, and he was the first Roman who ever wore a dress of silk. He often invited the most common of the people to share his banquets, and made them sit down on large bellows full of wind, which, by suddenly emptying themselves, threw the guests on the ground, and left them a prey to wild beasts. He often tied some of his favourites on a large wheel, and was particularly delighted to see them whirled round like Ixions, and sometimes suspended in the air, or sunk beneath the water.

HELIOPŌLIS, [a famous city of Egypt, situate a little to the east of the apex of the Delta, not far from modern Cairo. In Hebrew it is styled On or Aun, which term signifies strength, riches. In the Septuagint it is called Heliopolis (Ἡλιούπολις,) or the city of the sun. Herodotus also mentions it by this name, and speaks of its inhabitants as being the wisest and most ingenious of all the Egyptians. According to Berosus, this was the city of Moses. It was in fact a place of resort for all the Greeks who visited Egypt for instruction. Hither came Herodotus, Plato, Eudoxus, and others, and imbibed much of the learning which they afterwards disseminated among their own countrymen. Plato, in particular, resided here three years. The city was built, according to Strabo, on a long artificial mound of earth, so as to be out of the reach of the inundations of the Nile. It had an oracle of Apollo, and a famous temple of the sun, in which was a mirror so disposed that it reflected the ray of that luminary all day long, and enlightened the whole temple with great splendour. Hence the name of the city, Heliopolis. In this temple was fed and adored the sacred ox Mnevis, as Apis was at Memphis. This city was laid waste with fire and sword by Cambyses, and its college of priests all slaughtered. A solitary obelisk alone remains at the present day to point out the spot where it once stood. Heliopolis was famed also for its fountain of excellent water, which still remains, and gave rise to the subsequent Arabic name of the place, Ain Shems, or the fountain of the sun. The modern name is Matarea, or cool water.]—[Another city of Egypt, according to some geographers, who locate it in the Thebaid, and make it to be the On of Scripture. It is all, however, a matter of uncertainty.]—[A city of Syria, south-west of Emesa, on the opposite side of the Orontes. It is now Balbeck. Here are to be seen the ruins of a most magnificent temple of the sun.]

HELLIUM, a name given to the mouth of the Meuse. Plin. 4, c. 15.

HELLIUS, [Ἥλιος] the Greek name of the sun or Apollo.

HELLANICUS, a celebrated Greek historian, born at Mitylene. He wrote an history of the ancient kings of the earth, with an account of the founders of the most famous towns in every kingdom, and died B. C. 411, in the 85th year of his age. Paus. 2, c. 3.—Cic. de Orat. 2, c. 53.—Aul. Gel. 15, c. 23.—An historian of Miletus, who wrote a description of the earth.

HELLAS, [a term first applied to a city and region of Thessaly, in the district of Phthiotis, where Hellen the son of Deucalion reigned, but afterwards extended to all Thessaly, and finally made a general appellation for the whole of Greece. Thessaly itself excluded. vid. an explanation of this in the remarks appended to the article Græcia.] Plin. 4, c. 7.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 20.

HELLE, a daughter of Athamus and Nephele, sister of Phryxus. She fled from her father's house with her brother, to avoid the cruel oppression of her mother-in-law Ino. According to some accounts she was carried through the air on a golden ram which her mother had received from Neptune, and in her passage she became giddy, and fell from her seat into that part of the sea which from her received the name of Hellespont. Others say that she was carried on a cloud, or rather in a ship, from which she fell into the sea and was drowned. Phryxus, after he had given his sister a burial on the neighbouring coasts, pursued his journey and arrived safe in Colchis. (vid. Phryxus.) Ovid. Heroid. 13, &c. Met. 4, fab. 14.—Pindar. 4.—Pyth.—Paus. 9, c. 24.

HELLEN, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned in Phthiotis about 1495 years before the Christian era, and gave the name of Hellenes [Ἕλληνες] to his subjects. He had, by his wife Orseus, three sons; Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus, who gave their names to the three different nations known under the name of Æolians, Dorians, and Ionians.

These last derive their name from Ion, son of Xuthus, and from the difference either of expression or pronunciation, in their respective languages, arose the different dialects well known in the Greek language. [Hellen appears to have been an imaginary personage; (vid. remarks under the article Deucalion.) An account of the movements of the early Greek tribes may be found in the remarks appended to the article Græcia.] Paus. 3, c. 20, l. 7, c. 1.—Diod. 5.

HELLENES, [a name first given to the subjects of Hellen, but afterwards a general appellation for the people of Greece. The word occurs only once in Homer, (Il. 2, 684.) and is used not as a generic, but as a specific name for the inhabitants of that part of Thessaly called Hellas. Greece, according to Thucydides, had no one general appellation before the Trojan war, but the several nations took their distinguishing names from themselves, and Pelasgicum was the name of the largest tract. "But when Hellen and his sons," adds the historian, "had acquired power in Phthiotis, and led out their dependants by way of aid to other cities, conversation made the use of this name become much more frequent among the several people, though it was long before it so prevailed as to become the general appellation of them all." See more respecting the Hellenes in the remarks under the article Græcia.]

HELLESPONTIAS, a wind blowing from the north-east. Plin. 2, c. 47.

HELLESPONTUS, now the Dardanelles, a narrow strait between Asia and Europe, near the Propontis, which received its name from Helle who was drowned there in her voyage to Colchis. (vid. Helle.) [Its modern name of Dardanelles is supposed to come from the ancient city of Dardanus. (vid. Dardanus.) Its breadth and length are variously stated. (vid. Bosphorus, and the extract from Hobhouse given below.) Homer's epithet of ἄπειρος, boundless, applied to so narrow a strait, has given rise to much discussion, and is one of the points which have a bearing on the long-agitated question respecting the site of Troy. Mr. Hobhouse undertakes to explain the seeming inconsistency of Homer's term, by showing that the Hellespont should be considered as extending down to the promontory of Lectum, the northern boundary of Æolia, and that the whole line of coast to this point from Abydos, was considered by Strabo as being the shores of the Hellespont, not of the Ægean. The same writer observes, with regard to the breadth of the Hellespont, that it no where seems to be less than a mile across; and yet the ancient measurements give only seven stadia or 875 paces.] It is celebrated for the love and death of Leander. [vid. Hero and Leander.] It is also famed for the bridge of boats which Xerxes built over it when he invaded Greece. The folly of this prince is well known in beating and fettering the waves of the sea, whose impetuosity destroyed his ships, and rendered all his la-hours ineffectual. Strab. 13.—Plin. 8, c. 32.—Herodot. 7, c. 34.—Polyb.—Mela, 1, c. 1.—Ptol. 5, c. 2.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 407.—Liv. 31, c. 15, l. 33, c. 33.—The country along the Hellespont on the Asiatic coast bears the same name. Cic. Verr. 1, c. 24.—Strab. 12.—Plin. 5, c. 30.

HELLOPIA, a small country of Eubœa. The people were called Hellopes. The whole island bore the same name according to Strabo. Plin. 4, c. 12.

HELLŌTIA, two festivals, one of which was observed in Crete, in honour of Europa, whose bones were then carried in solemn procession, with a myrtle garland no less than twenty cubits in circumference, called ἑλλοτία. The other festival was celebrated at Corinth with games and races, where young men entered the lists and generally ran with burning torches in their hands. It was instituted in honour of Minerva, surnamed Hellotis, ἀπο τοῦ ἔλου, from a certain pond of Marathon, where one of her statues was erected, or ἀπο τοῦ ἔλαιν τοῦ ἵππου τὸν Πέγασον, because by her assistance Bellerophon took and managed the horse Pegasus, which was the original cause of the institution of the festival. Others derive the name from Hellotis, a Corinthian woman, from the following circumstance: when the Dorians and the Heraclidæ invaded Peloponnesus, they took and burnt Corinth; the inhabitants, and particularly the women, escaped by flight, except Hellotis and her sister Eurytione, who took shelter in Minerva's temple relying for safety upon the sanctity of the place. When this was known the Dorians set fire to the temple, and the two sisters perished in the flames. This wanton cruelty was followed by a dreadful plague, and the Dorians, to alleviate the misfortunes which they suffered, were directed by the oracle to appease the manes of the two sisters, and therefore they raised a new temple to the goddess Minerva, and established the festivals which bore the name of one of the unfortunate women.

HELŌRUM, [a town of Sicily below Syracuse, the vestiges of which are called Muri Ucci. The adjacent country was so beautiful as to be called the Helorian Tempe. It was situate at the mouth of a small stream called the Helorus.]

HELOS, a town of Laconia taken and destroyed by the Lacedæmonians under Agis the third, of the race of the Heraclidæ, because they refused to pay the tribute which was imposed upon them. The Lacedæmonians carried their resentment so far, that, not satisfied with the ruin of the city, they reduced the inhabitants to the lowest and most miserable slavery, and made a law which forbade their masters either to give them their liberty, or to sell them in any other country. To complete their infamy, all the slaves of the state and the prisoners of war were called by the mean appellation of Helotæ. Not only the servile offices in which they were employed denoted their misery and slavery, but they were obliged to wear pecu-
